The third movement, andante con moto, is again dull and uninteresting. It begins with an imitation of a well-known Irish harp prelude, "Try if it's in tune," which is anything but a diverting musical passage. Later on we are struck by a passage which is note for note the same as the theme of the slow movement of Brahms's fourth symphony. Dr. Stanford's friends probably called his attention to this parallelism, as he elaborately explains on the title page of his score that the motive in question is an old Irish tune called "The Lament of the Sons of Usnach." This he regards as a sufficient explanation; but it does not alter the fact that this similarity produces an unfortunate effect on the listener. The fourth and last movement, on the contrary, is a splendid piece of bold and stirring orchestral writing. It is built upon the themes of two fine old Irish folk-songs, "Remember the glories of Brian the brave" and "Let Erin remember the days of old." Both of these tunes are excellently adapted for use as themes, and Dr. Stanford has indeed made the best of his opportunities. The orchestration is always brilliant, and in places very broad and grand, and the closing passages, where the second of the tunes is scored fortissimo for the whole orchestra, produce a really magnificent effect. Mr. Nikisch deserves the thanks of the public for giving them opportunities to become familiar with compositions from so many different schools and countries, and we ought all to be glad that we have so good a programme maker in charge of our orchestra.

ARTHUR WELD.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, FEB, 24, 1890.

The Symphony Concert of Saturday—Joseffy as Soloist.

The concert of Saturday was of especial interest in two of its numbers, and the fact that Joseffy appeared as the soloist was sufficient to fill the hall to overflowing. The programme began with the overture to "Oberon," which was given with excellent effect, the shading and unity of attack being all that could be desired, and if the contrasts were a little sharply drawn, such dramatic effects are quite legitimate in a Weber work, which scarcely admits of the calm balance of a Brahms' composition.

Mr. Joseffy made a grand success in the A major concerto by Liszt. It is not as popular a work as the one in E flat, but its themes are more refined, and the whole work is more poetic and inspired. Mr. Joseffy is evidently broadening in his style, and his massive playing in the first part was as successful as his delicacy in the later portions. The passages between oboe and piano were especially dainty, and the celestial effects with the violins in the highest positions and afterwards pizzicato, were splendidly given, both by the orchestral strings and the pianist. The form of the work is rather that of a rhapsody than of a concerto, and the continuous development is somewhat abstruse for the non-musician. It was all the more remarkable therefore that the pianist was called out time after time at the conclusion of the work, but the great enthusiasm was fully merited.

The symphony which closed the programme was also a success. Mr. Nikisch gives proof that he is not bound up in prejudice by giving us many different schools of composition, and the appearance of the "Irish Symphony" on the programme was a further proof of his catholic tastes. The work of Dr. Villiers Stanford has received the approval of such men as Richter and von Bülow, and it is unquestionably one of the best specimens of the large instrumental forms that England has yet given us. To make an appropriate bull, the three best English instrumental composers of the present are German, Irish and Scotch. Cowen, Stanford and Hamish MacCunn are all noticeably founding their works on the solid basis of the folksong, and there is more than a possibility that the Scandinavian Symphony, the Welsh Symphony and the present Irish one will be followed by a Scottish work in the same mould by a Scotchman. In the first movement of the Irish Symphony there is no direct folksong influence, but Dr. Stanford contents himself with picturing the sombre tints of the Celtic music. The development here is rather prolix, which is an important defect. Only Brahms can launch into extended development without becoming prosy. The Scherzo is placed second in this work, a proceeding which is amply justified by the dark tints of the first movement. It is a hop-jig, full of the most characteristic expression. What a fine collection of folk-dances the moderns are getting in the latterday music! Brahms and Liszt have idealized the Hungarian dances, Dvorak gives us the Bohemian Furiant, Tschaikowsky presents the Kamarinskaia, Grieg and Svendsen bring in the Halling, and this hop-jig with its finely contrasted trio is a worthy addition to the list. The third movement has the weird wailing character of some of the old Celtic minor strains and is indeed founded on an Irish melody, "The lament of the sons of Usnach," and here it is curious how extremes meet, for the figure which is made so prominent during this movement is precisely the same that Brahms uses so effectively in the slow movement of his fourth symphony. The finale is the worthiest movement of all, and presents two Irish themes worked up finely together. The culmination is in a broad treatment of "Let Erin Remember," which is brought out with the full power of the brasses. It is doubly appropriate, both because of Moore's words, and the fact that they are associated with an old melody, "The Red Fox." The performance of the work was all that could be desired, the strings doing excellent work in the jig, the horns giving fine contrasts, the harp being appropriately prominent in the third movement, and the brasses majestic in the finale. Nor must I forget to chronicle the superb orchestral work and its leadership in the concerto, few conductors could have achieved such power and elasticity.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

BOSTON HERALD.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 25, 1890.

KNEISEL QUARTET CONCERT.

The patrons of the series of concerts by the Kneisel quartet enjoyed another excellent programme of chamber music at Union Hall last evening, the quartet being assisted by Mr. Arthur Whiting, pianist, and Mr. Leo Schulz, violinist. The programme consisted of Mr. G. W. Chadwick's piano quintet in E flat, Haydn's quartet in G major, No. 41, and Schubert's quintet in C major. The quintet by Mr. Chadwick had its first hearing in these concerts on this occasion, and the composer and the performers are alike to be complimented upon the results attending its performance. Happy the composer whose works find a place upon these programmes, for he is thus assured that they will be heard in public only after the most intelligent and conscientious preparation. The performers are also to be congratulated in having so worthy a work to present as a tribute to the American composer, as Mr. Chadwick's quintet represents him at his best, the impression gained of its merits at its performance two years ago being fully confirmed in last evening's performance. Mr. Whiting proved an excellent assisting artist in the quintet, and fully sustained his share of the admirable work done in the performance of Mr. Chadwick's composition. The Haydn quartet and the Schubert quintet filled out the evening's programme most happily, and these enjoyable chamber music numbers had a most attentive hearing.

Clipping from Standard
New Bedford Mass
Date ... 2/25

BIG SALE.—The sale of reserved seats for the Boston Symphony concert began promptly at 9 o'clock in the Y. M. C. A. rooms this forenoon, at which time the rooms were well filled by subscribers anxious to secure the best seats. From 9 o'clock to 12 o'clock the crowd continued pouring in, keeping Messrs. W. E. Lougee, W. H. Wood, Charles S. Kelley and Lieut. Simms of the committee busy waiting upon them in an improvised office in the boys' room. The sale was very large, about $900 having been received up to 2 o'clock this afternoon. The sale will continue through to-day up to 10 p. m. By 7 30 this morning the subscribers began to gather in force, though we hear of instances of some presenting themselves as early as 3 this morning. There are some good seats yet unsold, and we would advise subscribers to hasten if they would secure them, as enough have been subscribed for to insure the occupancy of about all the desirable seats in the house. It is calculated the entire sale of tickets will aggregate $1,950. The estimate is made from the subscriptions already handed in.

UNION HALL, 18 BOLYSTON STREET.

FIFTH SEASON 1889-90.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin.
Mr. OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin.
Mr. LOUIS SVEĆENSKI, Viola.
Mr. ANTON HEKKING, Violoncello.

WITH THE ASSISTANCE OF

Mr. ARTHUR WHITING, Pianist.
Mr. LEO SCHULZ, Violoncello.

IV. CONCERT.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 24TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

G. W. CHADWICK. QUINTET in E flat for PIANOFORTE AND STRINGS.
Allegro Sostenuto.—E flat major.
Andante Cantabile.—A flat major.
Allegretto Grazioso (Intermezzo).—C minor.
Allegro Energico.—E flat major.

HAYDN. QUARTET in G, op. 33, No. 5.
Vivace assai.—
Largo.—
Scherzo.—
Finale.—

SCHUBERT. QUINTET for STRINGS in C, op. 163.
Allegro ma non troppo.—C major.
Adagio.—E major; with Episode.—F. minor.
Scherzo, presto.—C major; with Trio, andante sostenuto.—D flat major.
Finale, allegretto.—C minor and major.

The Pianoforte is a Steinway.

FIFTH CONCERT, Monday, March 31st, at 8 P. M.

Boston Post

TUESDAY MORNING, FEB. 25, 1890

FOURTH KNEISEL QUARTETTE CONCERT.

There was a large house at the concert by the Kneisel Quartette last night, and an admirable programme was given, as follows:

Quintette in E flat for pianoforte and strings.....G. W. Chadwick
Quartette in G, op. 33, No. 5.....Haydn
Quintette for strings in C, op. 163...Schubert

Mr. Chadwick's quintette is unquestionably a beautiful work; in fact, in some places (notably the theme and whole opening portions of the slow movement) it proves itself worthy of rank among the highest-standing compositions of this class. The first movement is scholarly, but by no means pedantic, and the themes are developed and elaborated in a most brilliant fashion. The slow movement is wholly lovely and it was most exquisitely played. The allegretto (intermezzo) is very striking and the finale is very bold and vigorous. Throughout the whole work Mr. Chadwick has most successfully solved the problem of the proper relations which should exist between the pianoforte and the stringed instruments in chamber music. The piano is chiefly used in what might be called its accompanying capacity, and the figures and passages are often of striking originality and brilliancy. Aside from the interesting train of musical thought which characterizes all Mr. Chadwick's work, it possesses the additional advantage that it is always constructed in a most masterly manner. There are very few young musicians so prolific in fine ideas as Mr. Chadwick, and there are perhaps still fewer who possess the technical ability to make their works so well. All American musicians should be proud that one of their fellow-countrymen and colleagues should be able to produce so beautiful a work. And it will be gratifying news to many Boston concert-goers to know that the work is shortly to be repeated at one of Mr. Whiting's concerts. To Mr. Whiting belongs the greatest credit for the thoroughly artistic manner in which he played his part of the work in question. He has made most evident improvement and advance in his playing in every way, and particularly last evening he showed special aptitude for playing in chamber music concerts. He possesses a highly-finished technique, a beautiful touch and plenty of artistic understanding. The work was loudly applauded, and all the artists were recalled. The playing of the quartette was superb throughout. No praise is too high to be accorded to this organization. There may be one or two quartettes as good, but there is certainly nowhere a better quartette than this which Mr. Kneisel's artistic personality and the great individual merits of all his colleagues has brought into being. Certainly music lovers in Boston have every advantage—thanks to Mr. Higginson—for, besides the fact that we have one of the best orchestras in the world, we have also perhaps the very best quartette.

ARTHUR WELD.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 25, 1890.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The Kneisel Quartet, assisted by Mr. Arthur Whiting and Mr. Leo Schultz, gave the fourth concert of this, its fifth, season in Union Hall last evening. The programme was as follows:

G. W. Chadwick: Quintet in E-flat, for pianoforte and strings.
Haydn: Quartet in G, Op. 33, No. 5.
Schubert: Quintet in C, (with two 'celli), Op. 163.

Mr. Chadwick's new quintet is a work which immediately inspires respect, and something more. Here, as in his "Melpomene" overture, he has not shirked one jot of the hard work which the seriousness and dignity of the form demand. Indeed, this quintet gives, in one respect, even better assurance of the composer's having conquered what was at one time his besetting fault than the "Melpomene" did. Some of his earlier works, in spite of the talent and skill of which they gave evidence, were flavored with a certain, easy-going joviality of humor that not only verged dangerously on the trivial, but even made it, at moments, hard to believe that the composer were really taking himself seriously. Certain passages in his first and second symphonies almost made one wish that Mr. Chadwick would have done with the sonata-form for good and all, and, like Sir Arthur Sullivan, content himself with a more easily won success in the field of comic opera. Then came the "Melpomene" overture, which was seriousness and earnestness itself, and marked a notable advance over anything he had written before. Still, no one who knew Mr. Chadwick's innate sense of humor, and fondness for fun, could feel quite sure whether this new earnestness was the result of a fixed artistic determination, or whether it was that the peculiar, tragic character of the work offered him no temptations to stray into trivial paths. But all doubts of this sort are dissipated at once by this new quintet, for here Mr. Chadwick was in no wise bound by any obligation to seriousness of matter or manner—for the lightest and most rollicking musical material is quite as legitimately treated in the sonata-form as the gravest, and the most serious—but only by an obligation to seriousness of artistic purpose. Now, some of the thematic material in the quintet is as light-hearted, jovial and rollicking as need be; but the treatment is always dignified and earnest in musical purpose. The composer has kept himself as clear of triviality as possible. If at times he comes near the trivial—as he does in parts of the Andante, which sound a little theatrical, as some things in Jadassohn's chamber-music do—it is not the triviality of the old sort. And it is just in these movements where he might easily have lapsed into his old manner, in the first and last, that he has shown the most force of purpose, and achieved the finest results. Of course, we cannot judge the work in detail after but a single hearing; all we can give is our first impression, and this was distinctly fine. The quintet was admirably played by Mr. Whiting and the quartet, and elicited hearty and prolonged applause. It should be said in this connection that Mr. Perabo, who was at first to have played the pianoforte part, withdrew because the printed score did not reach him in time for him to make a sufficient study of the work to be willing to play it in public.

Of the beautiful Haydn and Schubert works nothing new is to be said, save that they were admirably played—and, with the Kneisels, this is nothing new.

Mr. Rafael Joseffy, Soloist.

The programme of the seventeenth concert of the Symphony Orchestra was:

Weber—Overture, "Oberon."
Liszt—Concerto for pianoforte in A major, No. 2.
Stanford C. Villiers—Symphony No. 3, F minor, op. 28, "The Irish."
I. Allegro moderato.
II. Allegro molto vivace.
III. Andante con molto.
IV. Finale; Allegro vivace.
(First time in Boston.)

Mr. Rafael Joseffy was the soloist.

The introduction of Prof. Stanford's symphony is a further indication of the liberal views Mr. Nikisch possesses. We in Boston hear very little of the music of our nearest kin, and although the English are not the masters in the art of music the Germans are, it is singularly unnatural, even unkind, to give such men as Stanford, Mackenzie and Parry—not to mention the canny Scot, MacCann—the perpetual cold shoulder. The "Irish" symphony, Prof. Stanford's third work in this form, is the first work of importance by the Cambridge professor heard in Boston. After one hearing we shall not attempt a final verdict.

As a whole the impression it made upon us was most agreeable. Good scholarship is abundant throughout, and we do not find the work deserving to be called "Kappelmeister music." The final movement is very much the finest of the four; here, as in the "Hop-jig" Irish melodies—and lovely tunes they are—form the melodic and thematic basis; the scenery is rich and full, and there is not a waste sentence in it. Compared with the finale, the first movement suffers by being over elaborated. The "Hop-jig" is capital. It sounds "Irish" and yet so neatly is it instrmentated that there is never a taint of coarseness. The composer lacked ideas in the slow movement; the color scheme is a good one, but, as it seems to us, unworthily bestowed. The work ought to be heard again. Our cousins across the ocean are earnest fellows in their art, and there is no desire on this side to act unfairly towards their best representatives. Cowen and Stanford are the two modern English symphonists whose works have been heard in Boston; were a comparison to be instituted between them we should say the former had the neatest touch and was melodically more winsome, while the latter knew the most, but up to date had been too busy with pupils to couch his learning with a due regard for grace and symmetry. The "Irish" symphony was admirably performed; all the lovely work for wind-band was splendidly executed. Mr. Nikisch is to be thanked for a hearing of the work and for so careful a rendering of it.

No more perfect performance than the "Oberon" overture has been heard from the orchestra this season; artistic horn-playing seems to run in the Reiter family; the present first horn of the orchestra, a brother of the lamented poseur, Xava Reiter, being a fine artist with a strong tone, which he controls at will.

Joseffy gave a superb exhibition of virtuosity in the collection of notes, called by its composer a concerto. In many respects his playing of M. Liszt's piece was marvellous. The work is generally bombastic and primarily brilliant, but there are measures of a quiet character, and therein did the pianist show his whilom lovely touch and singing tone, which years ago were the characteristics upon which he chiefly builded. Mr. Nikisch permitted an over-loud accompaniment, which resulted in an unsatisfactory ensemble.

At the close of the work Mr. Joseffy was recalled three or four times; the audience being worked upon by his intense virtuosity. The programme of the next concert is: Symphony in E-flat major, Mozart; air from "Nero," Rubinstein; suite, "Italia," Arthur Weld; Michaela's aria from "Carmen," Bizet; overture to "Struensee," Meyerbeer. Miss Gertrude Franklin will be the singer.

Boston Daily Traveller.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 26, 1890.

The Kneisel Quartet and Orth Concerts of

The fourth concert this season by the Kneisel Quartet was given in Union Hall Monday evening. The programme was: Pianoforte quintet in E flat, G. W. Chadwick; Quartet in G, op. 33, No. 5, Haydn; Quintet with two violoncellos, in C, op. 163, Schubert. The pianist was Mr. Arthur Whiting; Mr. Leo Schultz was the second violoncellist. Though very long, the concert was one of peculiar beauty. Mr. Chadwick's work is the best piece of chamber music any American has produced. A second hearing of it—two years ago it was played here at a concert given by the composer—presents both its scientific and poetic qualities in a much stronger light. In point of sentiment, the slow movement, with its serene opening for strings alone, is worthy to be ranked with the work of Raff and Rheinberger, while it is tastefully made. In the finale the succinctness of the composer's ideas, the polish given their exposition, and the absolute ease with which the movement moves to a natural and rugged climax, gives it especial distinction. Mr. Whiting's performance of the pianoforte part was technically clear and finished, and he is such an admirable ensemble player that he fully seconded the refined and excellently-balanced work of the string players. The quartet by Haydn is one of the simplest the genial old master ever penned. Words fail to describe the charm and loveliness of the Schubert quintet, given on this occasion with all possible finish and expression, Mr. Schultz's playing being almost always in perfect unity with the others. At no previous concert has the viola of Mr. Svecenski been more artistic in itself or more of a support in the ensemble. [illegible] concert with Bargiel on March 31. [illegible] Mrs. [illegible]

Boston Daily Advertiser.

Established 1813.

TUESDAY MORNING, FEB. 25, 1890.

The Kneisel Quartette Concert of Last Evening.

The fourth concert of the current series was given by this famous organization in Union Hall last night, and was not only more excellent in its execution than any that had preceded it, but was even more interesting in its contents, for it presented a new work by the best of the younger native composers. A piam quintette by G. W. Chadwick, with Arthur Whiting at the chief instrument, was the chief attraction, and probably the one that caused the hall to be so crowded, but the Schubert quintette with two violincellos was quite as artistic a plaasure as any that the club has given us.

Place aux Americains! The Chadwick quintette shows that the composer is attaining greater ease in the sonata form than ever. In the matter of development he is becoming more free and natural, and as this is the keystone of the classical instrumental forms, the advance in this direction means much. Hitherto the chief charm in his large works has been in the slow movements or in the scherzi, but this work would seem to reverse the order of merit, and the first movement, always the stumbling block of workers in the true sonata form, is by far the best and most original. It opens with a most genial subject, almost Celtic in its joviality, and containing an excellent phrase for subsequent development. The second subject is in good contrast, and has the additional merit of combining well with the chief theme in the "working out." The subsequent development is logical and natural beyond anything that Mr. Chadwick has yet given us, and the sprightly treatment of the characteristic first subject in diminution is very effective. The succeeding andante cantabile is not as tenderly melodious as its name would suggest, and its antiphonal episodes of pizzicato, with monotonic responses upon the piano, and the sudden pauses only cause it to seem disjointed. The intermezzo, at first rather obscure, soon becomes interesting because of its masterly contrapuntal treatment, the canonic imitations being most skilful. The last movement again presents a chief theme of rollicking gayety, and the contrapuntal touches which follow its reappearance after a counter theme are very ingenious; the end, too, with its sequence figures, and one touch of augmentation, is very effective. The work is a great addition to the native repertoire. The quartette did not play it with the most absolute perfection of ensemble, but, of course, nothing that the Kneisel quartette does is poor. Mr. Arthur Whiting gave the piano part with intelligence and general surety, but a little more of force and abandon would not have been misplaced.

The Haydn quartette in G was perfectly played, and its dainty simplicity won the most abundant applause. Especially commendable were the tempi taken in this, for it may be borne in mind that in Haydn's works all the marks of tempo were taken more moderately than nowadays. The largo was not dragging, and its closing passage in unison was most telling. So also was the playful upward (imperfect) cadence which ended the scherzo, and by the way, in this connection it may be as well to state that although Haydn used the word "scherzo" in two of his string quartettes, he is not to be credited with the invention of this form, for these movements have still the minuet flavor, and were after all but sporadic experiments; the scherzo in Beethoven's second symphony still remains the beginning of the form—so far as anything so elastic can be called a form.

The glory of the concert came at its end. Schubert's quintette in C was a grand performance of a most noble work. Already at its threshold the great swells on the impressive chords were finely given, and the glorious chief theme which followed was all that could be imagined. The brusque changes were also caught up with unity. In the second movement the sostenuto melody against pizzicati in the outer voices was commendably done, the agitato episode taken with absolute steadiness in the ensemble and the sudden pause in the returning passage made with due impressiveness. The syncopations of the scherzo, the contrasted power and breadth of the trio, the dainty Landler character (though it is not Landler rhythm) of the chief theme of the finale, were all points that I should like to dwell upon did space permit. Suffice it to say that the Kneisel Quartette (and one must add Mr. Leo Schultz to the list of artists) fairly excelled itself, and the finale was so thorough and such music that the audience applauded with real enthusiasm, and I forgive the programme maker for having caused me to listen to 2¼ hours of solid chamber music, with a warning, however, that such lengthy experiments are dangerous.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

[82]

UNION HALL, 18 BOLYSTON STREET.

FIFTH SEASON 1889-90.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin.
Mr. OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin.
Mr. LOUIS SVEĆENSKI, Viola.
Mr. ANTON HEKKING, Violoncello.

WITH THE ASSISTANCE OF

Mr. ARTHUR WHITING, Pianist.
Mr. LEO SCHULZ, Violoncello.

IV. CONCERT.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 24TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

G. W. CHADWICK. QUINTET in E flat for PIANOFORTE AND STRINGS.
Allegro Sostenuto.—E flat major.
Andante Cantabile.—A flat major.
Allegretto Grazioso (Intermezzo).—C minor.
Allegro Energico.—E flat major.

HAYDN. QUARTET in G, op. 33, No 5.
Vivace assai.—
Largo —
Scherzo.—
Finale.—

SCHUBERT. QUINTET for STRINGS in C, op. 163.
Allegro ma non troppo.—C major.
Adagio.—E major; with Episode.—F. minor.
Scherzo, presto.—C major; with Trio, andante sostenuto—D flat major.
Finale, allegretto.—C minor and major.

The Pianoforte is a Steinway.

FIFTH CONCERT, Monday, March 31st, at 8 P. M.

Boston Post

TUESDAY MORNING, FEB. 25, 1890

FOURTH KNEISEL QUARTETTE CONCERT.

There was a large house at the concert by the Kneisel Quartette last night, and an admirable programme was given, as follows:

Quintette in E flat for pianoforte and strings.....G. W. Chadwick
Quartette in G, op. 33, No. 5.....Haydn
Quintette for strings in C, op. 163...Schubert

Mr. Chadwick's quintette is unquestionably a beautiful work; in fact, in some places (notably the theme and whole opening portions of the slow movement) it proves itself worthy of rank among the highest-standing compositions of this class. The first movement is scholarly, but by no means pedantic, and the themes are developed and elaborated in a most brilliant fashion. The slow movement is wholly lovely and it was most exquisitely played. The allegretto (intermezzo) is very striking and the finale is very bold and vigorous. Throughout the whole work Mr. Chadwick has most successfully solved the problem of the proper relations which should exist between the pianoforte and the stringed instruments in chamber music. The piano is chiefly used in what might be called its accompanying capacity, and the figures and passages are often of striking originality and brilliancy. Aside from the interesting train of musical thought which characterizes all Mr. Chadwick's work, it possesses the additional advantage that it is always constructed in a most masterly manner. There are very few young musicians so prolific in fine ideas as Mr. Chadwick, and there are perhaps still fewer who possess the technical ability to make their works so well. All American musicians should be proud that one of their fellow-countrymen and colleagues should be able to produce so beautiful a work. And it will be gratifying news to many Boston concert-goers to know that the work is shortly to be repeated at one of Mr. Whiting's concerts. To Mr. Whiting belongs the greatest credit for the thoroughly artistic manner in which he played his part of the work in question. He has made most evident improvement and advance in his playing in every way, and particularly last evening he showed special aptitude for playing in chamber music concerts. He possesses a highly-finished technique, a beautiful touch and plenty of artistic understanding. The work was loudly applauded, and all the artists were recalled. The playing of the quartette was superb throughout. No praise is too high to be accorded to this organization. There may be one or two quartettes as good, but there is certainly nowhere a better quartette than this which Mr. Kneisel's artistic personality and the great individual merits of all his colleagues has brought into being. Certainly music lovers in Boston have every advantage—thanks to Mr. Higginson—for, besides the fact that we have one of the best orchestras in the world, we have also perhaps the very best quartette.

ARTHUR WELD.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 25, 1890.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The Kneisel Quartet, assisted by Mr. Arthur Whiting and Mr. Leo Schultz, gave the fourth concert of this, its fifth, season in Union Hall last evening. The programme was as follows:

G. W. Chadwick: Quintet in E-flat, for pianoforte and strings.
Haydn: Quartet in G, Op. 33, No. 5.
Schubert: Quintet in C, (with two 'celli), Op. 163.

Mr. Chadwick's new quintet is a work which immediately inspires respect, and something more. Here, as in his "Melpomene" overture, he has not shirked one jot of the hard work which the seriousness and dignity of the form demand. Indeed, this quintet gives, in one respect, even better assurance of the composer's having conquered what was at one time his besetting fault than the "Melpomene" did. Some of his earlier works, in spite of the talent and skill of which they gave evidence, were flavored with a certain, easy-going joviality of humor that not only verged dangerously on the trivial, but even made it, at moments, hard to believe that the composer were really taking himself seriously. Certain passages in his first and second symphonies almost made one wish that Mr. Chadwick would have done with the sonata-form for good and all, and, like Sir Arthur Sullivan, content himself with a more easily won success in the field of comic opera. Then came the "Melpomene" overture, which was seriousness and earnestness itself, and marked a notable advance over anything he had written before. Still, no one who knew Mr. Chadwick's innate sense of humor, and fondness for fun, could feel quite sure whether this new earnestness was the result of a fixed artistic determination, or whether it was that the peculiar, tragic character of the work offered him no temptations to stray into trivial paths. But all doubts of this sort are dissipated at once by this new quintet, for here Mr. Chadwick was in no wise bound by any obligation to seriousness of matter or manner—for the lightest and most rollicking musical material is quite as legitimately treated in the sonata-form as the gravest, and the most serious—but only by an obligation to seriousness of artistic purpose. Now, some of the thematic material in the quintet is as light-hearted, jovial and rollicking as need be; but the treatment is always dignified and earnest in musical purpose. The composer has kept himself as clear of triviality as possible. If at times he comes near the trivial—as he does in parts of the Andante, which sound a little theatrical, as some things in Jadassohn's chamber-music do—it is not the triviality of the old sort. And it is just in these movements where he might easily have lapsed into his old manner, in the first and last, that he has shown the most force of purpose, and achieved the finest results. Of course, we cannot judge the work in detail after but a single hearing; all we can give is our first impression, and this was distinctly fine. The quintet was admirably played by Mr. Whiting and the quartet, and elicited hearty and prolonged applause. It should be said in this connection that Mr. Perabo, who was at first to have played the pianoforte part, withdrew because the printed score did not reach him in time for him to make a sufficient study of the work to be willing to play it in public.

Of the beautiful Haydn and Schubert works nothing new is to be said, save that they were admirably played—and, with the Kneisels, this is nothing new.

Seventeenth Symphony Concert.
Mr. Rafael Joseffy, Soloist.

The programme of the seventeenth concert of the Symphony Orchestra was:

Weber—Overture, "Oberon."
Liszt—Concerto for pianoforte in A major, No. 2.
Stanford C. Villiers—Symphony No. 3, F minor, op. 28, "The Irish."
I. Allegro moderato.
II. Allegro molto vivace.
III. Andante con molto.
IV. Finale; Allegro vivace.
(First time in Boston.)

Mr. Rafael Joseffy was the soloist.

The introduction of Prof. Stanford's symphony is a further indication of the liberal views Mr. Nikisch possesses. We in Boston hear very little of the music of our nearest kin, and although the English are not the masters in the art of music the Germans are, it is singularly unnatural, even unkind, to give such men as Stanford, Mackenzie and Parry—not to mention the canny Scot, MacCann—the perpetual cold shoulder. The "Irish" symphony, Prof. Stanford's third work in this form, is the first work of importance by the Cambridge professor heard in Boston. After one hearing we shall not attempt a final verdict.

As a whole the impression it made upon us was most agreeable. Good scholarship is abundant throughout, and we do not find the work deserving to be called "Kappelmeister music." The final movement is very much the finest of the four; here, as in the "Hop-jig" Irish melodies—and lovely tunes they are—form the melodic and thematic basis; the scenery is rich and full, and there is not a waste sentence in it. Compared with the finale, the first movement suffers by being over elaborated. The "Hop-jig" is capital. It sounds "Irish" and yet so neatly is it instrmentated that there is never a taint of coarseness. The composer lacked ideas in the slow movement; the color scheme is a good one, but, as it seems to us, unworthily bestowed. The work ought to be heard again. Our cousins across the ocean are earnest fellows in their art, and there is no desire on this side to act unfairly towards their best representatives. Cowen and Stanford are the two modern English symphonists whose works have been heard in Boston; were a comparison to be instituted between them we should say the former had the neatest touch and was melodically more winsome, while the latter knew the most, but up to date had been too busy with pupils to couch his learning with a due regard for grace and symmetry. The "Irish" symphony was admirably performed; all the lovely work for wind-band was splendidly executed. Mr. Nikisch is to be thanked for a hearing of the work and for so careful a rendering of it.

No more perfect performance than the "Oberon" overture has been heard from the orchestra this season; artistic horn-playing seems to run in the Reiter family; the present first horn of the orchestra, a brother of the lamented poseur, Xava Reiter, being a fine artist with a strong tone, which he controls at will.

Joseffy gave a superb exhibition of virtuosity in the collection of notes, called by its composer a concerto. In many respects his playing of M. Liszt's piece was marvellous. The work is generally bombastic and primarily brilliant, but there are measures of a quiet character, and therein did the pianist show his whilom lovely touch and singing tone, which years ago were the characteristics upon which he chiefly builded. Mr. Nikisch permitted an over-loud accompaniment, which resulted in an unsatisfactory ensemble.

At the close of the work Mr. Joseffy was recalled three or four times; the audience being worked upon by his intense virtuosity. The programme of the next concert is: Symphony in E-flat major, Mozart; air from "Nero," Rubinstein; suite, "Italia," Arthur Weld; Michaela's aria from "Carmen," Bizet; overture to "Struensee," Meyeybeer. Miss Gertrude Franklin will be the singer.

Boston Daily Traveller.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 26, 1890.

The Kneisel Quartet and Orth Concerts of

The fourth concert this season by the Kneisel Quartet was given in Union Hall Monday evening. The programme was: Pianoforte quintet in E flat, G. W. Chadwick; Quartet in G, op. 33, No. 5, Haydn; Quintet with two violoncellos, in C, op. 163, Schubert. The pianist was Mr. Arthur Whiting; Mr. Leo Schultz was the second violoncellist. Though very long, the concert was one of peculiar beauty. Mr. Chadwick's work is the best piece of chamber music any American has produced. A second hearing of it—two years ago it was played here at a concert given by the composer—presents both its scientific and poetic qualities in a much stronger light. In point of sentiment, the slow movement, with its serene opening for strings alone, is worthy to be ranked with the work of Raff and Rheinberger, while it is tastefully made. In the finale the succinctness of the composer's ideas, the polish given their exposition, and the absolute ease with which the movement moves to a natural and rugged climax, gives it especial distinction. Mr. Whiting's performance of the pianoforte part was technically clear and finished, and he is such an admirable ensemble player that he fully seconded the refined and excellently-balanced work of the string players. The quartet by Haydn is one of the simplest the genial old master ever penned. Words fail to describe the charm and loveliness of the Schubert quintet, given on this occasion with all possible finish and expression, Mr. Schultz's playing being almost always in perfect unity with the others. At no previous concert has the viola of Mr. Svecenski been more artistic in itself or more of a support in the ensemble. The next concert will be given on March 31. Mr. Perabo will play. Miss [illegible]

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.

TUESDAY MORNING, FEB. 25, 1890.

The Kneisel Quartette Concert of Last Evening.

The fourth concert of the current series was given by this famous organization in Union Hall last night, and was not only more excellent in its execution than any that had preceded it, but was even more interesting in its contents, for it presented a new work by the best of the younger native composers. A piam quintette by G. W. Chadwick, with Arthur Whiting at the chief instrument, was the chief attraction, and probably the one that caused the hall to be so crowded, but the Schubert quintette with two violincellos was quite as artistic a plaasure as any that the club has given us.

Place aux Americains! The Chadwick quintette shows that the composer is attaining greater ease in the sonata form than ever. In the matter of development he is becoming more free and natural, and as this is the keystone of the classical instrumental forms, the advance in this direction means much. Hitherto the chief charm in his large works has been in the slow movements or in the scherzi, but this work would seem to reverse the order of merit, and the first movement, always the stumbling block of workers in the true sonata form, is by far the best and most original. It opens with a most genial subject, almost Celtic in its joviality, and containing an excellent phrase for subsequent development. The second subject is in good contrast, and has the additional merit of combining well with the chief theme in the "working out." The subsequent development is logical and natural beyond anything that Mr. Chadwick has yet given us, and the sprightly treatment of the characteristic first subject in diminution is very effective. The succeeding andante cantabile is not as tenderly melodious as its name would suggest, and its antiphonal episodes of pizzicato, with monotonic responses upon the piano, and the sudden pauses only cause it to seem disjointed. The intermezzo, at first rather obscure, soon becomes interesting because of its masterly contrapuntal treatment, the canonic imitations being most skilful. The last movement again presents a chief theme of rollicking gayety, and the contrapuntal touches which follow its reappearance after a counter theme are very ingenious; the end, too, with its sequence figures, and one touch of augmentation, is very effective. The work is a great addition to the native repertoire. The quartette did not play it with the most absolute perfection of ensemble, but, of course, nothing that the Kneisel quartette does is poor. Mr. Arthur Whiting gave the piano part with intelligence and general surety, but a little more of force and abandon would not have been misplaced.

The Haydn quartette in G was perfectly played, and its dainty simplicity won the most abundant applause. Especially commendable were the tempi taken in this, for it may be borne in mind that in Haydn's works all the marks of tempo were taken more moderately than nowadays. The largo was not dragging, and its closing passage in unison was most telling. So also was the playful upward (imperfect) cadence which ended the scherzo, and by the way, in this connection it may be as well to state that although Haydn used the word "scherzo" in two of his string quartettes, he is not to be credited with the invention of this form, for these movements have still the minuet flavor, and were after all but sporadic experiments; the scherzo in Beethoven's second symphony still remains the beginning of the form—so far as anything so elastic can be called a form.

The glory of the concert came at its end. Schubert's quintette in C was a grand performance of a most noble work. Already at its threshold the great swells on the impressive chords were finely given, and the glorious chief theme which followed was all that could be imagined. The brusque changes were also caught up with unity. In the second movement the sostenuto melody against pizzicati in the outer voices was commendably done, the agitato episode taken with absolute steadiness in the ensemble and the sudden pause in the returning passage made with due impressiveness. The syncopations of the scherzo, the contrasted power and breadth of the trio, the dainty Landler character (though it is not Landler rhythm) of the chief theme of the finale, were all points that I should like to dwell upon did space permit. Suffice it to say that the Kneisel Quartette (and one must add Mr. Leo Schultz to the list of artists) fairly excelled itself, and the finale was so thorough and such music that the audience applauded with real enthusiasm, and I forgive the programme maker for having caused me to listen to 2½ hours of solid chamber music, with a warning, however, that such lengthy experiments are dangerous.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

[82]

UNION HALL, 18 BOLYSTON STREET.

FIFTH SEASON 1889-90.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin.
Mr. OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin.
Mr. LOUIS SVEČENSKI, Viola.
Mr. ANTON HEKKING, Violoncello.

WITH THE ASSISTANCE OF

Mr. ARTHUR WHITING, Pianist.
Mr. LEO SCHULZ, Violoncello.

IV. CONCERT.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 24TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

G. W. CHADWICK. QUINTET in E flat for PIANOFORTE AND STRINGS.
Allegro Sostenuto.—E flat major.
Andante Cantabile.—A flat major.
Allegretto Grazioso (Intermezzo).—C minor.
Allegro Energico.—E flat major.

HAYDN. QUARTET in G, op. 33, No 5.
Vivace assai.—
Largo —
Scherzo.—
Finale.—

SCHUBERT. QUINTET for STRINGS in C, op. 163.
Allegro ma non troppo.—C major.
Adagio.—E major; with Episode.—F. minor.
Scherzo, presto.—C major; with Trio, andante sostenuto—D flat major.
Finale, allegretto.—C minor and major.

The Pianoforte is a Steinway.

FIFTH CONCERT, Monday, March 31st, at 8 P. M.

Boston Daily Traveller.
MONDAY, FEBRUARY 24,

Seventeenth Symphony Concert
Mr. Rafael Joseffy, Soloist.

The programme of the seventeenth concert of the Symphony Orchestra was:
Weber—Overture, "Oberon."
Liszt—Concerto for pianoforte in A major, No. 2.
Stanford C. Villiers—Symphony No. 3, F minor, op. 28, "The Irish."
I. Allegro moderato.
II. Allegro molto vivace.
III. Andante con molto.
IV. Finale; Allegro vivace.
(First time in Boston.)

Mr. Rafael Joseffy was the soloist.

The introduction of Prof. Stanford's symphony is a further indication of the liberal views Mr. Nikisch possesses. We in Boston hear very little of the music of our nearest kin, and although the English are not the masters in the art of music the Germans are, it is singularly unnatural, even unkind, to give such men as Stanford, Mackenzie and Parry—not to mention the canny Scot, MacCann—the perpetual cold shoulder. The "Irish" symphony, Prof. Stanford's third work in this form, is the first work of importance by the Cambridge professor heard in Boston. After one hearing we shall not attempt a final verdict.

As a whole the impression it made upon us was most agreeable. Good scholarship is abundant throughout, and we do not find the work deserving to be called "Kappelmeister music." The final movement is very much the finest of the four; here, as in the "Hop-jig" Irish melodies—and lovely tunes they are—form the melodic and thematic basis; the scenery is rich and full, and there is not a waste sentence in it. Compared with the finale, the first movement suffers by being over elaborated. The "Hop-jig" is capital. It sounds "Irish" and yet so neatly is it instrmentated that there is never a taint of coarseness. The composer lacked ideas in the slow movement; the color scheme is a good one, but, as it seems to us, unworthily bestowed. The work ought to be heard again. Our cousins across the ocean are earnest fellows in their art, and there is no desire on this side to act unfairly towards their best representatives. Cowen and Stanford are the two modern English symphonists whose works have been heard in Boston; were a comparison to be instituted between them we should say the former had the neatest touch and was melodically more winsome, while the latter knew the most, but up to date had been too busy with pupils to couch his learning with a due regard for grace and symmetry. The "Irish" symphony was admirably performed; all the lovely work for wind-band was splendidly executed. Mr. Nikisch is to be thanked for a hearing of the work and for so careful a rendering of it.

No more perfect performance than the "Oberon" overture has been heard from the orchestra this season; artistic horn-playing seems to run in the Reiter family; the present first horn of the orchestra, a brother of the lamented poseur, Xava Reiter, being a fine artist with a strong tone, which he controls at will.

Joseffy gave a superb exhibition of virtuosity in the collection of notes, called by its composer a concerto. In many respects his playing of M. Liszt's piece was marvellous. The work is generally bombastic and primarily brilliant, but there are measures of a quiet character, and therein did the pianist show his whilom lovely touch and singing tone, which years ago were the characteristics upon which he chiefly builded. Mr. Nikisch permitted an over-loud accompaniment, which resulted in an unsatisfactory ensemble.

At the close of the work Mr. Joseffy was recalled three or four times; the audience being worked upon by his intense virtuosity. The programme of the next concert is: Symphony in E-flat major, Mozart; air from "Nero," Rubinstein; suite, "Italia," Arthur Weld; Michaela's aria from "Carmen," Bizet; overture to "Struensee," Meyeybeer. Miss Gertrude Franklin will be the singer.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.

TUESDAY MORNING, FEB. 25, 1890.

The Kneisel Quartette Concert of Last Evening.

The fourth concert of the current series was given by this famous organization in Union Hall last night, and was not only more excellent in its execution than any that had preceded it, but was even more interesting in its contents, for it presented a new work by the best of the younger native composers. A piam quintette by G. W. Chadwick, with Arthur Whiting at the chief instrument, was the chief attraction, and probably the one that caused the hall to be so crowded, but the Schubert quintette with two violincellos was quite as artistic a plaasure as any that the cluh has given us.

Place aux Americains! The Chadwick quintette shows that the composer is attaining greater ease in the sonata form than ever. In the matter of development he is becoming more free and natural, and as this is the keystone of the classical instrumental forms, the advance in this direction means much. Hitherto the chief charm in his large works has been in the slow movements or in the scherzi, but this work would seem to reverse the order of merit, and the first movement, always the stumbling block of workers in the true sonata form, is by far the best and most original. It opens with a most genial subject, almost Celtic in its joviality, and containing an excellent phrase for subsequent development. The second subject is in good contrast, and has the additional merit of combining well with the chief theme in the "working out." The subsequent development is logical and natural beyond anything that Mr. Chadwick has yet given us, and the sprightly treatment of the characteristic first subject in diminution is very effective. The succeeding andante cantabile is not as tenderly melodious as its name would suggest, and its antiphenal episodes of pizzicato, with monotonic responses upon the piano, and the sudden pauses only cause it to seem disjointed. The intermezzo, at first rather obscure, soon becomes interesting because of its masterly contrapuntal treatment, the canonic imitations being most skilful. The last movement again presents a chief theme of rollicking gayety, and the contrapuntal touches which follow its reappearance after a counter theme are very ingenious; the end, too, with its sequence figures, and one touch of augmentation, is very effective. The work is a great addition to the native repertoire. The quartette did not play it with the most absolute perfection of ensemble, but, of course, nothing that the Kneisel quartette does is poor. Mr. Arthur Whiting gave the piano part with intelligence and general surety, but a little more of force and abandon would not have been misplaced.

The Haydn quartette in G was perfectly played, and its dainty simplicity won the most abundant applause. Especially commendable were the tempi taken in this, for it may be borne in mind that in Haydn's works all the marks of tempo were taken more moderately than nowadays. The largo was not dragging, and its closing passage in unison was most telling. So also was the playful upward (imperfect) cadence which ended the scherzo, and by the way, in this connection it may be as well to state that although Haydn used the word "scherzo" in two of his string quartettes, he is not to be credited with the invention of this form, for these movements have still the minuet flavor, and were after all but sporadic experiments; the scherzo in Beethoven's second symphony still remains the beginning of the form—so far as anything so elastic can be called a form.

The glory of the concert came at its end. Schubert's quintette in C was a grand performance of a most noble work. Already at its threshold the great swells on the impressive chords were finely given, and the glorious chief theme which followed was all that could be imagined. The brusque changes were also caught up with unity. In the second movement the sostenuto melody against pizzicati in the outer voices was commendably done, the agitato episode taken with absolute steadiness in the ensemble and the sudden pause in the returning passage made with due impressiveness. The syncopations of the scherzo, the contrasted power and breadth of the trio, the dainty Landler character (though it is not Landler rhythm) of the chief theme of the finale, were all points that I should like to dwell upon did space permit. Suffice it to say that the Kneisel Quartette (and one must add Mr. Leo Schultz to the list of artists) fairly excelled itself, and the finale was so thorough and such music that the audience applauded with real enthusiasm, and I forgive the programme maker for having caused me to listen to 2¼ hours of solid chamber music, with a warning, however, that such lengthy experiments are dangerous.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Post

TUESDAY MORNING, FEB. 25, 1890

FOURTH KNEISEL QUARTETTE CONCERT.

There was a large house at the concert by the Kneisel Quartette last night, and an admirable programme was given, as follows:
Quintette in E flat for pianoforte and strings.....G. W. Chadwick
Quartette in G, op. 33, No. 5.....Haydn
Quintette for strings in C, op. 163...Schubert

Mr. Chadwick's quintette is unquestionably a beautiful work; in fact, in some places (notably the theme and whole opening portions of the slow movement) it proves itself worthy of rank among the highest-standing compositions of this class. The first movement is scholarly, but by no means pedantic, and the themes are developed and elaborated in a most brilliant fashion. The slow movement is wholly lovely and it was most exquisitely played. The allegretto (intermezzo) is very striking and the finale is very bold and vigorous. Throughout the whole work Mr. Chadwick has most successfully solved the problem of the proper relations which should exist between the pianoforte and the stringed instruments in chamber music. The piano is chiefly used in what might be called its accompanying capacity, and the figures and passages are often of striking originality and brilliancy. Aside from the interesting train of musical thought which characterizes all Mr. Chadwick's work, it possesses the additional advantage that it is always constructed in a most masterly manner. There are very few young musicians so prolific in fine ideas as Mr. Chadwick, and there are perhaps still fewer who possess the technical ability to make their works so well. All American musicians should be proud that one of their fellow-countrymen and colleagues should be able to produce so beautiful a work. And it will be gratifying news to many Boston concert-goers to know that the work is shortly to be repeated at one of Mr. Whiting's concerts. To Mr. Whiting belongs the greatest credit for the thoroughly artistic manner in which he played his part of the work in question. He has made most evident improvement and advance in his playing in every way, and particularly last evening he showed special aptitude for playing in chamber music concerts. He possesses a highly-finished technique, a beautiful touch and plenty of artistic understanding. The work was loudly applauded, and all the artists were recalled. The playing of the quartette was superb throughout. No praise is too high to be accorded to this organization. There may be one or two quartettes as good, but there is certainly nowhere a better quartette than this which Mr. Kneisel's artistic personality and the great individual merits of all his colleagues has brought into being. Certainly music lovers in Boston have every advantage—thanks to Mr. Higginson—for, besides the fact that we have one of the best orchestras in the world, we have also perhaps the very best quartette.

ARTHUR WELD.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 25, 1890.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The Kneisel Quartet, assisted by Mr. Arthur Whiting and Mr. Leo Schultz, gave the fourth concert of this, its fifth, season in Union Hall last evening. The programme was as follows:
G. W. Chadwick: Quintet in E-flat, for pianoforte and strings.
Haydn: Quartet in G, Op. 33, No. 5.
Schubert: Quintet in C, (with two 'celli), Op. 163.

Mr. Chadwick's new quintet is a work which immediately inspires respect, and something more. Here, as in his "Melpomene" overture, he has not shirked one jot of the hard work which the seriousness and dignity of the form demand. Indeed, this quintet gives, in one respect, even better assurance of the composer's having conquered what was at one time his besetting fault than the "Melpomene" did. Some of his earlier works, in spite of the talent and skill of which they gave evidence, were flavored with a certain, easy-going joviality of humor that not only verged dangerously on the trivial, but even made it, at moments, hard to believe that the composer were really taking himself seriously. Certain passages in his first and second symphonies almost made one wish that Mr. Chadwick would have done with the sonata-form for good and all, and, like Sir Arthur Sullivan, content himself with a more easily won success in the field of comic opera. Then came the "Melpomene" overture, which was seriousness and earnestness itself, and marked a notable advance over anything he had written before. Still, no one who knew Mr. Chadwick's innate sense of humor, and fondness for fun, could feel quite sure whether this new earnestness was the result of a fixed artistic determination, or whether it was that the peculiar, tragic character of the work offered him no temptations to stray into trivial paths. But all doubts of this sort are dissipated at once by this new quintet, for here Mr. Chadwick was in no wise bound by any obligation to seriousness of matter or manner—for the lightest and most rollicking musical material is quite as legitimately treated in the sonata-form as the gravest, and the most serious—but only by an obligation to seriousness of artistic purpose. Now, some of the thematic material in the quintet is as light-hearted, jovial and rollicking as need be; but the treatment is always dignified and earnest in musical purpose. The composer has kept himself as clear of triviality as possible. If at times he comes near the trivial—as he does in parts of the Andante, which sound a little theatrical, as some things in Jadassohn's chamber-music do—it is not the triviality of the old sort. And it is just in these movements where he might easily have lapsed into his old manner, in the first and last, that he has shown the most force of purpose, and achieved the finest results. Of course, we cannot judge the work in detail after but a single hearing; all we can give is our first impression, and this was distinctly fine. The quintet was admirably played by Mr. Whiting and the quartet, and elicited hearty and prolonged applause. It should be said in this connection that Mr. Perabo, who was at first to have played the pianoforte part, withdrew because the printed score did not reach him in time for him to make a sufficient study of the work to be willing to play it in public.

Of the beautiful Haydn and Schubert works nothing new is to be said, save that they were admirably played—and, with the Kneisels, this is nothing new.

Boston Daily Traveller.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 26, 1890.

The Kneisel Quartet and Orth Concerts of

The fourth concert this season by the Kneisel Quartet was given in Union Hall Monday evening. The programme was: Pianoforte quintet in E flat, G. W. Chadwick; Quartet in G, op. 33, No. 5, Haydn; Quintet with two violoncellos, in C, op. 163, Schubert. The pianist was Mr. Arthur Whiting; Mr. Leo Schultz was the second violoncellist. Though very long, the concert was one of peculiar beauty. Mr. Chadwick's work is the best piece of chamber music any American has produced. A second hearing of it—two years ago it was played here at a concert given by the composer—presents both its scientific and poetic qualities in a much stronger light. In point of sentiment, the slow movement, with its serene opening for strings alone, is worthy to be ranked with the work of Raff and Rheinberger, while it is tastefully made. In the finale the succinctness of the composer's ideas, the polish given their exposition, and the absolute ease with which the movement moves to a natural and rugged climax, gives it especial distinction. Mr. Whiting's performance of the pianoforte part was technically clear and finished, and he is such an admirable ensemble player that he fully seconded the refined and excellently-balanced work of the string players. The quartet by Haydn is one of the simplest the genial old master ever penned. Words fail to describe the charm and loveliness of the Schubert quintet, given on this occasion with all possible finish and expression, Mr. Schultz's playing being almost always in perfect unity with the others. At no previous concert has the viola of Mr. Svecenski been more artistic in itself or more of a support in the ensemble. The next concert will be given on March 31. Mr. Perabo will play. Miss

[82]

From an interesting article, by F. H. Jenks, on Boston Musical Composers, contributed to the New England Magazine for January, 1890, we extract the following which makes clear the activity and the high aims of one of the youngest of prominent native writers: "Mr. Chadwick's compositions are in many forms. Among them are pieces for pianoforte and for organ, songs, part-songs, and church music, besides works which require an orchestra. His most important productions show his sympathy with the romantic schools, but they also evince a determination to be clear in form and treatment, and to make no sacrifice of distinctness for the sake of picturesque effect. Mr. Chadwick's compositions having a largeness of purpose are these: For Solo Voices, Chorus, and Orchestra—"The Tale of the Viking;" Dedication Ode; Ballad, "Lovely Rosabelle;" The Pilgrims Hymn. Chamber and Orchestra Music—Three string quartets; Quintet, pianoforte and strings, E flat: played by the composer and Kneisel Quartet, Chickering Hall, Boston, Jan. 23, 1888; Overture, "Rip Van Winkle," Handel and Haydn Festival, May 1880; Overture, "Thalia:" Handel and Haydn Festival, May 3, 1883; Overture, "Melpomene:" Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dec. 24, 1887; Paris, Trocadero, World's Fair, 1889; Overture, "The Miller's Daughter," San Francisco; Symphony, No. 1, C: Harvard Musical Association, Feb. 23, 1882; Symphony, No. 2, B-flat: Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dec. 11, 1886." Regarding the work played to-day, which since its initial performance two years ago has been heard in Leipzig, New York, Cleveland and Detroit, it will be observed that throughout the four movements the composer has used the piano "color" and the string color in such a way that the scoring is reversed at each repetition of a subject; in the first movement the first subject is given to the pianoforte, and when it comes in again it is in the strings. The second movement is in quasi-sonata form with one subject, used four times, and no "development" group. The third movement is in trio form, and contains strict octave canon in the trio subject. The last movement is a rondo in regular finale form; the second subject is developed into a fugato in quadruple counter-point. The quintet has been published by Arthur P. Schmidt, Boston and Leipzig.

(First performance at Kneisel Concerts.)

Though less frequently heard than many another of Haydn's quartets, the gentle work played today—one of seven by this composer in the key of G—discloses many a reason why it should not be forgotten. It is one of the simplest in construction, and is full of that subtle charm by which the father of instrumental music is known so unmistakably. The first movement is as happy in spirit and as free from technical complications as it well could be. The largo, cantabile, 4-4, is one continuous melody for first violin, the accompanying figure different in each part, preserving a uniform habit throughout. The questioning scherzo is contrasted with a trio that sings itself. In 6-8 time, the allegretto dances along. In this movement of only one subject the inner parts are more conspicuous than elsewhere in the work: the florid figure given the viola and 'cello in turn, is both for use and adornment. A brisk presto, of twenty-six measures, brings the quartet to an end. (First performance at Kneisel Concerts.)

Schubert wrote because he could not help it, and left the offspring of his brain to find their way into the world's appreciation as best they might; careless about present fame, he published few of his more important compositions. But there came after him those who did not rest until the world had been made acquainted with the beauties that lay in the stores of silent manuscripts, the one legacy of a great genius. Mendelssohn took up the cause of Schubert's instrumental music, (the songs had earlier been understood and admired by every-one with any pretentions to musical sensibility,) and by his powerful influence at Leipzig and elsewhere, created a general desire among musicians and patrons of music to know it; Schumann, eloquent in his admiration for Schubert, did scarcely less to forward the fame of one whose works were never more loved than now. The Quintet, in C, for strings, (op. 163,) was written in 1828, the year of Schubert's death. Grove voices general opinion when he says; "This is now universally accepted not only as Schubert's finest piece of chamber music, but as one of the very finest of its class. The two 'cellos alone give it distinction, it has all the poetry and romance of the G major Quartet, without the extravagant length which will always stand in the way of that noble production; while the adagio is so solemn, and yet so beautiful in its tone, so entrancing in its melodies and so incessant in its interest, and the trio of the scherzo, both from itself and its place in the movement, is so eminently dramatic, that it is difficult to speak of either too highly. (Second performance at Kneisel Concerts.)

Boston Post

TUESDAY MORNING, FEB. 25, 1890

FOURTH KNEISEL QUARTETTE CONCERT.

There was a large house at the concert by the Kneisel Quartette last night, and an admirable programme was given, as follows:

Quintette in E flat for pianoforte and strings.....G. W. Chadwick
Quartette in G, op. 33, No. 5.....Haydn
Quintette for strings in C, op. 163...Schubert

Mr. Chadwick's quintette is unquestionably a beautiful work; in fact, in some places (notably the theme and whole opening portions of the slow movement) it proves itself worthy of rank among the highest-standing compositions of this class. The first movement is scholarly, but by no means pedantic, and the themes are developed and elaborated in a most brilliant fashion. The slow movement is wholly lovely and it was most exquisitely played. The allegretto (intermezzo) is very striking and the finale is very bold and vigorous. Throughout the whole work Mr. Chadwick has most successfully solved the problem of the proper relations which should exist between the pianoforte and the stringed instruments in chamber music. The piano is chiefly used in what might be called its accompanying capacity, and the figures and passages are often of striking originality and brilliancy. Aside from the interesting train of musical thought which characterizes all Mr. Chadwick's work, it possesses the additional advantage that it is always constructed in a most masterly manner. There are very few young musicians so prolific in fine ideas as Mr. Chadwick, and there are perhaps still fewer who possess the technical ability to make their works so well. All Americans musicians should be proud that one of their fellow-countrymen and colleagues should be able to produce so beautiful a work. And it will be gratifying news to many Boston concert-goers to know that the work is shortly to be repeated at one of Mr. Whiting's concerts. To Mr. Whiting belongs the greatest credit for the thoroughly artistic manner in which he played his part of the work in question. He has made most evident improvement and advance in his playing in every way, and particularly last evening he showed special aptitude for playing in chamber music concerts. He possesses a highly-finished technique, a beautiful touch and plenty of artistic understanding. The work was loudly applauded, and all the artists were recalled. The playing of the quartette was superb throughout. No praise is too high to be accorded to this organization. There may be one or two quartettes as good, but there is certainly nowhere a better quartette than this which Mr. Kneisel's artistic personality and the great individual merits of all his colleagues has brought into being. Certainly music lovers in Boston have every advantage—thanks to Mr. Higginson—for, besides the fact that we have one of the best orchestras in the world, we have also perhaps the very best quartette.

ARTHUR WELD.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 25, 1890.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The Kneisel Quartet, assisted by Mr. Arthur Whiting and Mr. Leo Schultz, gave the fourth concert of this, its fifth, season in Union Hall last evening. The programme was as follows:

G. W. Chadwick: Quintet in E-flat, for pianoforte and strings.
Haydn: Quartet in G, Op. 33, No. 5.
Schubert: Quintet in C, (with two 'cellI), Op. 163.

Mr. Chadwick's new quintet is a work which immediately inspires respect, and something more. Here, as in his "Melpomene" overture, he has not shirked one jot of the hard work which the seriousness and dignity of the form demand. Indeed, this quintet gives, in one respect, even better assurance of the composer's having conquered what was at one time his besetting fault than the "Melpomene" did. Some of his earlier works, in spite of the talent and skill of which they gave evidence, were flavored with a certain, easy-going joviality of humor that not only verged dangerously on the trivial, but even made it, at moments, hard to believe that the composer were really taking himself seriously. Certain passages in his first and second symphonies almost made one wish that Mr. Chadwick would have done with the sonata-form for good and all, and, like Sir Arthur Sullivan, content himself with a more easily won success in the field of comic opera. Then came the "Melpomene" overture, which was seriousness and earnestness itself, and marked a notable advance over anything he had written before. Still, no one who knew Mr. Chadwick's innate sense of humor, and fondness for fun, could feel quite sure whether this new earnestness was the result of a fixed artistic determination, or whether it was that the peculiar, tragic character of the work offered him no temptations to stray into trivial paths. But all doubts of this sort are dissipated at once by this new quintet, for here Mr. Chadwick was in no wise bound by any obligation to seriousness of matter or manner—for the lightest and most rollicking musical material is quite as legitimately treated in the sonata-form as the gravest, and the most serious—but only by an obligation to seriousness of artistic purpose. Now, some of the thematic material in the quintet is as light-hearted, jovial and rollicking as need be; but the treatment is always dignified and earnest in musical purpose. The composer has kept himself as clear of triviality as possible. If at times he comes near the trivial—as he does in parts of the Andante, which sound a little theatrical, as some things in Jadassohn's chamber-music do—it is not the triviality of the old sort. And it is just in these movements where he might easily have lapsed into his old manner, in the first and last, that he has shown the most force of purpose, and achieved the finest results. Of course, we cannot judge the work in detail after but a single hearing; all we can give is our first impression, and this was distinctly fine. The quintet was admirably played by Mr. Whiting and the quartet, and elicited hearty and prolonged applause. It should be said in this connection that Mr. Perabo, who was at first to have played the pianoforte part, withdrew because the printed score did not reach him in time for him to make a sufficient study of the work to be willing to play it in public.

Of the beautiful Haydn and Schubert works nothing new is to be said, save that they were admirably played—and, with the Kneisels, this is nothing new.

Mr. Rafael Joseffy, Soloist.

The programme of the seventeenth concert of the Symphony Orchestra was:

Weber—Overture, "Oberon."
Liszt—Concerto for pianoforte in A major, No. 2.
Stanford C. Villiers—Symphony No. 3, F minor, op. 28, "The Irish."
I. Allegro moderato.
II. Allegro molto vivace.
III. Andante con molto.
IV. Finale; Allegro vivace.
(First time in Boston.)

Mr. Rafael Joseffy was the soloist.

The introduction of Prof. Stanford's symphony is a further indication of the liberal views Mr. Nikisch possesses. We in Boston hear very little of the music of our nearest kin, and although the English are not the masters in the art of music the Germans are, it is singularly unnatural, even unkind, to give such men as Stanford, Mackenzie and Parry—not to mention the canny Scot, MacCann—the perpetual cold shoulder. The "Irish" symphony, Prof. Stanford's third work in this form, is the first work of importance by the Cambridge professor heard in Boston. After one hearing we shall not attempt a final verdict.

As a whole the impression it made upon us was most agreeable. Good scholarship is abundant throughout, and we do not find the work deserving to be called "Kappelmeister music." The final movement is very much the finest of the four; here, as in the "Hop-jig" Irish melodies—and lovely tunes they are—form the melodic and thematic basis; the scenery is rich and full, and there is not a waste sentence in it. Compared with the finale, the first movement suffers by being over elaborated. The "Hop-jig" is capital. It sounds "Irish" and yet so neatly is it instrmentated that there is never a taint of coarseness. The composer lacked ideas in the slow movement; the color scheme is a good one, but, as it seems to us, unworthily bestowed. The work ought to be heard again. Our cousins across the ocean are earnest fellows in their art, and there is no desire on this side to act unfairly towards their best representatives. Cowen and Stanford are the two modern English symphonists whose works have been heard in Boston; were a comparison to be instituted between them we should say the former had the neatest touch and was melodically more winsome, while the latter knew the most, but up to date had been too busy with pupils to couch his learning with a due regard for grace and symmetry. The "Irish" symphony was admirably performed; all the lovely work for wind-band was splendidly executed. Mr. Nikisch is to be thanked for a hearing of the work and for so careful a rendering of it.

No more perfect performance than the "Oberon" overture has been heard from the orchestra this season; artistic horn-playing seems to run in the Reiter family; the present first horn of the orchestra, a brother of the lamented poseur, Xava Reiter, being a fine artist with a strong tone, which he controls at will.

Joseffy gave a superb exhibition of virtuosity in the collection of notes, called by its composer a concerto. In many respects his playing of M. Liszt's piece was marvellous. The work is generally bombastic and primarily brilliant, but there are measures of a quiet character, and therein did the pianist show his whilom lovely touch and singing tone, which years ago were the characteristics upon which he chiefly builded. Mr. Nikisch permitted an over-loud accompaniment, which resulted in an unsatisfactory ensemble.

At the close of the work Mr. Joseffy was recalled three or four times; the audience being worked upon by his intense virtuosity. The programme of the next concert is: Symphony in E-flat major, Mozart; air from "Nero," Rubinstein; suite, "Italia," Arthur Weld; Michaela's aria from "Carmen," Bizet; overture to "Struensee," Meyeybeer. Miss Gertrude Franklin will be the singer.

Boston Daily Traveller.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 26, 1890.

The Kneisel Quartet and Orth Concerts of

The fourth concert this season by the Kneisel Quartet was given in Union Hall Monday evening. The programme was: Pianoforte quintet in E flat, G. W. Chadwick; Quartet in G, op. 33, No. 5, Haydn; Quintet with two violoncellos, in C, op. 163, Schubert. The pianist was Mr. Arthur Whiting; Mr. Leo Schultz was the second violoncellist. Though very long, the concert was one of peculiar beauty. Mr. Chadwick's work is the best piece of chamber music any American has produced. A second hearing of it—two years ago it was played here at a concert given by the composer—presents both its scientific and poetic qualities in a much stronger light. In point of sentiment, the slow movement, with its serene opening for strings alone, is worthy to be ranked with the work of Raff and Rheinberger, while it is tastefully made. In the finale the succinctness of the composer's ideas, the polish given their exposition, and the absolute ease with which the movement moves to a natural and rugged climax, gives it especial distinction. Mr. Whiting's performance of the pianoforte part was technically clear and finished, and he is such an admirable ensemble player that he fully seconded the refined and excellently-balanced work of the string players. The quartet by Haydn is one of the simplest the genial old master ever penned. Words fail to describe the charm and loveliness of the Schubert quintet, given on this occasion with all possible finish and expression, Mr. Schultz's playing being almost always in perfect unity with the others. At no previous concert has the style of Mr. Schultz been more artistic in its breadth and repose, and in Seventeenth Symphony Concert.

Mr. Rafael Joseffy, Soloist.

The programme of the seventeenth concert of the Symphony Orchestra was:

Weber—Overture, "Oberon."
Liszt—Concerto for pianoforte in A major, No. 2.
Stanford C. Villiers—Symphony No. 3, F minor, op. 28, "The Irish."
I. Allegro moderato.
II. Allegro molto vivace.
III. Andante con molto.
IV. Finale; Allegro vivace.
(First time in Boston.)

Mr. Rafael Joseffy was the soloist.

The introduction of Prof. Stanford's symphony is a further indication of the liberal views Mr. Nikisch possesses. We in Boston hear very little of the music of our nearest kin, and although the English are not the masters in the art of music the Germans are, it is singularly unnatural, even unkind, to give such men as Stanford, Mackenzie and Parry—not to mention the canny Scot, MacCann—the perpetual cold shoulder. The "Irish" symphony, Prof. Stanford's third work in this form, is the first work of importance by the Cambridge professor heard in Boston. After one hearing we shall not attempt a final verdict.

As a whole the impression it made upon us was most agreeable. Good scholarship is abundant throughout, and we do not find the work deserving to be called "Kappelmeister music." The final movement is very much the finest of the four; here, as in the "Hop-jig" Irish melodies—and lovely tunes they are—form the melodic and thematic basis; the scenery is rich and full, and there is not a waste sentence in it. Compared with the finale, the first movement suffers by being over elaborated. The "Hop-jig" is capital. It sounds "Irish" and yet so neatly is it instrmentated that there is never a taint of coarseness. The composer lacked ideas in the slow movement; the color scheme is a good one, but, as it seems to us, unworthily bestowed. The work ought to be heard again. Our cousins across the ocean are earnest fellows in their art, and there is no desire on this side to act unfairly towards their best representatives. Cowen and Stanford are the two modern English symphonists whose works have been heard in Boston; were a comparison to be instituted between them we should say the former had the neatest touch and was melodically more winsome, while the latter knew the most, but up to date had been too busy with pupils to couch his learning with a due regard for grace and symmetry. The "Irish" symphony was admirably performed; all the lovely work for wind-band was splendidly executed. Mr. Nikisch is to be thanked for a hearing of the work and for so careful a rendering of it.

No more perfect performance than the "Oberon" overture has been heard from the orchestra this season; artistic horn-playing seems to run in the Reiter family; the present first horn of the orchestra, a brother of the lamented poseur, Xava Reiter, being a fine artist with a strong tone, which he controls at will.

Joseffy gave a superb exhibition of virtuosity in the collection of notes, called by its composer a concerto. In many respects his playing of M. Liszt's piece was marvellous. The work is generally bombastic and primarily brilliant, but there are measures of a quiet character, and therein did the pianist show his whilom lovely touch and singing tone, which years ago were the characteristics upon which he chiefly builded. Mr. Nikisch permitted an over-loud accompaniment, which resulted in an unsatisfactory ensemble.

At the close of the work Mr. Joseffy was recalled three or four times; the audience being worked upon by his intense virtuosity. The programme of the next concert is: Symphony in E-flat major, Mozart; air from "Nero," Rubinstein; suite, "Italia," Arthur Weld; Michaela's aria from "Carmen," Bizet; overture to "Struensee," Meyeybeer. Miss Gertrude Franklin will be the singer.

Boston Post

TUESDAY MORNING, FEB. 25, 1890

FOURTH KNEISEL QUARTETTE CONCERT.

There was a large house at the concert by the Kneisel Quartette last night, and an admirable programme was given, as follows:

Quintette in E flat for pianoforte and strings.....G. W. Chadwick
Quartette in G, op. 33, No. 5.....Haydn
Quintette for strings in C, op. 163...Schubert

Mr. Chadwick's quintette is unquestionably a beautiful work; in fact, in some places (notably the theme and whole opening portions of the slow movement) it proves itself worthy of rank among the highest-standing compositions of this class. The first movement is scholarly, but by no means pedantic, and the themes are developed and elaborated in a most brilliant fashion. The slow movement is wholly lovely and it was most exquisitely played. The allegretto (intermezzo) is very striking and the finale is very bold and vigorous. Throughout the whole work Mr. Chadwick has most successfully solved the problem of the proper relations which should exist between the pianoforte and the stringed instruments in chamber music. The piano is chiefly used in what might be called its accompanying capacity, and the figures and passages are often of striking originality and brilliancy. Aside from the interesting train of musical thought which characterizes all Mr. Chadwick's work, it possesses the additional advantage that it is always constructed in a most masterly manner. There are very few young musicians so prolific in fine ideas as Mr. Chadwick, and there are perhaps still fewer who possess the technical ability to make their works so well. All American musicians should be proud that one of their fellow-countrymen and colleagues should be able to produce so beautiful a work. And it will be gratifying news to many Boston concert-goers to know that the work is shortly to be repeated at one of Mr. Whiting's concerts. To Mr. Whiting belongs the greatest credit for the thoroughly artistic manner in which he played his part of the work in question. He has made most evident improvement and advance in his playing in every way, and particularly last evening he showed special aptitude for playing in chamber music concerts. He possesses a highly-finished technique, a beautiful touch and plenty of artistic understanding. The work was loudly applauded, and all the artists were recalled. The playing of the quartette was superb throughout. No praise is too high to be accorded to this organization. There may be one or two quartettes as good, but there is certainly nowhere a better quartette than this which Mr. Kneisel's artistic personality and the great individual merits of all his colleagues has brought into being. Certainly music lovers in Boston have every advantage—thanks to Mr. Higginson—for, besides the fact that we have one of the best orchestras in the world, we have also perhaps the very best quartette.

ARTHUR WELD.

Boston Evening Transcript.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 25, 1890.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The Kneisel Quartet, assisted by Mr. Arthur Whiting and Mr. Leo Schultz, gave the fourth concert of this, its fifth, season in Union Hall last evening. The programme was as follows:

G. W. Chadwick: Quintet in E-flat, for pianoforte and strings.
Haydn: Quartet in G, Op. 33, No. 5.
Schubert: Quintet in C, (with two 'celli), Op. 163.

Mr. Chadwick's new quintet is a work which immediately inspires respect, and something more. Here, as in his "Melpomene" overture, he has not shirked one jot of the hard work which the seriousness and dignity of the form demand. Indeed, this quintet gives, in one respect, even better assurance of the composer's having conquered what was at one time his besetting fault than the "Melpomene" did. Some of his earlier works, in spite of the talent and skill of which they gave evidence, were flavored with a certain, easy-going joviality of humor that not only verged dangerously on the trivial, but even made it, at moments, hard to believe that the composer were really taking himself seriously. Certain passages in his first and second symphonies almost made one wish that Mr. Chadwick would have done with the sonata-form for good and all, and, like Sir Arthur Sullivan, content himself with a more easily won success in the field of comic opera. Then came the "Melpomene" overture, which was seriousness and earnestness itself, and marked a notable advance over anything he had written before. Still, no one who knew Mr. Chadwick's innate sense of humor, and fondness for fun, could feel quite sure whether this new earnestness was the result of a fixed artistic determination, or whether it was that the peculiar, tragic character of the work offered him no temptations to stray into trivial paths. But all doubts of this sort are dissipated at once by this new quintet, for here Mr. Chadwick was in no wise bound by any obligation to seriousness of matter or manner—for the lightest and most rollicking musical material is quite as legitimately treated in the sonata-form as the gravest, and the most serious—but only by an obligation to seriousness of artistic purpose. Now, some of the thematic material in the quintet is as light-hearted, jovial and rollicking as need be; but the treatment is always dignified and earnest in musical purpose. The composer has kept himself as clear of triviality as possible. If at times he comes near the trivial—as he does in parts of the Andante, which sound a little theatrical, as some things in Jadassohn's chamber-music do—it is not the triviality of the old sort. And it is just in these movements where he might easily have lapsed into his old manner, in the first and last, that he has shown the most force of purpose, and achieved the finest results. Of course, we cannot judge the work in detail after but a single hearing; all we can give is our first impression, and this was distinctly fine. The quintet was admirably played by Mr. Whiting and the quartet, and elicited hearty and prolonged applause. It should be said in this connection that Mr. Perabo, who was at first to have played the pianoforte part, withdrew because the printed score did not reach him in time for him to make a sufficient study of the work to be willing to play it in public.

Of the beautiful Haydn and Schubert works nothing new is to be said, save that they were admirably played—and, with the Kneisels, this is nothing new.

Boston Daily Traveller.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 26, 1890.

The Kneisel Quartet and Orth Concerts of

The fourth concert this season by the Kneisel Quartet was given in Union Hall Monday evening. The programme was: Pianoforte quintet in E flat, G. W. Chadwick; Quartet in G, op. 33, No. 5, Haydn; Quintet with two violoncellos, in C, op. 163, Schubert. The pianist was Mr. Arthur Whiting; Mr. Leo Schultz was the second violoncellist. Though very long, the concert was one of peculiar beauty. Mr. Chadwick's work is the best piece of chamber music any American has produced. A second hearing of it—two years ago it was played here at a concert given by the composer—presents both its scientific and poetic qualities in a much stronger light. In point of sentiment, the slow movement, with its serene opening for strings alone, is worthy to be ranked with the work of Raff and Rheinberger, while it is tastefully made. In the finale the succinctness of the composer's ideas, the polish given their exposition, and the absolute ease with which the movement moves to a natural and rugged climax, gives it especial distinction. Mr. Whiting's performance of the pianoforte part was technically clear and finished, and he is such an admirable ensemble player that he fully seconded the refined and excellently-balanced work of the string players. The quartet by Haydn is one of the simplest the genial old master ever penned. Words fail to describe the charm and loveliness of the Schubert quintet, given on this occasion with all possible finish and expression, Mr. Schultz's playing being almost always in perfect unity with the others. At no previous concert has the viola of Mr. Svecenski been more artistic in itself or more of a support in the ensemble. The next concert will be given on March 11. Mr. Perabo will play Liszt

Stockbridge Programme

PORTLAND, FEB. 26

PROGRAMME.

THIRTEENTH ENTERTAINMENT.

Wednesday Evening, Feb. 26th.

GRAND CONCERT

—BY THE—

BOSTON

Symphony Orchestra.

(60 MUSICIANS.)

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor,

MR. FRANZ KNEISEL, Soloist.

1. OVERTURE, "Tannhaeuser," Wagner
2. TWO MOVEMENTS FROM CONCERTO FOR VIOLIN, Mendelssohn
   MR. KNEISEL.
3. SUITE, "Peer Gynt," Grieg
   "Daybreak."
   "The Death of Aase."
   "Anitra's Dance."
   "In the Halls of the King of the Dovre Mountains."
   (The imps are chasing Peer Gynt.)
4. AIR HONGROIS, Ernst
   MR. KNEISEL.
5. SYMPHONY in C Minor No. 5, Beethoven
   Allegro con brio.—Andante con moto.—Allegro (Scherzo).—Allegro. (Finale.)

NOTE.—The doors will be kept closed during the performance of each number on the programme.

THE BEACON: BOSTON

S., SATURDAY, MARCH 1, 18

THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULARS.

The second of this season's series of the favorite afternoon concerts which bear the above title, will be given in Music Hall on Wednesday afternoon next. Mr. Nikisch has prepared a programme so attractive that there has been already an immense sale of tickets, and early asking will be necessary to secure the others. The overture will be the brilliant "Jubel," of Weber, and the other orchestra numbers will be the "Peer Gynt" suite of Grieg (which has been specially requested), and Rubinstein's "Bal Costume" dance music. The afternoon will have the unusual advantage of two soloists—Mr. Hekking, who will play upon his 'cello the Chopin nocturne which he renders so beautifully, and Miss DeVere, whose delightful voice and style will be heard in the "Indian Bell" song from "Lakme" and a great aria from Meyerbeer's "Etoile du Nord."

[83]

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

—A WEEKLY PAPER—

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 26, 1890.

* * *

I never take a trip to Boston and meet the artists and composers of that city without coming home most favorably impressed. I do not say that New York musicians are inferior as men to their Boston confrères, but I do assert that there is a finer strain, an esprit de corps and a higher social level there maintained than here in New York.

No one will gainsay that the Boston Symphony Orchestra does not present a better appearance than that of any other musical organization in the country.

Such men as Nikisch, Kneisel, Hekking and a dozen others could be adduced as testimony to the fact.

I fancy it is because of different social conditions in Boston. Musicians are not ostracized socially, and with this greater freedom comes, of course, increased culture and ease of manner.

* * *

Then, too, the number of Americans settled in and about Boston practicing the divine art. They are nearly all Americans. Look at John K. Paine, George Chadwick, Arthur Foote, E. A. MacDowell, for example. Here you have Americanism with a vengeance, even to the fact that they are, in addition to being well trained and highly talented musicians, also gentlemen, a desideratum in all professions, even that of music.

* * *

Boston, too, can boast of the best galaxy of violinists in the country.

If you don't believe it listen to the strings in Mr. Nikisch's band.

Pianists, too, are as plentiful as mulberries in season, although in but several cases is high water mark reached.

Then, too, the Hub of the Universe is well supplied with music critics, and it would be hard to beat such a collection of names as Louis C. Elson, Ben Woolf, a very good musician; Arthur Weld, a composer-critic of more than budding promises; Mr. Capen, formerly of the "Home Journal;" G. H. Wilson, of the "Traveller;" Philip G. Hale, now of the "Home Journal," formerly of Albany, one of the most trenchant critics and all round musicians in Boston. He has stirred matters up a bit there and always hits from the shoulder. Yes, I think Boston can hold her own in matters musical.

* * *

Harmony: That which now exists in all departments of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Interlude: The restless play of two feet belonging to a scion of our best families imprisoned weekly in Music Hall on Saturday nights; feet visible in the aisle.

Motete: The jam in Hamilton-pl. entrance, Boston Music Hall, at 7:55 Saturday evenings.

Nocturne: A whistling milkman at 4:45 A. M.

Overture: In popular parlance anything from DeWolf Hop-

THE BOSTON TIMES.

BOSTON, SUNDAY, MARCH 2, 1890.

THE SYMPHONIES.

EIGHTEENTH CONCERT.

At the Symphony concert, last evening, a decidedly interesting success was scored by the well-known critic, essayist and musician, Mr. Arthur Weld, who proved himself to be no less conspicuously a well-schooled and highly gifted composer by producing a suite for orchestra, the significant and attractive title of which is "Italia." While as a musical illustration of the Italian genus as it shows itself in the everyday life of cities like Venice, Naples, Rome, etc., the work may be regarded as inadequately macaronic, yet it is charmingly scored, and is as abundantly melodious as the most exacting melodist could demand. Contrapuntally and harmonically, too, it is a very able work, and one that has a very effective and enlivening finale with its Roma "Il Carnivale." The suite was enthusiastically received, and was conducted by its composer in a very creditable manner.

The soloist for the concert was Miss Gertrude Franklin who with all the irreproachable taste, expression and artistic refinement for which she is noted, sang Micaela's Aria from "Carmen"; and if possible with even more charming effect an aria by Rubinstein from "Der Daemon." As usual none was more raptuous in acknowledging the characteristically superb standard and attainment of Miss Franklin's singing than many well-known musicians in the audience.

The symphony was Mozart's in E flat (Koechel 543) and Meyerbeer's overture, "Struense," ended the concert, the orchestra playing with all its wonted brilliancy.

THE KNEISEL QUARTETTE.

The fourth concert of the season by the Kneisel quartette was given in Union hall, Monday evening. The programme read:

G. W. Chadwick.....Piano Quintette in E flat
Haydn.....Quartette in G major No. 41
Schubert.....Quintette in C major

The piano quintette by Chadwick deeply engrossed the attention of all present. It is one of the ablest compositions that has yet appeared from the pen of the well-known American composer, and in the allegro portions of the work it is conspicuously endowed with an abundance of such yearnings for the sublime in art, with all the scholarly thought and feeling that are the distinguishing characteristics of musical genius. Mr. Arthur Whiting, the well known pianist, who assisted the quartette in the performance of the work, played admirably.

The best work of Mr. Kneisel and his associates was with the selections by Haydn and Schubert, and with the Haydn quartette especially, there was a perfection in the ensemble and characteristic precision, delicacy and refinement shown that were of the highest order.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, MAR. 1, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The central number on this evening's programme is a composition by a young Bostonian—Mr. Arthur Weld, who, after graduating from the Munich school, has been practising his profession at home and contributing the critical musical articles to the Boston Post. This work is entitled "Italia," a dramatic suite for orchestra, and its movements are thus arranged, there being no break between the first and second:—

1. { Monte Cassino—"Ave maris stella."
2. { Venezia—"I gondolieri amorosi."
3. Napoli—"Pulchinella."
4. Amalfi—"Una sera d'amore."
5. Roma—"Il Carnevale."

Of his work the composer says: "There is no attempt to represent by music all manner of impossible details; but the composition is distinctly 'programme music,' in the sense that it endeavors to musically portray the general feeling or coloring, so to speak, of modern Italian life. The five movements, it will be seen, are named after five towns in Italy, with a secondary title, indicating some especial sentiment connected with the town in question." His plan will be understood by the citation of the first paragraph of his analysis, which states that "the introduction, Monte Cassino, 'Ave Maris stella,' E-flat major, opens with a hymn or choral for all the wind instruments, followed by a passage of canonic imitation in eight real parts in the strings. The indicated tempo is C, adagio religioso; and the whole character of this movement is peaceful and devout, like the lives of the monks who live in the grand old monastery of the Benedictine order among the beautiful mountain forests of Monte Cassino."

We cannot help differing from Mr. Weld in regard to his nomenclature, for we find his music romantic rather than dramatic, and we cannot trace in it anything which characteristically expresses either the Italian spirit in such various phases or suggests the musical temper of those cities which have a markedly melodious individuality, such as Venice and Naples. There is indeed the rhythm of the barcarole in the one and something of the national briskness in the other; but the real flavor and atmosphere of those regions is not to be perceived. This general criticism apart, Mr. Weld's music merits warm praise, as yesterday afternoon it gave evident pleasure. It is melodious and its harmonies are full and rich; the instruments are used with an understanding of the capacity and color of each, and their blending is full, compact and by turns sonorous and suave; even the brass, for which, like many young composers, Mr. Weld has a strong predilection, is used with reserve and in its more dignified aspects; the themes are treated with generous amplitude—possibly one or two movements will be thought too much extended—but there is neither the stiffness of the mere student nor the assumption of the young professor in their development; in a word, this suite comes gratefully upon the ear and will be received by the judgment with respect as by friendly interest with comfortable anticipation. The orchestra played it beautifully under the baton of Mr. Weld, who conducted quietly and moderately but with control and clearly indicated purpose. The concert begins with Mozart's E-flat symphony, easily to be remembered as containing the minuet so often arranged for the piano, and that exquisitely tender and serene andante, sometimes spoken of as the "swan-song." Meyerbeer's strong "Struensee" overture ends the programme, and in alternation with the instrumental numbers are two songs for Miss Franklin, who always considers the dignity of the occasion and has now chosen Micaela's great air in "Carmen," and Tamara's important scene from Rubinstein's opera, "The Demon," which latter is now given for the first time in Boston; both have full orchestral accompaniments. The programme prepared for next week's concert stands thus:

Mendelssohn....Overture, "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage."
Louis Maas.....Concerto for Pianoforte, in C-minor, Opus 13.
(First time.)
Schubert.....Funeral March, Orchestrated by Liszt.
Schumann.....Symphony No. 1, in B-flat.
Soloist, Mr. Carl Faelten.

KNEISEL QUARTETTE CONCERTS.

The concert of Monday evening had a particular interest because it began with a pianoforte quintette in E-flat, by Mr. G. W. Chadwick. His musical fellow-townsmen do not need to be told that Mr. Chadwick is a man of strong and independent thought, who writes when he has something to say, and almost invariably puts what he has to say into suitable and effective language. He has the art to give evidence of knowledge without formality, to be fanciful without grotesqueness and serious without ponderousness. This quintette, framed upon well shaped themes, is a beautifully proportioned and always interesting work; it has its passages of grace, delicacy and brightness, and then, when the right moment comes, it illustrates the sturdy positiveness which is such a characteristic of its author, rising to a finale of sustained vigor and warm earnestness. It was most advantageously played, Mr. Arthur Whiting taking the pianoforte part with high credit alike to the composer and to himself. A quartette of Haydn and a string quintette of Schubert completed the programme, and in these also the finished and appreciative work of the quartette was always manifest.

Clipping from Press Portland Me

Date 2/27

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Last evening the second and last of the symphony concerts in the Stockbridge course was given at City Hall. On this occasion Herr Nikisch brought with him sixty-eight musicians in order to give fuller and grander effect to the numbers that graced the programme. The selections were admirable, and the concert will long be remembered as one of the finest our musical people have ever enjoyed.

The concert opened with that superb piece of orchestration, the Tannhauser overture. Many times as it has been heard here it seemed as if last night's rendering surpassed all others. The tempo was very clear and distinctly marked. The brasses obtained the prominence that Wagner assigned them, and that is necessary in order to give the grand effects that are a distinguishing feature of the work. The pianissimo passages displayed great delicacy of treatment, and the whole rendering was characterized by precision. The Peer-Gynt suite—a full description of which was given in yesterday's PRESS—afforded evident pleasure even to the hypercritical. The contrast between the several numbers, the careful manner in which they were rendered, the many beauties disclosed, and the manner in which the band played as one man, showed the great command Herr Nikisch had over his men. The funeral march was remarkable in respect to the way the pianissimo effects were handled, and the grotesque and effective way in which the orchestra portrayed the imps following and tormenting Peer-Gynt, was admirably set forth. The waltz of Anitra was extremely graceful and dainty. So pleased was the audience that they demanded an encore, which Mr. Nikisch kindly favored them with.

The Beethoven Symphony was something long to be remembered. The hearer was taken out of himself, wholly wrapt in that magnificent composition so superbly presented. The Symphony has always charmed whenever it has been given here, and last night fitly closed an evening of unalloyed enjoyment.

The soloist last evening was Herr Kneisel, the concert-master, who during the last season wielded the baton in place of Herr Gericke. His interpretation of the beautiful Mendelssohn concerto and Ernst's "Air Hongrois" was characterized by great brilliancy, rare [illegible] and deep feeling.

Nov. 8/89

E EVENING WISCONSIN:

THEY ARE OUT OF TUNE

An Interesting Dispute With a Humorous Aspect.

ARIONS AND MUSICIANS FIGHTING.

The Musicians Want the Arions to Pay Them the Modest Little Sum of $25 Each Every Evening—Source of the Trouble.

The Milwaukee Musicians' Union and the Arion Musical Club are a little out of tune. The union has given notice that hereafter if the Arion Club wants to engage the services of its members it will have to pay each man $25 per evening. This somewhat unusual price was determined upon as a measure of retaliation for a grievance which the members of the union think they have against the Arion Club. Last season, on one occasion, the club engaged the Boston Symphony Orchestra to play at a concert, and it has been announced that the same orchestra would, if possible, be engaged for one of this season's concerts. This is what aroused the wrath of the Milwaukee musicians. They claim that to bring musicians from Boston is to discourage home industry and for that reason they refuse to play at the Arion concerts for less than $25 per man.

At a meeting of the union held last evening it was resolved to send written notice of this action to A. G. Bodden, one of the directors of the Arion Club. The Musicians' Union includes Bach's and Clauder's orchestras and a majority of the other bands in the city. George Bach is president of the organization.

Christopher Bach said to-day that he was not present when the $25 per man resolution was adopted, but he considered that the musicians were justly displeased at the engagement of the Boston Orchestra.

Stockbridge Programme

PORTLAND, FEB. 26

PROGRAMME.

THIRTEENTH ENTERTAINMENT.

Wednesday Evening, Feb. 26th.

GRAND CONCERT

—BY THE—

BOSTON

Symphony Orchestra.

(60 MUSICIANS.)

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor,

MR. FRANZ KNEISEL, Soloist.

1. OVERTURE, "Tannhaeuser," Wagner
2. TWO MOVEMENTS FROM CONCERTO FOR VIOLIN, Mendelssohn
   MR. KNEISEL.
3. SUITE, "Peer Gynt," Grieg
   "Daybreak."
   "The Death of Aase."
   "Anitra's Dance."
   "In the Halls of the King of the Dovre Mountains."
   (The imps are chasing Peer Gynt.)
4. AIR HONGROIS, Ernst
   MR. KNEISEL.
5. SYMPHONY in C Minor No. 5, Beethoven
   Allegro con brio.—Andante con moto.—Allegro (Scherzo).—Allegro. (Finale.)

NOTE.—The doors will be kept closed during the performance of each number on the programme.

THE BEACON: BOSTON

S., SATURDAY, MARCH 1, 18

THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULARS.

The second of this season's series of the favorite afternoon concerts which bear the above title, will be given in Music Hall on Wednesday afternoon next. Mr. Nikisch has prepared a programme so attractive that there has been already an immense sale of tickets, and early asking will be necessary to secure the others. The overture will be the brilliant "Jubel," of Weber, and the other orchestra numbers will be the "Peer Gynt" suite of Grieg (which has been specially requested), and Rubinstein's "Bal Costume" dance music. The afternoon will have the unusual advantage of two soloists—Mr. Hekking, who will play upon his 'cello the Chopin nocturne which he renders so beautifully, and Miss DeVere, whose delightful voice and style will be heard in the "Indian Bell" song from "Lakme" and a great aria from Meyerbeer's "Etoile du Nord."

[83]

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

—A WEEKLY PAPER—

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 26, 1890.

* * *

I never take a trip to Boston and meet the artists and composers of that city without coming home most favorably impressed. I do not say that New York musicians are inferior as men to their Boston confrères, but I do assert that there is a finer strain, an esprit de corps and a higher social level there maintained than here in New York.

No one will gainsay that the Boston Symphony Orchestra does not present a better appearance than that of any other musical organization in the country.

Such men as Nikisch, Kneisel, Hekking and a dozen others could be adduced as testimony to the fact.

I fancy it is because of different social conditions in Boston. Musicians are not ostracized socially, and with this greater freedom comes, of course, increased culture and ease of manner.

* * *

Then, too, the number of Americans settled in and about Boston practicing the divine art. They are nearly all Americans. Look at John K. Paine, George Chadwick, Arthur Foote, E. A. MacDowell, for example. Here you have Americanism with a vengeance, even to the fact that they are, in addition to being well trained and highly talented musicians, also gentlemen, a desideratum in all professions, even that of music.

* * *

Boston, too, can boast of the best galaxy of violinists in the country.

If you don't believe it listen to the strings in Mr. Nikisch's band.

Pianists, too, are as plentiful as mulberries in season, although in but several cases is high water mark reached.

Then, too, the Hub of the Universe is well supplied with music critics, and it would be hard to beat such a collection of names as Louis C. Elson, Ben Woolf, a very good musician; Arthur Weld, a composer-critic of more than budding promises; Mr. Capen, formerly of the "Home Journal;" G. H. Wilson, of the "Traveller;" Philip G. Hale, now of the "Home Journal," formerly of Albany, one of the most trenchant critics and all round musicians in Boston. He has stirred matters up a bit there and always hits from the shoulder. Yes, I think Boston can hold her own in matters musical.

* * *

Harmony: That which now exists in all departments of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Interlude: The restless play of two feet belonging to a scion of our best families imprisoned weekly in Music Hall on Saturday nights; feet visible in the aisle.

Motete: The jam in Hamilton-pl. entrance, Boston Music Hall, at 7:55 Saturday evenings.

Nocturne: A whistling milkman at 4:45 A. M.

THE BOSTON TIMES.

BOSTON, SUNDAY, MARCH 2, 1890.

THE SYMPHONIES.

EIGHTEENTH CONCERT.

At the Symphony concert, last evening, a decidedly interesting success was scored by the well-known critic, essayist and musician, Mr. Arthur Weld, who proved himself to be no less conspicuously a well-schooled and highly gifted composer by producing a suite for orchestra, the significant and attractive title of which is "Italia." While as a musical illustration of the Italian genus as it shows itself in the everyday life of cities like Venice, Naples, Rome, etc., the work may be regarded as inadequately macaronic, yet it is charmingly scored, and is as abundantly melodious as the most exacting melodist could demand. Contrapuntally and harmonically, too, it is a very able work, and one that has a very effective and enlivening finale with its Roma "Il Carnivale." The suite was enthusiastically received, and was conducted by its composer in a very creditable manner.

The soloist for the concert was Miss Gertrude Franklin who with all the irreproachable taste, expression and artistic refinement for which she is noted, sang Micaela's Aria from "Carmen"; and if possible with even more charming effect an aria by Rubinstein from "Der Daemon." As usual none was more raptuous in acknowledging the characteristically superb standard and attainment of Miss Franklin's singing than many well-known musicians in the audience.

The symphony was Mozart's in E flat (Koechel 543) and Meyerbeer's overture, "Struense," ended the concert, the orchestra playing with all its wonted brilliancy.

THE KNEISEL QUARTETTE.

The fourth concert of the season by the Kneisel quartette was given in Union hall, Monday evening. The programme read:

G. W. Chadwick.....Piano Quintette in E flat
Haydn.....Quartette in G major No. 41
Schubert.....Quintette in C major

The piano quintette by Chadwick deeply engrossed the attention of all present. It is one of the ablest compositions that has yet appeared from the pen of the well-known American composer, and in the allegro portions of the work it is conspicuously endowed with an abundance of such yearnings for the sublime in art, with all the scholarly thought and feeling that are the distinguishing characteristics of musical genius. Mr. Arthur Whiting, the well known pianist, who assisted the quartette in the performance of the work, played admirably.

The best work of Mr. Kneisel and his associates was with the selections by Haydn and Schubert, and with the Haydn quartette especially, there was a perfection in the ensemble and characteristic precision, delicacy and refinement shown that were of the highest order.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, MAR. 1, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The central number on this evening's programme is a composition by a young Bostonian—Mr. Arthur Weld, who, after graduating from the Munich school, has been practising his profession at home and contributing the critical musical articles to the Boston Post. This work is entitled "Italia," a dramatic suite for orchestra, and its movements are thus arranged, there being no break between the first and second:—

1. { Monte Cassino—"Ave maris stella."
2. { Venezia—"I gondolieri amorosi."
3. Napoli—"Pulchinella."
4. Amalfi—"Una sera d'amore."
5. Roma—"Il Carnevale."

Of his work the composer says: "There is no attempt to represent by music all manner of impossible details; but the composition is distinctly 'programme music,' in the sense that it endeavors to musically portray the general feeling or coloring, so to speak, of modern Italian life. The five movements, it will be seen, are named after five towns in Italy, with a secondary title, indicating some especial sentiment connected with the town in question." His plan will be understood by the citation of the first paragraph of his analysis, which states that "the introduction, Monte Cassino, 'Ave Maris stella,' E-flat major, opens with a hymn or choral for all the wind instruments, followed by a passage of canonic imitation in eight real parts in the strings. The indicated tempo is C, adagio religioso; and the whole character of this movement is peaceful and devout, like the lives of the monks who live in the grand old monastery of the Benedictine order among the beautiful mountain forests of Monte Cassino."

We cannot help differing from Mr. Weld in regard to his nomenclature, for we find his music romantic rather than dramatic, and we cannot trace in it anything which characteristically expresses either the Italian spirit in such various phases or suggests the musical temper of those cities which have a markedly melodious individuality, such as Venice and Naples. There is indeed the rhythm of the barcarole in the one and something of the national briskness in the other; but the real flavor and atmosphere of those regions is not to be perceived. This general criticism apart, Mr. Weld's music merits warm praise, as yesterday afternoon it gave evident pleasure. It is melodious and its harmonies are full and rich; the instruments are used with an understanding of the capacity and color of each, and their blending is full, compact and by turns sonorous and suave; even the brass, for which, like many young composers, Mr. Weld has a strong predilection, is used with reserve and in its more dignified aspects; the themes are treated with generous amplitude—possibly one or two movements will be thought too much extended—but there is neither the stiffness of the mere student nor the assumption of the young professor in their development; in a word, this suite comes gratefully upon the ear and will be received by the judgment with respect as by friendly interest with comfortable anticipation. The orchestra played it beautifully under the baton of Mr. Weld, who conducted quietly and moderately but with control and clearly indicated purpose. The concert begins with Mozart's E-flat symphony, easily to be remembered as containing the minuet so often arranged for the piano, and that exquisitely tender and serene andante, sometimes spoken of as the "swan-song." Meyerbeer's strong "Struensee" overture ends the programme, and in alternation with the instrumental numbers are two songs for Miss Franklin, who always considers the dignity of the occasion and has now chosen Micaela's great air in "Carmen," and Tamara's important scene from Rubinstein's opera, "The Demon," which latter is now given for the first time in Boston; both have full orchestral accompaniments. The programme prepared for next week's concert stands thus:

Mendelssohn....Overture, "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage."
Louis Maas.....Concerto for Pianoforte, in C-minor, Opus 13.
(First time.)
Schubert.....Funeral March, Orchestrated by Liszt.
Schumann.....Symphony No. 1, in B-flat.
Soloist, Mr. Carl Faelten.

KNEISEL QUARTETTE CONCERTS.

The concert of Monday evening had a particular interest because it began with a pianoforte quintette in E-flat, by Mr. G. W. Chadwick. His musical fellow-townsmen do not need to be told that Mr. Chadwick is a man of strong and independent thought, who writes when he has something to say, and almost invariably puts what he has to say into suitable and effective language. He has the art to give evidence of knowledge without formality, to be fanciful without grotesqueness and serious without ponderousness. This quintette, framed upon well shaped themes, is a beautifully proportioned and always interesting work; it has its passages of grace, delicacy and brightness, and then, when the right moment comes, it illustrates the sturdy positiveness which is such a characteristic of its author, rising to a finale of sustained vigor and warm earnestness. It was most advantageously played, Mr. Arthur Whiting taking the pianoforte part with high credit alike to the composer and to himself. A quartette of Haydn and a string quintette of Schubert completed the programme, and in these also the finished and appreciative work of the quartette was always manifest.

Clipping from Press Portland Me

Date Nov 27

VENUE.

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Last evening the second and last of the symphony concerts in the Stockbridge course was given at City Hall. On this occasion Herr Nikisch brought with him sixty-eight musicians in order to give fuller and grander effect to the numbers that graced the programme. The selections were admirable, and the concert will long be remembered as one of the finest our musical people have ever enjoyed.

The concert opened with that superb piece of orchestration, the Tannhauser overture. Many times as it has been heard here it seemed as if last night's rendering surpassed all others. The tempo was very clear and distinctly marked. The brasses obtained the prominence that Wagner assigned them, and that is necessary in order to give the grand effects that are a distinguishing feature of the work. The pianissimo passages displayed great delicacy of treatment, and the whole rendering was characterized by precision. The Peer-Gynt suite—a full description of which was given in yesterday's PRESS—afforded evident pleasure even to the hypercritical. The contrast between the several numbers, the careful manner in which they were rendered, the many beauties disclosed, and the manner in which the band played as one man, showed the great command Herr Nikisch had over his men. The funeral march was remarkable in respect to the way the pianissimo effects were handled, and the grotesque and effective way in which the orchestra portrayed the imps following and tormenting Peer-Gynt, was admirably set forth. The waltz of Anitra was extremely graceful and dainty. So pleased was the audience that they demanded an encore, which Mr. Nikisch kindly favored them with.

The Beethoven Symphony was something long to be remembered. The hearer was taken out of himself, wholly wrapt in that magnificent composition so superbly presented. The Symphony has always charmed whenever it has been given here, and last night fitly closed an evening of unalloyed enjoyment.

The soloist last evening was Herr Kneisel, the concert-master, who during the last season wielded the baton in place of Herr Gericke. His interpretation of the beautiful Mendelssohn concerto and Ernst's "Air Hongrois" was characterized by great brilliancy, rare [illegible] and deep feeling.

Nov. 8/89

E EVENING WISCONSIN:

THEY ARE OUT OF TUNE

An Interesting Dispute With a Humorous Aspect.

ARIONS AND MUSICIANS FIGHTING.

The Musicians Want the Arions to Pay Them the Modest Little Sum of $25 Each Every Evening—Source of the Trouble.

The Milwaukee Musicians' Union and the Arion Musical Club are a little out of tune. The union has given notice that hereafter if the Arion Club wants to engage the services of its members it will have to pay each man $25 per evening. This somewhat unusual price was determined upon as a measure of retaliation for a grievance which the members of the union think they have against the Arion Club. Last season, on one occasion, the club engaged the Boston Symphony Orchestra to play at a concert, and it has been announced that the same orchestra would, if possible, be engaged for one of this season's concerts. This is what aroused the wrath of the Milwaukee musicians. They claim that to bring musicians from Boston is to discourage home industry and for that reason they refuse to play at the Arion concerts for less than $25 per man.

At a meeting of the union held last evening it was resolved to send written notice of this action to A. G. Bodden, one of the directors of the Arion Club. The Musicians' Union includes Bach's and Clauder's orchestras and a majority of the other bands in the city. George Bach is president of the organization.

Christopher Bach said to-day that he was not present when the $25 per man resolution was adopted, but he considered that the musicians were justly displeased at the engagement of the Boston Orchestra.

HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, MARCH 1, 1890

THE SEVENTEENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.—

Weber.....Overture, "Oberon"
Liszt.....Concerto for Pianoforte in A major, No. 2
C. V. Stanford....Symphony No. 3, in F minor, "The Irish," op. 28.
1. Allegro moderato.
2. Allegro molto vivace.
3. Andanta con molto.
4. Finale, Allegro vivace.
(First time in Boston).

And now comes Mr. Charles Villiers Stanford, the Irish-English-German composer, with his third symphony, in which he has made use of Irish scales and tunes, and has thus attempted to catch "color," which, like the will-o'-the-wisp, so often evades and mocks the pursuer who thinks he has it within his grasp. Mr. Stanford is a man of knowledge and industry; he has thoroughly learned his trade and he has turned out much music. Operas, orchestral works, church services, cantatas, and oratorios,—he has written them all. They are above suspicion, for the work of an English Professor-Doctor should at least resemble Cæsar's wife; they show ability in counterpoint, knowledge of orchestral resources, and no mean skill in putting into shape what he has thought out; but they smell of the lamp.

Take this symphony, for instance. The first movement is only interesting as a study in counterpoint. The moment counterpoint is forced upon the attention, the moment it is merely counterpoint and nothing else, it becomes unendurable. What does the hearer care for "inversions by contrary motion" and all the rest of the technical baggag? Who thinks of the counterpoint in the Magic Flute Overture or the Finale of the Jupiter Symphony for there the rules of composition are merely the tools with which Mozart wrought his imperishable works. Neither are the themes themselves of the first movement of the "Irish" symphony attractive, nor is the thematic development anything but a long-continued bore. Each instrument has its turn, and the recapitulation becomes encyclopedic in contents and extent. On the other hand the jig which follows is admirably conceived and admirably written. It is characteristic, it is devil-me-care; full of spirit, free from vulgarity; "the impassioned jig danced by a wild bare-legged pair, on the cabin door taken off its hinges." It is the most truly musical number of the symphony. The third movement begins with a harp prelude said to be "in imitation of one familiar to Irish harpists under the title of 'Try if it s in tune.'" This peculiar introduction of the harp is in the present instance unfortunate. By this I do not mean it is out of place; for surely in an Irish symphony, what instrument has a more pressing right to be heard? For years the Irish harpers who played with their nails and not with the fleshy tip of the fingers have been celebrated. In the Syntagma of Michael Praetorius published in 1618 the compass, the description and a picture of the "Irlaendische Harfe' are to be found. But the prelude chosen is singularly dull, familiar as it may be to Irish harpists. The origiual "Try if it's in tune," can be found in Chorley's "National Music of the World," page 188, and the writer says of it, "this at once suggests the seeming caprice, the real deficiency of certain intervals which mark a large section of the tunes of Ireland, probably the most ancient ones." The strains heard in the third movement do not suggest the harp of Irish romance, fashioned out of the breast bone of a forsaken maiden. "The Lament of the Sons of Usnach" is then repeated ad nauseam; as has been pointed out by Mr. Stanford himself this melody bears a curious resemblance to a tune made by Johannes Brahms. The andante, as a whole, is dull and flabby. The last movement is exceedingly well written; two spirited Irish airs are introduced and effectively employed. And the symphony closes in a blaze of glory. It is a question whether the deliberate choice of Irish scales and tunes does not impair the true musical worth of this symphony. The moment nationality is forced upon the attention by such means, there is danger of monotony, and a symphonic movement approaches dangerously the pot-pourri. This symphony, to repeat, is exceedingly well-written; there is little spontaneity; there is little inspiration; there is much that is monotonous; there is much that is tedious. It was finely played by the orchestra.

Mr. Rafael Joseffy was the soloist, and he played Liszt's concerto No. 2 for pianoforte and orchestra. It is a curious work, blatant, full of fu is and fury. It is chiefly remarkable for its instrumentation, and the passages given to solo 'cello (beautifully played by Mr. Hekking) and piano are poetically imagined. Hanslick describes this concerto as "garrulous and weak in invention." Nor is it as fine and free a work as the intoxicating first concerto in E flat. It is not too much to say that the playing of Mr. Joseffy was superb. His performance was eminently virile, yet although the temptation to pound was great, the pianist seldom forced tone into noise. His use of the pedal was remarkable; many bravura passages of exceeding difficulty were played without it, such is his marvelous technique; and his employment of the pedal-staccato was a liberal education to any observing student. Mr. Joseffy was listened to with profound attention and thrice recalled. Mr. Nikisch was unfortunate in his accompaniment.

The Oberon overture was nobly played; there were one or two departures from the "traditions," but they did not impair the performance.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.—The fourth concert of the series of the Kneisel Quartet was given at Union Hall Monday night, with the assistance of Mr. Leo Schulz, violoncello, and Mr. Arthur Whiting, pianist. The long but interesting program was as follows:

Quintet in E flat.....G. W. Chadwick
(Pianoforte and strings).
Quartet in G, op. 33, No. 5.....Hayden
Quintet in C, op. 163.....Schubert

Mr. Chadwick's Quintet for pianoforte and strings is a work seriously conceived and thoughtfully worked out. It has not the "long breath" of other compositions of his, nor is the interest always sustained. The performance of it does not call for special comment; it was respectable; but the strings were played in a somewhat perfunctory manner, and although Mr. Whiting played as a rule with taste and a keen sense of proportion, he was at times careless in his use of the pedal.

Nothing could have been sharper than the contrast between the sparkle and ingenious simplicity of Haydn's work and the mysterious, unearthly beauty of the Schubert quintet. Too often the instrumental works of Schubert are a steady decrescendo of musical worth. The first movement will be superb; the slow movement will be of exquisite beauty but rambling and diffuse; and then weakness and triviality unto the end. But this quintet is of pure gold and is not beaten thin. Upon it have German critics exhausted the language of praise, and we are called upon to see "the stars" and "the somber woods" and "the dark shadow of death" which regularly present themselves to the frenzied eyes of the honest German when he hears beautiful music. And yet what wonder that men approach the ridiculous in trying to express the thoughts awakened by such strains? Even Zola says of Schubert, "he rides under the pale moon by the side of silver lakes; and he rides by oaks and weeping-willows which toss wildly on high their arms."

As regards the playing of the men, it is not too much to say that their performance of the Schumann Quintet was from an artistic standpoint wholly admirable; it was so noble and so simple; it was so free from caprice, from affectation.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, MARCH 2, 1890.

The Symphony Concert, Miss Franklin, Soloist.

"The King's Fool" at the Hollis Street Theatre—Another "Young People's Popular"—The Patti-Tamagno Opera Season—Mr. Lang's Concerto Concerts—News, Notes, and Comment.

For the 18th of the current series of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, given at Music Hall last evening, under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, the programme was as follows:

Symphony in E flat (Koechel 543).....Mozart
Micaela's aria, from the opera "Carmen".....Bizet
"Italia," dramatic suite for orchestra..Arthur Weld
Aria, "Taeglich eilen wir im Fluge," from "Der Daemon".....Rubinstein
Overture, "Struensee".....Meyerbeer

Miss Gertrude Franklin was the singer, and her appearance was again welcomed in the most friendly manner, the favor with which she is held as a concert artist being most unmistakably shown as she entered to sing the "Carmen" aria. Her choice of this song made quite a marked departure from the usual line of vocal selections heard at these concerts, and the number suited her characteristics as a vocalist most happily. The beauty of the song, so seldom well sung in performances of the opera, was finely displayed in Miss Franklin's interpretation, and, despite the fact that this number demands the stage surroundings and the situation of the scene to make it altogether effective, it gave great pleasure, and called out hearty applause for the singer at its conclusion. The aria from Rubinstein's "Daemon" proved a most delightful novelty, and its selection by Miss Franklin gave another evidence of her remarkably correct estimate of her own abilities. Few artists could equal Miss Franklin's success in this selection, for she met all its difficulties with rare grace and skill, and sung the quaint and fascinating movements with charming effect. She was abundantly honored upon the conclusion of this number, and her appearance as soloist was again a most pronounced feature of the season, as it has been in recent years. The "Italia" suite of Mr. Arthur Weld, a Boston musician, composer and journalist, had its first hearing in this city on this occasion, although it had its first American production in the Worcester festival concerts of 1888. The composition gives ample evidence of the tact as well as talent of its composer, and is, altogether, a very clever work. Its five movements are designated: 1, Monte Cassino—"Ave maris stella;" 2, Venezia—"Igondolieri amorosi;" 3, Napoli—"Pulchinella;" 4, Amalfi—"Una sera d'amore;" 5, Roma—"Il Carnevale;" and the composer states that his design was "to musically portray the general feeling or coloring, so to speak, of modern Italian life," each movement "indicating some especial sentiment connected with the town in question." Mr. Weld has been most successful in carrying out this intention in the first three movements, each of which shows originality of thought and an admirable command of the necessary orchestral combinations to give the "local color" demanded in his musical pictures. The love story, which is made the leading idea of the fourth movement, is less successfuly treated, possibly from the fact that the cool-hearted American failed to grasp the characteristics of love making in the warm-hearted Italian race. This movement is scientific where it should be passionate, and, although showing the scholarly abilities of the composer to advantage falls short of the mark in depicting the scenes and incidents associated with the subject treated. The final movement is full of the life and din of the scenes it is supposed to depict and; although its brilliant and bombastic measures give a realistic idea of the fetes and fun of the carnival time, it is impossible not to conclude that thoughts of his native land, accompained by echoes of a real southern "walk around" floated through the composer's mind as he concluded the suite. Mr. Weld made a very common error in conducting his own composition, for whatever his studies and experience may have been in directing orchestras, his lack of recent practice in this duty led to results which were not favorable to the best performance of his work. He, however, had abundant evidence that the audience enjoyed the fruit of his labors as a composer as well as his efforts as a conductor. Mr. Nikisch gave a most enjoyable performance of the familiar Mozart symphony, and the string band was heard with especial pleasure in the lovely andante. The new horn player came out bravely in the "Carmen" accompaniment, and the overture by Meyerbeer successfully ended this most enjoyable concert.

"YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULAR."

The second of the "Young People's Popular" by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given on Wednesday afternoon next at Music Hall, under Mr. Arthur Nikisch's direction, with Mlle. Clementina de Vere, soprano, and Mr. Anton Hekking, 'cello, as soloists. The programme will be:

Overture, "Jubel".....Weber
Bell song from, "Lakme".....Delibes
Mlle. de Vere.
Suite, "Peer Gynt," op. 46 (by request).....Grieg
Nocturne for violoncello.....Chopin
Mr. Hekking.
Aria from the "Star of the North".....Meyerbeer
Mlle. de Vere.
Ballet music, "Bal Costume".....Rubinstein

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, MAR. 3. 1890.

The Symphony Concert of Last Saturday —Miss Franklin as Soloist.

It was not a very impressive programme, and had the fault of many of its predecessors, of being too long. It began with Mozart's clarinet symphony, which, although one of the sterling works of the master, is dwarfed by the two other works which appeared in the same set—the pathetic G minor symphony and the "Jupiter," which is by all odds the noblest symphonic work that the last century has to offer us. But this work is historically interesting as using the clarinet in symphony for the first time. The older works generally gave three part harmony to the woodwind (whence probably came the use of the word "trio" as applied to the second division of the Minuet forms) using either a combination of two oboes and a bassoon, or flute, oboe and bassoon, and Mozart himself, instead of at once using a quartette, turns the oboe out of the band in order to make place for the clarinet. Naturally the instrument becomes especially prominent in its early appearances, and in this symphony it has some very important work to do, but unfortunately our clarinets are not as splendidly played as the flutes or the oboes, and while their performance of last night showed no technical faults it also showed no especially brilliant points to commend. One point can be praised, however, the fire and brio of the finale, which made a splendid culmination to the work.

Miss Gertrude Franklin was not very secure in the highest register in her first number, Micaela's aria in the third act of "Carmen," but she sang with much expression and eclipsed previous performances of this rather diaphanous part, for Bizet in this opera makes vice much more musical than virtue. But in the second number—an aria from Rubinstein's "Demon"—Miss Franklin achieved a triumph, her brilliancy in the vocalization of the work being phenomanal, and even the highest phrases being clear and purely intoned. The chromatic runs were especially effective.

It was but right that Mr. Nikisch should give a hearing to one of the compositions of his stanch friend Mr. Arthur Weld, but I think a better impression would have been made if the last movement only, of the suite had been given, for the rest of the work is prolix and by no means as Italian or as dramatic as its name would indicate. The work seems vague even to to the composer himself, judging by the sentences—"the melody of the trio is perhaps (!) intended to represent Columbine" and "the love story does not seem to end happily, but perhaps the music only represents the vague sadness which follows any very happy hour," which appear in the composer's own analysis of his work, in Mr. Wilson's "Music Hall Programme." Certainly if the composer did not definitely know the meanings he intended to convey, the mere outsider cannot be expected to. The appearance of the young master as conductor was the signal for prolonged applause, and Mr. Weld justified this by leading with much intelligence, and although of course the orchestra did not follow his baton quite as steadily as they would have Mr. Nikisch's, yet there was proof enough given that the composer would also make a good conductor. The horn was excellently played in the second movement and deserves especial mention. The Neapolitan movement was a disappointment; it had no local color, and nothing in it spoke of the joyous life of the most characteristic city of the world. In this particular the Suite reminded of Richard Strauss' Italian symphony, but at least the latter brought in a popular Neapolitan tune, while Mr. Weld makes no attempt to utilize the folksong in any way. In the movement entitled "Amalfi," the oboe fell deeply in love with the first violin and a protracted scene of amatory character followed. Up to the end of this movement there had been nothing very characteristic, and the chief points to praise were the musicianly leading of the voices in the first movement and the touches of romantic tone color in the fourth, but now the work suddenly took on new vigor, and became interesting and characteristic. The tone-picture of a Roman carnival was of striking power from the first and its whirling accompaniment, its fiery piccolo effects, the bold use of every species of percussion, its impressive pizzicati, the excellent imitation of the Pifferrari, the broad 'cello theme, heightened by augmentation at the end, the love episodes interrupted by the hurly-burly of the revelry—all these effects made up a stirring and characteristic picture and proved that there is good stuff in the new composer. This last movement, at least, ought to find a permanent place on the American repertoire, and I hope to hear it again. Mr. Weld was recalled with great enthusiasm by both public and orchestra.

The concert closed with a very noisy performance of Meyerbeer's "Struensee" overture. There are unquestionably some effects of tone-coloring in this master's works that are an interesting study; but the Wagnerians, and Schumann too, have caused many to believe that Meyerbeer is the unpardonable sin. His bold use of kettledrums in the second act of "Robert le Diable," his wonderful employment of bassoons in middle register in the incantation scene of the same opera, his use of contrabasses in the great alto aria in the "Prophet," and of bass-clarinet in the march of the same opera, of viol d'amour in the first act and of bass-clarinet in the last act of the "Huguenots," are a few of the effects which stamp him a great colorist, and in this overture, too, the use made of the harp (and Mr. Schuecker played splendidly) was a proof of this, but the blatant brass and the rather vulgar type of the ideas expressed, often evidently merely to astound the public, made the work better adapted to the popular concerts of the summer season than to a concert containing a good symphony as its first number. It was evident, too, that this kind of work is beginning to have its effect upon the orchestra and even the strings, formerly so exquisite in to... coarsely and ro... applause after the ... had finished their deafening career, but that only shows that the symphony concerts have not educated the people to the standard of their own programmes. If Mr. Nikisch desires to know how much such applause is worth, let him sometime perform an orchestral transcription of the sextette from "Lucia," and he will find that there will be more applause attained than has been achieved by all the Beethoven symphonies put together.

LOUIS. C. ELSON.

Boston Post

MONDAY MORNING, MARCH 3, 1890

EIGHTEENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

It is often affirmed when the question of American music is under discussion that we can have no American music. Strictly speaking this is true, yet a similar affirmation might be made with equal truth concerning the music of any other country. It is the foreigner's theory that in a nation like ours, constantly becoming more and more cosmopolitan, that in the very youngest of the really great nations there is found coincident with our national life a hopeless and widespread sterility of the logical and at the same time exhilarating art conditions that might otherwise tend to the development of a characteristically national music, or a nationally artistic "school." Artistically speaking, however, there is but one school. This school no more belongs to one country than to another. It is the school universal. German, French, English and American music? By no means. At present our greatest composers are German composers. With them as with Verdi of Italy, Gounod of France and John K. Paine of America, there is invariably maintained the universal and international oneness of standard to be observed. This, in all the perennial grandeur that it implies, is the creative musician's as well as the conductor's only standard. Georg Henschel conformed to it in selecting his programmes for the original Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the present series of programmes have been in like manner selected by Arthur Nikisch. The programme for Saturday evening's concert was a model. A more eclectic and artistic choice has seldom been made for any Boston Symphony concert, and most worthy in connection with this choice Miss Gertrude Franklin was soloist, the programme reading as follows:

Symphony in E flat (Koechel 543).....Mozart
Micaela's aria, from "Carmen".....Bizet
"Italia," dramatic suite for orchestra.....Arthur Weld
1. Monte Cassino—"Ave maris stella." 2. Venezia—"I gondolieri amorosi." 3. Napoli—"Pulchinella." 4. Amalfi—"Una sera d'amore." 5. Roma—"Il Carnevale."
(First time in Boston.)
Aria—"Taeglich eilen wir im Fluge," from "Der Daemon".....Rubinstein
(First time in Boston.)
Overture, "Struensee".....Meyerbeer

By all odds the composition on the above scheme that was awaited with the deepest interest was the dramatic suite of Mr. Arthur Weld. No one capable of judging could have listened to Mr. Weld's composition without pronouncing it to be the work of an exceptionally well-educated and able musician, to whom music is a perfectly familiar and natural mode of speech, emanating from a mind cast in an uncommonly artistic mould. The leading themes in each movement are often exquisitely pure and melodious in themselves, and are also most skilfully and judiciously treated. The orchestral treatment is characterized by great flexibility, and in fact we cannot pass from the inadequate reference to this portion of the work without paying a warm tribute of praise to Mr. Weld for the admirable way in which he has treated the instruments throughout. If he has erred, it is in the all-absorbing subjectivity with which he appears to have developed his musical illustrations, yet most of the "Ave maris stella" portion of the suite is exempt from any such criticism, while in the final movement there is a most enlivening and piquant realization afforded of the typical carnival, especially in the downright realism that is effected by the orchestration. The canon that enters at the introduction of the suite is no less a masterly piece of writing than it is thoroughly musical and devoid of all scholastic pedantry. Mr. Weld conducted his work in a highly creditable, effective and unobtrusive style, and at its conclusion he was raptuously applauded and recalled in a manner that was no less enthusiastic and sincere than thoroughly well-merited.

Throughout Miss Franklin's singing of the Bizet and Rubinstein arias, the realization and idealization of the composer's intent seemed the sole aim of the artiste, and as usual her vocalization appealed to the best class of music-lovers, who were foremost in recognizing the superbly artistic merit of her performance. The rich and sympathetic tones of her voice were at their best, while the perspicuity, culture and refinement of her interpretations call for naught but the warmest praise.

Mr. Weld's suite was admirably performed, and so were the symphony and overture, the playing being characterized by the well-known fusion of effects, delicacy, contrast and brilliancy of the orchestra's best work.

C. I. CAPEN.

[84]

HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, MARCH 1, 1890

THE SEVENTEENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.—

Weber.....Overture, "Oberon"
Liszt.....Concerto for Pianoforte in A major, No. 2
C. V. Stanford....Symphony No. 3, in F minor, "The Irish," op. 28.

1. Allegro moderato.
2. Allegro molto vivace.
3. Andanta con molto.
4. Finale, Allegro vivace.

(First time in Boston).

And now comes Mr. Charles Villiers Stanford, the Irish-English-German composer, with his third symphony, in which he has made use of Irish scales and tunes, and has thus attempted to catch "color," which, like the will-o'-the-wisp, so often evades and mocks the pursuer who thinks he has it within his grasp. Mr. Stanford is a man of knowledge and industry; he has thoroughly learned his trade and he has turned out much music. Operas, orchestral works, church services, cantatas, and oratorios,—he has written them all. They are above suspicion, for the work of an English Professor-Doctor should at least resemble Cæsar's wife; they show ability in counterpoint, knowledge of orchestral resources, and no mean skill in putting into shape what he has thought out; but they smell of the lamp.

Take this symphony, for instance. The first movement is only interesting as a study in counterpoint. The moment counterpoint is forced upon the attention, the moment it is merely counterpoint and nothing else, it becomes unendurable. What does the hearer care for "inversions by contrary motion" and all the rest of the technical baggag? Who thinks of the counterpoint in the Magic Flute Overture or the Finale of the Jupiter Symphony for there the rules of composition are merely the tools with which Mozart wrought his imperishable works. Neither are the themes themselves of the first movement of the "Irish" symphony attractive, nor is the thematic development anything but a long-continued bore. Each instrument has its turn, and the recapitulation becomes encyclopedic in contents and extent. On the other hand the jig which follows is admirably conceived and admirably written. It is characteristic, it is devil-me-care; full of spirit, free from vulgarity; "the impassioned jig danced by a wild bare-legged pair, on the cabin door taken off its hinges." It is the most truly musical number of the symphony. The third movement begins with a harp prelude said to be "in imitation of one familiar to Irish harpists under the title of 'Try if it s in tune.'" This peculiar introduction of the harp is in the present instance unfortunate. By this I do not mean it is out of place; for surely in an Irish symphony, what instrument has a more pressing right to be heard? For years the Irish harpers who played with their nails and not with the fleshy tip of the fingers have been celebrated. In the Syntagma of Michael Praetorius published in 1618 the compass, the description and a picture of the "Irlaendische Harfe" are to be found. But the prelude chosen is singularly dull, familiar as it may be to Irish harpists. The original "Try if it's in tune," can be found in Chorley's "National Music of the World," page 188, and the writer says of it, "this at once suggests the seeming caprice, the real deficiency of certain intervals which mark a large section of the tunes of Ireland, probably the most ancient ones." The strains heard in the third movement do not suggest the harp of Irish romance, fashioned out of the breast bone of a forsaken maiden. "The Lament of the Sons of Usnach" is then repeated ad nauseam; as has been pointed out by Mr. Stanford himself this melody bears a curious resemblance to a tune made by Johannes Brahms. The andante, as a whole, is dull and flabby. The last movement is exceedingly well written; two spirited Irish airs are introduced and effectively employed. And the symphony closes in a blaze of glory. It is a question whether the deliberate choice of Irish scales and tunes does not impair the true musical worth of this symphony. The moment nationality is forced upon the attention by such means, there is danger of monotony, and a symphonic movement approaches dangerously the pot-pourri. This symphony, to repeat, is exceedingly well-written; there is little spontaneity; there is little inspiration; there is much that is monotonous; there is much that is tedious. It was finely played by the orchestra.

Mr. Rafael Joseffy was the soloist, and he played Liszt's concerto No. 2 for pianoforte and orchestra. It is a curious work, blatant, full of fuss and fury. It is chiefly remarkable for its instrumentation, and the passages given to solo 'cello (beautifully played by Mr. Hekking) and piano are poetically imagined. Hanslick describes this concerto as "garrulous and weak in invention." Nor is it as fine and free a work as the intoxicating first concerto in E flat. It is not too much to say that the playing of Mr. Joseffy was superb. His performance was eminently virile, yet although the temptation to pound was great, the pianist seldom forced tone into noise. His use of the pedal was remarkable; many bravura passages of exceeding difficulty were played without it, such is his marvelous technique; and his employment of the pedal-staccato was a liberal education to any observing student. Mr. Joseffy was listened to with profound attention and thrice recalled. Mr. Nikisch was unfortunate in his accompaniment.

The Oberon overture was nobly played; there were one or two departures from the "traditions," but they did not impair the performance.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.—The fourth concert of the series of the Kneisel Quartet was given at Union Hall Monday night, with the assistance of Mr. Leo Schulz, violoncello, and Mr. Arthur Whiting, pianist. The long but interesting program was as follows:

Quintet in E flat.....G. W. Chadwick
(Pianoforte and strings).
Quartet in G, op. 33, No. 5.....Hayden
Quintet in C, op. 163.....Schubert

Mr. Chadwick's Quintet for pianoforte and strings is a work seriously conceived and thoughtfully worked out. It has not the "long breath" of other compositions of his, nor is the interest always sustained. The performance of it does not call for special comment; it was respectable: but the strings were played in a somewhat perfunctory manner, and although Mr. Whiting played as a rule with taste and a keen sense of proportion, he was at times careless in his use of the pedal.

Nothing could have been sharper than the contrast between the sparkle and ingenious simplicity of Haydn's work and the mysterious, unearthly beauty of the Schubert quintet. Too often the instrumental works of Schubert are a steady decrescendo of musical worth. The first movement will be superb; the slow movement will be of exquisite beauty but rambling and diffuse; and then weakness and triviality unto the end. But this quintet is of pure gold and is not beaten thin. Upon it have German critics exhausted the language of praise, and we are called upon to see "the stars" and "the somber woods" and "the dark shadow of death" which regularly present themselves to the frenzied eyes of the honest German when he hears beautiful music. And yet what wonder that men approach the ridiculous in trying to express the thoughts awakened by such strains? Even Zola says of Schubert, "he rides under the pale moon by the side of silver lakes; and he rides by oaks and weeping-willows which toss wildly on high their arms."

As regards the playing of the men, it is not too much to say that their performance of the Schumann Quintet was from an artistic standpoint wholly admirable; it was so noble and so simple; it was so free from caprice, from affectation.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, MARCH 2, 1890.

The Symphony Concert, Miss Franklin, Soloist.

"The King's Fool" at the Hollis Street Theatre—Another "Young People's Popular"—The Patti-Tamagno Opera Season—Mr. Lang's Concerto Concerts—News, Notes, and Comment.

For the 18th of the current series of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, given at Music Hall last evening, under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, the programme was as follows:

Symphony in E flat (Koechel 543).....Mozart
Micaela's aria, from the opera "Carmen".....Bizet
"Italia," dramatic suite for orchestra..Arthur Weld
Aria, "Taeglich eilen wir im Fluge," from "Der Daemon".....Rubinstein
Overture, "Struensee".....Meyerbeer

Miss Gertrude Franklin was the singer, and her appearance was again welcomed in the most friendly manner, the favor with which she is held as a concert artist being most unmistakably shown as she entered to sing the "Carmen" aria. Her choice of this song made quite a marked departure from the usual line of vocal selections heard at these concerts, and the number suited her characteristics as a vocalist most happily. The beauty of the song, so seldom well sung in performances of the opera, was finely displayed in Miss Franklin's interpretation, and, despite the fact that this number demands the stage surroundings and the situation of the scene to make it altogether effective, it gave great pleasure, and called out hearty applause for the singer at its conclusion. The aria from Rubinstein's "Daemon" proved a most delightful novelty, and its selection by Miss Franklin gave another evidence of her remarkably correct estimate of her own abilities. Few artists could equal Miss Franklin's success in this selection, for she met all its difficulties with rare grace and skill, and sung the quaint and fascinating movements with charming effect. She was abundantly honored upon the conclusion of this number, and her appearance as soloist was again a most pronounced feature of the season, as it has been in recent years. The "Italia" suite of Mr. Arthur Weld, a Boston musician, composer and journalist, had its first hearing in this city on this occasion, although it had its first American production in the Worcester festival concerts of 1888. The composition gives ample evidence of the tact as well as talent of its composer, and is, altogether, a very clever work. Its five movements are designated: 1, Monte Cassino—"Ave maris stella;" 2, Venezia—"Igondolieri amorosi;" 3, Napoli—"Pulchinella;" 4, Amalfi—"Una sera d'amore;" 5, Roma—"Il Carnevale;" and the composer states that his design was "to musically portray the general feeling or coloring, so to speak, of modern Italian life," each movement "indicating some especial sentiment connected with the town in question." Mr. Weld has been most successful in carrying out this intention in the first three movements, each of which shows originality of thought and an admirable command of the necessary orchestral combinations to give the "local color" demanded in his musical pictures. The love story, which is made the leading idea of the fourth movement, is less successfuly treated, possibly from the fact that the cool-headed American failed to grasp the characteristics of love making in the warm-hearted Italian race. This movement is scientific where it should be passionate, and, although showing the scholarly abilities of the composer to advantage falls short of the mark in depicting the scenes and incidents associated with the subject treated. The final movement is full of the life and din of the scenes it is supposed to depict and, although its brilliant and bombastic measures give a realistic idea of the fetes and fun of the carnival time, it is impossible not to conclude that thoughts of his native land, accompained by echoes of a real southern "walk around" floated through the composer's mind as he concluded the suite. Mr. Weld made a very common error in conducting his own composition, for whatever his studies and experience may have been in directing orchestras, his lack of recent practice in this duty led to results which were not favorable to the best performance of his work. He, however, had abundant evidence that the audience enjoyed the fruit of his labors as a composer as well as his efforts as a conductor. Mr. Nikisch gave a most enjoyable performance of the familiar Mozart symphony, and the string band was heard with especial pleasure in the lovely andante. The new horn player came out bravely in the "Carmen" accompaniment, and the overture by Meyerbeer successfully ended this most enjoyable concert.

"YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULAR."

The second of the "Young People's Popular" by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given on Wednesday afternoon next at Music Hall, under Mr. Arthur Nikisch's direction, with Mlle. Clementina de Vere, soprano, and Mr. Anton Hekking, 'cello, as soloists. The programme will be:

Overture, "Jubel".....Weber
Bell song from "Lakme".....Delibes
Mlle. de Vere.
Suite, "Peer Gynt," op. 46 (by request).....Grieg
Nocturne for violoncello.....Chopin
Mr. Hekking.
Aria from the "Star of the North".....Meyerbeer
Mlle. de Vere.
Ballet music, "Bal Costume".....Rubinstein

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, MAR. 3. 1890.

The Symphony Concert of Last Saturday—Miss Franklin as Soloist.

It was not a very impressive programme, and had the fault of many of its predecessors, of being too long. It began with Mozart's clarinet symphony, which, although one of the sterling works of the master, is dwarfed by the two other works which appeared in the same set—the pathetic G minor symphony and the "Jupiter," which is by all odds the noblest symphonic work that the last century has to offer us. But this work is historically interesting as using the clarinet in symphony for the first time. The older works generally gave three part harmony to the woodwind (whence probably came the use of the word "trio" as applied to the second division of the Minuet forms) using either a combination of two oboes and a bassoon, or flute, oboe and bassoon, and Mozart himself, instead of at once using a quartette, turns the oboe out of the band in order to make place for the clarinet. Naturally the instrument becomes especially prominent in its early appearances, and in this symphony it has some very important work to do, but unfortunately our clarinets are not as splendidly played as the flutes or the oboes, and while their performance of last night showed no technical faults it also showed no especially brilliant points to commend. One point can be praised, however, the fire and brio of the finale, which made a splendid culmination to the work.

Miss Gertrude Franklin was not very secure in the highest register in her first number, Micaela's aria in the third act of "Carmen," but she sang with much expression and eclipsed previous performances of this rather diaphanous part, for Bizet in this opera makes vice much more musical than virtue. But in the second number—an aria from Rubinstein's "Demon"—Miss Franklin achieved a triumph, her brilliancy in the vocalization of the work being phenomanal, and even the highest phrases being clear and purely intoned. The chromatic runs were especially effective.

It was but right that Mr. Nikisch should give a hearing to one of the compositions of his stanch friend Mr. Arthur Weld, but I think a better impression would have been made if the last movement only, of the suite had been given, for the rest of the work is prolix and by no means as Italian or as dramatic as its name would indicate. The work seems vague even to to the composer himself, judging by the sentences—"the melody of the trio is perhaps (!) intended to represent Columbine" and "the love story does not seem to end happily, but perhaps the music only represents the vague sadness which follows any very happy hour," which appear in the composer's own analysis of his work, in Mr. Wilson's "Music Hall Programme." Certainly if the composer did not definitely know the meanings he intended to convey, the mere outsider cannot be expected to. The appearance of the young master as conductor was the signal for prolonged applause, and Mr. Weld justified this by leading with much intelligence, and although of course the orchestra did not follow his baton quite as steadily as they would have Mr. Nikisch's, yet there was proof enough given that the composer would also make a good conductor. The horn was excellently played in the second movement and deserves especial mention. The Neapolitan movement was a disappointment; it had no local color, and nothing in it spoke of the joyous life of the most characteristic city of the world. In this particular the Suite reminded of Richard Strauss' Italian symphony, but at least the latter brought in a popular Neapolitan tune, while Mr. Weld makes no attempt to utilize the folksong in any way. In the movement entitled "Amalfi," the oboe fell deeply in love with the first violin and a protracted scene of amatory character followed. Up to the end of this movement there had been nothing very characteristic, and the chief points to praise were the musicianly leading of the voices in the first movement and the touches of romantic tone color in the fourth, but now the work suddenly took on new vigor, and became interesting and characteristic. The tone-picture of a Roman carnival was of striking power from the first and its whirling accompaniment, its fiery piccolo effects, the bold use of every species of percussion, its impressive pizzicati, the excellent imitation of the Pifferrari, the broad 'cello theme, heightened by augmentation at the end, the love episodes interrupted by the hurly-burly of the revelry—all these effects made up a stirring and characteristic picture and proved that there is good stuff in the new composer. This last movement, at least, ought to find a permanent place on the American repertoire, and I hope to hear it again. Mr. Weld was recalled with great enthusiasm by both public and orchestra.

The concert closed with a very noisy performance of Meyerbeer's "Struensee" overture. There are unquestionably some effects of tone-coloring in this master's works that are an interesting study; but the Wagnerians, and Schumann too, have caused many to believe that Meyerbeer is the unpardonable sin. His bold use of kettledrums in the second act of "Robert le Diable," his wonderful employment of bassoons in middle register in the incantation scene of the same opera, his use of contrabasses in the great alto aria in the "Prophet," and of bass-clarinet in the march of the same opera, of viol d'amour in the first act and of bass-clarinet in the last act of the "Huguenots," are a few of the effects which stamp him a great colorist, and in this overture, too, the use made of the harp (and Mr. Schuecker played splendidly) was a proof of this, but the blatant brass and the rather vulgar type of the ideas expressed, often evidently merely to astound the public, made the work better adapted to the popular concerts of the summer season than to a concert containing a good symphony as its first number. It was evident, too, that this kind of work is beginning to have its effect upon the orchestra and even the strings, formerly so exquisite in tone coarsely and roughly. [illegible] was great applause after the brasses had finished their deafening career, but that only shows that the symphony concerts have not educated the people to the standard of their own programmes. If Mr. Nikisch desires to know how much such applause is worth, let him sometime perform an orchestral transcription of the sextette from "Lucia," and he will find that there will be more applause attained than has been achieved by all the Beethoven symphonies put together.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Post

MONDAY MORNING, MARCH 3, 1890

EIGHTEENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

It is often affirmed when the question of American music is under discussion that we can have no American music. Strictly speaking this is true, yet a similar affirmation might be made with equal truth concerning the music of any other country. It is the foreigner's theory that in a nation like ours, constantly becoming more and more cosmopolitan, that in the very youngest of the really great nations there is found coincident with our national life a hopeless and widespread sterility of the logical and at the same time exhilarating art conditions that might otherwise tend to the development of a characteristically national music, or a nationally artistic "school." Artistically speaking, however, there is but one school. This school no more belongs to one country than to another. It is the school universal. German, French, English and American music? By no means. At present our greatest composers are German composers. With them as with Verdi of Italy, Gounod of France and John K. Paine of America, there is invariably maintained the universal and international oneness of standard to be observed. This, in all the perennial grandeur that it implies, is the creative musician's as well as the conductor's only standard. Georg Henschel conformed to it in selecting his programmes for the original Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the present series of programmes have been in like manner selected by Arthur Nikisch. The programme for Saturday evening's concert was a model. A more eclectic and artistic choice has seldom been made for any Boston Symphony concert, and most worthy in connection with this choice Miss Gertrude Franklin was soloist, the programme reading as follows:

Symphony in E flat (Koechel 543).....Mozart
Micaela's aria, from "Carmen".....Bizet
"Italia," dramatic suite for orchestra.....Arthur Weld
1. Monte Cassino—"Ave maris stella." 2. Venezia—"I gondolieri amorosi." 3. Napoli—"Pulchinella." 4. Amalfi—"Una sera d'amore." 5. Roma—"Il Carnevale."
(First time in Boston.)
Aria—"Taeglich eilen wir im Fluge," from "Der Daemon".....Rubinstein
(First time in Boston.)
Overture, "Struensee".....Meyerbeer

By all odds the composition on the above scheme that was awaited with the deepest interest was the dramatic suite of Mr. Arthur Weld. No one capable of judging could have listened to Mr. Weld's composition without pronouncing it to be the work of an exceptionally well-educated and able musician, to whom music is a perfectly familiar and natural mode of speech, emanating from a mind cast in an uncommonly artistic mould. The leading themes in each movement are often exquisitely pure and melodious in themselves, and are also most skilfully and judiciously treated. The orchestral treatment is characterized by great flexibility, and in fact we cannot pass from the inadequate reference to this portion of the work without paying a warm tribute of praise to Mr. Weld for the admirable way in which he has treated the instruments throughout. If he has erred, it is in the all-absorbing subjectivity with which he appears to have developed his musical illustrations, yet most of the "Ave maris stella" portion of the suite is exempt from any such criticism, while in the final movement there is a most enlivening and piquant realization afforded of the typical carnival, especially in the downright realism that is effected by the orchestration. The canon that enters at the introduction of the suite is no less a masterly piece of writing than it is thoroughly musical and devoid of all scholastic pedantry. Mr. Weld conducted his work in a highly creditable, effective and unobtrusive style, and at its conclusion he was raptuously applauded and recalled in a manner that was no less enthusiastic and sincere than thoroughly well-merited.

Throughout Miss Franklin's singing of the Bizet and Rubinstein arias, the realization and idealization of the composer's intent seemed the sole aim of the artiste, and as usual her vocalization appealed to the best class of music-lovers, who were foremost in recognizing the superbly artistic merit of her performance. The rich and sympathetic tones of her voice were at their best, while the perspicuity, culture and refinement of her interpretations call for naught but the warmest praise.

Mr. Weld's suite was admirably performed, and so were the symphony and overture, the playing being characterized by the well-known fusion of effects, delicacy, contrast and brilliancy of the orchestra's best work.

C. L. CAPEN.

[84]

[95]

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 2, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme last night was neither edifying nor well given, but it made up in length what it lacked in quality. Mozart's "Clarinette" symphony, the first which contained a clarinette part, but the weakest of the group of three which the master composed in 1788, began the concert, but it was soon evident that our orchestra does not contain the greatest of clarinette players, and after Mr. Strasser's playing at the recent Baermann concert, the lack of fullness of tone was all the more perceptible. Miss Gertrude Franklin sang rather indecisively in the higher register, in her first song, but quite expressively nevertheless, and we have never had Micaela's airs so well done in Boston. The second song was from Rubinstein's "Demon," and was given in that strange and weird language, "libretto-English," but the singing made ample amends for the weakness of the words, and the vocalist was at her very best, her floriture being excellent and clear even in the most difficult passages. She was recalled with enthusiasm. So was Arthur Welch after his Suite, which I did not think "dramatic" (save in its finale) nor "Italian," but which found immense favor with the public, and of which I liked the last movement. If Mr. Nikisch desires to prove all the ill-natured remarks that have been said about him, he has only to give a few more Meyerbeer overtures, with the blatant effects of last night. There is a distinct deterioration from the high standard our orchestra once had, in programmes, in performances—in every way, but it is not too late yet to cry a halt, and improve matters.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET CONCERT.

Union Hall was crowded Monday night by a fashionable audience on the occasion of the fourth concert of the Kneisel quartet series. Probably the fact that a new work by an American composer was to be produced, and that Arthur Whiting was to play the piano part, had something to do with the fact that the hall was so full, but the performance of the quartet was also of a character to warrant an appreciative audience in any musical community. The new work alluded to above was Chadwick's quintet in E flat, which has been heard in many other cities since its first performance some two years ago. It is one of the most successful works of the composer, and exhibits a skill in development that is not often present in the works of native composers. The first movement has a most genial chief theme, in excellent contrast with the following second theme, and both are subsequently developed in most masterly style. The two interior movements are not so impressive as the first and last of the work, although the intermezzo has some very skillful contrapuntal passages. The finale has some exquisite touches of treatment, and its chief theme is as rollicking as heart could desire. The sequences at the close and the broad augmentation of the leading figure form a very majestic ending. The work is one of the very best of American contributions to the sonata forms. Its performance was of adequate steadiness, although not as perfect as some of the work of the Kneisel Quartet. Mr. Arthur Whiting was generally excellent in the piano part, although a trifle more of force would not have been misplaced. The quartet, which followed, was perfectly performed and justly evoked the greatest enthusiasm. Then came the gem of the concert, the Schubert quintet in C, with two 'cellos, Mr. Leo Schulz playing the extra instrument. The great quartet has never excelled the beauty with which this work was given. There was absolutely no blemish for adverse criticism to lift its voice about. The finale found the audience quite as enthusiastic as at the beginning of the concert, and this, too, after a programme which lasted over two hours! I have often stated that I believe this quartet to be the best in America, but on this occasion they excelled themselves and the performers are to be congratulated on a performance of a character transcending even their own previous record.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Evening Transcript.

MONDAY, MARCH 3, 1890.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The programme of the eighteenth symphony concert was as follows:

Mozart: Symphony in E-flat.
Bizet: Micaela's air from "Carmen."
Arthur Weld: Suite, "Italia."
Rubinstein: Tamara's song from "The Demon."
Meyerbeer: Overture to "Struensee."

Miss Gertrude Franklin was the singer.

The wind-players had evidently forgotten to blow the weather out of their instruments before the concert began, for the response to Mr. Nikisch's first wave of his bâton was not the chord of E-flat major, as the audience had a right to expect it would be, but a nondescript something that froze one's very blood with terror. But the weather being once blown out of the sonorous tubes, Mozart's music had free course through them, and all went well. To say that Mozart's E-flat symphony is the least great of his greatest three is to say nothing very hard about it. Even if it fall a little behind the "Jupiter" and the unapproached G minor, it is great enough, and was doubly welcome last Saturday, after the late famine of great music here. We hardly like Mr. Nikisch's taking the announcement of the theme of the first movement slower than he meant to carry it through; even admitting the occasional propriety of taking slightly different tempi for different themes in a movement, we can see no possible advantage that can accrue from taking successive apparitions of the same theme at different tempi—except in such rare cases as the first song in Schumann's "Paradise and the Peri," where a gradual and continuous acceleration of the tempo is indicated by the composer. But, with this single exception, Mr. Nikisch's reading of the symphony seemed admirable in every respect, and the orchestra played it excellently.

Mr. Weld's suite in five movements (Monte Cassino: "Ave maris Stella."—Venezia: "I gondolieri amorosi."—Napoli: "Pulcinella."—Amalfi: "Una sera d'amore." — Roma; "Il Carnevale.") is a composition of which one would like to know the exact history, before passing judgment on it. Not long ago we had the privilege of listening to two movements of chamber music by Mr. Weld, which gave us unalloyed pleasure, and we learned that these movements were originally written for his final examination in Counterpoint at the Royal Music School in Munich. It may have been the knowledge of this that led us strongly to suspect, last Saturday evening, that the "Italia" suite may have owed its existence, in part at least, to an impending examination in Instrumentation. If this is so, one prominent feature in the orchestra is sufficiently accounted for,—the over-crowding of an almost unexampled variety of orchestral effects. It is a well-known trait of the young composer to be too prone to unpack all his orchestral baggage at once, in his first few compositions for orchestra, and to weigh down his writing with an embarrassment of orchestral riches. But we have never yet seen this done with such frank redundance as in this suite; the work might be called a complete practical illustration of Berlioz's entire "Traité d' Instrumentation," amplified by some original experiments of the composer's own. So bewildering is this perpetual kaleidoscopic shifting of orchestral color, this constant apparition of new tints and combinations, that one can hardly believe that the composer had the concert room solely in view when he wrote the work. There is something academic in this lavish display of resources; and one finds in it, as in many other things academic, a certain lack of a sense of humor. Still, even if one finds Mr. Weld's artistic judgment somewhat at fault in this matter—that is, looking at his work from the concert-going, and not from the academic, point of view—one cannot but admire the general aureness of hand he shows in commanding his resources. With few and insignificant exceptions, his treatment of the orchestra shows conspicuous skill, technical knowledge and imaginativeness. Now and then one may feel that he was led to do certain things more for the sake of doing them than for the effect produced; for instance, the effect of the solo violin and viola, in the fourth movement, is hardly such as to pay the composer for adding two staves to his score; it sounds rather as if he were bound to use a solo violin and viola, than as if he really wanted to. But such fallings short of effectiveness in coloring are merely sporadic in the work. Apart from the instrumentation, the suite shows melodic inventiveness, force and even vehemence of feeling, and poetic imagination. Unhappily, also, it shows in the second, fourth and fifth movements a terrible tendency to prolixity. We like the "Ave maris stella" and the "Pulcinella" by far the best; the former for its beauty, the latter for its genuine humor. The "Sera d'amore," in spite of an evident definiteness of structural plan, sounds all too vague, too merely emotional, and is moreover spun out beyond all true proportion. Mr. Weld conducted the suite without exuberance of gesture, but with aplomb, and a sure grasp of his forces. He was repeatedly recalled at the close.

Meyerbeer's "Struensee" overture—an admirable example, by the way, of what Meyerbeer could not do in the way of orchestral composition—was exceedingly brilliantly played.

Miss Franklin sang the song from "Carmen" with great sincerity of sentiment. Her singing of the mad-song from Rubinstein's "Demon" left a less determinate impression upon us; the song itself is too hard to like for one to enjoy the singing of it.

The next programme is: Mendelssohn, overture, "Meeresstille und glückliche Fahrt;" Louis Maas, pianoforte concerto in C minor, op. 13; Schubert, Funeral March (scored by Liszt); Schumann, Symphony No. 1, in B-flat. Mr. Carl Faelten will be the pianist.

Boston Sunday Globe.

TWENTY-FOUR PAGES.

SUNDAY, MARCH 2, 1890.

SYMPHONY SOUNDS.

Arthur Weld's "Italia," Under the Composer's Direction—Miss Franklin's Songs.

It was a graceful compliment to his friend, Arthur Weld, when Mr. Nikisch gave the young composer's "Italia" a place upon a Boston Symphony programme. But the Leipzig director has more than twice or thrice given evidence of his readiness to appreciate the work of Americans in music, and "Italia" will easily take rank among the most agreeable offerings of native talent that the season has brought. Mr. Weld's suite, composed when he was a student at Munich, and honored with a hearing at the Worcester festival of 1888, is undoubtedly "programme music." Throughout, the work shows command over the resources of the modern orchestra, and there has been but infrequent yielding to the tendency to over-elaboration of themes. The "linked sweetness" is undoubtedly "long drawn out" in the Amalfi movement, which sets forth a lover's longing. But the other movements, particularly that which recalls life in Rome at carnival time, never lose their hold upon interest. Mr. Weld himself conducted the performance of the "Italia" with much care and earnestness, and, at the close, the young composer and critic was recalled and applauded very heartily. The orchestra performed its part with great spirit for the most part, and its members joined heartily in the plaudits that followed the suite. Mozart's symphony in E flat, with its lovely and familiar andante, opened the programme and Meyerbeer's strong "Struensee" overture ended what was one of Mr. Nikisch's longest concerts. Miss Gertrude Franklin, the soloist of the occasion, sang Micaela's air from "Carmen," best known as "Io dico di no." She was not quite at her best in this Bizet selection, but in the florid air from Rubinstein's "Demon" her singing was exceptionally clear and brilliant, and the favorite soprano found warm and ready appreciation for her achievements.

Dr. Louis Maas, whose good work for music in Boston is not forgotten, though he himself has passed away, is represented on Mr. Nikisch's programme this week by his concerto for pianoforte in C minor. Mr. Carl Faelten will be the soloist. Such classics make up the offering as Mendelssohn's overture, "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage, Schubert's "Funeral March" (Liszt orchestration) and Schumann's first symphony.

CONCERT PROMISES.

The Young People's "Popular" in Music Hall, Wednesday Afternoon.

Were the second of Mr. Nikisch's "Young People's Populars" notable for nothing else than the re-entrance of that distinguished singer, Mlle. Clementine de Vere, the occasion would be accounted one of particular and unusual interest. But the Boston symphony orchestra and Anton Rekking are to assist in a programme that is worth reproducing here, so well is it arranged. Already there has been a brisk call for seats. The offering follows:

Overture, Jubel.....Weber
Bell song from Lakme.....Delibes
Mlle. De Vere.
Suite, Peer Gynt, op. 46 (by request).....Grieg
Nocturne for violoncello.....Chopin
Mr. Hekking.
Aria from the Star of the North.....Meyerbeer
Mlle. De Vere.
Ballet music, Bal Costume.....Rubinstein

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 2.

The Boston Symphony Concert.

The eighteenth concert of the Symphony Orchestra had a special interest in the performance of "Italia," a Dramatic Suite, for orchestra, by Mr. Arthur Weld. It is in five movements, opening with an admirably written hymn, richly but clearly and broadly scored, and impressing the hearers at the outset with the composer's thorough knowledge of orchestral resources and his skill and discretion in using them. The hymn merges, after much ingenious contrapuntal treatment, into a melodious and brilliant movement, the second theme of which is a species of barcarolle, but somewhat more extended and serious than are songs of this description. The third movement is a very vivacious, original and strikingly piquant scherzo, in which there is some exceedingly clever and effective instrumentation. Then comes an andante, the most ambitious portion of the work, and of symphonic proportions, prolific in flowing and, at times, sensuous melody. This is followed in turn by an exceedingly animated, brilliant and finely colored finale, portraying in tone color the bustle and merriment of a Roman carnival. It is impossible to describe fully a work of this varied character in the space at our command, but we can express the pleasure afforded in hearing it, and pay tribute to its clearness, its profusion of flowing melody, its masterly harmonies, and its fine musicianship generally. The instrumentation is always free and flexible, and the work has manifestly been thought out for the orchestra, from the outset. There is an ease and a freedom in the scoring, a feeling for the timbre of the various instruments and a knowledge shown in combining them for contrast and variety in effect, that has been seen in none of our younger composers. The work is not only interesting, but it is exceptionally able, and is entitled to the most earnest consideration and respect as a notable addition to the list of the best achievements of our native musicians. Mr. Weld conducted it spiritedly and firmly, holding his orchestra well in hand, and showing marked efficiency at the conductor's stand. The work was applauded with enthusiasm, and the composer was recalled twice to bow his acknowledgments to an appreciative and delighted audience. The concert began with Mozart's E flat symphony, which was beautifully read by Mr. Nikisch, and with a keenly artistic sympathy with the true spirit of the music, throwing into it a stimulating virility, and avoiding in the more tender movements of the work that sickly sentimentality that is too often and wrongly imparted to them. It was admirable Mozart intepreting. The concert ended with a stirring and brilliant performance of Meyerbeer's "Struensee" overture. The soloist was Miss Gertrude Franklin, who was never heard with finer effect than on this occasion. She sang the grand aria of Micaela from Bizet's "Carmen" with splendid dramatic fervor and largeness of expression giving a marked example of her skill in sostenuto singing. Her other contribution to the concert was Tamara's "Mad Song" from Rubinstein's "The Demon," which had not been heard here before. It is gracefully melodious, varying constantly in the emotions it depicts, and is prolific in strongly rythmical floriturl of considerable difficulty. It was brilliantly sung by the artist, and in a style of the highest purity and finish, marked by exquisite delicacy in the more flowery phrases. Miss Franklin was vigorously recalled twice after each solo. For the next concert the programme is: Mendelssohn's "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage," overture; a concerto for piano, by L. Maas; Funeral March, Schubert, instrumented by Liszt, and Schumann's Symphony No. 1. The soloist is to be Mr. Carl Faelten.

Musical Notes.

On Wednesday afternoon next a "Young People's Popular" will be given in Music Hall, by the Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Nikisch has chosen an admirable programme for the occasion, as will be seen by the following: "Jubel" overture, Weber; "Bell Song" from "Lackme," Delibes; Suite, "Peter Gynt," Grieg; Nocturne for violoncello, Chopin; aria from "The Star of the North," Meyerbeer; and ballet music, "Bal Costume" Rubinstein. Mlle. Clementine de Vere and Mr. Anton Hekking will be the soloists.

Boston Post

TUESDAY MORNING, MARCH 4, 1890.

According to the Western papers the recent disorganization of the so-called "Boston Symphony Orchestral Club" was not entirely amicable. It appears that the club wished to get rid of its manager, Mr. Bachert, and not vice versa, as was at first represented. The club, with the exception of Mr. de Seve, the violinist, has reorganized under the title of "New York Harmonic Club" (a much more honest title than the other, be it remarked), and will proceed to give concerts under a new management. The charming Swedish singer, Miss Augusta Ohrstrom, will remain with the new organization.

[95]

...n Journal.

...TH SUPPLEMENT.

...MING EDITION.

...AY MORNING, MARCH 3, 1890.

The Symphony Concert.

There was sufficient variety at the Symphony concert Saturday evening to satisfy the most capricious. There was a symphony by Mozart, a vocal soloist who gave arias from the opera, an instrumental suite by an American composer, an overture by Meyerbeer, and two conductors. What more could have been crowded into one evening?

The Mozart symphony was by no means the least interesting portion of the concert. It was the Symphony in E flat, and is one of the most melodious, pleasing and beautiful of them all. Simple in construction, reminding one of Haydn in that respect, there is nothing trivial or dull in it. The andante and minuetto are delightful pieces of orchestration, and the finale is designed, like all of Mozart's endings, to send the audience away in the best of humor. It was put first on the programme, and every music-lover was sorry when it was ended. No selection this season has met with a more hearty response from the audience. It was excellently played. So also was the Meyerbeer overture which closed the concert. Praise of Mr. Nikisch and the orchestra is getting at this time to be superfluous. Yet it is none the less deserved, for their renditions are as near perfection as we expect to hear in this city.

Miss Gertrude Franklin was the soloist. She is always welcome, because of her careful, artistic and conscientious work. Nothing is slightingly treated, and her voice, which is pure and true in intonation, is able to do what many larger voices cannot accomplish. She gave the familiar aria of Michaela in "Carmen" and an aria from Rubinstein's opera of "The Demon," a selection new to her auditors. Miss Franklin always endeavors to bring out something that has not been sung until it is hackneyed, and in this she shows the faithful student of her art that she is. Better selections for her voice than the Michaela aria could not have been chosen; the latter, with its legato measures, interwoven with brilliant execution, was especially suited to her high, flexible vocalism. It is not often that Miss Franklin does better work than she did Saturday evening.

There remains the "Italia" suite of Arthur Weld, which had its first presentation before a Boston audience. It was given at Worcester in 1888, and then, as now, it was conducted by the composer. Mr. Weld states that it is distinctly programme music; it is in five movements, and is intended to portray the different feelings of Italian life. It is a very meritorious production, and was well rendered. The audience, also, was very kind to the young composer—recalling him several times after the rendition. We are unable, however, to conceive of any advantage to be derived from the resignation of the conductor's baton into the hands of the composer. It is due to Mr. Weld to say that his conducting was far in advance of that in Worcester; at the same time works by our resident composers have been given a place in these concerts, when the authors have been content—and it has seemed in much better taste—to have the composition interpreted at the hands of Mr. Nikisch. At the next concert we are to have another piano soloist—something which will cease, probably, when all the pianists of the country have had an appearance—and this is to be the programme: Mendelssohn, overture, "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage;" Louis Maas, concerto for pianoforte in C minor, opus 13 (first time); Schubert, "Funeral March," orchestrated by Liszt; Schumann, Symphony No. 1, in B flat; soloist, Mr. Carl Faelten.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 2.

The Boston Symphony Concert.

The eighteenth concert of the Symphony Orchestra had a special interest in the performance of "Italia," a Dramatic Suite, for orchestra, by Mr. Arthur Weld. It is in five movements, opening with an admirably written hymn, richly but clearly and broadly scored, and impressing the hearers at the outset with the composer's thorough knowledge of orchestral resources and his skill and discretion in using them. The hymn merges, after much ingenious contrapuntal treatment, into a melodious and brilliant movement, the second theme of which is a species of barcarolle, but somewhat more extended and serious than are songs of this description. The third movement is a very vivacious, original and strikingly piquant scherzo, in which there is some exceedingly clever and effective instrumentation. Then comes an andante, the most ambitious portion of the work, and of symphonic proportions, prolific in flowing and, at times, sensuous melody. This is followed in turn by an exceedingly animated, brilliant and finely colored finale, portraying in tone color the bustle and merriment of a Roman carnival. It is impossible to describe fully a work of this varied character in the space at our command, but we can express the pleasure afforded in hearing it, and pay tribute to its clearness, its profusion of flowing melody, its masterly harmonies, and its fine musicianship generally. The instrumentation is always free and flexible, and the work has manifestly been thought out for the orchestra, from the outset. There is an ease and a freedom in the scoring, a feeling for the timbre of the various instruments and a knowledge shown in combining them for contrast and variety in effect, that has been seen in none of our younger composers. The work is not only interesting, but it is exceptionally able, and is entitled to the most earnest consideration and respect as a notable addition to the list of the best achievements of our native musicians. Mr. Weld conducted it spiritedly and firmly, holding his orchestra well in hand, and showing marked efficiency at the conductor's stand. The work was applauded with enthusiasm, and the composer was recalled twice to bow his acknowledgments to an appreciative and delighted audience. The concert began with Mozart's E flat symphony, which was beautifully read by Mr. Nikisch, and with a keenly artistic sympathy with the true spirit of the music, throwing into it a stimulating virility, and avoiding in the more tender movements of the work that sickly sentimentality that is too often and wrongly imparted to them. It was admirable Mozart intepreting. The concert ended with a stirring and brilliant performance of Meyerbeer's "Struensee" overture. The soloist was Miss Gertrude Franklin, who was never heard with finer effect than on this occasion. She sang the grand aria of Micaela from Bizet's "Carmen" with splendid dramatic fervor and largeness of expression giving a marked example of her skill in soste enuto singing. Her other contribution to the concert was Tamara's "Mad Song" from Rubinstein's "The Demon," which had not been heard here before. It is gracefully melodious, varying constantly in the emotions it depicts, and is prolific in strongly rythmical fioriturl of considerable difficulty. It was brilliantly sung by the artist, and in a style of the highest purity and finish, marked by exquisite delicacy in the more flowery phrases. Miss Franklin was vigorously recalled twice after each solo. For the next concert the programme is: Mendelssohn's "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage," overture; a concerto for piano, by L. Maas; Funeral March, Schubert, instrumented by Liszt, and Schumann's Symphony No. 1. The soloist is to be Mr. Carl Faelten.

Boston Sunday Globe.

TWENTY-FOUR PAGES.

SUNDAY, MARCH 2, 1890.

SYMPHONY SOUNDS.

Arthur Weld's "Italia," Under the Composer's Direction—Miss Franklin's Songs.

It was a graceful compliment to his friend, Arthur Weld, when Mr. Nikisch gave the young composer's "Italia" a place upon a Boston Symphony programme. But the Leipzig director has more than twice or thrice given evidence of his readiness to appreciate the work of Americans in music, and "Italia" will easily take rank among the most agreeable offerings of native talent that the season has brought. Mr. Weld's suite, composed when he was a student at Munich, and honored with a hearing at the Worcester festival of 1888, is undoubtedly "programme music." Throughout, the work shows command over the resources of the modern orchestra, and there has been but infrequent yielding to the tendency to over-elaboration of themes. The "linked sweetness" is undoubtedly "long drawn out" in the Amalfi movement, which sets forth a lover's longing. But the other movements, particularly that which recalls life in Rome at carnival time, never lose their hold upon interest. Mr. Weld himself conducted the performance of the "Italia" with much care and earnestness, and, at the close, the young composer and critic was recalled and applauded very heartily. The orchestra performed its part with great spirit for the most part, and its members joined heartily in the plaudits that followed the suite. Mozart's symphony in E flat, with its lovely and familiar andante, opened the programme and Meyerbeer's strong "Struensee" overture ended what was one of Mr. Nikisch's longest concerts. Miss Gertrude Franklin, the soloist of the occasion, sang Micaela's air from "Carmen," best known as "Io dico di no." She was not quite at her best in this Bizet selection, but in the florid air from Rubinstein's "Demon" her singing was exceptionally clear and brilliant, and the favorite soprano found warm and ready appreciation for her achievements.

Dr. Louis Maas, whose good work for music in Boston is not forgotten, though he himself has passed away, is represented on Mr. Nikisch's programme this week by his concerto for pianoforte in C minor. Mr. Carl Faelten will be the soloist. Such classics make up the offering as Mendelssohn's overture, "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage, Schubert's "Funeral March" (Liszt orchestration) and Schumann's first symphony.

CONCERT PROMISES.

The Young People's "Popular" in Music Hall, Wednesday Afternoon.

Were the second of Mr. Nikisch's "Young People's Populars" notable for nothing else than the re-entrance of that distinguished singer, Mlle. Clementine de Vere, the occasion would be accounted one of particular and unusual interest. But the Boston symphony orchestra and Anton Rekking are to assist in a programme that is worth reproducing here, so well is it arranged. Already there has been a brisk call for seats. The offering follows:

Overture, Jubel.....Weber
Bell song from Lakme.....Delibes
Mlle. De Vere.
Suite, Peer Gynt, op. 46 (by request).....Grieg
Nocturne for violoncello.....Chopin
Mr. Hekking.
Aria from the Star of the North.....Meyerbeer
Mlle. De Vere.
Ballet music, Bal Costume.....Rubinstein

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 2, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme last night was neither edifying nor well given, but it made up in length what it lacked in quality. Mozart's "Clarinette" symphony, the first which contained a clarinette part, but the weakest of the group of three which the master composed in 1788, began the concert, but it was soon evident that our orchestra does not contain the greatest of clarinette players, and after Mr. Strasser's playing at the recent Baermann concert, the lack of fullness of tone was all the more perceptible. Miss Gertrude Franklin sang rather indecisively in the higher register, in her first song, but quite expressively nevertheless, and we have never had Micaela's airs so well done in Boston. The second song was from Rubinstein's "Demon," and was given in that strange and weird language, "libretto-English," but the singing made ample amends for the weakness of the words, and the vocalist was at her very best, her floriture being excellent and clear even in the most difficult passages. She was recalled with enthusiasm. So was Arthur Welch after his Suite, which I did not think "dramatic" (save in its finale) nor "Italian," but which found immense favor with the public, and of which I liked the last movement. If Mr. Nikisch desires to prove all the ill-natured remarks that have been said about him, he has only to give a few more Meyerbeer overtures, with the blatant effects of last night. There is a distinct deterioration from the high standard our orchestra once had, in programmes, in performances—in every way, but it is not too late yet to cry a halt, and improve matters.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET CONCERT.

Union Hall was crowded Monday night by a fashionable audience on the occasion of the fourth concert of the Kneisel quartet series. Probably the fact that a new work by an American composer was to be produced, and that Arthur Whiting was to play the piano part, had something to do with the fact that the hall was so full, but the performance of the quartet was also of a character to warrant an appreciative audience in any musical community. The new work alluded to above was Chadwick's quintet in E flat, which has been heard in many other cities since its first performance some two years ago. It is one of the most successful works of the composer, and exhibits a skill in development that is not often present in the works of native composers. The first movement has a most genial chief theme, in excellent contrast with the following second theme, and both are subsequently developed in most masterly style. The two interior movements are not so impressive as the first and last of the work, although the intermezzo has some very skillful contrapuntal passages. The finale has some exquisite touches of treatment, and its chief theme is as rollicking as heart could desire. The sequences at the close and the broad augmentation of the leading figure form a very majestic ending. The work is one of the very best of American contributions to the sonata forms. Its performance was of adequate steadiness, although not as perfect as some of the work of the Kneisel Quartet. Mr. Arthur Whiting was generally excellent in the piano part, although a trifle more of force would not have been misplaced. The quartet, which followed, was perfectly performed and justly evoked the greatest enthusiasm. Then came the gem of the concert, the Schubert quintet in C, with two 'cellos, Mr. Leo Schulz playing the extra instrument. The great quartet has never excelled the beauty with which this work was given. There was absolutely no blemish for adverse criticism to lift its voice about. The finale found the audience quite as enthusiastic as at the beginning of the concert, and this, too, after a programme which lasted over two hours! I have often stated that I believe this quartet to be the best in America, but on this occasion they excelled themselves and the performers are to be congratulated on a performance of a character transcending even their own previous record.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Musical Notes.

On Wednesday afternoon next a "Young People's Popular" will be given in Music Hall, by the Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Nikisch has chosen an admirable programme for the occasion, as will be seen by the following: "Jubel" overture, Weber; "Bell Song" from "Lackme," Delibes; Suite, "Peter Gynt," Grieg; Nocturne for violoncello, Chopin; aria from "The Star of the North," Meyerbeer; and ballet music, "Bal Costume" Rubinstein. Mlle. Clementine de Vere and Mr. Anton Hekking will be the soloists.

Boston Post

TUESDAY MORNING, MARCH 4, 1890

According to the Western papers the recent disorganization of the so-called "Boston Symphony Orchestral Club" was not entirely amicable. It appears that the club wished to get rid of its manager, Mr. Bachert, and not vice versa, as was at first represented. The club, with the exception of Mr. de Seve, the violinist, has reorganized under the title of "New York Harmonic Club" (a much more honest title than the other, be it remarked), and will proceed to give concerts under a new management. The charming Swedish singer, Miss Augusta Ohrstrom, will remain with the new organization.

Boston Evening Transcript.

MONDAY, MARCH 3, 1890.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The programme of the eighteenth symphony concert was as follows:

Mozart: Symphony in E-flat.
Bizet: Micaela's air from "Carmen."
Arthur Weld: Suite, "Italia."
Rubinstein: Tamara's song from "The Demon."
Meyerbeer: Overture to "Struensee."

Miss Gertrude Franklin was the singer.

The wind-players had evidently forgotten to blow the weather out of their instruments before the concert began, for the response to Mr. Nikisch's first wave of his bâton was not the chord of E-flat major, as the audience had a right to expect it would be, but a nondescript something that froze one's very blood with terror. But the weather being once blown out of the sonorous tubes, Mozart's music had free course through them, and all went well. To say that Mozart's E-flat symphony is the least great of his greatest three is to say nothing very hard about it. Even if it fall a little behind the "Jupiter" and the unapproached G minor, it is great enough, and was doubly welcome last Saturday, after the late famine of great music here. We hardly like Mr. Nikisch's taking the announcement of the theme of the first movement slower than he meant to arry it through; even admitting the occasional propriety of taking slightly different tempi for different themes in a movement, we can see no possible advantage that can accrue from taking successive apparitions of the same theme at different tempi—except in such rare cases as the first song in Schumann's "Paradise and the Peri," where a gradual and continuous acceleration of the tempo is indicated by the composer. But, with this single exception, Mr. Nikisch's reading of the symphony seemed admirable in every respect, and the orchestra played it excellently.

Mr. Weld's suite in five movements (Monte Cassino: "Ave maris Stella."—Venezia: "I gondolieri amorosi."—Napoli: "Pulcinella."—Amalfi: "Una sera d'amore." — Roma; "Il Carnevale.") is a composition of which one would like to know the exact history, before passing judgment on it. Not long ago we had the privilege of listening to two movements of chamber music by Mr. Weld, which gave us unalloyed pleasure, and we learned that these movements were originally written for his final examination in Counterpoint at the Royal Music School in Munich. It may have been the knowledge of this that led us strongly to suspect, last Saturday evening, that the "Italia" suite may have owed its existence, in part at least, to an impending examination in Instrumentation. If this is so, one prominent feature in the orchestra is sufficiently accounted for,—the over-crowding of an almost unexampled variety of orchestral effects. It is a well-known trait of the young composer to be too prone to unpack all his orchestral baggage at once, in his first few compositions for orchestra, and to weigh down his writing with an embarrassment of orchestral riches. But we have never yet seen this done with such frank redundance as in this suite; the work might be called a complete practical illustration of Berlioz's entire "Traité d' Instrumentation," amplified by some original experiments of the composer's own. So bewildering is this perpetual kaleidoscopic shifting of orchestral color, this constant apparition of new tints and combinations, that one can hardly believe that the composer had the concert room solely in view when he wrote the work. There is something academic in this lavish display of resources; and one finds in it, as in many other things academic, a certain lack of a sense of humor. Still, even if one finds Mr. Weld's artistic judgment somewhat at fault in this matter—that is, looking at his work from the concert-going, and not from the academic, point of view—one cannot but admire the general sureness of hand he shows in commanding his resources. With few and insignificant exceptions, his treatment of the orchestra shows conspicuous skill, technical knowledge and imaginativeness. Now and then one may feel that he was led to do certain things more for the sake of doing them than for the effect produced; for instance, the effect of the solo violin and viola, in the fourth movement, is hardly such as to pay the composer for adding two staves to his score; it sounds rather as if he were bound to use a solo violin and viola, than as if he really wanted to. But such fallings short of effectiveness in coloring are merely sporadic in the work. Apart from the instrumentation, the suite shows melodic inventiveness, force and even vehemence of feeling, and poetic imagination. Unhappily, also, it shows in the second, fourth and fifth movements a terrible tendency to prolixity. We like the "Ave maris stella" and the "Pulcinella" by far the best; the former for its beauty, the latter for its genuine humor. The "Sera d'amore," in spite of an evident definiteness of structural plan, sounds all too vague, too merely emotional, and is moreover spun out beyond all true proportion. Mr. Weld conducted the suite without exuberance of gesture, but with aplomb, and a sure grasp of his forces. He was repeatedly recalled at the close.

Meyerbeer's "Struensee" overture—an admirable example, by the way, of what Meyerbeer could not do in the way of orchestral composition—was exceedingly brilliantly played.

Miss Franklin sang the song from "Carmen" with great sincerity of sentiment. Her singing of the mad-song from Rubinstein's "Demon" left a less determinate impression upon us; the song itself is too hard to like for one to enjoy the singing of it.

The next programme is: Mendelssohn, overture, "Meeresstille und glückliche Fahrt;" Louis Maas, pianoforte concerto in C minor, op. 13; Schubert, Funeral March (scored by Liszt); Schumann, Symphony No. 1, in B-flat. Mr. Carl Faelten will be the pianist.

[95]

Boston Journal.

WITH SUPPLEMENT.

MORNING EDITION.

SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 3, 1890.

The Symphony Concert.

There was sufficient variety at the Symphony Concert Saturday evening to satisfy the most fastidious. There was a symphony by Mozart, a vocal soloist who gave arias from the opera, an instrumental suite by an American composer, an overture by Meyerbeer, and two conductors. What more could have been crowded into one evening?

The Mozart symphony was by no means the least interesting portion of the concert. It was the Symphony in E flat, and is one of the most euphonious, pleasing and beautiful of them all. Simple in construction, reminding one of Haydn in that respect, there is nothing trivial or dull in it. The andante and minuetto are delightful pieces of orchestration, and the finale is designed, like all of Mozart's endings, to send the audience away in the best of humor. It was put first on the programme, and every music-lover was sorry when it was ended. No selection this season has met with a more hearty response from the audience. It was excellently played. So also was the Meyerbeer overture which closed the concert. Praise of Mr. Nikisch and the orchestra is getting at this time to be superfluous. Yet it is none the less deserved, for their renditions are as near perfection as we expect to hear in this city.

Miss Gertrude Franklin was the soloist. She is always welcome, because of her careful, artistic and conscientious work. Nothing is slightingly treated, and her voice, which is pure and true in intonation, is able to do what many larger voices cannot accomplish. She gave the familiar aria of Michaela in "Carmen" and an aria from Rubinstein's opera of "The Demon," a selection new to her auditors. Miss Franklin always endeavors to bring out something that has not been sung until it is hackneyed, and in this she shows the faithful student of her art that she is. Better selections for her voice than the Michaela aria could not have been chosen; the latter, with its legato measures, interwoven with brilliant execution, was especially suited to her high, flexible vocalism. It is not often that Miss Franklin does better work than she did Saturday evening.

There remains the "Italia" suite of Arthur Weld, which had its first presentation before a Boston audience. It was given at Worcester in 1888, and then, as now, it was conducted by the composer. Mr. Weld states that it is distinctly programme music; it is in five movements, and is intended to portray the different feelings of Italian life. It is a very meritorious production, and was well rendered. The audience, also, was very kind to the young composer—recalling him several times after the rendition. We are unable, however, to conceive of any advantage to be derived from the resignation of the conductor's baton into the hands of the composer. It is due to Mr. Weld to say that his conducting was far in advance of that in Worcester; at the same time works by our resident composers have been given a place in these concerts, when the authors have been content—and it has seemed in much better taste—to have the composition interpreted at the hands of Mr. Nikisch. At the next concert we are to have another piano soloist—something which will cease, probably, when all the pianists of the country have had an appearance—and this is to be the programme: Mendelssohn, overture, "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage;" Louis Maas, concerto for pianoforte in C minor, opus 13 (first time); Schubert, "Funeral March," orchestrated by Liszt; Schumann, Symphony No. 1, in B flat; soloist, Mr. Carl Faelten.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 2.

The Boston Symphony Concert.

The eighteenth concert of the Symphony Orchestra had a special interest in the performance of "Italia," a Dramatic Suite, for orchestra, by Mr. Arthur Weld. It is in five movements, opening with an admirably written hymn, richly but clearly and broadly scored, and impressing the hearers at the outset with the composer's thorough knowledge of orchestral resources and his skill and discretion in using them. The hymn merges, after much ingenious contrapuntal treatment, into a melodious and brilliant movement, the second theme of which is a species of barcarolle, but somewhat more extended and serious than are songs of this description. The third movement is a very vivacious, original and strikingly piquant scherzo, in which there is some exceedingly clever and effective instrumentation. Then comes an andante, the most ambitious portion of the work, and of symphonic proportions, prolific in flowing and, at times, sensuous melody. This is followed in turn by an exceedingly animated, brilliant and finely colored finale, portraying in tone color the bustle and merriment of a Roman carnival. It is impossible to describe fully a work of this varied character in the space at our command, but we can express the pleasure afforded in hearing it, and pay tribute to its clearness, its profusion of flowing melody, its masterly harmonies, and its fine musicianship generally. The instrumentation is always free and flexible, and the work has manifestly been thought out for the orchestra, from the outset. There is an ease and a freedom in the scoring, a feeling for the timbre of the various instruments and a knowledge shown in combining them for contrast and variety in effect, that has been seen in none of our younger composers. The work is not only interesting, but it is exceptionally able, and is entitled to the most earnest consideration and respect as a notable addition to the list of the best achievements of our native musicians. Mr. Weld conducted it spiritedly and firmly, holding his orchestra well in hand, and showing marked efficiency at the conductor's stand. The work was applauded with enthusiasm, and the composer was recalled twice to bow his acknowledgments to an appreciative and delighted audience. The concert began with Mozart's E flat symphony, which was beautifully read by Mr. Nikisch, and with a keenly artistic sympathy with the true spirit of the music, throwing into it a stimulating virility, and avoiding in the more tender movements of the work that sickly sentimentality that is too often and wrongly imparted to them. It was admirable Mozart intepreting. The concert ended with a stirring and brilliant performance of Meyerbeer's "Struensee" overture. The soloist was Miss Gertrude Franklin, who was never heard with finer effect than on this occasion. She sang the grand aria of Micaela from Bizet's "Carmen" with splendid dramatic fervor and largeness of expression giving a marked example of her skill in sost enuto singing. Her other contribution to the concert was Tamara's "Mad Song" from Rubinstein's "The Demon," which had not been heard here before. It is gracefully melodious, varying constantly in the emotions it depicts, and is prolific in strongly rythmical fiorituri of considerable difficulty. It was brilliantly sung by the artist, and in a style of the highest purity and finish, marked by exquisite delicacy in the more flowery phrases. Miss Franklin was vigorously recalled twice after each solo. For the next concert the programme is: Mendelssohn's "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage," overture; a concerto for piano, by L. Maas; Funeral March, Schubert, instrumented by Liszt, and Schumann's Symphony No. 1. The soloist is to be Mr. Carl Faelten.

Boston Sunday Globe.

TWENTY-FOUR PAGES.

SUNDAY, MARCH 2, 1890.

SYMPHONY SOUNDS.

Arthur Weld's "Italia," Under the Composer's Direction—Miss Franklin's Songs.

It was a graceful compliment to his friend, Arthur Weld, when Mr. Nikisch gave the young composer's "Italia" a place upon a Boston Symphony programme. But the Leipzig director has more than twice or thrice given evidence of his readiness to appreciate the work of Americans in music, and "Italia" will easily take rank among the most agreeable offerings of native talent that the season has brought. Mr. Weld's suite, composed when he was a student at Munich, and honored with a hearing at the Worcester festival of 1888, is undoubtedly "programme music." Throughout, the work shows command over the resources of the modern orchestra, and there has been but infrequent yielding to the tendency to over-elaboration of themes. The "linked sweetness" is undoubtedly "long drawn out" in the Amalfi movement, which sets forth a lover's longing. But the other movements, particularly that which recalls life in Rome at carnival time, never lose their hold upon interest. Mr. Weld himself conducted the performance of the "Italia" with much care and earnestness, and, at the close, the young composer and critic was recalled and applauded very heartily. The orchestra performed its part with great spirit for the most part, and its members joined heartily in the plaudits that followed the suite. Mozart's symphony in E flat, with its lovely and familiar andante, opened the programme and Meyerbeer's strong "Struensee" overture ended what was one of Mr. Nikisch's longest concerts. Miss Gertrude Franklin, the soloist of the occasion, sang Micaela's air from "Carmen," best known as "Io dico di no." She was not quite at her best in this Bizet selection, but in the florid air from Rubinstein's "Demon" her singing was exceptionally clear and brilliant, and the favorite soprano found warm and ready appreciation for her achievements.

Dr. Louis Maas, whose good work for music in Boston is not forgotten, though he himself has passed away, is represented on Mr. Nikisch's programme this week by his concerto for pianoforte in C minor. Mr. Carl Faelten will be the soloist. Such classics make up the offering as Mendelssohn's overture, "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage, Schubert's "Funeral March" (Liszt orchestration) and Schumann's first symphony.

CONCERT PROMISES.

The Young People's "Popular" in Music Hall, Wednesday Afternoon.

Were the second of Mr. Nikisch's "Young People's Populars" notable for nothing else than the re-entrance of that distinguished singer, Mlle. Clementine de Vere, the occasion would be accounted one of particular and unusual interest. But the Boston symphony orchestra and Anton Hekking are to assist in a programme that is worth reproducing here, so well is it arranged. Already there has been a brisk call for seats. The offering follows:

Overture, Jubel.....Weber
Bell song from Lakme.....Delibes
Mlle. De Vere.
Suite, Peer Gynt, op. 46 (by request).....Grieg
Nocturne for violoncello.....Chopin
Mr. Hekking.
Aria from the Star of the North.....Meyerbeer
Mlle. De Vere.
Ballet music, Bal Costume.....Rubinstein

Musical Notes.

On Wednesday afternoon next a "Young People's Popular" will be given in Music Hall, by the Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Nikisch has chosen an admirable programme for the occasion, as will be seen by the following: "Jubel" overture, Weber; "Bell Song" from "Lackme," Delibes; Suite, "Peter Gynt," Grieg; Nocturne for violoncello, Chopin; aria from "The Star of the North," Meyerbeer; and ballet music, "Bal Costume" Rubinstein. Mlle. Clementine de Vere and Mr. Anton Hekking will be the soloists.

Boston Post

TUESDAY MORNING, MARCH 4, 1890

According to the Western papers the recent disorganization of the so-called "Boston Symphony Orchestral Club" was not entirely amicable. It appears that the club wished to get rid of its manager, Mr. Bachert, and not vice versa, as was at first represented. The club, with the exception of Mr. de Seve, the violinist, has reorganized under the title of "New York Harmonic Club" (a much more honest title than the other, be it remarked), and will proceed to give concerts under a new management. The charming Swedish singer, Miss Augusta Ohrstrom, will remain with the new organization.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 2, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme last night was neither edifying nor well given, but it made up in length what it lacked in quality. Mozart's "Clarinette" symphony, the first which contained a clarinette part, but the weakest of the group of three which the master composed in 1788, began the concert, but it was soon evident that our orchestra does not contain the greatest of clarinette players, and after Mr. Strasser's playing at the recent Baermann concert, the lack of fullness of tone was all the more perceptible. Miss Gertrude Franklin sang rather indecisively in the higher register, in her first song, but quite expressively nevertheless, and we have never had Micaela's airs so well done in Boston. The second song was from Rubinstein's "Demon," and was given in that strange and weird language, "libretto-English," but the singing made ample amends for the weakness of the words, and the vocalist was at her very best, her fioriture being excellent and clear even in the most difficult passages. She was recalled with enthusiasm. So was Arthur Welch after his Suite, which I did not think "dramatic" (save in its finale) nor "Italian," but which found immense favor with the public, and of which I liked the last movement. If Mr. Nikisch desires to prove all the ill-natured remarks that have been said about him, he has only to give a few more Meyerbeer overtures, with the blatant effects of last night. There is a distinct deterioration from the high standard our orchestra once had, in programmes, in performances—in every way, but it is not too late yet to cry a halt, and improve matters.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET CONCERT.

Union Hall was crowded Monday night by a fashionable audience on the occasion of the fourth concert of the Kneisel quartet series. Probably the fact that a new work by an American composer was to be produced, and that Arthur Whiting was to play the piano part, had something to do with the fact that the hall was so full, but the performance of the quartet was also of a character to warrant an appreciative audience in any musical community. The new work alluded to above was Chadwick's quintet in E flat, which has been heard in many other cities since its first performance some two years ago. It is one of the most successful works of the composer, and exhibits a skill in development that is not often present in the works of native composers. The first movement has a most genial chief theme, in excellent contrast with the following second theme, and both are subsequently developed in most masterly style. The two interior movements are not so impressive as the first and last of the work, although the intermezzo has some very skillful contrapuntal passages. The finale has some exquisite touches of treatment, and its chief theme is as rollicking as heart could desire. The sequences at the close and the broad augmentation of the leading figure form a very majestic ending. The work is one of the very best of American contributions to the sonata forms. Its performance was of adequate steadiness, although not as perfect as some of the work of the Kneisel Quartet. Mr. Arthur Whiting was generally excellent in the piano part, although a trifle more of force would not have been misplaced. The quartet, which followed, was perfectly performed and justly evoked the greatest enthusiasm. Then came the gem of the concert, the Schubert quintet in C, with two 'cellos, Mr. Leo Schulz playing the extra instrument. The great quartet has never excelled the beauty with which this work was given. There was absolutely no blemish for adverse criticism to lift its voice about. The finale found the audience quite as enthusiastic as at the beginning of the concert, and this, too, after a programme which lasted over two hours! I have often stated that I believe this quartet to be the best in America, but on this occasion they excelled themselves and the performers are to be congratulated on a performance of a character transcending even their own previous record.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Evening Transcript.

MONDAY, MARCH 3, 1890.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The programme of the eighteenth symphony concert was as follows:

Mozart: Symphony in E-flat.
Bizet: Micaëla's air from "Carmen."
Arthur Weld: Suite, "Italia."
Rubinstein: Tamara's song from "The Demon."
Meyerbeer: Overture to "Struensee."

Miss Gertrude Franklin was the singer.

The wind-players had evidently forgotten to blow the weather out of their instruments before the concert began, for the response to Mr. Nikisch's first wave of his bâton was not the chord of E-flat major, as the audience had a right to expect it would be, but a nondescript something that froze one's very blood with terror. But the weather being once blown out of the sonorous tubes, Mozart's music had free course through them, and all went well. To say that Mozart's E-flat symphony is the least great of his greatest three is to say nothing very hard about it. Even if it fall a little behind the "Jupiter" and the unapproached G minor, it is great enough, and was doubly welcome last Saturday, after the late famine of great music here. We hardly like Mr. Nikisch's taking the announcement of the theme of the first movement slower than he meant to arry it through; even admitting the occasional propriety of taking slightly different tempi for different themes in a movement, we can see no possible advantage that can accrue from taking successive apparitions of the same theme at different tempi—except in such rare cases as the first song in Schumann's "Paradise and the Peri." where a gradual and continuous acceleration of the tempo is indicated by the composer. But, with this single exception, Mr. Nikisch's reading of the symphony seemed admirable in every respect, and the orchestra played it excellently.

Mr. Weld's suite in five movements (Monte Cassino: "Ave maris Stella."—Venezia: "I gondolieri amorosi."—Napoli: "Pulcinella."—Amalfi: "Una sera d'amore." — Roma; "Il Carnevale.") is a composition of which one would like to know the exact history, before passing judgment on it. Not long ago we had the privilege of listening to two movements of chamber music by Mr. Weld, which gave us unalloyed pleasure, and we learned that these movements were originally written for his final examination in Counterpoint at the Royal Music School in Munich. It may have been the knowledge of this that led us strongly to suspect, last Saturday evening, that the "Italia" suite may have owed its existence, in part at least, to an impending examination in Instrumentation. If this is so, one prominent feature in the orchestra is sufficiently accounted for,—the over-crowding of an almost unexampled variety of orchestral effects. It is a well-known trait of the young composer to be too prone to unpack all his orchestral baggage at once, in his first few compositions for orchestra, and to weigh down his writing with an embarrassment of orchestral riches. But we have never yet seen this done with such frank redundance as in this suite; the work might be called a complete practical illustration of Berlioz's entire "Traité d' Instrumentation," amplified by some original experiments of the composer's own. So bewildering is this perpetual kaleidoscopic shifting of orchestral color, this constant apparition of new tints and combinations, that one can hardly believe that the composer had the concert room solely in view when he wrote the work. There is something academic in this lavish display of resources; and one finds in it, as in many other things academic, a certain lack of a sense of humor. Still, even if one finds Mr. Weld's artistic judgment somewhat at fault in this matter—that is, looking at his work from the concert-going, and not from the academic, point of view—one cannot but admire the general sureness of hand he shows in commanding his resources. With few and insignificant exceptions, his treatment of the orchestra shows conspicuous skill, technical knowledge and imaginativeness. Now and then one may feel that he was led to do certain things more for the sake of doing them than for the effect produced; for instance, the effect of the solo violin and viola, in the fourth movement, is hardly such as to pay the composer for adding two staves to his score; it sounds rather as if he were bound to use a solo violin and viola, than as if he really wanted to. But such fallings short of effectiveness in coloring are merely sporadic in the work. Apart from the instrumentation, the suite shows melodic inventiveness, force and even vehemence of feeling, and poetic imagination. Unhappily, also, it shows in the second, fourth and fifth movements a terrible tendency to prolixity. We like the "Ave maris stella" and the "Pulcinella" by far the best; the former for its beauty, the latter for its genuine humor. The "Sera d'amore," in spite of an evident definiteness of structural plan, sounds all too vague, too merely emotional, and is moreover spun out beyond all true proportion. Mr. Weld conducted the suite without exuberance of gesture, but with aplomb, and a sure grasp of his forces. He was repeatedly recalled at the close.

Meyerbeer's "Struensee" overture—an admirable example, by the way, of what Meyerbeer could not do in the way of orchestral composition—was exceedingly brilliantly played.

Miss Franklin sang the song from "Carmen" with great sincerity of sentiment. Her singing of the mad-song from Rubinstein's "Demon" left a less determinate impression upon us; the song itself is too hard to like for one to enjoy the singing of it.

The next programme is: Mendelssohn, overture, "Meeresstille und glückliche Fahrt;" Louis Maas, pianoforte concerto in C minor, op. 13; Schubert, Funeral March (scored by Liszt); Schumann, Symphony No. 1, in B-flat. Mr. Carl Faelten will be the pianist.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

MINNEAPOLIS,

MONDAY EVENING, MAY 12, 1890.

ONE GREAT CONCERT.

Under the management of

MR. LOUIS MILLER.

Boston Daily Traveller.

TUESDAY, MARCH 4, 1890.

Eighteenth Symphony Concert on Saturday Evening—Miss Gertrude Franklin, Soloist.

The programme of the eighteenth Symphony concert was:

Mozart.	Symphony in E flat. (Kocchel 543).
Bizet.	Micaela's Aria, from "Carmen."
Arthur Weld.	"Italia." Dramatic Suite for Orchestra, 1. Monte Cassino.—"Ave maris stella." 2. Venezia.—"I gondolieri amorosi." 3. Napoli.—"Pulchinella." 4. Amalfi.—"Una sera d'amore." 5. Roma.—"Il Carnevale." (First time in Boston.)
Rubinstein.	Aria, "Taeglich eilen wir im Fluge," from "Der Daemon." (First time in Boston.)
Meyerbeer.	Overture. "Struensee."

What more beautiful performance of Mozart could purists ask than that Mr. Nikisch gave on Saturday. The perfection of outline, which is Mozart's chief charm, was preserved in the rendering, and this had an added quality of expression, welcome because it set off and did not injuriously condition the exact, scholarly, elegant, but not inspired, music. Meyerbeer's orchestral prelude to his brother's play of "Struensee" is not in strict overture form, neither is it so very worthy of place in a concert of the strictest standard; the little Jew did a great work in improving the Rossini model of opera, but his is emphatically a theatric manner, and, shorn of the trappings of the playhouse, his music, to use a paradoxical expression, does not "light up well." The performance of the "Struensee" piece was vigorous, and it sent the audience away in good humor. Mr. Weld's music is a succession of five tone-pictures of Italian life, each being intended by the composer to suggest the particular habit or pastime of the community from which it takes its name; there is no resemblance to the suite form proper, though Mr. Weld's Italians being creatures of diverse moods, the several movements offer variety of tempi, color, sentiment and sound. When the work was played at the Worcester Festival this column contained a review of it, and our estimate was by no means disparaging. But a Boston Symphony concert and a matinee in innocent Worcester are different affairs, so it is now necessary to apply a stricter standard of judgment than before. Mr. Weld wrote the music of his "Italia" in Munich, when he was a pupil of the Royal Music School, and it was performed as a sort of graduating thesis by the orchestra of the school. It is very good work indeed, for a student attempt; it possesses ideas, shows extended study of the instruments, and no little faculty in combining them; and, while one or two of the themes suggest Wagner, there is a gratifying amount of originality in the melodies. But when Mr. Weld has composed more, and subjected his work to more crucial tests, he will wish he had kept his "Italia" in his portfolio, and recognized that its level of excellence is not that of the Symphony concert. As popular music, Mr. Weld's suite is capital, the "Carnevale" being extremely ingenious. Mr. Weld conducted the performance of his own work, and the success it achieved with the audience—he was twice recalled at its close—was largely owing to this fact. He held his players well in hand, got clean-cut entrances from the different divisions, handled the crescendi and diminuendi nicely, and altogether showed positive qualities for the work of conducting an orchestra.

Miss Franklin is to be congratulated for going out of the beaten track in selecting the air from "Carmen." The Rubinstein scene is new here. It is very exacting vocally and makes demands upon the voice which only the best trained can answer. Miss Franklin sang it beautifully, though we wished Mr. Nikisch had chosen a faster tempo in the closing measures. After each appearance the singer was twice recalled. The next programme is: Mendelssohn, overture, "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage;" Louis Maas, concerto for pianoforte, in C minor, op. 13; Schubert, Funeral March, orchestrated by Liszt; Schumann, Symphony No. 1, in B flat. Soloist, Mr. Carl Faelten.

Notes.

The second of the Young People's Populars, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be given on Wednesday afternoon (tomorrow) at Music Hall, when the soloists will be Mlle. Clementina de Vere, soprano, and Anton Hekking, 'cello-player.

BUFFALO EXPRESS

Sunday Morning, March 2, 1890.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

PLANS FOR THE BUFFALO FESTIVAL OF 1891.

Musical Services To-day — Local Concerts—Advice to Mr. Purse and Mrs. Coffer—A Sad Memorial Service.

Emissaries of the Buffalo Musical Association were in Boston last week and hobnobbed with Arthur Nikisch, conductor, and Mr. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Great plans are on foot for the festival of 1891, when the Nikisch forces are expected to participate. The suggestion in this column two weeks ago that Beethoven's great orchestral and vocal Ninth Symphony be given at that time has met with enthusiastic indorsement by the music committee, and it is extremely probable that the work will then be produced for the first time in Buffalo. Another great attraction which is being sought is an original work by Brahms. Dr. Park soon sails for Europe and will carry with him a letter from Nikisch to Brahms asking for an original composition written expressly for the Buffalo festival, to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Nikisch seems confident that such a work can be secured. If it is, it will give to our festival an importance and eclat which will attract listeners and critics from a great distance. This would indeed be glory enough for any musical association on the continent.

The failure of the Ernst scheme is not going to deprive Buffalo of a Nikisch concert in May. The superb Boston orchestra will come here for one night some time during that month and enable us to compare it with its former self under Gericke. The enthusiasm with which its Boston season was regarded at home is shown in the fact that before the first concert $100,000 from advance sales was banked, and the two galleries opened to non-subscribers at popular prices were jammed an hour before the beginning of the first matinee. Both Mr. Nikisch and Mr. Ellis speak in the kindest manner of Buffalo and fully understand the unfortunate contretemps which has dissolved their contract with Mr. Ernst.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

THURSDAY MORNING, MAR. 6, 1890.

The Young People's Popular Concert Yesterday Afternoon.

The concert at Music Hall yesterday afternoon was popular in every sense of the word, and drew an audience larger than any that has ever attended any of these concerts which are extraneous to the regular course. The programme began with Weber's Jubel overture, which was given with great spirit, especially in its finale. Then came Mlle. De Vere in the "Bell Song" from "Lakme," which she gave in a manner entirely beyond criticism. Some time ago, when Mlle. De Vere appeared in miscellaneous concerts in Boston I predicted that she would yet be in the front rank of coloratur singers, and her work at this concert goes far to bear out the prophecy. Her fioriture against the flute passages in the aria from the "Star of the North," were equal to those of any singer who has appeared in Boston in many years.

The Suite "Peer Gynt" has been too recently reviewed to require further criticism, but I take the occasion to renew my statement that it is by no means trashy or sensational music.

Chopin's Nocturne, transcribed for 'cello and harp, was altogether a beautiful combination and was played to perfection, and Rubinstein's "Bal Costume" was given with all necessary vigor. The programme was not on as high a level as the previous popular concerts (outside of the summer "promenades"), but perhaps this is no fault, for the public expressed their hearty appreciation of it.

Boston Post

THURSDAY MORNING, MARCH 6, 1890

THE SECOND YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULAR.

Music Hall was not only filled but overflowing yesterday afternoon for the second concert of the "Young People's Popular" series, and the well-arranged programme was constantly greeted with deserved applause:

Overture, "Jubel" ..... Weber
Bell song from "Lakmé" ..... Delibes
Mlle. de Vere.
Suite. "Peer Gynt," op. 46 (by request) . Grieg
Nocturne for violoncello (with harp accompaniment) ..... Chopin
Mr. Hekking.
Aria from the "Star of the North" . . Meyerbeer
Mlle. de Vere.
Ballet music. "Bal Costumé" . . . . Rubinstein

The orchestra was in capital form, and played all its numbers very finely. The "Peer Gynt" suite by Grieg, which was repeated "by request," was again loudly applauded. In response to the applause Mr. Nikisch repeated the last movement. This was certainly more justifiable than to do so at the Symphony concert itself; still, it is a matter for regret, firstly, that our superior and well-trained "musical" public should wish to hear the rather vulgar little tune again; and, secondly, that even in these concerts the unwise precedent of granting an encore should have been made. The six numbers of Rubinstein's charming "Bal Costume" were delightfully interpreted by Mr. Nikisch, and most especially excellent was the rendering of the Toreadore et Andalouse and the Pélerin et Fantasie, which could scarcely have been better played.

Miss Clementine de Vere is certainly a most exquisite singer: every time she is heard one cannot fail to admire more and more the almost faultless technique with which she easily conquers the most complicated coloratur passages, and the delightfully pure and rich tone of her voice is a constant pleasure while she is singing. The Boston public is fortunate in the approaching opportunity at the Handel and Haydn Society's festival of hearing this fine artist in more important parts, and she will doubtless become a firm favorite with our concert-goers. Yesterday afternoon she sang the bell song from "Lakmé," a well-known piéce de fioriture for singers with flexible voices, and an equally celebrated coloratur aria from Meyerbeer's "Etoile du Nord," in which latter she was beautifully accompanied by M. Molé, the admirable flautist of our orchestra, in the evening cadenzas. Both numbers were superbly sung, and more one cannot say. Mr. Anton Hekking, the first 'cellist of the orchestra, was heard to great advantage in an arrangement of Chopin's ever popular E flat nocturne for 'cello and harp. He played it with beautiful tone and fine technique, and was accompanied by Mr. Shuecker in a most finished and musicianly manner. The whole concert was very pleasant, and it is to be regretted that this series has not been more extended during the winter.

ARTHUR WELD.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Second of the Season's "Young People's Popular" Concerts.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, assisted by Mlle. Clementina De Vere, soprano, and Mr. Anton Hekking, 'cello player, gave the second of the present season's "Young People's Populars" at Music Hall, yesterday afternoon, under Mr. Arthur Nikisch's direction. The programme was as follows: Overture, "Jubel," Weber; "Bell Song" from "Lakme," Delibes, Mlle. De Vere; Suite, "Peer Gynt," Grieg; Nocturne for violoncello (with harp accompaniment), Chopin, Mr. Hekking; aria from the "Star of the North," Meyerbeer, Mlle. De Vere; "Bal Costume," Rubinstein.

No better evidence of the rapid strides made by Mr. Nikisch in acquiring a knowledge of, and meeting the popular taste of, the local public could be asked than the character of this programme and its performance, the success of the concert calling out the highest praise to conductor, assistants and orchestra. Mlle. De Vere's triumph as the day's vocalist was most pronounced, and the commendation given her by the audience was most justly won. Her voice was at its best, and the selections were most admirably suited to her remarkable abilities as a singer. Her "Bell Song" was a fine rendition of the beauties of this graceful but exacting selection from Delibes' opera, and the audience was fairly captivated by the brilliancy and accuracy of her tones and the faultless delivery of the notable composition. In the now seldom-heard "Star of the North" aria the purity of her voice fairly rivalled the marvellous flute tones in the obbligato, so skilfully played by M. Mole, and the vocal pyrotechnics of the selection were sung with delightful effect. Mr. Hekking came in for his full share of the honors of the afternoon, and charmed the audience to absolute silence by his remarkably artistic playing of the Chopin Nocturne, in which the harp accompaniment by Mr. Schuecker was a source of great additional pleasure. The immense audience present again indorsed the "Peer Gynt" suite, and made it necessary to repeat the final movement before the applause could be quieted. Its performance, as well as the playing of the "Bal Costume" ballet music, and the "Jubal" overture, commanded the highest praise, and the concert, as a whole, made a most memorable impression. An amusing incident of the afternoon illustrated the danger of departing from the common use of a desk by the conductor. Mr. Nikisch returned to his habit of dispensing with a desk in the Grieg suite, and at the opening of the last movement this led him into an awkward predicament. The orchestra was a bit demoralized by the applause which rewarded their playing of the third movement, and mutual congratulations appeared to occupy the attention of the men. Mr. Nikisch on top of his "little throne" was helpless, for there was nothing within reach to hit with his baton. Concert master Kneisel saw the situation, and ended the awkward pause by rapping the men to attention.

Boston Daily Globe.

THURSDAY, MARCH 6.

UNDER NIKISCH'S BATON.

A Delightful Popular Programme Offered at Music Hall.

There was a delightful concert in Music Hall yesterday afternoon. The audience was very large and brilliant, and decidedly more enthusiastic than most of the gatherings that have watched Mr. Nikisch and his players. Had such an entertainment as this second "young people's popular" failed to gain favor, Boston's claim to being appreciative might well have been denied.

Mlle. Clementine De Vere, whose singing is beautifully clear, true and powerful, gave in her very best manner the "Bell song" from "Lakme," and after a florid air from Meyerbeer's "Star of the North." In both selections she was recalled, and again and again bowed her acknowledgments. The "Lakme" number, certainly, has never been given here with more absolute purity of intonation and sureness of effect. Mr. Anton Hekking, the celloist, gave in his own finished and artistic style a Chopin nocturne, for which Mr. Schuecker provided the harp accompaniment.

The orchestra never played more gloriously. Weber's "Jubilee" overture, the "Peer Gynt" suite (of course the quaint imp music was redemanded), and Rubinstein's "Bal Costume," all illustrated the leader's marvellous command over a body of musicians whom it would indeed be difficult to excel anywhere. Every orchestral effect seems to be at the command of Mr. Nikisch's baton.

It is to be hoped that a third "Popular" may be added to the record of this brilliant musical season.

---

[86]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

MINNEAPOLIS,

MONDAY EVENING, MAY 12, 1890.

ONE GREAT CONCERT.

Under the management of

MR. LOUIS MILLER.

Boston Daily Traveller.

TUESDAY, MARCH 4, 1890.

Eighteenth Symphony Concert on Saturday Evening—Miss Gertrude Franklin, Soloist.

The programme of the eighteenth Symphony concert was:

Mozart.	Symphony in E flat. (Koechel 543).
Bizet.	Micaela's Aria, from "Carmen."
Arthur Weld.	"Italia." Dramatic Suite for Orchestra.
	1. Monte Cassino.—"Ave maris stella."
	2. Venezia.—"I gondolieri amorosi."
	3. Napoli.—"Pulchinella."
	4. Amalfi.—"Una sera d'amore."
	5. Roma.—"Il Carnevale." (First time in Boston.)
Rubinstein.	Aria, "Taeglich eilen wir im Fluge," from "Der Daemon." (First time in Boston.)
Meyerbeer.	Overture. "Struensee."

What more beautiful performance of Mozart could purists ask than that Mr. Nikisch gave on Saturday. The perfection of outline, which is Mozart's chief charm, was preserved in the rendering, and this had an added quality of expression, welcome because it set off and did not injuriously condition the exact, scholarly, elegant, but not inspired, music. Meyerbeer's orchestral prelude to his brother's play of "Struensee" is not in strict overture form, neither is it so very worthy of place in a concert of the strictest standard; the little Jew did a great work in improving the Rossini model of opera, but his is emphatically a theatric manner, and, shorn of the trappings of the playhouse, his music, to use a paradoxical expression, does not "light up well." The performance of the "Struensee" piece was vigorous, and it sent the audience away in good humor. Mr. Weld's music is a succession of five tone-pictures of Italian life, each being intended by the composer to suggest the particular habit or pastime of the community from which it takes its name; there is no resemblance to the suite form proper, though Mr. Weld's Italians being creatures of diverse moods, the several movements offer variety of tempi, color, sentiment and sound. When the work was played at the Worcester Festival this column contained a review of it, and our estimate was by no means disparaging. But a Boston Symphony concert and a matinee in innocent Worcester are different affairs, so it is now necessary to apply a stricter standard of judgment than before. Mr. Weld wrote the music of his "Italia" in Munich, when he was a pupil of the Royal Music School, and it was performed as a sort of graduating thesis by the orchestra of the school. It is very good work indeed, for a student attempt; it possesses ideas, shows extended study of the instruments, and no little faculty in combining them; and, while one or two of the themes suggest Wagner, there is a gratifying amount of originality in the melodies. But when Mr. Weld has composed more, and subjected his work to more crucial tests, he will wish he had kept his "Italia" in his portfolio, and recognized that its level of excellence is not that of the Symphony concert. As popular music, Mr. Weld's suite is capital, the "Carnevale" being extremely ingenious. Mr. Weld conducted the performance of his own work, and the success it achieved with the audience—he was twice recalled at its close—was largely owing to this fact. He held his players well in hand, got clean-cut entrances from the different divisions, handled the crescendi and diminuendi nicely, and altogether showed positive qualities for the work of conducting an orchestra.

Miss Franklin is to be congratulated for going out of the beaten track in selecting the air from "Carmen." The Rubinstein scene is new here. It is very exacting vocally and makes demands upon the voice which only the best trained can answer. Miss Franklin sang it beautifully, though we wished Mr. Nikisch had chosen a faster tempo in the closing measures. After each appearance the singer was twice recalled. The next programme is: Mendelssohn, overture, "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage;" Louis Maas, concerto for pianoforte, in C minor, op. 13; Schubert, Funeral March, orchestrated by Liszt; Schumann, Symphony No. 1, in B flat. Soloist, Mr. Carl Faelten.

Notes.

The second of the Young People's Populars, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be given on Wednesday afternoon (tomorrow) at Music Hall, when the soloists will be Mlle. Clementina de Vere, soprano, and Anton Hekking, 'cello-player.

BUFFALO EXPRESS

Sunday Morning, March 2, 1890.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

PLANS FOR THE BUFFALO FESTIVAL OF 1891.

Musical Services To-day -- Local Concerts--Advice to Mr. Purse and Mrs. Coffer--A Sad Memorial Service.

Emissaries of the Buffalo Musical Association were in Boston last week and hobnobbed with Arthur Nikisch, conductor, and Mr. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Great plans are on foot for the festival of 1891, when the Nikisch forces are expected to participate. The suggestion in this column two weeks ago that Beethoven's great orchestral and vocal Ninth Symphony be given at that time has met with enthusiastic indorsement by the music committee, and it is extremely probable that the work will then be produced for the first time in Buffalo. Another great attraction which is being sought is an original work by Brahms. Dr. Park soon sails for Europe and will carry with him a letter from Nikisch to Brahms asking for an original composition written expressly for the Buffalo festival, to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Nikisch seems confident that such a work can be secured. If it is, it will give to our festival an importance and eclat which will attract listeners and critics from a great distance. This would indeed be glory enough for any musical association on the continent.

The failure of the Ernst scheme is not going to deprive Buffalo of a Nikisch concert in May. The superb Boston orchestra will come here for one night some time during that month and enable us to compare it with its former self under Gericke. The enthusiasm with which its Boston season was regarded at home is shown in the fact that before the first concert $100,000 from advance sales was banked, and the two galleries opened to non-subscribers at popular prices were jammed an hour before the beginning of the first matinee. Both Mr. Nikisch and Mr. Ellis speak in the kindest manner of Buffalo and fully understand the unfortunate contretemps which has dissolved their contract with Mr. Ernst.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

THURSDAY MORNING, MAR. 6, 1890.

The Young People's Popular Concert Yesterday Afternoon.

The concert at Music Hall yesterday afternoon was popular in every sense of the word, and drew an audience larger than any that has ever attended any of these concerts which are extraneous to the regular course. The programme began with Weber's Jubel overture, which was given with great spirit, especially in its finale. Then came Mlle. De Vere in the "Bell Song" from "Lakme," which she gave in a manner entirely beyond criticism. Some time ago, when Mlle. De Vere appeared in miscellaneous concerts in Boston I predicted that she would yet be in the front rank of coloratur singers, and her work at this concert goes far to bear out the prophecy. Her fioriture against the flute passages in the aria from the "Star of the North," were equal to those of any singer who has appeared in Boston in many years.

The Suite "Peer Gynt" has been too recently reviewed to require further criticism, but I take the occasion to renew my statement that it is by no means trashy or sensational music.

Chopin's Nocturne, transcribed for 'cello and harp, was altogether a beautiful combination and was played to perfection, and Rubinstein's "Bal Costume" was given with all necessary vigor. The programme was not on as high a level as the previous popular concerts (outside of the summer "promenades"), but perhaps this is no fault, for the public expressed their hearty appreciation of it.

Boston Post

THURSDAY MORNING, MARCH 6, 1890

THE SECOND YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULAR.

Music Hall was not only filled but overflowing yesterday afternoon for the second concert of the "Young People's Popular" series, and the well-arranged programme was constantly greeted with deserved applause:

Overture, "Jubel".....Weber
Bell song from "Lakmé".....Delibes
Mlle. de Vere.
Suite. "Peer Gynt," op. 46 (by request). Grieg
Nocturne for violoncello (with harp accompaniment).....Chopin
Mr. Hekking.
Aria from the "Star of the North"..Meyerbeer
Mlle. de Vere.
Ballet music. "Bal Costumé".....Rubinstein

The orchestra was in capital form, and played all its numbers very finely. The "Peer Gynt" suite by Grieg, which was repeated "by request," was again loudly applauded. In response to the applause Mr. Nikisch repeated the last movement. This was certainly more justifiable than to do so at the Symphony concert itself; still, it is a matter for regret, firstly, that our superior and well-trained "musical" public should wish to hear the rather vulgar little tune again; and, secondly, that even in these concerts the unwise precedent of granting an encore should have been made. The six numbers of Rubinstein's charming "Bal Costumé" were delightfully interpreted by Mr. Nikisch, and most especially excellent was the rendering of the Toreadore et Andalouse and the Pélerin et Fantasie, which could scarcely have been better played.

Miss Clementine de Vere is certainly a most exquisite singer: every time she is heard one cannot fail to admire more and more the almost faultless technique with which she easily conquers the most complicated colorature passages, and the delightfully pure and rich tone of her voice is a constant pleasure while she is singing. The Boston public is fortunate in the approaching opportunity at the Händel and Haydn Society's festival of hearing this fine artist in more important parts, and she will doubtless become a firm favorite with our concert-goers. Yesterday afternoon she sang the bell song from "Lakmé," a well-known pièce de fioriture for singers with flexible voices, and an equally celebrated colorature aria from Meyerbeer's "Etoile du Nord," in which latter she was beautifully accompanied by M. Molé, the admirable flautist of our orchestra, in the opening cadenzas. Both numbers were superbly sung, and more one cannot say. Mr. Anton Hekking, the first 'cellist of the orchestra, was heard to great advantage in an arrangement of Chopin's ever popular E flat nocturne for 'cello and harp. He played it with beautiful tone and fine technique, and was accompanied by Mr. Shuecker in a most finished and musicianly manner. The whole concert was very pleasant, and it is to be regretted that this series has not been more extended during the winter.

ARTHUR WELD.

[illegible]

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Second of the Season's "Young People's Popular" Concerts.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, assisted by Mlle. Clementina De Vere, soprano, and Mr. Anton Hekking, 'cello player, gave the second of the present season's "Young People's Populars" at Music Hall, yesterday afternoon, under Mr. Arthur Nikisch's direction. The programme was as follows: Overture, "Jubel," Weber; "Bell Song" from "Lakme," Delibes, Mlle. De Vere; Suite, "Peer Gynt," Grieg; Nocturne for violoncello (with harp accompaniment), Chopin; Mr. Hekking; aria from the "Star of the North," Meyerbeer, Mlle. De Vere; "Bal Costume," Rubinstein.

No better evidence of the rapid strides made by Mr. Nikisch in acquiring a knowledge of, and meeting the popular tastes of, the local public could be asked than the character of this programme and its performance, the success of the concert calling only for the highest praise to conductor, assisting artists and orchestra. Mlle. De Vere's triumph as the day's vocalist was most pronounced, and the commendation given her by the audience was most justly won. Her voice was at its best, and the selections were most admirably suited to her remarkable abilities as a singer. Her "Bell Song" was a full realization of the beauties of this graceful but trying selection from Delibes' opera, and the audience was fairly captivated by the brilliancy and accuracy of her tones and the faultless delivery of the notable composition. In the now seldom-heard "Star of the North" aria the purity of her voice fairly rivalled the marvellous flute tones in the obbligato, so skilfully played by M. Mole, and the vocal pyrotechnics of the selection were sung with delightful effect. Mr. Hekking came in for his full share of the honors of the afternoon, and charmed the audience to absolute silence by his remarkably artistic playing of the Chopin Nocturne, in which the harp accompaniment by Mr. Schuecker was a source of great additional pleasure. The immense audience present again indorsed the "Peer Gynt" suite, and made it necessary to repeat the final movement before the applause could be quieted. Its performance, as well as the playing of the "Bal Costume" ballet music, and the "Jubal" overture, commanded the highest praise, and the concert, as a whole, made a most memorable impression. An amusing incident of the afternoon illustrated the danger of departing from the common use of a desk by the conductor. Mr. Nikisch returned to his habit of dispensing with a desk in the Grieg suite, and at the opening of the last movement this led him into an awkward predicament. The orchestra was a bit demoralized by the applause which rewarded their playing of the third movement, and mutual congratulations appeared to occupy the attention of the men. Mr. Nikisch on top of his "little throne" was helpless, for there was nothing within reach to hit with his baton. Concert master Kneisel saw the situation, and ended the awkward pause by rapping the men to attention.

Boston Daily Globe.

THURSDAY, MARCH 6

UNDER NIKISCH'S BATON.

A Delightful Popular Programme Offered at Music Hall.

There was a delightful concert in Music Hall yesterday afternoon. The audience was very large and brilliant, and decidedly more enthusiastic than most of the gatherings that have watched Mr. Nikisch and his players. Had such an entertainment as this second "young people's popular" failed to gain favor, Boston's claim to being appreciative might well have been denied.

Mlle. Clementine De Vere, whose singing is beautifully clear, true and powerful, gave in her very best manner the "Bell song" from "Lakme," and after a florid air from Meyerbeer's "Star of the North." In both selections she was recalled, and again and again bowed her acknowledgments. The "Lakme" number, certainly, has never been given here with more absolute purity of intonation and sureness of effect. Mr. Anton Hekking, the celloist, gave in his own finished and artistic style a Chopin nocturne, for which Mr. Schuecker provided the harp accompaniment.

The orchestra never played more gloriously. Weber's "Jubilee" overture, the "Peer Gynt" suite (of course the quaint imp music was redemanded), and Rubinstein's "Bal Costume," all illustrated the leader's marvellous command over a body of musicians whom it would indeed be difficult to excel anywhere. Every orchestral effect seems to be at the command of Mr. Nikisch's baton.

It is to be hoped that a third "Popular" may be added to the record of this brilliant musical season.

---

[86]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

MINNEAPOLIS,

MONDAY EVENING, MAY 12, 1890.

ONE GREAT CONCERT.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1889-90

Under the management of

MR. LOUIS MILLER.

Boston Daily Traveller.

TUESDAY, MARCH 4, 1890.

Eighteenth Symphony Concert on Saturday Evening—Miss Gertrude Franklin, Soloist.

The programme of the eighteenth Symphony concert was:

Mozart.	Symphony in E flat. (Koechel 543).
Bizet.	Micaela's Aria, from "Carmen."
Arthur Weld.	"Italia." Dramatic Suite for Orchestra.
	1. } Monte Cassino.—"Ave maris stella."
	2. } Venezia.—"I gondolieri amorosi."
	3. Napoli.—"Pulchinella."
	4. Amalfi.—"Una sera d'amore."
	5. Roma.—"Il Carnevale." (First time in Boston.)
Rubinstein.	Aria, "Taeglich eilen wir im Fluge," from "Der Daemon." (First time in Boston.)
Meyerbeer.	Overture. "Struensee."

What more beautiful performance of Mozart could purists ask than that Mr. Nikisch gave on Saturday. The perfection of outline, which is Mozart's chief charm, was preserved in the rendering, and this had an added quality of expression, welcome because it set off and did not injuriously condition the exact, scholarly, elegant, but not inspired, music. Meyerbeer's orchestral prelude to his brother's play of "Struensee" is not in strict overture form, neither is it so very worthy of place in a concert of the strictest standard; the little Jew did a great work in improving the Rossini model of opera, but his is emphatically a theatric manner, and, shorn of the trappings of the playhouse, his music, to use a paradoxical expression, does not "light up well." The performance of the "Struensee" piece was vigorous, and it sent the audience away in good humor. Mr. Weld's music is a succession of five tone-pictures of Italian life, each being intended by the composer to suggest the particular habit or pastime of the community from which it takes its name; there is no resemblance to the suite form proper, though Mr. Weld's Italians being creatures of diverse moods, the several movements offer variety of tempi, color, sentiment and sound. When the work was played at the Worcester Festival this column contained a review of it, and our estimate was by no means disparaging. But a Boston Symphony concert and a matinee in innocent Worcester are different affairs, so it is now necessary to apply a stricter standard of judgment than before. Mr. Weld wrote the music of his "Italia" in Munich, when he was a pupil of the Royal Music School, and it was performed as a sort of graduating thesis by the orchestra of the school. It is very good work indeed, for a student attempt; it possesses ideas, shows extended study of the instruments, and no little faculty in combining them; and, while one or two of the themes suggest Wagner, there is a gratifying amount of originality in the melodies. But when Mr. Weld has composed more, and subjected his work to more crucial tests, he will wish he had kept his "Italia" in his portfolio, and recognized that its level of excellence is not that of the Symphony concert. As popular music, Mr. Weld's suite is capital, the "Carnevale" being extremely ingenious. Mr. Weld conducted the performance of his own work, and the success it achieved with the audience—he was twice recalled at its close—was largely owing to this fact. He held his players well in hand, got clean-cut entrances from the different divisions, handled the crescendi and diminuendi nicely, and altogether showed positive qualities for the work of conducting an orchestra.

Miss Franklin is to be congratulated for going out of the beaten track in selecting the air from "Carmen." The Rubinstein scene is new here. It is very exacting vocally and makes demands upon the voice which only the best trained can answer. Miss Franklin sang it beautifully, though we wished Mr. Nikisch had chosen a faster tempo in the closing measures. After each appearance the singer was twice recalled. The next programme is: Mendelssohn, overture, "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage;" Louis Maas, concerto for pianoforte, in C minor, op. 13; Schubert, Funeral March, orchestrated by Liszt; Schumann, Symphony No. 1, in B flat. Soloist, Mr. Carl Faelten.

Notes.

The second of the Young People's Populars, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be given on Wednesday afternoon (tomorrow) at Music Hall, when the soloists will be Mlle. Clementina de Vere, soprano, and Anton Hekking, 'cello-player.

Buffalo Express

Sunday Morning, March 2, 1890.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

PLANS FOR THE BUFFALO FESTIVAL OF 1891.

Musical Services To-day—Local Concerts—Advice to Mr. Purse and Mrs. Coffer—A Sad Memorial Service.

Emissaries of the Buffalo Musical Association were in Boston last week and hobnobbed with Arthur Nikisch, conductor, and Mr. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Great plans are on foot for the festival of 1891, when the Nikisch forces are expected to participate. The suggestion in this column two weeks ago that Beethoven's great orchestral and vocal Ninth Symphony be given at that time has met with enthusiastic indorsement by the music committee, and it is extremely probable that the work will then be produced for the first time in Buffalo. Another great attraction which is being sought is an original work by Brahms. Dr. Park soon sails for Europe and will carry with him a letter from Nikisch to Brahms asking for an original composition written expressly for the Buffalo festival, to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Nikisch seems confident that such a work can be secured. If it is, it will give to our festival an importance and eclat which will attract listeners and critics from a great distance. This would indeed be glory enough for any musical association on the continent.

The failure of the Ernst scheme is not going to deprive Buffalo of a Nikisch concert in May. The superb Boston orchestra will come here for one night some time during that month and enable us to compare it with its former self under Gericke. The enthusiasm with which its Boston season was regarded at home is shown in the fact that before the first concert $100,000 from advance sales was banked, and the two galleries opened to non-subscribers at popular prices were jammed an hour before the beginning of the first matinee. Both Mr. Nikisch and Mr. Ellis speak in the kindest manner of Buffalo and fully understand the unfortunate contretemps which has dissolved their contract with Mr. Ernst.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

THURSDAY MORNING, MAR. 6, 1890.

The Young People's Popular Concert Yesterday Afternoon.

The concert at Music Hall yesterday afternoon was popular in every sense of the word, and drew an audience larger than any that has ever attended any of these concerts which are extraneous to the regular course. The programme began with Weber's Jubel overture, which was given with great spirit, especially in its finale. Then came Mlle. De Vere in the "Bell Song" from "Lakme," which she gave in a manner entirely beyond criticism. Some time ago, when Mlle. De Vere appeared in miscellaneous concerts in Boston I predicted that she would yet be in the front rank of coloratur singers, and her work at this concert goes far to bear out the prophecy. Her fioriture against the flute passages in the aria from the "Star of the North," were equal to those of any singer who has appeared in Boston in many years.

The Suite "Peer Gynt" has been too recently reviewed to require further criticism, but I take the occasion to renew my statement that it is by no means trashy or sensational music.

Chopin's Nocturne, transcribed for 'cello and harp, was altogether a beautiful combination and was played to perfection, and Rubinstein's "Bal Costume" was given with all necessary vigor. The programme was not on as high a level as the previous popular concerts (outside of the summer "promenades"), but perhaps this is no fault, for the public expressed their hearty appreciation of it.

Boston Post

THURSDAY MORNING, MARCH 6, 1890

THE SECOND YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULAR.

Music Hall was not only filled but overflowing yesterday afternoon for the second concert of the "Young People's Popular" series, and the well-arranged programme was constantly greeted with deserved applause:

Overture, "Jubel".....Weber
Bell song from "Lakmé".....Delibes
Mlle. de Vere.
Suite. "Peer Gynt," op. 46 (by request).Grieg
Nocturne for violoncello (with harp accompaniment).....Chopin
Mr. Hekking.
Aria from the "Star of the North"..Meyerbeer
Mlle. de Vere.
Ballet music. "Bal Costumé".....Rubinstein

The orchestra was in capital form, and played all its numbers very finely. The "Peer Gynt" suite by Grieg, which was repeated "by request," was again loudly applauded. In response to the applause Mr. Nikisch repeated the last movement. This was certainly more justifiable than to do so at the Symphony concert itself; still, it is a matter for regret, firstly, that our superior and well-trained "musical" public should wish to hear the rather vulgar little tune again; and, secondly, that even in these concerts the unwise precedent of granting an encore should have been made. The six numbers of Rubinstein's charming "Bal Costumé" were delightfully interpreted by Mr. Nikisch, and most especially excellent was the rendering of the Toreadore et Andalouse and the Pélerin et Fantasie, which could scarcely have been better played.

Miss Clementine de Vere is certainly a most exquisite singer; every time she is heard one cannot fail to admire more and more the almost faultless technique with which she easily conquers the most complicated colorature passages, and the delightfully pure and rich tone of her voice is a constant pleasure while she is singing. The Boston public is fortunate in the approaching opportunity at the Händel and Haydn Society's festival of hearing this fine artist in more important parts, and she will doubtless become a firm favorite with our concert-goers. Yesterday afternoon she sang the bell song from "Lakmé," a well-known piece de fioriture for singers with flexible voices, and an equally celebrated colorature aria from Meyerbeer's "Etoile du Nord," in which latter she was beautifully accompanied by M. Molé, the admirable flautist of our orchestra, in the opening cadenzas. Both numbers were superbly sung, and more one cannot say. Mr. Anton Hekking, the first 'cellist of the orchestra, was heard to great advantage in an arrangement of Chopin's ever popular E flat nocturne for 'cello and harp. He played it with beautiful tone and fine technique, and was accompanied by Mr. Shuecker in a most finished and musicianly manner. The whole concert was very pleasant, and it is to be regretted that this series has not been more extended during the winter.

ARTHUR WELD.

BOSTON HERALD

THURSDAY, MARCH 6, 1890.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Second of the Season's "Young People's Popular" Concerts.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, assisted by Mlle. Clementina De Vere, soprano, and Mr. Anton Hekking, 'cello player, gave the second of the present season's "Young People's Populars" at Music Hall, yesterday afternoon, under Mr. Arthur Nikisch's direction. The programme was as follows: Overture, "Jubel," Weber; "Bell Song" from "Lakme," Delibes, Mlle. De Vere; Suite, "Peer Gynt," Grieg; Nocturne for violoncello (with harp accompaniment), Chopin; Mr. Hekking; aria from the "Star of the North," Meyerbeer, Mlle. De Vere; "Bal Costume," Rubinstein.

No better evidence of the rapid strides made by Mr. Nikisch in acquiring a knowledge of, and meeting the popular tastes of, the local public could be asked than the character of this programme and its performance, the success of the concert calling only for the highest praise to conductor, assisting artists and orchestra. Mlle. De Vere's triumph as the day's vocalist was most pronounced, and the commendation given her by the audience was most justly won. Her voice was at its best, and the selections were most admirably suited to her remarkable abilities as a singer. Her "Bell Song" was a full realization of the beauties of this graceful but trying selection from Delibes' opera, and the audience was fairly captivated by the brilliancy and accuracy of her tones and the faultless delivery of the notable composition. In the now seldom-heard "Star of the North" aria the purity of her voice fairly rivalled the marvellous flute tones in the obbligato, so skilfully played by M. Mole, and the vocal pyrotechnics of the selection were sung with delightful effect. Mr. Hekking came in for his full share of the honors of the afternoon, and charmed the audience to absolute silence by his remarkably artistic playing of the Chopin Nocturne, in which the harp accompaniment by Mr. Schuecker was a source of great additional pleasure. The immense audience present again indorsed the "Peer Gynt" suite, and made it necessary to repeat the final movement before the applause could be quieted. Its performance, as well as the playing of the "Bal Costume" ballet music, and the "Jubal" overture, commanded the highest praise, and the concert, as a whole, made a most memorable impression. An amusing incident of the afternoon illustrated the danger of departing from the common use of a desk by the conductor. Mr. Nikisch returned to his habit of dispensing with a desk in the Grieg suite, and at the opening of the last movement this led him into an awkward predicament. The orchestra was a bit demoralized by the applause which rewarded their playing of the third movement, and mutual congratulations appeared to occupy the attention of the men. Mr. Nikisch on top of his "little throne" was helpless, for there was nothing within reach to hit with his baton. Concert master Kneisel saw the situation, and ended the awkward pause by rapping the men to attention.

Boston Daily Globe.

THURSDAY, MARCH 6.

UNDER NIKISCH'S BATON.

A Delightful Popular Programme Offered at Music Hall.

There was a delightful concert in Music Hall yesterday afternoon. The audience was very large and brilliant, and decidedly more enthusiastic than most of the gatherings that have watched Mr. Nikisch and his players. Had such an entertainment as this second "young people's popular" failed to gain favor, Boston's claim to being appreciative might well have been denied.

Mlle. Clementine De Vere, whose singing is beautifully clear, true and powerful, gave in her very best manner the "Bell song" from "Lakme," and after a florid air from Meyerbeer's "Star of the North." In both selections she was recalled, and again and again bowed her acknowledgments. The "Lakme" number, certainly, has never been given here with more absolute purity of intonation and sureness of effect. Mr. Anton Hekking, the celloist, gave in his own finished and artistic style a Chopin nocturne, for which Mr. Schuecker provided the harp accompaniment.

The orchestra never played more gloriously. Weber's "Jubilee" overture, the "Peer Gynt" suite (of course the quaint imp music was redemanded), and Rubinstein's "Bal Costume," all illustrated the leader's marvellous command over a body of musicians whom it would indeed be difficult to excel anywhere. Every orchestral effect seems to be at the command of Mr Nikisch's baton.

It is to be hoped that a third "Popular" may be added to the record of this brilliant musical season.

---

[86]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

[87]

Hyperion Theatre, - - New Haven,

Monday Evening, March 17, at 8.

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Boston Daily Traveller.

...SDAY, MARCH 6, 1890.

...d "Young People's Popular" Concert—The Patti Season—Notes.

...Boston Symphony Orchestra, assisted ... Clementina De Vere, soprano, and ...on Hekking, 'cello player, gave the ... young people's popular" concert of ...eason at Music Hall yesterday afternoon. The programme was: Overture, "Ju...," Weber; "Bell Song" from "Lakme," ...s, (Mlle. De Vere); suite, "Peer Gynt," ...; nocturne for 'cello (with harp accom...iment), Chopin, (Mr. Hekking); aria from ...e "Star of the North," Meyerbeer, (Mlle. De Vere); ballet music, "Bal Costume," Rubinstein.

The hall was crowded, and the large proportion of young people present should indicate to the management how great a field there is here for afternoon "popular" concerts. The playing of the orchestra was admirable at all points, the Rubinstein ballet music in particular having splendid fire, accent and expression.

The theatric suite of Grieg's made a sensation as usual. Lovely in quality and pure in style was Mr. Hekking's work, artistically accompanied by M. Schuecker. Miss De Vere is a singer to swear by; she can be depended upon for safe, fluent and tuneful vocalization, and care in the reading, while her singing has a certain sincerity at all times, though the vehicle of its expression be only a brilliant tiara of fioriture.

Miss De Vere is so versatile an artist that we could have wished more variety in selection than was afforded by the two airs sung yesterday. The tune from "The Star of the North"—which the gray-beards tell us Jenny Lind used to sing beautifully—was very neatly executed, and the skilled accompaniment of our accomplised flutist, M. Molé, was in itself an artistic chef d'œuvre.

Boston Evening Transcript.

THURSDAY, MARCH 6, 1890.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Young People's Popular Concert yesterday afternoon filled the Music Hall with eager listeners. The programme was;

Weber: Jubel-Ouvertüre.
Delibes: Bell-song from "Lakmé."
Grieg: Suite, "Peer Gynt."
Chopin: Nocturne, transcribed for 'cello and harp.
Meyerbeer: Air from "l'Etoile du Nord."
Rubinstein: "Bal Costumé."

Miss Clementina de Vere was the singer, and Mr. Anton Hekking the 'cellist.

Weber's Jubel-Ouvertüre, the most trivial of his overtures that have kept their place in the general concert repertory, was played with immense brilliancy and effect. Especially good was the fine balancing of the wind parts in the final outburst upon "God Save the King," which made the melody clearly audible, in spite of the rather awkward scoring to which the composer was forced by the incomplete scale of the trumpets of his day. Conductor and orchestra surpassed themselves in the "Peer Gynt" suite, and the last movement was encored, as usual—and, as usual, made no effect whatever in the repetition. Rubinstein's "Bal Costumé" was given, we believe, entire, and by no means served to increase our respect for the composer. One would have thought that it would pass the bounds even of Rubinstein's nonchalance to be willing to sign his name to such music. With the exception of the bright and sparkling "Toréadore et Andalouse," the work is as trival, vulgar and free from ideas as any brass band could desire. It was pretty coarsely played, too, if the truth must be told.

One was again sorry to see Mr. Hekking come forward with a transcription of a Chopin nocturne. To be sure, this was a "popular," not a symphony concert, and, at popular concerts, the artistic conscience is not expected to be very strait-laced; but the 'cello, no] matter how well played, knocks the whole character and individuality of a Chopin nocturne so completely on the head, that one could wish such a piece of bad taste to be permitted nowhere. If the audience at these concerts were as largely composed of young people as was originally hoped, the playing of such pieces might fairly come under the head of musical perversion of youth. For those who are fond of hair-splitting, it might be interesting to decide which is the worse, Wilhelmj's G-string perversion of the Bach aria, or these 'cello transcriptions of Chopin.

Miss de Vere made an immediate and brilliant impression; her beautiful voice, excellent school, brilliant technique, and generally musical and charming singing, make her an artist like few. An evident nervousness was quite sufficient to account for an occasional lapse from exact intonation in difficult passages of rapid fioriture; indeed, excellent judges who have heard Miss de Vere before, assure us that this sort of thing is not her habit, and we can easily believe them. Both in the selection from "Lakmé" and the air from "l'Etoile du Nord"—in which latter she was admirably seconded by Messrs. Molé and Heindl—her singing was delightful to a rare degree. Miss de Vere has proved herself to be a very valuable addition to the soprano ranks here, and we sincerely hope to hear more from her soon.

New Haven Union

NEW HAVEN, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 12

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Josseffy, the renowned pianist, has seldom appeared in New Haven, but whenever here has been received with enthusiasm. He will be the soloist at the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra next Monday evening.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, MAR. 8, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

It will be pleasant for the Symphony patrons to welcome once more Professor Faelten, who has been too long unheard by them; and whose rentrée will be made in the C-minor pianoforte concerto of the late Dr. Louis Maas, whose loss to the world of music will long be lamented. The artist's mastery of all that relates to the technique of the instrument, his strong grasp and clear exposition of his subject, his earnest energy, his enthusiasm and his honest passionateness in the greater and warmer episodes of his work, are all too well known to need definition here and too much esteemed to require special praise today. He played the whole concerto (dedicated to him, by the way) nobly, with a controlled impetuosity for the first movement, quiet fervor for the second, and picturesqueness for the last. The music, which has not been heard since Dr. Maas played it, eight years ago, is instinct with poetry, expressed in a rich variety of form and coloring; the pianoforte, as might be expected when a pianist writes, stands out from the score either by the strength or the grace with which its part is imbued; but, on the other hand, the author had such sympathy for the orchestra that his instrumentation is generously endowed with figure and with fulness. The orchestra yesterday did well by it upon the whole, although there were moments when they carried too heavy a hand and when they did not seem quite to understand the sudden shifts of accent and rhythm in which Dr. Maas showed himself an admiring follower of Brahms; these small inconsistencies, however, did not mar the second movement, which was smooth, sweet and sustained throughout. The profitable precaution of finding out beforehand whether or not the orchestra was in tune with the piano, neglected when Mr. Joseffy played, was not forgotten, and the advantage was felt thankfully. The piano, it may be noted, was from Knabe,—a maker not too often heard here,—an instrument a little dull, perhaps, in the upper octave, but solid, full and firm in the rest of its compass, answering the players' demands excellently.

The remainder of the programme is made from familiar material—Mendelssohn's "Calm at Sea and Prosperous Voyage" overture, Schumann's first symphony and the unimportant orchestral arrangement by Liszt of the Schubert funeral march.

The programme for next week stands thus: W. Sterndale Bennett, overture, "The Naiads"; Massenet, aria, "Marie Magdelene"; Otto Floersheim, scherzo for orchestra (first time); Berlioz, "La Captive," dramatic scene for contralto and orchestra; Beethoven, the "Pastoral" symphony. Soloist, Mrs. Walter C. Wyman, contralto.

HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, MARCH 8, 1890

THE EIGHTEENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.—

Mozart.....Symphony in E-flat (Koechel 543)
Bizet.....Micaela's Aria, from "Carmen"
Arthur Weld .....'Italia," Dramatic Suite for Orchestra.

1. Monte Cassino—"Ave maris stella."
2. Veneza—"I gondolieri amorosi."
3. Napoli—"Pulchinella."
4. Amalfi—"Una sera d'amore."
5. Roma—"Il Carnevale."

(First time in Boston.)

Rubinstein Aria,....."Taeglich eilen wir im Fluge," from "Der Daemon."
(First time in Boston.)
Meyerbeer ....Overture, "Struensee"

The music of Mozart is to many a stumbling-block, a source of confusion. The performer must have absolute technique, not for its display, but that beauty of tone may be sure and ever present. Keen must be the musical instinct of the conductor and great his experience, or the exquisite proportions of a Mozart symphony will not be preserved. It is not surprising then that the first number of Saturday's program was, as a whole, roughly handled by Mr. Nikisch, for the Symphony in E-flat is not Sturm und Drang music, it does not call for the display of cheap emotion with the accompaniment of sheet-iron thunder and the glare of a calcium light. It is serene and calm; it is "noble and nude and antique." But Mr. Nikisch is not content unless he can excite feelings of wonder; he is fond of "playing to the gallery." And so he calls upon the strings until instead of beauty of tone, we listen merely to rasped cat-gut. Under his direction the kettle-drums become obtrusive, and the brass is blown as though leading his men in battle array he stood before the walls of Jericho. The forte of Mozart became the fortissimo of Mr. Nikisch; and the fortissimo of Mr. Nikisch is often marked ffff. It was a pleasure, however, to hear the Menuetto taken at its proper tempo and not played as though it were a modern scherzo, which is too often the case. Nor should the admirable playing of the bassoons and flute be passed over without praise.

In former years the Overture to "Struensee" was compared by the worshipers of Meyerbeer to the great overtures of Beethoven and Weber; and even no less a man than Ernest Reyer writes of it with respect. But Meyerbeer, great as he was in the opera, was never truly successful in purely instrumental writing. He is said to have written overtures to "Robert" and "L'Africaine"; but they have disappeared completely. Like the overture to "Dinorah," the "Struensee" overture shows the worst side of Meyerbeer: his insatiable craving for effect. There is a suspicion of sawdust; the bars are thrown down, and the riders upon prancing horses go about the ring, with painted faces, gorgeous in tinsel and discolored plumes. Everywhere is seen in this music a desire to startle at any cost. It may be heard in a theater with pleasure, while the crowd awaits the curtain's rise; it has no place upon a symphony program.

Mr. Arthur Weld prepared for the "Program Notes" a sketch of his Dramatic Suite "Italia," played here last week for the first time. This sketch is excellent, in that it is of a truly explanatory nature; it is short and sensible. Let us look at the Suite itself. The hymn with which it opens is interesting in its subject and treatment. Scholarship is shown without the palpable and blighting presence of pedantry. There is a knowledge shown of the character of the different instruments and a healthy employment of this knowledge. There is no break between the first and second movements, and possibly for this reason, the mixture of movements seems too long spun out, and the attention of the hearer flags. Nor is the subject of the barcarole particularly interesting. The third movement, "a miniature scherzo and trio," is admirable from nearly every point of view, and is musically the best balanced number of the work. Upon the fourth movement, "Amalfi: una sera d'amore," Mr. Weld has evidently spent much earnest work. It is planned upon a large scale and is most elaborately treated. As is often the case, in spite of this toil, the movement is weak and inconsequential. There are a few charming passages, but there is a superfluity of detail; incessant modulations lead the hearer to no resting place; the passion which should shake the whole like a fierce pulse is frittered away into little bits; and it is too long. Mr. Weld is a young man; a man of strong mind and of marked individuality. It is curious that in a scene where one should naturally expect the exuberance and the unbridled passion characteristic of a composer of his age, that there should be such a lack of blood, such an absence of sensuousness. The woman who breathes the air of Italy is not the blonde of the north, the woman of Heine who has no heart and whose breast of snow covers the ice which lies beneath; her beauty is the bellezza folgorante; she is the sister of Juliet of Verona whom the northern woman calls immodest. She has never been told that passionate love is shameful, nor could she, unmoved, speculate and calculate upon the relative value of males presented as attractions in the matrimonial market. Her love is without reason; when she loves it is with elemental passion. But the love scene of the Suite surely takes place in the foggy north; and love is cold and stops to think and question. On the contrary, the last movement, "Il Carnevale," is eminently characteristic. It is full of life; it reproduces the bustle, the good nature, the triviality of the scene. It abounds in passages of exceedingly clever instrumentation. It is realistic and yet musical. It shows imagination; it shows a sense of color not seen in the other movements. If here and there passages may strike a smug and orthodox citizen as vulgar, that is the fault of the Carneval and not of Mr. Weld. With the exception of this last movement, the composer has not been fortunate in his "local coloring." The hymn or choral could be chanted by monks of other lands; the barcarole does not suggest the streets of water, does not recall the dead Venetian women of Browning, dear dead women whose hair of gold used to hang and brush their bosoms; while the slow movement is distinctly German, and we miss the dolore which eternally rhymes with amore in Italian strains. But this has nothing to do with the true musical merits and faults of the composition. It is an uneven work; the thoughts are not always worthy of the robes which cover them; admirable passages stand side by side with crudities; but there is very much more to be praised than blamed. Mr. Weld has publicly given evidence that he has a sensitive and musical nature; that he has studied long and well; that he is often ingenious in the art of putting things. He steers clear of common-places, and this is seen even in what at first hearing appeared crude and weak; he does not follow slavishly in ruts pointed out and approved of by many, because they cannot strike out paths for themselves. Above all he has shown that he can write for an orchestra; he is not afraid of daring combinations and striking contrasts; and, men and brethren, this writing for the orchestra is no easy task.

Mr. Weld directed his Suite and at the close was enthusiastically applauded. The orchestra under his careful direction played with precision and intelligence.

The soloist of the evening was Miss Gertrude Franklin, who sang Micaela's superb aria from "Carmen" and Tamara's aria from the first act of Rubinstein's "Demon." This latter aria, heard in Boston for the first time, is of great beauty; it abides in the memory; it haunts. It was sung exceedingly well; and Miss Franklin [illegible] for the selection

YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULAR.—The second "Young People's Popular Concert" was given at Music Hall Wednesday afternoon. The soloists were Miss Clementine De Vere and Mr. Anton Hekking. The program was as follows:

Overture. "Jubel."....Weber
Bell Song from "Lakme."....Delibes
Miss De Vere.
Suite. "Peer Gynt." op. 46, (by request.)....Grieg
Nocturne for Violoncello, (with harp accompaniment.)....Chopin
Mr. Hekking.
Aria from the "Star of the North."....Meyerbeer
Miss De Vere.
Ballet Music. "Bal Costume,"....Rubinstein
Introduction.
Berger et Bergere.
Pecheur Napolitain et Napolitaine.
Toreadore et Andalouse.
Pelerin et Fantasie.
Royal Tambour et Vivandiere.

The hall was crowded and the concert was thoroughly enjoyed. The program was well selected, if the purpose of these concerts is taken into consideration. Certain numbers of the ballet music of Rubinstein are well known in their original form (pianoforte duets), and in their new dress, they certainly have gained in charm. By far the most effective and characteristic number is the "Toreadore et Andalouse," with its fascinating rhythm and glowing color. The "Peer Gynt" Suite was well played and loudly applauded, and, as usual, the last movement was re-demanded. Mr. Hekking played with harp accompaniment, a transcription of a Chopin Nocturne and was recalled. The feature of the concert, however, was the exquisite singing of Miss Clementine De Vere, who has voice, skill and taste, a rare combination in these days. Such singers should be frequently heard, and it is to be hoped that she will appear as soloist in one of the Symphony Concerts before the season is over. In the Meyerbeer aria she was brilliantly accompanied by the flute players, Messrs. Molé and Heindl.

These concerts are too few in number. That they would be attended and enjoyed is shown by the crowd and applause of Wednesday.

PHILIP HALE.

New Haven Union

NEW HAVEN, MONDAY, MARCH 10

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Monday evening of next week the fourth and last of the concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra will be given. Rafael Josseffy, the pianist, will be the soloist. The concert will be under the direction of Arthur Nikisch and will in every respect equal if not surpass all previous concerts. Tickets are now on sale at Steinert's.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Hyperion Theatre, - - New Haven,

Monday Evening, March 17, at 8.

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

[87]

Boston Daily Traveller.

THURSDAY, MARCH 6, 1890.

...nd "Young People's Popular" Concert—The Patti Season—Notes.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, assisted by Miss Clementina De Vere, soprano, and Mr. Anton Hekking, 'cello player, gave the second "young people's popular" concert of the season at Music Hall yesterday afternoon. The programme was: Overture, "Jubilee," Weber; "Bell Song" from "Lakme," Delibes, (Mlle. De Vere); suite, "Peer Gynt," Grieg; nocturne for 'cello (with harp accompaniment), Chopin, (Mr. Hekking); aria from the "Star of the North," Meyerbeer, (Mlle. De Vere); ballet music, "Bal Costume," Rubinstein.

The hall was crowded, and the large proportion of young people present should indicate to the management how great a field there is here for afternoon "popular" concerts. The playing of the orchestra was admirable at all points, the Rubinstein ballet music in particular having splendid fire, accent and expression.

The theatric suite of Grieg's made a sensation as usual. Lovely in quality and pure in style was Mr. Hekking's work, artistically accompanied by M. Schuecker. Miss De Vere is a singer to swear by; she can be depended upon for safe, fluent and tuneful vocalization, and care in the reading, while her singing has a certain sincerity at all times, though the vehicle of its expression be only a brilliant tiara of fioriture.

Miss De Vere is so versatile an artist that we could have wished more variety in selection than was afforded by the two airs sung yesterday. The tune from "The Star of the North"—which the gray-beards tell us Jenny Lind used to sing beautifully—was very neatly executed, and the skilled accompaniment of our accomplised flutist, M. Molé, was in itself an artistic chef d'œuvre.

Boston Evening Transcript.

THURSDAY, MARCH 6, 1890.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Young People's Popular Concert yesterday afternoon filled the Music Hall with eager listeners. The programme was:

Weber: Jubel-Ouvertüre.
Delibes: Bell-song from "Lakmé."
Grieg: Suite, "Peer Gynt."
Chopin: Nocturne, transcribed for 'cello and harp.
Meyerbeer: Air from "l'Etoile du Nord."
Rubinstein: "Bal Costumé."

Miss Clementina de Vere was the singer, and Mr. Anton Hekking the 'cellist.

Weber's Jubel-Ouvertüre, the most trivial of his overtures that have kept their place in the general concert repertory, was played with immense brilliancy and effect. Especially good was the fine balancing of the wind parts in the final outburst upon "God Save the King," which made the melody clearly audible, in spite of the rather awkward scoring to which the composer was forced by the incomplete scale of the trumpets of his day. Conductor and orchestra surpassed themselves in the "Peer Gynt" suite, and the last movement was encored, as usual—and, as usual, made no effect whatever in the repetition. Rubinstein's "Bal Costumé" was given, we believe, entire, and by no means served to increase our respect for the composer. One would have thought that it would pass the bounds even of Rubinstein's nonchalance to be willing to sign his name to such music. With the exception of the bright and sparkling "Toréadore et Andalouse," the work is as trival, vulgar and free from ideas as any brass band could desire. It was pretty coarsely played, too, if the truth must be told.

One was again sorry to see Mr. Hekking come forward with a transcription of a Chopin nocturne. To be sure, this was a "popular," not a symphony concert, and, at popular concerts, the artistic conscience is not expected to be very strait-laced; but the 'cello, no[t] matter how well played, knocks the whole character and individuality of a Chopin nocturne so completely on the head, that one could wish such a piece of bad taste to be permitted nowhere. If the audience at these concerts were as largely composed of young people as was originally hoped, the playing of such pieces might fairly come under the head of musical perversion of youth. For those who are fond of hair-splitting, it might be interesting to decide which is the worse, Wilhelmj's G-string perversion of the Bach aria, or these 'cello transcriptions of Chopin.

Miss de Vere made an immediate and brilliant impression; her beautiful voice, excellent school, brilliant technique, and generally musical and charming singing, make her an artist like few. An evident nervousness was quite sufficient to account for an occasional lapse from exact intonation in difficult passages of rapid fioriture; indeed, excellent judges who have heard Miss de Vere before, assure us that this sort of thing is not her habit, and we can easily believe them. Both in the selection from "Lakmé" and the air from "l'Etoile du Nord"—in which latter she was admirably seconded by Messrs. Molé and Heindl—her singing was delightful to a rare degree. Miss de Vere has proved herself to be a very valuable addition to the soprano ranks here, and we sincerely hope to hear more from her soon.

New Haven Union

NEW HAVEN, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 12

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Josseffy, the renowned pianist, has seldom appeared in New Haven, but whenever here has been received with enthusiasm. He will be the soloist at the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra next Monday evening.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, MAR. 8, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

It will be pleasant for the Symphony patrons to welcome once more Professor Faelten, who has been too long unheard by them; and whose rentrée will be made in the C-minor pianoforte concerto of the late Dr. Louis Maas, whose loss to the world of music will long be lamented. The artist's mastery of all that relates to the technique of the instrument, his strong grasp and clear exposition of his subject, his earnest energy, his enthusiasm and his honest passionateness in the greater and warmer episodes of his work, are all too well known to need definition here and too much esteemed to require special praise today. He played the whole concerto (dedicated to him, by the way) nobly, with a controlled impetuosity for the first movement, quiet fervor for the second, and picturesqueness for the last. The music, which has not been heard since Dr. Maas played it, eight years ago, is instinct with poetry, expressed in a rich variety of form and coloring; the pianoforte, as might be expected when a pianist writes, stands out from the score either by the strength or the grace with which its part is imbued; but, on the other hand, the author had such sympathy for the orchestra that his instrumentation is generously endowed with figure and with fulness. The orchestra yesterday did well by it upon the whole, although there were moments when they carried too heavy a hand and when they did not seem quite to understand the sudden shifts of accent and rhythm in which Dr. Maas showed himself an admiring follower of Brahms; these small inconsistencies, however, did not mar the second movement, which was smooth, sweet and sustained throughout. The profitable precaution of finding out beforehand whether or not the orchestra was in tune with the piano, neglected when Mr. Joseffy played, was not forgotten, and the advantage was felt thankfully. The piano, it may be noted, was from Knabe,—a maker not too often heard here,—an instrument a little dull, perhaps, in the upper octave, but solid, full and firm in the rest of its compass, answering the players' demands excellently.

The remainder of the programme is made from familiar material—Mendelssohn's "Calm at Sea and Prosperous Voyage" overture, Schumann's first symphony and the unimportant orchestral arrangement by Liszt of the Schubert funeral march.

The programme for next week stands thus: W. Sterndale Bennett, overture, "The Naiads"; Massenet, aria, "Marie Magdelene"; Otto Floersheim, scherzo for orchestra (first time); Berlioz, "La Captive," dramatic scene for contralto and orchestra; Beethoven, the "Pastoral" symphony. Soloist, Mrs. Walter C. Wyman, contralto.

HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, MARCH 8, 1890

THE EIGHTEENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.—
Mozart.....Symphony in E-flat (Koechel 543,
Bizet.....Micaela's Aria, from "Carmen"
Arthur Weld .....“Italia,” Dramatic Suite for Orchestra.
1. Monte Cassino—“Ave maris stella.”
2. Veneza—“I gondolieri amorosi.”
3. Napoli—“Pulchinella.”
4. Amalfi—“Una sera d'amore.”
5. Roma—“Il Carnevale.”
(First time in Boston.)
Rubinstein Aria,.....“Taeglich eilen wir im Flage,” from “Der Daemon.”
(First time in Boston.)
Meyerbeer ....Overture, “Struensee”

The music of Mozart is to many a stumbling-block, a source of confusion. The performer must have absolute technique, not for its display, but that beauty of tone may be sure and ever present. Keen must be the musical instinct of the conductor and great his experience, or the exquisite proportions of a Mozart symphony will not be preserved. It is not surprising then that the first number of Saturday's program was, as a whole, roughly handled by Mr. Nikisch, for the Symphony in E-flat is not Sturm und Drang music, it does not call for the display of cheap emotion with the accompaniment of sheet-iron thunder and the glare of a calcium light. It is serene and calm; it is "noble and nude and antique." But Mr. Nikisch is not content unless he can excite feelings of wonder; he is fond of "playing to the gallery." And so he calls upon the strings until instead of beauty of tone, we listen merely to rasped cat-gut. Under his direction the kettle-drums become obtrusive, and the brass is blown as though leading his men in battle array he stood before the walls of Jericho. The forte of Mozart became the fortissimo of Mr. Nikisch; and the fortissimo of Mr. Nikisch is often marked ffff. It was a pleasure, however, to hear the Menuetto taken at its proper tempo and not played as though it were a modern scherzo, which is too often the case. Nor should the admirable playing of the bassoons and flute be passed over without praise.

In former years the Overture to "Struensee" was compared by the worshipers of Meyerbeer to the great overtures of Beethoven and Weber; and even no less a man than Ernest Reyer writes of it with respect. But Meyerbeer, great as he was in the opera, was never truly successful in purely instrumental writing. He is said to have written overtures to "Robert" and "L'Africaine"; but they have disappeared completely. Like the overture to "Dinorah," the "Struensee" overture shows the worst side of Meyerbeer: his insatiable craving for effect. There is a suspicion of sawdust; the bars are thrown down, and the riders upon prancing horses go about the ring, with painted faces, gorgeous in tinsel and discolored plumes. Everywhere is seen in this music a desire to startle at any cost. It may be heard in a theater with pleasure, while the crowd awaits the curtain's rise; it has no place upon a symphony program.

Mr. Arthur Weld prepared for the "Program Notes" a sketch of his Dramatic Suite "Italia," played here last week for the first time. This sketch is excellent, in that it is of a truly explanatory nature; it is short and sensible. Let us look at the Suite itself. The hymn with which it opens is interesting in its subject and treatment. Scholarship is shown without the palpable and blighting presence of pedantry. There is a knowledge shown of the character of the different instruments and a healthy employment of this knowledge. There is no break between the first and second movements, and possibly for this reason, the mixture of movements seems too long spun out, and the attention of the hearer flags. Nor is the subject of the barcarole particularly interesting. The third movement, "a miniature scherzo and trio," is admirable from nearly every point of view, and is musically the best balanced number of the work. Upon the fourth movement, "Amalfi: una sera d'amore," Mr. Weld has evidently spent much earnest work. It is planned upon a large scale and is most elaborately treated. As is often the case, in spite of this toil, the movement is weak and inconsequential. There are a few charming passages, but there is a superfluity of detail; incessant modulations lead the hearer to no resting place; the passion which should shake the whole like a fierce pulse is frittered away into little bits; and it is too long. Mr. Weld is a young man; a man of strong mind and of marked individuality. It is curious that in a scene where one should naturally expect the exuberance and the unbridled passion characteristic of a composer of his age, that there should be such a lack of blood, such an absence of sensuousness. The woman who breathes the air of Italy is not the blonde of the north, the woman of Heine who has no heart and whose breast of snow covers the ice which lies beneath; her beauty is the bellezza folgorante; she is the sister of Juliet of Verona whom the northern woman calls immodest. She has never been told that passionate love is shameful, nor could she, unmoved, speculate and calculate upon the relative value of males presented as attractions in the matrimonial market. Her love is without reason; when she loves it is with elemental passion. But the love scene of the Suite surely takes place in the foggy north; and love is cold and stops to think and question. On the contrary, the last movement, "Il Carnevale," is eminently characteristic. It is full of life; it reproduces the bustle, the good nature, the triviality of the scene. It abounds in passages of exceedingly clever instrumentation. It is realistic and yet musical. It shows imagination; it shows a sense of color not seen in the other movements. If here and there passages may strike a smug and orthodox citizen as vulgar, that is the fault of the Carneval and not of Mr. Weld. With the exception of this last movement, the composer has not been fortunate in his "local coloring." The hymn or choral could be chanted by monks of other lands; the barcarole does not suggest the streets of water, does not recall the dead Venetian women of Browning, dear dead women whose hair of gold used to hang and brush their bosoms; while the slow movement is distinctly German, and we miss the dolore which eternally rhymes with amore in Italian strains. But this has nothing to do with the true musical merits and faults of the composition. It is an uneven work; the thoughts are not always worthy of the robes which cover them; admirable passages stand side by side with crudities; but there is very much more to be praised than blamed. Mr. Weld has publicly given evidence that he has a sensitive and musical nature; that he has studied long and well; that he is often ingenious in the art of putting things. He steers clear of common-places, and this is seen even in what at first hearing appeared crude and weak; he does not follow slavishly in ruts pointed out and approved of by many, because they cannot strike out paths for themselves. Above all he has shown that he can write for an orchestra; he is not afraid of daring combinations and striking contrasts; and, men and brethren, this writing for the orchestra is no easy task.

Mr. Weld directed his Suite and at the close was enthusiastically applauded. The orchestra under his careful direction played with precision and intelligence.

The soloist of the evening was Miss Gertrude Franklin, who sang Micaela's superb aria from "Carmen" and Tamara's aria from the first act of Rubinstein's "Demon." This latter aria, heard in Boston for the first time, is of great beauty; it abides in the memory; it haunts. It was sung exceedingly well; and Miss Franklin [illegible] both for the selection

YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULAR.—The second "Young People's Popular Concert" was given at Music Hall Wednesday afternoon. The soloists were Miss Clementine De Vere and Mr. Anton Hekking. The program was as follows:

Overture. "Jubel."....Weber
Bell Song from "Lakme."....Delibes
Miss De Vere.
Suite. "Peer Gynt." op. 46, (by request.)....Grieg
Nocturne for Violoncello, (with harp accompaniment.)....Chopin
Mr. Hekking.
Aria from the "Star of the North."....Meyerbeer
Miss De Vere.
Ballet Music. "Bal Costume,"....Rubinstein
Introduction.
Berger et Bergere.
Pecheur Napolitain et Napolitaine.
Toreadore et Andalouse.
Pelerin et Fantasie.
Royal Tambour et Vivandiere.

The hall was crowded and the concert was thoroughly enjoyed. The program was well selected, if the purpose of these concerts is taken into consideration. Certain numbers of the ballet music of Rubinstein are well known in their original form (pianoforte duets), and in their new dress, they certainly have gained in charm. By far the most effective and characteristic number is the "Toreadore et Andalouse," with its fascinating rhythm and glowing color. The "Peer Gynt" Suite was well played and loudly applauded, and, as usual, the last movement was re-demanded. Mr. Hekking played with harp accompaniment, a transcription of a Chopin Nocturne and was recalled. The feature of the concert, however, was the exquisite singing of Miss Clementine De Vere, who has voice, skill and taste, a rare combination in these days. Such singers should be frequently heard, and it is to be hoped that she will appear as soloist in one of the Symphony Concerts before the season is over. In the Meyerbeer aria she was brilliantly accompanied by the flute players, Messrs. Molé and Heindl.

These concerts are too few in number. That they would be attended and enjoyed is shown by the crowd and applause of Wednesday.

PHILIP HALE.

New Haven Union

NEW HAVEN, MONDAY, MARCH 10

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Monday evening of next week the fourth and last of the concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra will be given. Rafael Josseffy, the pianist, will be the soloist. The concert will be under the direction of Arthur Nikisch and will in every respect equal if not surpass all previous concerts. Tickets are now on sale at Steinert's.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Boston Daily Traveller.

THURSDAY, MARCH 8, 1890.

Second "Young People's Popular" Concert—The Patti Season—Notes.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, assisted by Mlle. Clementina De Vere, soprano, and Mr. Anton Hekking, 'cello player, gave the second "young people's popular" concert of the season at Music Hall yesterday afternoon. The programme was: Overture, "Jubilee," Weber; "Bell Song" from "Lakme," Delibes, (Mlle. De Vere); suite, "Peer Gynt," Grieg; nocturne for 'cello (with harp accompaniment), Chopin, (Mr. Hekking); aria from the "Star of the North," Meyerbeer, (Mlle. De Vere); ballet music, "Bal Costume," Rubinstein.

The hall was crowded, and the large proportion of young people present should indicate to the management how great a field there is here for afternoon "popular" concerts. The playing of the orchestra was admirable at all points, the Rubinstein ballet music in particular having splendid fire, accent and expression.

The theatric suite of Grieg's made a sensation as usual. Lovely in quality and pure in style was Mr. Hekking's work, artistically accompanied by M. Schuecker. Miss De Vere is a singer to swear by; she can be depended upon for safe, fluent and tuneful vocalization, and care in the reading, while her singing has a certain sincerity at all times, though the vehicle of its expression be only a brilliant tiara of floriture.

Miss De Vere is so versatile an artist that we could have wished more variety in selection than was afforded by the two airs sung yesterday. The tune from "The Star of the North"—which the gray-beards tell us Jenny Lind used to sing beautifully—was very neatly executed, and the skilled accompaniment of our accomplised flutist, M. Molé, was in itself an artistic chef d'œuvre.

Boston Evening Transcript.

THURSDAY, MARCH 6, 1890.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Young People's Popular Concert yesterday afternoon filled the Music Hall with eager listeners. The programme was:

Weber: Jubel-Ouvertüre.
Delibes: Bell-song from "Lakmé."
Grieg: Suite, "Peer Gynt."
Chopin: Nocturne, transcribed for 'cello and harp.
Meyerbeer: Air from "l'Etoile du Nord."
Rubinstein: "Bal Costumé."

Miss Clementina de Vere was the singer, and Mr. Anton Hekking the 'cellist.

Weber's Jubel-Ouvertüre, the most trivial of his overtures that have kept their place in the general concert repertory, was played with immense brilliancy and effect. Especially good was the fine balancing of the wind parts in the final outburst upon "God Save the King," which made the melody clearly audible, in spite of the rather awkward scoring to which the composer was forced by the incomplete scale of the trumpets of his day. Conductor and orchestra surpassed themselves in the "Peer Gynt" suite, and the last movement was encored, as usual—and, as usual, made no effect whatever in the repetition. Rubinstein's "Bal Costumé" was given, we believe, entire, and by no means served to increase our respect for the composer. One would have thought that it would pass the bounds even of Rubinstein's nonchalance to be willing to sign his name to such music. With the exception of the bright and sparkling "Toréadore et Andalouse," the work is as trival, vulgar and free from ideas as any brass band could desire. It was pretty coarsely played, too, if the truth must be told.

One was again sorry to see Mr. Hekking come forward with a transcription of a Chopin nocturne. To be sure, this was a "popular," not a symphony concert, and, at popular concerts, the artistic conscience is not expected to be very strait-laced; but the 'cello, no] matter how well played, knocks the whole character and individuality of a Chopin nocturne so completely on the head, that one could wish such a piece of bad taste to be permitted nowhere. If the audience at these concerts were as largely composed of young people as was originally hoped, the playing of such pieces might fairly come under the head of musical perversion of youth. For those who are fond of hair-splitting, it might be interesting to decide which is the worse, Wilhelmj's G-string perversion of the Bach aria, or these 'cello transcriptions of Chopin.

Miss de Vere made an immediate and brilliant impression; her beautiful voice, excellent school, brilliant technique, and generally musical and charming singing, make her an artist like few. An evident nervousness was quite sufficient to account for an occasional lapse from exact intonation in difficult passages of rapid floriture; indeed, excellent judges who have heard Miss de Vere before, assure us that this sort of thing is not her habit, and we can easily believe them. Both in the selection from "Lakmé" and the air from "l'Etoile du Nord"—in which latter she was admirably seconded by Messrs. Molé and Heindl—her singing was delightful to a rare degree. Miss de Vere has proved herself to be a very valuable addition to the soprano ranks here, and we sincerely hope to hear more from her soon.

New Haven Union

NEW HAVEN, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 12

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Joseffy, the renowned pianist, has seldom appeared in New Haven, but whenever here has been received with enthusiasm. He will be the soloist at the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra next Monday evening.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, MAR. 8, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

It will be pleasant for the Symphony patrons to welcome once more Professor Faelten, who has been too long unheard by them; and whose rentrée will be made in the C-minor pianoforte concerto of the late Dr. Louis Maas, whose loss to the world of music will long be lamented. The artist's mastery of all that relates to the technique of the instrument, his strong grasp and clear exposition of his subject, his earnest energy, his enthusiasm and his honest passionateness in the greater and warmer episodes of his work, are all too well known to need definition here and too much esteemed to require special praise today. He played the whole concerto (dedicated to him, by the way) nobly, with a controlled impetuosity for the first movement, quiet fervor for the second, and picturesqueness for the last. The music, which has not been heard since Dr. Maas played it, eight years ago, is instinct with poetry, expressed in a rich variety of form and coloring; the pianoforte, as might be expected when a pianist writes, stands out from the score either by the strength or the grace with which its part is imbued; but, on the other hand, the author had such sympathy for the orchestra that his instrumentation is generously endowed with figure and with fulness. The orchestra yesterday did well by it upon the whole, although there were moments when they carried too heavy a hand and when they did not seem quite to understand the sudden shifts of accent and rhythm in which Dr. Maas showed himself an admiring follower of Brahms; these small inconsistencies, however, did not mar the second movement, which was smooth, sweet and sustained throughout. The profitable precaution of finding out beforehand whether or not the orchestra was in tune with the piano, neglected when Mr. Joseffy played, was not forgotten, and the advantage was felt thankfully. The piano, it may be noted, was from Knabe,—a maker not too often heard here,—an instrument a little dull, perhaps, in the upper octave, but solid, full and firm in the rest of its compass, answering the players' demands excellently.

The remainder of the programme is made from familiar material—Mendelssohn's "Calm at Sea and Prosperous Voyage" overture, Schumann's first symphony and the unimportant orchestral arrangement by Liszt of the Schubert funeral march.

The programme for next week stands thus: W. Sterndale Bennett, overture, "The Naiads"; Massenet, aria, "Marie Magdelene"; Otto Floersheim, scherzo for orchestra (first time); Berlioz, "La Captive," dramatic scene for contralto and orchestra; Beethoven, the "Pastoral" symphony. Soloist, Mrs. Walter C. Wyman, contralto.

HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, MARCH 8, 1890

THE EIGHTEENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.—
Mozart.....Symphony in E-flat (Koechel 543)
Bizet.....Micaela's Aria, from "Carmen"
Arthur Weld .....“Italia,” Dramatic Suite for Orchestra.
1. Monte Cassino—“Ave maris stella.”
2. Veneza—“I gondolieri amorosi.”
3. Napoli—“Pulchinella.”
4. Amalfi—“Una sera d'amore.”
5. Roma—“Il Carnevale.”
(First time in Boston.)
Rubinstein Aria,.....“Taeglich eilen wir im Fluge,” from “Der Daemon.”
(First time in Boston.)
Meyerbeer ....Overture, “Struensee”

The music of Mozart is to many a stumbling-block, a source of confusion. The performer must have absolute technique, not for its display, but that beauty of tone may be sure and ever present. Keen must be the musical instinct of the conductor and great his experience, or the exquisite proportions of a Mozart symphony will not be preserved. It is not surprising then that the first number of Saturday's program was, as a whole, roughly handled by Mr. Nikisch, for the Symphony in E-flat is not Sturm und Drang music, it does not call for the display of cheap emotion with the accompaniment of sheet-iron thunder and the glare of a calcium light. It is serene and calm; it is “noble and nude and antique.” But Mr. Nikisch is not content unless he can excite feelings of wonder; he is fond of “playing to the gallery.” And so he calls upon the strings until instead of beauty of tone, we listen merely to rasped cat-gut. Under his direction the kettle-drums become obtrusive, and the brass is blown as though leading his men in battle array he stood before the walls of Jericho. The forte of Mozart became the fortissimo of Mr. Nikisch; and the fortissimo of Mr. Nikisch is often marked ffff. It was a pleasure, however, to hear the Menuetto taken at its proper tempo and not played as though it were a modern scherzo, which is too often the case. Nor should the admirable playing of the bassoons and flute be passed over without praise.

In former years the Overture to “Struensee” was compared by the worshipers of Meyerbeer to the great overtures of Beethoven and Weber; and even no less a man than Ernest Reyer writes of it with respect. But Meyerbeer, great as he was in the opera, was never truly successful in purely instrumental writing. He is said to have written overtures to “Robert” and “L'Africaine”; but they have disappeared completely. Like the overture to “Dinorah,” the “Struensee” overture shows the worst side of Meyerbeer: his insatiable craving for effect. There is a suspicion of sawdust; the bars are thrown down, and the riders upon prancing horses go about the ring, with painted faces, gorgeous in tinsel and discolored plumes. Everywhere is seen in this music a desire to startle at any cost. It may be heard in a theater with pleasure, while the crowd awaits the curtain's rise; it has no place upon a symphony program.

Mr. Arthur Weld prepared for the “Program Notes” a sketch of his Dramatic Suite “Italia,” played here last week for the first time. This sketch is excellent, in that it is of a truly explanatory nature; it is short and sensible. Let us look at the Suite itself. The hymn with which it opens is interesting in its subject and treatment. Scholarship is shown without the palpable and blighting presence of pedantry. There is a knowledge shown of the character of the different instruments and a healthy employment of this knowledge. There is no break between the first and second movements, and possibly for this reason, the mixture of movements seems too long spun out, and the attention of the hearer flags. Nor is the subject of the barcarole particularly interesting. The third movement, “a miniature scherzo and trio,” is admirable from nearly every point of view, and is musically the best balanced number of the work. Upon the fourth movement, “Amalfi—una sera d'amore,” Mr. Weld has evidently spent much earnest work. It is planned upon a large scale and is most elaborately treated. As is often the case, in spite of this toil, the movement is weak and inconsequential. There are a few charming passages, but there is a superfluity of detail; incessant modulations lead the hearer to no resting place; the passion which should shake the whole like a fierce pulse is frittered away into little bits; and it is too long. Mr. Weld is a young man; a man of strong mind and of marked individuality. It is curious that in a scene where one should naturally expect the exuberance and the unbridled passion characteristic of a composer of his age, that there should be such a lack of blood, such an absence of sensuousness. The woman who breathes the air of Italy is not the blonde of the north, the woman of Heine who has no heart and whose breast of snow covers the ice which lies beneath; her beauty is the bellezza folgorante; she is the sister of Juliet of Verona whom the northern woman calls immodest. She has never been told that passionate love is shameful, nor could she, unmoved, speculate and calculate upon the relative value of males presented as attractions in the matrimonial market. Her love is without reason; when she loves it is with elemental passion. But the love scene of the Suite surely takes place in the foggy north; and love is cold and stops to think and question. On the contrary, the last movement, “Il Carnevale,” is eminently characteristic. It is full of life; it reproduces the bustle, the good nature, the triviality of the scene. It abounds in passages of exceedingly clever instrumentation. It is realistic and yet musical. It shows imagination; it shows a sense of color not seen in the other movements. If here and there passages may strike a smug and orthodox citizen as vulgar, that is the fault of the Carneval and not of Mr. Weld. With the exception of this last movement, the composer has not been fortunate in his “local coloring.” The hymn or choral could be chanted by monks of other lands; the barcarole does not suggest the streets of water, does not recall the dead Venetian women of Browning, dear dead women whose hair of gold used to hang and brush their bosoms; while the slow movement is distinctly German, and we miss the dolore which eternally rhymes with amore in Italian strains. But this has nothing to do with the true musical merits and faults of the composition. It is an uneven work; the thoughts are not always worthy of the robes which cover them; admirable passages stand side by side with crudities; but there is very much more to be praised than blamed. Mr. Weld has publicly given evidence that he has a sensitive and musical nature; that he has studied long and well; that he is often ingenious in the art of putting things. He steers clear of common-places, and this is seen even in what at first hearing appeared crude and weak; he does not follow slavishly in ruts pointed out and approved of by many, because they cannot strike out paths for themselves. Above all he has shown that he can write for an orchestra; he is not afraid of daring combinations and striking contrasts; and, men and brethren, this writing for the orchestra is no easy task.

Mr. Weld directed his Suite and at the close was enthusiastically applauded. The orchestra under his careful direction played with precision and intelligence.

The soloist of the evening was Miss Gertrude Franklin, who sang Micaela's superb aria from “Carmen” and Tamara's aria from the first act of Rubinstein's “Demon.” This latter aria, heard in Boston for the first time, is of great beauty; it abides in the memory; it haunts. It was sung exceedingly well; and Miss Franklin [illegible] for the selection

Hyperion Theatre, - - New Haven,

[87]

Monday Evening, March 17, at 8.

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULAR.—The second “Young People's Popular Concert” was given at Music Hall Wednesday afternoon. The soloists were Miss Clementine De Vere and Mr. Anton Hekking. The program was as follows:

Overture. “Jubel.”.....Weber
Bell Song from “Lakme.”.....Delibes
Miss De Vere.
Suite. “Peer Gynt.” op. 46, (by request.).....Grieg
Nocturne for Violoncello, (with harp accompaniment.).....Chopin
Mr. Hekking.
Aria from the “Star of the North.”.....Meyerbeer
Miss De Vere.
Ballet Music. “Bal Costume,”.....Rubinstein
Introduction.
Berger et Bergere.
Pecheur Napolitain et Napolitaine.
Toreadore et Andalouse.
Pelerin et Fantasie.
Royal Tambour et Vivandiere.

The hall was crowded and the concert was thoroughly enjoyed. The program was well selected, if the purpose of these concerts is taken into consideration. Certain numbers of the ballet music of Rubinstein are well known in their original form (pianoforte duets), and in their new dress, they certainly have gained in charm. By far the most effective and characteristic number is the “Toreadore et Andalouse,” with its fascinating rhythm and glowing color. The “Peer Gynt” Suite was well played and loudly applauded, and, as usual, the last movement was re-demanded. Mr. Hekking played with harp accompaniment, a transcription of a Chopin Nocturne and was recalled. The feature of the concert, however, was the exquisite singing of Miss Clementine De Vere, who has voice, skill and taste, a rare combination in these days. Such singers should be frequently heard, and it is to be hoped that she will appear as soloist in one of the Symphony Concerts before the season is over. In the Meyerbeer aria she was brilliantly accompanied by the flute players, Messrs. Molé and Heindl.

These concerts are too few in number. That they would be attended and enjoyed is shown by the crowd and applause of Wednesday.

PHILIP HALE.

New Haven Union

NEW HAVEN, MONDAY, MARCH 10

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Monday evening of next week the fourth and last of the concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra will be given. Rafael Josseffy, the pianist, will be the soloist. The concert will be under the direction of Arthur Nikisch and will in every respect equal if not surpass all previous concerts. Tickets are now on sale at Steinert's.

[88]

THE BOSTON TIMES

TWENTY-SIXTH YEAR.

BOSTON, SUNDAY, MARCH 9, 1890.

THE SYMPHONIES.

NINETEENTH CONCERT.

Last night's programme was:

Mendelssohn, Overture, "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage."
Louis Maas, Concerto for Pianoforte, in C minor, Op. 12.
Allegro maestoso.
Intermezzo (Andante).
Presto.
Schubert, Funeral March, Orchestrated by Liszt
Schumann, Symphony No. 1, in B-flat
Andante un poco maestoso.
Allegro molto vivace.
Larghetto.
Scherzo.
Allegro animato e grazioso.

While such is the standard proficiency and attainment of the Boston Symphony orchestra that any very noticeable improvement from concert to concert cannot reasonably be expected, yet it fairly seemed last evening as though the performances had reached their high water mark. Carping and canting and disparaging may be the sine qua non of the average critic; yet in the case of the Boston Symphony orchestra versus any such superfluous opinions, the intelligent public, the good musicians and the fairest critics are by no means disposed to participate in the game. Neither Woolf, Krehbiel, Hale, Weld, Elson, Wilson nor Apthorp would think of denying that we have here the most competent, progressive and effective orchestra in the country; and so long as brother Davenport remains so significantly silent of late we may not be so very far out of the way in affirming that the orchestra is at last pre-eminently fortunate in its present masterly conductor. The Sphinx silent, we may hope that in the holy temple of honest criticism not even the superannuated tin god on a tricycle will arise to in any way militate against all earth's silence upon the superb qualifications of Mr. Nikisch as a conductor.

Last night's concert was notably characteristic of some of the most interesting successes of the season. It began with much charm in the playing of the Mendelssohn overture, it went on with even greater charm with Mr. Faelten's performance of the Maas concerto and there was a glorious finale in Schumann's first symphony. The many friends of the late Louis Maas could have but felt grateful to Carl Faelten for his very appropriate choice of the Maas concerto, op. 12, which was thus heard for the second time in one of the Boston Symphony concerts.

Unlike most concertos, the really exhilarating and effective movement of the work is by no means with its opening allegro. Here a certain charm of mystery is the predominating if not the only charm; and it is the product, as it often seems of an almost preternatural and even a melancholic frame of mind. The next movement, however, is involved in no such vagary. Here all is clear and it is the poet musician who speaks in tranquil yet in quasi-sentimental mood. The finale is a remarkably well-made, vigorous and exciting presto, and is clearest in form and easiest to comprehend of all three movements. In brief, though the mind of its creator and the hand of its executant have become dust, the monument of a rare musician's genius such as this charming concerto illustrates can never crumble. It is an immortal work.

Mr. Faelten was not only impressive in the eulogistic justice of his scholarly interpretation but the exacting demand of the masterpiece were all reciprocated with an artistic finish and unfailing accuracy that were simply wonderful. His entire performance was one of unmixed truthfulness and with all its brilliant vituosity was invariably replete with artistic suggestions.

The symphony by Schumann received the best orchestral performance of the concert, it being as luxuriant and refined in tonal quality as the most captious could have wished, and the artistic sympathy among the performing musicians was invariably consonant with the splendid interpretation, throughout, of conductor Nikisch.

Boston Journal.

MORNING EDITION.

MONDAY MORNING, MARCH 10, 1890.

The Symphony Concerts.

The two important features of the Symphony concert Saturday evening were Louis Maas's concerto for piano and orchestra and Schumann's spring symphony. The former introduced Carl Faelten as the soloist of the evening. He gave a scholarly and impressive rendition of the work of Mr. Maas. The work itself, as well as Mr. Faelten's interpretation of it, is interesting, unique in conception, and gave much pleasure to the audience. The gifted author, whose sudden demise last year caused so much sadness, was at his best in this concerto, and Mr. Nikisch, as well as Mr. Faelten, to whom the piece was dedicated, is entitled to much credit for giving the public an opportunity of listening to it.

The Schumann Symphony found a hearty response in the hearts of the audience. Mr. Nikisch conducts Schumann without his desk, and all the movements were given an interpretation that called forth exceedingly flattering applause. The other numbers for the orchestra were Mendelssohn's "Calm Soa and Prosperous Voyage," and Liszt's arrangement of Schubert't Funeral March. No exception can be taken to the work of the orchestra in any of these numbers. That in the Mendelssohn selection was [illegible]. At the next concert Mrs. [illegible] is to be the soloist. [illegible] will include

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 9.

The Boston Symphony Concert.

Last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened with Mendelssohn's "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage" overture, on the whole the least interesting of the composer's works in this kind, certainly far less so than the "Fingal," the "Melusina" and the "Midsummer Night's Dream" overtures. The adagio was exquisitely played, but the allegro was occasionally confused, though there was fine power in the manner in which its more fiery climaxes were worked up. Schubert's "Funeral March," orchestrated by Liszt, was splendidly read and played throughout, the brass wind being heard to exceptional advantage in the clearness, precision, and richness that characterized it. The concert ended with a magnificent performance of Schumann's glorious first symphony. Mr. Nikisch is especially happy in interpreting this composer, as he has manifested on every occasion that he has presented a work by him. The reading of this work was one of Mr. Nikisch's brilliant successes of the season. Fire, poetry, dignity and sentiment of the most impressive and delightful order colored it from beginning to end. The orchestra, also, was at its best. The performance was a memorable one. The soloist of the concert was Mr. Carl Faelten who was heard in the late Louis Maas's concerto for piano in C-minor; certainly a striking and able composition, abundant in admirable musicianship, solid and pure in style, clear in form and excellent in orchestral treatment. The first movement is perhaps the least interesting portion of the work, but the intermezzo is full of charm and character, and the finale is unflagging in brightness, force and spirit. Mr. Faelten played with great animation, clearness and nobility of style, and with masterly freedom of technique, the effort as a whole being inspiriting and interesting in effect to an uncommon degree. The artist has rarely been heard with more thoroughly satisfying results than in his vigorous and able interpretation and performance of this work. He was applauded with great heartiness, and received two recalls. The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "The Naiads," W. Sterndale Bennett; Aria, "Marie Magdalene," Massenet; Scherzo for Orchestra (first time), Otto Floersheim; "La Captive," dramatic scene for contralto and orchestra, Berlioz; and Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony. The soloist will be Mrs. Walter C. Wyman.

The Young People's Popular Concert on Wednesday afternoon attracted an audience that packed Music Hall. Mr. Nikisch prepared an admirable programme for the occasion, opening with Weber's Jubilee Overture, which was splendidly played. Grieg's "Peer Gynt" suite, which was so pleasantly received when it was given at a recent Symphony Concert, was repeated, by request, and renewed to the full, the favor that attended its earlier performance. The concert ended with Rubinstein's brilliant "Bal Costume," ballet music, delightfully read and inspiritingly rendered by the orchestra. Mlle Clementine De Vere sang the charming "Bell Song" from Delibes's "Lackme" and the florid aria, with flute obligato, from Meyerbeer's "The Star of the North." In both the artist displayed marked skill, flexibility, and freedom in coloratura singing, winning cordial applause and two recalls after each effort. Mr. Hekking played a nocturne for violon cello, with harp accompaniment, by Chopin, with fine grace of style and warmth of sentiment, and was rewarded by a well earned storm of plaudits. The concert was successful and satisfying in every way, and the favor which it met should prove an encouragement for other entertainments by the Symphony Orchestra upon a similar plan.

The Kneisel Quartet, assisted by Mr. Arthur Whiting and Mr. Leo Schultz, gave its fourth concert of the season in Union Hall on Monday evening week. The programme was made notably interesting by the performance of Mr. G. W. Chadwick's quintette for piano and strings in E-flat, which had its first public hearing here on this occasion. The work is in many essentials the strongest and most earnest that we have as yet had from the composer, and may safely be ranked as one of the strongest of recent achievements by native musicians. Mr. Chadwick is always clear, and there is no difficulty in following him intelligently, even on a first hearing. The opening movement is beautifully developed, is interesting in its theme, is scholarly without dryness, and brilliant without triviality. The "working out" is equally ingenious and fluent. The slow movement abounds in charm of melody and of treatment, and has just the touch of gravity to impart to it a graceful dignity. The intermezzo is equally original and pleasing, and the finale, in its fire, its broad vigor and its impetuous dash, forms a worthy climax to the whole. In point of construction this fine quintette leaves nothing to be desired. The piano is kept in its due place as part of a well-balanced whole, and the work is prolific in effects of striking freshness, and is always satisfying. It was sympathetically read and played by the quartet and Mr. Whiting, and was cordially received and heartily and appreciatively applauded. It was originally intended that Mr. Ernst Perabo should play the piano part, but the printed score reached him too late to enable him to devote that conscientious study to it which he deemed necessary before playing it in public. The other selections were Haydn's lovely quartette in G, op. 33, No. 5, and Schubert's wonderful string quartette in C, op. 163. These were performed with beauty of style and perfection of technique that are above all praise, and that have become the invariable qualities that may be confidently looked for in the playing of this splendid organization.

Boston Sunday Globe.

TWENTY-FOUR PAGES.

SUNDAY, MARCH 9, 1890.

SYMPHONY ECHOES.

Dr. Maas' Pianoforte Concerto, With Classic Works, Heard in Music Hall.

On the whole the 19th symphony concert was hardly up to the average of the season's work. The programme was too long for one thing, and the orchestra seemed to be lacking in its accustomed zeal. The Mendelssohn overture, "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage," was certainly not well played at the rehearsal—well played, that is, according to the standard set by Mr. Nikisch. Nor can the interpretation of the Lizst setting of Schubert's "Funeral March" be given more than a qualified commendation. When the great Schumann ("Spring") symphony was reached, however, the orchestra seemed to gain a new access of spirit and power. It was a thoroughly fine interpretation. Nikisch himself excels in setting forth the works of this great composer, and the symphony, though it came last in the programme, was followed with interest and pleasure. Carl Faelten, the pianist, gave as the solo for the occasion Louis Maas' concerto for pianoforte in C minor. It ranks among the best works of this artist, and Mr. Nikisch has done well to follow the example set by one of his predecessors and give the concerto a hearing before a symphony audience. Mr. Faelten's performance was brilliant, facile and appreciative, and he merited all the applause that followed.

The season is nearing its close. Five more concerts and Mr. Nikisch's first year of work at the head of the Boston Symphony orchestra will have ended. Next Saturday's programme is to give an English overture, Sterndale Bennett's "Naiads," a scherzo by Otto Floersheim of New York (first time), a Massenet air, and Berlioz' scena, "La Captive," with Mrs. Walter C. Wyman as the soloist, and Beethoven's pastoral symphony.

Boston Post

MONDAY MORNING, MARCH 10, 1890

NINETEENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

An enthusiastic audience listened to the following programme on Saturday evening with an attention which the extreme length of the concert did not decrease:

Overture—"Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage".....Mendelssohn
Concerto for pianoforte, in C minor, op. 12.....Louis Maas
Funeral March. Orchestrated by Liszt.....Schubert
Symphony No. 1, in B flat.....Schumann

It would be interesting to know the opinion of the public at large as to whether or not Mr. Nikisch is playing too much Mendelssohn. He has certainly played more than we have ever had before in the season, and Saturday's selection particularly is probably the least interesting of his orchestral works, certainly of his overtures. At the same time it was so beautifully played that its lack of interest was more than counterbalanced by the pleasure given by its superb rendering. Mr. Carl Faelten's fine piano playing was greeted with prolonged applause. His technical attainments are of the highest order, and the musicianly manner in which he represents all possible moods of the pianoforte—power, virility and passion, or light, delicate and dainty detail—gave the keenest pleasure. His phrasing, also, was more than delightful, and his whole performance was masterly in every sense of the word. He selected for performance a pianoforte concerto in C minor, op. 12, by the late Dr. Louis Maas, which has already been heard twice in Boston. The successful instrumentation of a piece originally written for pianoforte is a very difficult matter. The whole feeling and spirit of the orchestra is so wholly different from the piano that it is almost impossible properly to interpret one by the other. There is no doubt that Liszt, with his immense knowledge of orchestral resources was a man wonderfully well equipped for such a task, but he has only been partially successful in the instance of the Schubert Funeral March. Added to this the great length of the work, even when played as on this occasion without repetitions, and it is open to considerable doubt as to its desirability on a concert programme. If anything could make the work a success it would be the artistic intelligence of Mr. Nikisch's interpretation and the splendid illustration of his wishes by the orchestra.

It was twenty minutes past 9 when Mr. Nikisch rapped up the orchestra to begin the symphony. This makes the concert too long, beyond all question. We have twenty-four concerts a winter, not to say forty-eight, counting the afternoon rehearsals, and it is undoubtedly the feeling of the musicians, as well as the public at large, that the "hour-and-a-half limit" should be adhered to as strictly as possible. But in this instance again Mr. Nikisch and his orchestra more than atoned for the disadvantages of the situation. Mr. Nikisch's extreme sympathy with the orchestral works of Schumann becomes more noticeable every time he produces one of these works. It seems like an almost divine interpretation of these masterpieces, which gained in every way—in strength, plasticity, form and beauty—under Mr. Nikisch's magnetic baton. The symphony was superbly performed, and received the distinct and unqualified approval of the audience, which applauded loudly after each movement as well as at the end of the concert. The reading of the first and last movements was particularly interesting, and the grace and delicacy with which the latter was played was something extraordinary. That charming singer, Mrs. Walter C. Wyman, will be the soloist at the next concert. Her beautiful singing is sure to captivate the audience, and Boston concert-goers will owe her a debt of gratitude for allowing them to hear again that beautiful little masterpiece by Berlioz, "La Captive."

ARTHUR WELD.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, MARCH 9, 1890.

The Symphony Concert, Mr. Carl Faelten, Soloist.

The Handel and Haydn Festival—Works and Artists to Be Heard—The Patti Opera Season—Albani's Return—The Lang and Baermann Concerts—News Notes—Gossip.

Mr. Carl Faelten, pianist, was the soloist at last evening's Symphony concert, under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, and he paid a very graceful tribute to the memory of the late Louis Maas by selecting that composer's pianoforte concerto in C minor as his contribution to the programme. Mr. Maas, it will be remembered, did valiant service in the cause of native and resident composers during his residence in this country, and this work was dedicated to last evening's soloist as a recognition on the part of the composer of his talent as a fellow-musician and pianist. The three movements—allegro maestoso, intermezzo (andante) and presto—all bear unmistakable evidence of the composer's mastery of the technique of the pianoforte, and the solo instrument is given good prominence in the construction and elaboration of the work. The concerto appeals to the intellectual side of the musician, and in its several parts affords ample source for study and analytical examination. A better performance of the work could hardly be asked for than that given by Mr. Faelten, whose style and sympathies are peculiarly in the line of its characteristics. The player gave his best efforts in its interpretation, and gained a hearty recognition of his efforts to interest the audience in the composition, the orchestra sustaining him with admirable success in this direction. The concerto was preceded by Mendelssohn's overture, "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage," and followed by Schubert's "Funeral March" orchestrated by Liszt, the symphony No. 1, by Schumann, ending the last of the evening's selections. No better performance of the ever enjoyable "Spring" symphony has been heard here in recent years, a skilful heightening of the contrasts in the reading given by Mr. Nikisch bringing out in bold relief its many beauties. Similarly good work was done by the orchestra in the other numbers of the programme, which, as a whole, was an eminently enjoyable one. Next Saturday the programme will include W. Sterndale Bennett's overture, "The Naiads"; Massenet's aria, "Marie Magdeleine"; Otto Floersheim's scherzo for orchestra; Berlioz's "La Captive," dramatic scena for contralto and orchestra, and Beethoven's symphony No. 6 in F. The soloist will be Mrs. Walter C. Wyman.

NEW HAVEN, SATURDAY, MARCH 8

NIKISCH, JOSEFFY.

CLOSING CONCERT of the series by the BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.
Mr. Arthur Nikisch, Conductor

HYPERION THEATER,
Monday, March 17th, at 8 P. M.

Soloist: MR. RAFAEL JOSEFFY.

Brilliant Programme

Including the Schubert Unfinished Symphony, Rubinstein's "Bal Costume," Schumann Pianoforte Concerto, Overture, "Die Meistersinger," Wagner, &c.

Tickets now ready at Steinert's Music Store.
C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The closing concert of the series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will occur at the Hyperion theater on Monday evening, March 11. The soloist of this concert will be Mr. Rafael Joseffy, who has before delighted New Haven audiences. This concert will be one of the best of the series.

Coming Amusements Secured by the Local Managers.

The last concert of the series given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will take place at the Hyperion theater on Monday evening, March 17. This concert will be under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, who has won great favor in this city. The soloist for the occasion will be Mr. Rafael Joseffy, who has been heard in New Haven on previous occasions, and been warmly welcomed. His coming appearance will be hailed with delight. A brilliant programme has been arranged, including the Schubert unfinished symphony, Rubinstein's "Bal Costume," Schumann pianoforte concerto, overture, "Die Meistersinger," Wagner, etc. Tickets now ready at Steinert's music store.

Boston Evening Transcript.

MONDAY, MARCH 10, 1890.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The programme of the nineteenth symphony concert was:

Mendelssohn: Overture, "Meeresstille und glückliche Fahrt."
Louis Maas: Pianoforte concerto in C minor, op. 12.
Schubert: Funeral March (scored by Liszt).
Schumann: Symphony No. 1, in B-flat.

Mr. Carl Faelten was the pianist.

The Mendelssohn overture was played with immense spirit, the picturesque coda, with all its details of coming into port, trumpet and horn salutes, and dropping anchor, being made more than commonly effective. One could only regret the excessive ritardando in the last two measures, which, apart from its not being well done by the orchestra, seemed to us wholly out of keeping with the beautiful simplicity of Mendelssohn's cadence. It was noticeable, too, in many parts of the Allegro, that spirit and vivacity of effect was gained somewhat at the expense of delicacy and finish. Liszt's orchestral version of the Schubert march we cannot like. It is a tremendous swelling out of what is, in its original shape, a modest piece enough, and gives the composition a theatrical air such as one dislikes to associate with the name of Schubert. Mr. Nikisch, too, entered into Liszt's spirit with a vengeance, and did everything to make the music sound very big indeed. One felt, somehow, that this march, unlike the one in the "Eroica" symphony, which was written "per festeggiare il sovvenire di un grand' uomo," must have been meant "to celebrate the memory of a heavy tragedian."

The Schumann symphony went splendidly, except in the opening Andante un poco maestoso, and except also for a frequent lack of finish and delicacy in the playing. In the opening Andante it seemed to us that Mr. Nikisch erred, as he has done once or twice before, on the side of doing too much, of trying to make the thing too impressive. We would not criticise his conception too carelessly, for in this instance, as in other similar cases before, it was pretty evident that the orchestra did not carry it out well. Side by side with a superbly vigorous accent would come a place where the stroke was weakened and the effect blurred by the band not coming in exactly together, a weakness which was made doubly conspicuous by the grandiose pomposity of the intention. The extreme deliberateness of the tempo, too, gave one more time to feel the damping effect of such lapses than one would have had if the movement had not been taken so very slow, in which case it is quite probable that the lapses would not have occurred. But, for the rest, the symphony went grandly, the general vigor both of the conception and the performance being distinctly fine.

Mr Faelten fairly outdid himself in his superb playing of Mr. Maas's concerto. In point of brilliancy, sentiment, and musicianly solidity of style, he left absolutely nothing to be desired. No composer could ask for a finer and more exhaustive performance of his work. A double recall has seldom been so well earned. The concerto itself, which has twice been played here by the composer, shines by the excellence of its form, and by occasional moments, as toward the close of the Intermezzo, of great beauty.

The next programme is: Bennett, overture, "The Naiads;" Massenet, aria, from "Marie Magdeleine;" Floersheim, scherzo; Berlioz, "La Captive;" Beethoven, symphony No. 6 in F ("Pastoral"). Mrs. Walter C. Wyman will be the singer.

VEN EVENING REGISTER.

E NEW HAVEN [illegible]

Next Monday evening the last concert of the Boston Symphony series will be given at the Hyperion. Joseffy will make his appearance on this occasion, and the program gives promise that the concert will be the best of the series. Tickets are now on sale at Steinert's music store.

[illegible] house for [illegible]

[88]

THE BOSTON TIMES

TWENTY-SIXTH YEAR.

BOSTON, SUNDAY, MARCH 9, 1890.

THE SYMPHONIES.

NINETEENTH CONCERT.

Last night's programme was:

Mendelssohn, Overture, "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage."
Louis Maas, Concerto for Pianoforte, in C minor, Op. 12.
Allegro maestoso.
Intermezzo (Andante).
Presto.
Schubert, Funeral March, Orchestrated by Liszt
Schumann, Symphony No. 1, in B-flat
Andante un poco maestoso.
Allegro molto vivace.
Larghetto.
Scherzo.
Allegro animato e grazioso.

While such is the standard proficiency and attainment of the Boston Symphony orchestra that any very noticeable improvement from concert to concert cannot reasonably be expected, yet it fairly seemed last evening as though the performances had reached their high water mark. Carping and canting and disparaging may be the sine qua non of the average critic; yet in the case of the Boston Symphony orchestra versus any such superfluous opinions, the intelligent public, the good musicians and the fairest critics are by no means disposed to participate in the game. Neither Woolf, Krehbiel, Hale, Weld, Elson, Wilson nor Apthorp would think of denying that we have here the most competent, progressive and ieffective orchestra in the country; and so long as brother Davenport remains so significantly silent of late we may not be so very far out of the way in affirming that the orchestra is at last pre-eminently fortunate in its present masterly conductor. The Sphinx silent, we may hope that in the holy temple of honest criticism not even the superannuated tin god on a tricycle will arise to in any way militate against all earth's silence upon the superb qualifications of Mr. Nikisch as a conductor.

Last night's concert was notably characteristic of some of the most interesting successes of the season. It began with much charm in the playing of the Mendelssohn overture, it went on with even greater charm with Mr. Faelten's performance of the Maas concerto and there was a glorious finale in Schumann's first symphony. The many friends of the late Louis Maas could have but felt grateful to Carl Faelten for his very appropriate choice of the Maas concerto, op. 12, which was thus heard for the second time in one of the Boston Symphony concerts.

Unlike most concertos, the really exhilarating and effective movement of the work is by no means with its opening allegro. Here a certain charm of mystery is the predominating if not the only charm; and it is the product, as it often seems of an almost preternatural and even a melancholic frame of mind. The next movement, however, is involved in no such vagary. Here all is clear and it is the poet musician who speaks in tranquil yet in quasi-sentimental mood. The finale is a remarkably well-made, vigorous and exciting presto, and is clearest in form and easiest to comprehend of all three movements. In brief, though the mind of its creator and the hand of its executant have become dust, the monument of a rare musician's genius such as this charming concerto illustrates can never crumble. It is an immortal work.

Mr. Faelten was not only impressive in the eulogistic justice of his scholarly interpretation but the exacting demand of the masterpiece were all reciprocated with an artistic finish and unfailing accuracy that were simply wonderful. His entire performance was one of unmixed truthfulness and with all its brilliant vituosity was invariably replete with artistic suggestions.

The symphony by Schumann received the best orchestral performance of the concert, it being as luxuriant and refined in tonal quality as the most captious could have wished, and the artistic sympathy among the performing musicians was invariably consonant with the splendid interpretation, throughout, of conductor Nikisch.

Boston Journal.

MORNING EDITION.

MONDAY MORNING, MARCH 10, 1890.

The Symphony Concert.

The two important features of the Symphony concert Saturday evening were Louis Maas's concerto for piano and orchestra and Schumann's spring symphony. The former introduced Carl Faelten as the soloist of the evening. He gave a scholarly and impressive rendition of the work of Mr. Maas. The work itself, as well as Mr. Faelten's interpretation of it, is interesting, unique in conception, and gave much pleasure to the audience. The gifted author, whose sudden demise last year caused so much sadness, was at his best in this concerto, and Mr. Nikisch, as well as Mr. Faelten, to whom the piece was dedicated, is entitled to much credit for giving the public an opportunity of listening to it.

The Schumann Symphony found a hearty response in the hearts of the audience. Mr. Nikisch conducts Schumann without his desk, and all the movements were given an interpretation that called forth exceedingly flattering applause. The other numbers for the orchestra were Mendelssohn's "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage" and Liszt's arrangement of Schubert't Funeral March. No exception can be taken to the work of the orchestra in any of these numbers. That in the Mendelssohn selection was particularly happy. At the next concert Mrs. Walter C. Wyman, contralto, is to be the soloist, and the orchestral selections will include Beethoven's Symphony No. 6.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 9.

The Boston Symphony Concert.

Last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened with Mendelssohn's "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage" overture, on the whole the least interesting of the composer's works in this kind, certainly far less so than the "Fingal," the "Melusina" and the "Midsummer Night's Dream" overtures. The adagio was exquisitely played, but the allegro was occasionally confused, though there was fine power in the manner in which its more fiery climaxes were worked up. Schubert's "Funeral March," orchestrated by Liszt, was splendidly read and played throughout, the brass wind being heard to exceptional advantage in the clearness, precision, and richness that characterized it. The concert ended with a magnificent performance of Schumann's glorious first symphony. Mr. Nikisch is especially happy in interpreting this composer, as he has manifested on every occasion that he has presented a work by him. The reading of this work was one of Mr. Nikisch's brilliant successes of the season. Fire, poetry, dignity and sentiment of the most impressive and delightful order colored it from beginning to end. The orchestra, also, was at its best. The performance was a memorable one. The soloist of the concert was Mr. Carl Faelten who was heard in the late Louis Maas's concerto for piano in C-minor; certainly a striking and able composition, abundant in admirable musicianship, solid and pure in style, clear in form and excellent in orchestral treatment. The first movement is perhaps the least interesting portion of the work, but the intermezzo is full of charm and character, and the finale is unflagging in brightness, force and spirit. Mr. Faelten played with great animation, clearness and nobility of style, and with masterly freedom of technique, the effort as a whole being inspiriting and interesting in effect to an uncommon degree. The artist has rarely been heard with more thoroughly satisfying results than in his vigorous and able interpretation and performance of this work. He was applauded with great heartiness, and received two recalls. The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "The Naiads," W. Sterndale Bennett; Aria, "Marie Magdalene," Massenet; Scherzo for Orchestra (first time), Otto Floersheim; "La Captive," dramatic scene for contralto and orchestra, Berlioz; and Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony. The soloist will be Mrs. Walter C. Wyman.

The Young People's Popular Concert on Wednesday afternoon attracted an audience that packed Music Hall. Mr. Nikisch prepared an admirable programme for the occasion, opening with Weber's Jubilee Overture, which was splendidly played. Grieg's "Peer Gynt" suite, which was so pleasantly received when it was given at a recent Symphony Concert, was repeated, by request, and renewed to the full, the favor that attended its earlier performance. The concert ended with Rubinstein's brilliant "Bal Costume," ballet music, delightfully read and inspiritingly rendered by the orchestra. Mlle. Clementine De Vere sang the charming "Bell Song" from Delibes's "Lackme" and the florid aria, with flute obligato, from Meyerbeer's "The Star of the North." In both the artist displayed marked skill, flexibility, and freedom in coloratura singing, winning cordial applause and two recalls after each effort. Mr. Hekking played a nocturne for violoncello, with harp accompaniment, by Chopin, with fine grace of style and warmth of sentiment, and was rewarded by a well earned storm of plaudits. The concert was successful and satisfying in every way, and the favor which it met should prove an encouragement for other entertainments by the Symphony Orchestra upon a similar plan.

The Kneisel Quartet, assisted by Mr. Arthur Whiting and Mr. Leo Schultz, gave its fourth concert of the season in Union Hall on Monday evening week. The programme was made notably interesting by the performance of Mr. G. W. Chadwick's quintette for piano and strings in E-flat, which had its first public hearing here on this occasion. The work is in many essentials the strongest and most earnest that we have as yet had from the composer, and may safely be ranked as one of the strongest of recent achievements by native musicians. Mr. Chadwick is always clear, and there is no difficulty in following him intelligently, even on a first hearing. The opening movement is beautifully developed, is interesting in its theme, is scholarly without dryness, and brilliant without triviality. The "working out" is equally ingenious and fluent. The slow movement abounds in charm of melody and of treatment, and has just the touch of gravity to impart to it a graceful dignity. The intermezzo is equally original and pleasing, and the finale, in its fire, its broad vigor and its impetuous dash, forms a worthy climax to the whole. In point of construction this fine quintette leaves nothing to be desired. The piano is kept in its due place as part of a well-balanced whole, and the work is prolific in effects of striking freshness, and is always satisfying. It was sympathetically read and played by the quartet and Mr. Whiting, and was cordially received and heartily and appreciatively applauded. It was originally intended that Mr. Ernst Perabo should play the piano part, but the printed score reached him too late to enable him to devote that conscientious study to it which he deemed necessary before playing it in public. The other selections were Haydn's lovely quartette in G, op. 33, No. 5, and Schubert's wonderful string quartette in C, op. 163. These were performed with beauty of style and perfection of technique that are above all praise, and that have become the invariable qualities that may be confidently looked for in the playing of this splendid organization.

Boston Sunday Globe.

TWENTY-FOUR PAGES.

SUNDAY, MARCH 9, 1890.

SYMPHONY ECHOES.

Dr. Maas' Pianoforte Concerto, With Classic Works, Heard in Music Hall.

On the whole the 19th symphony concert was hardly up to the average of the season's work. The programme was too long for one thing, and the orchestra seemed to be lacking in its accustomed zeal. The Mendelssohn overture, "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage," was certainly not well played at the rehearsal—well played, that is, according to the standard set by Mr. Nikisch. Nor can the interpretation of the Lizst setting of Schubert's "Funeral March" be given more than a qualified commendation. When the great Schumann ("Spring") symphony was reached, however, the orchestra seemed to gain a new access of spirit and power. It was a thoroughly fine interpretation. Nikisch himself excels in setting forth the works of this great composer, and the symphony, though it came last in the programme, was followed with interest and pleasure. Carl Faelten, the pianist, gave as the solo for the occasion Louis Maas' concerto for pianoforte in C minor. It ranks among the best works of this artist, and Mr. Nikisch has done well to follow the example set by one of his predecessors and give the concerto a hearing before a symphony audience. Mr. Faelten's performance was brilliant, facile and appreciative, and he merited all the applause that followed.

The season is nearing its close. Five more concerts and Mr. Nikisch's first year of work at the head of the Boston Symphony orchestra will have ended. Next Saturday's programme is to give an English overture, Sterndale Bennett's "Naiads," a scherzo by Otto Floersheim of New York (first time), a Massenet air, and Berlioz' scena, "La Captive," with Mrs. Walter C. Wyman as the soloist, and Beethoven's pastoral symphony.

Boston Post

MONDAY MORNING, MARCH 10, 1890

NINETEENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

An enthusiastic audience listened to the following programme on Saturday evening with an attention which the extreme length of the concert did not decrease:

Overture—"Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage".....Mendelssohn
Concerto for pianoforte, in C minor, op. 12.....Louis Maas
Funeral March. Orchestrated by Liszt.....Schubert
Symphony No. 1, in B flat.....Schumann

It would be interesting to know the opinion of the public at large as to whether or not Mr. Nikisch is playing too much Mendelssohn. He has certainly played more than we have ever had before in the season, and Saturday's selection particularly is probably the least interesting of his orchestral works, certainly of his overtures. At the same time it was so beautifully played that its lack of interest was more than counterbalanced by the pleasure given by its superb rendering. Mr. Carl Faelten's fine piano playing was greeted with prolonged applause. His technical attainments are of the highest order, and the musicianly manner in which he represents all possible moods of the pianoforte—power, virility and passion, or light, delicate and dainty detail—gave the keenest pleasure. His phrasing, also, was more than delightful, and his whole performance was masterly in every sense of the word. He selected for performance a pianoforte concerto in C minor, op. 12, by the late Dr. Louis Maas, which has already been heard twice in Boston. The successful instrumentation of a piece originally written for pianoforte is a very difficult matter. The whole feeling and spirit of the orchestra is so wholly different from the piano that it is almost impossible properly to interpret one by the other. There is no doubt that Liszt, with his immense knowledge of orchestral resources, was a man wonderfully well equipped for such a task, but he has only been partially successful in the instance of the Schubert Funeral March. Added to this the great length of the work, even when played as on this occasion without repetitions, and it is open to considerable doubt as to its desirability on a concert programme. If anything could make the work a success it would be the artistic intelligence of Mr. Nikisch's interpretation and the splendid illustration of his wishes by the orchestra.

It was twenty minutes past 9 when Mr. Nikisch rapped up the orchestra to begin the symphony. This makes the concert too long, beyond all question. We have twenty-four concerts a winter, not to say forty-eight, counting the afternoon rehearsals, and it is undoubtedly the feeling of the musicians, as well as the public at large, that the "hour-and-a-half limit" should be adhered to as strictly as possible. But in this instance again Mr. Nikisch and his orchestra more than atoned for the disadvantages of the situation. Mr. Nikisch's extreme sympathy with the orchestral works of Schumann becomes more noticeable every time he produces one of these works. It seems like an almost divine interpretation of these masterpieces, which gained in every way—in strength, plasticity, form and beauty—under Mr. Nikisch's magnetic baton. The symphony was superbly performed, and received the distinct and unqualified approval of the audience, which applauded loudly after each movement as well as at the end of the concert. The reading of the first and last movements was particularly interesting, and the grace and delicacy with which the latter was played was something extraordinary. That charming singer, Mrs. Walter C. Wyman, will be the soloist at the next concert. Her beautiful singing is sure to captivate the audience, and Boston concert-goers will owe her a debt of gratitude for allowing them to hear again that beautiful little masterpiece by Berlioz, "La Captive."

ARTHUR WELD.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, MARCH 9, 1890.

The Symphony Concert, Mr. Carl Faelten, Soloist.

The Handel and Haydn Festival—Works and Artists to Be Heard—The Patti Opera Season—Albani's Return—The Lang and Baermann Concerts—News Notes—Gossip.

Mr. Carl Faelten, pianist, was the soloist at last evening's Symphony concert, under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, and he paid a very graceful tribute to the memory of the late Louis Maas by selecting that composer's pianoforte concerto in C minor as his contribution to the programme. Mr. Maas, it will be remembered, did valiant service in the cause of native and resident composers during his residence in this country, and this work was dedicated to last evening's soloist as a recognition on the part of the composer of his talent as a fellow-musician and pianist. The three movements—allegro maestoso, intermezzo (andante) and presto—all bear unmistakable evidence of the composer's mastery of the technique of the pianoforte, and the solo instrument is given good prominence in the construction and elaboration of the work. The concerto appeals to the intellectual side of the musician, and in its several parts affords ample source for study and analytical examination. A better performance of the work could hardly be asked for than that given by Mr. Faelten, whose style and sympathies are peculiarly in the line of its characteristics. The player gave his best efforts in its interpretation, and gained a hearty recognition of his efforts to interest the audience in the composition, the orchestra sustaining him with admirable success in this direction. The concerto was preceded by Mendelssohn's overture, "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage," and followed by Schubert's "Funeral March" orchestrated by Liszt, the symphony No. 1, by Schumann, ending the last of the evening's selections. No better performance of the ever enjoyable "Spring" symphony has been heard here in recent years, a skilful heightening of the contrasts in the reading given by Mr. Nikisch bringing out in bold relief its many beauties. Similarly good work was done by the orchestra in the other numbers of the programme, which, as a whole, was an eminently enjoyable one. Next Saturday the programme will include W. Sterndale Bennett's overture, "The Naiads"; Massenet's aria, "Marie Magdelene"; Otto Floersheim's scherzo for orchestra; Berlioz's "La Captive," dramatic scene for contralto and orchestra, and Beethoven's symphony No. 6 (pastorale). The soloist will be Mrs. Walter C. Wyman.

New Haven Union

NEW HAVEN, SATURDAY, MARCH 8

NIKISCH. JOSEFFY.

CLOSING CONCERT of the series by the BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.
Mr. Arthur Nikisch, Conductor

HYPERION THEATER,

Monday, March 17th, at 8 P. M.

Soloist: MR. RAFAEL JOSEFFY.

Brilliant Programme

Including the Schubert Unfinished Symphony, Rubinstein's "Bal Costume," Schumann Pianoforte Concerto, Overture, "Die Meistersinger," Wagner, &c.

Tickets now ready at Steinert's Music Store.
C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The closing concert of the series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will occur at the Hyperion theater on Monday evening, March 11. The soloist of this concert will be Mr. Rafael Joseffey, who has before delighted New Haven audiences. This concert will be one of the best of the series.

Coming Amusements Secured by the Local Managers.

The last concert of the series given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will take place at the Hyperion theater on Monday evening, March 17. This concert will be under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, who has won great favor in this city. The soloist for the occasion will be Mr. Rafael Joseffy, who has been heard in New Haven on previous occasions, and been warmly welcomed. His coming appearance will be hailed with delight. A brilliant programme has been arranged, including the Schubert unfinished symphony, Rubinstein's "Bal Costume," Schumann pianoforte concerto, overture, "Die Meistersinger," Wagner, etc. Tickets now ready at Steinert's music store.

Boston Evening Transcript.

MONDAY, MARCH 10, 1890.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The programme of the nineteenth symphony concert was:

Mendelssohn: Overture, "Meeresstille und gluckliche Fahrt."
Louis Maas: Pianoforte concerto in C minor, op. 12.
Schubert: Funeral March (scored by Liszt).
Schumann: Symphony No. 1, in B-flat.

Mr. Carl Faelten was the pianist.

The Mendelssohn overture was played with immense spirit, the picturesque coda, with all its details of coming into port, trumpet and horn salutes, and dropping anchor, being made more than commonly effective. One could only regret the excessive ritardando in the last two measures, which, apart from its not being well done by the orchestra, seemed to us wholly out of keeping with the beautiful simplicity of Mendelssohn's cadence. It was noticeable, too, in many parts of the Allegro, that spirit and vivacity of effect was gained somewhat at the expense of delicacy and finish. Liszt's orchestral version of the Schubert march we cannot like. It is a tremendous swelling out of what is, in its original shape, a modest piece enough, and gives the composition a theatrical air such as one dislikes to associate with the name of Schubert. Mr. Nikisch, too, entered into Liszt's spirit with a vengeance, and did everything to make the music sound very big indeed. One felt, somehow, that this march, unlike the one in the "Eroica" symphony, which was written "per festeggiare il sovvenire di un grand' uomo," must have been meant "to celebrate the memory of a heavy tragedian."

The Schumann symphony went splendidly, except in the opening Andante un poco maestoso, and except also for a frequent lack of finish and delicacy in the playing. In the opening Andante it seemed to us that Mr. Nikisch erred, as he has done once or twice before, on the side of doing too much, of trying to make the thing too impressive. We would not criticize his conception too carelessly, for in this instance, as in other similar cases before, it was pretty evident that the orchestra did not carry it out well. Side by side with a superbly vigorous accent would come a place where the stroke was weakened and the effect blurred by the band not coming in exactly together, a weakness which was made doubly conspicuous by the grandiose pomposity of the intention. The extreme deliberateness of the tempo, too, gave one more time to feel the damping effect of such lapses than one would have had if the movement had not been taken so very slow, in which case it is quite probable that the lapses would not have occurred. But, for the rest, the symphony went grandly, the general vigor both of the conception and the performance being distinctly fine.

Mr Faelten fairly outdid himself in his superb playing of Mr. Maas's concerto. In point of brilliancy, sentiment, and musicianly solidity of style, he left absolutely nothing to be desired. No composer could ask for a finer and more exhaustive performance of his work. A double recall has seldom been so well earned. The concerto itself, which has twice been played here by the composer, shines by the excellence of its form, and by occasional moments, as toward the close of the Intermezzo, of great beauty.

The next programme is: Bennett, overture, "The Naiads;" Massenet, aria, from "Marie Magdeleine;" Floersheim, scherzo; Berlioz, "La Captive;" Beethoven, symphony No. 6 in F ("Pastoral"). Mrs. Walter C. Wyman will be the singer.

VEN EVENING REGISTER.

E NEW HAVEN EVENI

Next Monday evening the last concert of the Boston Symphony series will be given at the Hyperion. Joseffy will make his appearance on this occasion, and the program gives promise that the concert will be the best of the series. Tickets are now on sale at Steinert's music store.

At Proctor's Opera house for three nights commencing next Monday and

THE BOSTON TIMES

TWENTY-SIXTH YEAR.

BOSTON, SUNDAY, MARCH 9, 1890.

THE SYMPHONIES.

NINETEENTH CONCERT.

Last night's programme was:

Mendelssohn, Overture, "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage."
Louis Maas, Concerto for Pianoforte, in C minor, Op. 12.
Allegro maestoso.
Intermezzo (Andante).
Presto.
Schubert, Funeral March, Orchestrated by Liszt
Schumann, Symphony No. 1, in B-flat
Andante un poco maestoso.
Allegro molto vivace.
Larghetto.
Scherzo.
Allegro animato e grazioso.

While such is the standard proficiency and attainment of the Boston Symphony orchestra that any very noticeable improvement from concert to concert cannot reasonably be expected, yet it fairly seemed last evening as though the performances had reached their high water mark. Carping and canting and disparaging may be the sine qua non of the average critic; yet in the case of the Boston Symphony orchestra versus any such superfluous opinions, the intelligent public, the good musicians and the fairest critics are by no means disposed to participate in the game. Neither Woolf, Krehbiel, Hale, Weld, Elson, Wilson nor Apthorp would think of denying that we have here the most competent, progressive and ieffective orchestra in the country; and so long as brother Davenport remains so significantly silent of late we may not be so very far out of the way in affirming that the orchestra is at last pre-eminently fortunate in its present masterly conductor. The Sphinx silent, we may hope that in the holy temple of honest criticism not even the superannuated tin god on a tricycle will arise to in any way militate against all earth's silence upon the superb qualifications of Mr. Nikisch as a conductor.

Last night's concert was notably characteristic of some of the most interesting successes of the season. It began with much charm in the playing of the Mendelssohn overture, it went on with even greater charm with Mr. Faelten's performance of the Maas concerto and there was a glorious finale in Schumann's first symphony. The many friends of the late Louis Maas could have but felt grateful to Carl Faelten for his very appropriate choice of the Maas concerto, op. 12, which was thus heard for the second time in one of the Boston Symphony concerts.

Unlike most concertos, the really exhilarating and effective movement of the work is by no means with its opening allegro. Here a certain charm of mystery is the predominating if not the only charm; and it is the product, as it often seems of an almost preternatural and even a melancholic frame of mind. The next movement, however, is involved in no such vagary. Here all is clear and it is the poet musician who speaks in tranquil yet in quasi-sentimental mood. The finale is a remarkably well-made, vigorous and exciting presto, and is clearest in form and easiest to comprehend of all three movements. In brief, though the mind of its creator and the hand of its executant have become dust, the monument of a rare musician's genius such as this charming concerto illustrates can never crumble. It is an immortal work.

Mr. Faelten was not only impressive in the eulogistic justice of his scholarly interpretation but the exacting demand of the masterpiece were all reciprocated with an artistic finish and unfailing accuracy that were simply wonderful. His entire performance was one of unmixed truthfulness and with all its brilliant vituosity was invariably replete with artistic suggestions.

The symphony by Schumann received the best orchestral performance of the concert, it being as luxuriant and refined in tonal quality as the most captious could have wished, and the artistic sympathy among the performing musicians was invariably consonant with the splendid interpretation, throughout, of conductor Nikisch.

Boston Journal.

MORNING EDITION.

MONDAY MORNING, MARCH 10, 1890.

The Symphony Concert.

The two important features of the Symphony concert Saturday evening were Louis Maas's concerto for piano and orchestra and Schumann's spring symphony. The former introduced Carl Faelten as the soloist of the evening. He gave a scholarly and impressive rendition of the work of Mr. Maas. The work itself, as well as Mr. Faelten's interpretation of it, is interesting, unique in conception, and gave much pleasure to the audience. The gifted author, whose sudden demise last year caused so much sadness, was at his best in this concerto, and Mr. Nikisch, as well as Mr. Faelten, to whom the piece was dedicated, is entitled to much credit for giving the public an opportunity of listening to it.

The Schumann Symphony found a hearty response in the hearts of the audience. Mr. Nikisch conducts Schumann without his desk, and all the movements were given an interpretation that called forth exceedingly flattering applause. The other numbers for the orchestra were Mendelssohn's "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage" and Liszt's arrangement of Schubert't Funeral March. No exception can be taken to the work of the orchestra in any of these numbers. That in the Mendelssohn selection was particularly happy. At the next concert Mrs. Walter C. Wyman, contralto, is to be the soloist, and the orchestral selections will include Beethoven's Symphony No. 6.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 9.

The Boston Symphony Concert.

Last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened with Mendelssohn's "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage" overture, on the whole the least interesting of the composer's works in this kind, certainly far less so than the "Fingal," the "Melusina" and the "Midsummer Night's Dream" overtures. The adagio was exquisitely played, but the allegro was occasionally confused, though there was fine power in the manner in which its more fiery climaxes were worked up. Schubert's "Funeral March," orchestrated by Liszt, was splendidly read and played throughout, the brass wind being heard to exceptional advantage in the clearness, precision, and richness that characterized it. The concert ended with a magnificent performance of Schumann's glorious first symphony. Mr. Nikisch is especially happy in interpreting this composer, as he has manifested on every occasion that he has presented a work by him. The reading of this work was one of Mr. Nikisch's brilliant successes of the season. Fire, poetry, dignity and sentiment of the most impressive and delightful order colored it from beginning to end. The orchestra, also, was at its best. The performance was a memorable one. The soloist of the concert was Mr. Carl Faelten who was heard in the late Louis Maas's concerto for piano in C-minor; certainly a striking and able composition, abundant in admirable musicianship, solid and pure in style, clear in form and excellent in orchestral treatment. The first movement is perhaps the least interesting portion of the work, but the intermezzo is full of charm and character, and the finale is unflagging in brightness, force and spirit. Mr. Faelten played with great animation, clearness and nobility of style, and with masterly freedom of technique, the effort as a whole being inspiriting and interesting in effect to an uncommon degree. The artist has rarely been heard with more thoroughly satisfying results than in his vigorous and able interpretation and performance of this work. He was applauded with great heartiness, and received two recalls. The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "The Naiads," W. Sterndale Bennett; Aria, "Marie Magdalene," Massenet; Scherzo for Orchestra (first time), Otto Floersheim; "La Captive," dramatic scene for contralto and orchestra, Berlioz; and Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony. The soloist will be Mrs. Walter C. Wyman.

The Young People's Popular Concert on Wednesday afternoon attracted an audience that packed Music Hall. Mr. Nikisch prepared an admirable programme for the occasion, opening with Weber's Jubilee Overture, which was splendidly played. Grieg's "Peer Gynt" suite, which was so pleasantly received when it was given at a recent Symphony Concert, was repeated, by request, and renewed to the full, the favor that attended its earlier performance. The concert ended with Rubinstein's brilliant "Bal Costume," ballet music, delightfully read and inspiritingly rendered by the orchestra. Miss Clementine De Vere sang the charming "Bell Song" from Delibes's "Lackme" and the florid aria, with flute obligato, from Meyerbeer's "The Star of the North." In both the artist displayed marked skill, flexibility, and freedom in coloratura singing, winning cordial applause and two recalls after each effort. Mr. Hekking played a nocturne for violoncello, with harp accompaniment, by Chopin, with fine grace of style and warmth of sentiment, and was rewarded by a well earned storm of plaudits. The concert was successful and satisfying in every way, and the favor which it met should prove an encouragement for other entertainments by the Symphony Orchestra upon a similar plan.

The Kneisel Quartet, assisted by Mr. Arthur Whiting and Mr. Leo Schultz, gave its fourth concert of the season in Union Hall on Monday evening week. The programme was made notably interesting by the performance of Mr. G. W. Chadwick's quintette for piano and strings in E-flat, which had its first public hearing here on this occasion. The work is in many essentials the strongest and most earnest that we have as yet had from the composer, and may safely be ranked as one of the strongest of recent achievements by native musicians. Mr. Chadwick is always clear, and there is no difficulty in following him intelligently, even on a first hearing. The opening movement is beautifully developed, is interesting in its theme, is scholarly without dryness, and brilliant without triviality. The "working out" is equally ingenious and fluent. The slow movement abounds in charm of melody and of treatment, and has just the touch of gravity to impart to it a graceful dignity. The intermezzo is equally original and pleasing, and the finale, in its fire, its broad vigor and its impetuous dash, forms a worthy climax to the whole. In point of construction this fine quintette leaves nothing to be desired. The piano is kept in its due place as part of a well-balanced whole, and the work is prolific in effects of striking freshness, and is always satisfying. It was sympathetically read and played by the quartet and Mr. Whiting, and was cordially received and heartily and appreciatively applauded. It was originally intended that Mr. Ernst Perabo should play the piano part, but the printed score reached him too late to enable him to devote that conscientious study to it which he deemed necessary before playing it in public. The other selections were Haydn's lovely quartette in G, op. 33, No. 5, and Schubert's wonderful string quartette in C, op. 163. These were performed with beauty of style and perfection of technique that are above all praise, and that have become the invariable qualities that may be confidently looked for in the playing of this splendid organization.

Boston Sunday Globe.

TWENTY-FOUR PAGES.

SUNDAY, MARCH 9, 1890.

SYMPHONY ECHOES.

Dr. Maas' Pianoforte Concerto, With Classic Works, Heard in Music Hall.

On the whole the 19th symphony concert was hardly up to the average of the season's work. The programme was too long for one thing, and the orchestra seemed to be lacking in its accustomed zeal. The Mendelssohn overture, "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage," was certainly not well played at the rehearsal—well played, that is, according to the standard set by Mr. Nikisch. Nor can the interpretation of the Lizst setting of Schubert's "Funeral March" be given more than a qualified commendation. When the great Schumann ("Spring") symphony was reached, however, the orchestra seemed to gain a new access of spirit and power. It was a thoroughly fine interpretation. Nikisch himself excels in setting forth the works of this great composer, and the symphony, though it came last in the programme, was followed with interest and pleasure. Carl Faelten, the pianist, gave as the solo for the occasion Louis Maas' concerto for pianoforte in C minor. It ranks among the best works of this artist, and Mr. Nikisch has done well to follow the example set by one of his predecessors and give the concerto a hearing before a symphony audience. Mr. Faelten's performance was brilliant, facile and appreciative, and he merited all the applause that followed.

The season is nearing its close. Five more concerts and Mr. Nikisch's first year of work at the head of the Boston Symphony orchestra will have ended. Next Saturday's programme is to give an English overture, Sterndale Bennett's "Naiads," a scherzo by Otto Floersheim of New York (first time), a Massenet air, and Berlioz' scena, "La Captive," with Mrs. Walter C. Wyman as the soloist, and Beethoven's pastoral symphony.

Boston Post

MONDAY MORNING, MARCH 10, 1890

NINETEENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

An enthusiastic audience listened to the following programme on Saturday evening with an attention which the extreme length of the concert did not decrease:

Overture—"Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage".....Mendelssohn
Concerto for pianoforte, in C minor, op. 12.....Louis Maas
Funeral March, Orchestrated by Liszt.....Schubert
Symphony No. 1, in B flat.....Schumann

It would be interesting to know the opinion of the public at large as to whether or not Mr. Nikisch is playing too much Mendelssohn. He has certainly played more than we have ever had before in the season, and Saturday's selection particularly is probably the least interesting of his orchestral works, certainly of his overtures. At the same time it was so beautifully played that its lack of interest was more than counterbalanced by the pleasure given by its superb rendering. Mr. Carl Faelten's fine piano playing was greeted with prolonged applause. His technical attainments are of the highest order, and the musicianly manner in which he represents all possible moods of the pianoforte—power, virility and passion, or light, delicate and dainty detail—gave the keenest pleasure. His phrasing, also, was more than delightful, and his whole performance was masterly in every sense of the word. He selected for performance a pianoforte concerto in C minor, op. 12, by the late Dr. Louis Maas, which has already been heard twice in Boston. The successful instrumentation of a piece originally written for pianoforte is a very difficult matter. The whole feeling and spirit of the orchestra is so wholly different from the piano that it is almost impossible properly to interpret one by the other. There is no doubt that Liszt, with his immense knowledge of orchestral resources, was a man wonderfully well equipped for such a task, but he has only been partially successful in the instance of the Schubert Funeral March. Added to this the great length of the work, even when played as on this occasion without repetitions, and it is open to considerable doubt as to its desirability on a concert programme. If anything could make the work a success it would be the artistic intelligence of Mr. Nikisch's interpretation and the splendid illustration of his wishes by the orchestra.

It was twenty minutes past 9 when Mr. Nikisch rapped up the orchestra to begin the symphony. This makes the concert too long, beyond all question. We have twenty-four concerts a winter, not to say forty-eight, counting the afternoon rehearsals, and it is undoubtedly the feeling of the musicians, as well as the public at large, that the "hour-and-a-half limit" should be adhered to as strictly as possible. But in this instance again Mr. Nikisch and his orchestra more than atoned for the disadvantages of the situation. Mr. Nikisch's extreme sympathy with the orchestral works of Schumann becomes more noticeable every time he produces one of these works. It seems like an almost divine interpretation of these masterpieces, which gained in every way—in strength, plasticity, form and beauty—under Mr. Nikisch's magnetic baton. The symphony was superbly performed, and received the distinct and unqualified approval of the audience, which applauded loudly after each movement as well as at the end of the concert. The reading of the first and last movements was particularly interesting, and the grace and delicacy with which the latter was played was something extraordinary. That charming singer, Mrs. Walter C. Wyman, will be the soloist at the next concert. Her beautiful singing is sure to captivate the audience, and Boston concert-goers will owe her a debt of gratitude for allowing them to hear again that beautiful little masterpiece by Berlioz, "La Captive."

ARTHUR WELD.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, MARCH 9, 1890.

The Symphony Concert, Mr. Carl Faelten, Soloist.

The Handel and Haydn Festival—Works and Artists to Be Heard—The Patti Opera Season—Albani's Return—The Lang and Baermann Concerts—News Notes—Gossip.

Mr. Carl Faelten, pianist, was the soloist at last evening's Symphony concert, under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, and he paid a very graceful tribute to the memory of the late Louis Maas by selecting that composer's pianoforte concerto in C minor as his contribution to the programme. Mr. Maas, it will be remembered, did valiant service in the cause of native and resident composers during his residence in this country, and this work was dedicated to last evening's soloist as a recognition on the part of the composer of his talent as a fellow-musician and pianist. The three movements—allegro maestoso, intermezzo (andante) and presto—all bear unmistakable evidence of the composer's mastery of the technique of the pianoforte, and the solo instrument is given good prominence in the construction and elaboration of the work. The concerto appeals to the intellectual side of the musician, and in its several parts affords ample source for study and analytical examination. A better performance of the work could hardly be asked for than that given by Mr. Faelten, whose style and sympathies are peculiarly in the line of its characteristics. The player gave his best efforts in its interpretation, and gained a hearty recognition of his efforts to interest the audience in the composition, the orchestra sustaining him with admirable success in this direction. The concerto was preceded by Mendelssohn's overture, "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage," and followed by Schubert's "Funeral March" orchestrated by Liszt, the symphony No. 1, by Schumann, ending the last of the evening's selections. No better performance of the ever enjoyable "Spring" symphony has been heard here in recent years, a skilful heightening of the contrasts in the reading given by Mr. Nikisch bringing out in bold relief its many beauties. Similarly good work was done by the orchestra in the other numbers of the programme, which, as a whole, was an eminently enjoyable one. Next Saturday the programme will include W. Sterndale Bennett's overture, "The Naiads"; Massenet's aria, "Marie Magdelene"; Otto Floersheim's scherzo for orchestra; Berlioz's "La Captive," dramatic scene for contralto and orchestra, and Beethoven's symphony No. 6 (pastorale). The soloist will be Mrs. Walter C. Wyman.

New Haven Union

NEW HAVEN, SATURDAY, MARCH 8

NIKISCH. JOSEFFY.

CLOSING CONCERT of the series by the BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.
Mr. Arthur Nikisch, Conductor

HYPERION THEATER,

Monday, March 17th, at 8 P. M.

Soloist: MR. RAFAEL JOSEFFY.

Brilliant Programme

Including the Schubert Unfinished Symphony, Rubinstein's "Bal Costume," Schumann Pianoforte Concerto, Overture, "Die Meistersinger," Wagner, &c.

Tickets now ready at Steinert's Music Store.
C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The closing concert of the series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will occur at the Hyperion theater on Monday evening, March 11. The soloist of this concert will be Mr. Rafael Joseffey, who has before delighted New Haven audiences. This concert will be one of the best of the series.

Coming Amusements Secured by the Local Managers.

The last concert of the series given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will take place at the Hyperion theater on Monday evening, March 17. This concert will be under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, who has won great favor in this city. The soloist for the occasion will be Mr. Rafael Joseffy, who has been heard in New Haven on previous occasions, and been warmly welcomed. His coming appearance will be hailed with delight. A brilliant programme has been arranged, including the Schubert unfinished symphony, Rubinstein's "Bal Costume," Schumann pianoforte concerto, overture, "Die Meistersinger," Wagner, etc. Tickets now ready at Steinert's music store.

Boston Evening Transcript.

MONDAY, MARCH 10, 1890.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The programme of the nineteenth symphony concert was:

Mendelssohn: Overture, "Meeresstille und glückliche Fahrt."
Louis Maas: Pianoforte concerto in C minor, op. 12.
Schubert: Funeral March (scored by Liszt).
Schumann: Symphony No. 1, in B-flat.

Mr. Carl Faelten was the pianist.

The Mendelssohn overture was played with immense spirit, the picturesque coda, with all its details of coming into port, trumpet and horn salutes, and dropping anchor, being made more than commonly effective. One could only regret the excessive ritardando in the last two measures, which, apart from its not being well done by the orchestra, seemed to us wholly out of keeping with the beautiful simplicity of Mendelssohn's cadence. It was noticeable, too, in many parts of the Allegro, that spirit and vivacity of effect was gained somewhat at the expense of delicacy and finish. Liszt's orchestral version of the Schubert march we cannot like. It is a tremendous swelling out of what is, in its original shape, a modest piece enough, and gives the composition a theatrical air such as one dislikes to associate with the name of Schubert. Mr. Nikisch, too, entered into Liszt's spirit with a vengeance, and did everything to make the music sound very big indeed. One felt, somehow, that this march, unlike the one in the "Eroica" symphony, which was written "per festeggiare il sovvenire di un grand' uomo," must have been meant "to celebrate the memory of a heavy tragedian."

The Schumann symphony went splendidly, except in the opening Andante un poco maestoso, and except also for a frequent lack of finish and delicacy in the playing. In the opening Andante it seemed to us that Mr. Nikisch erred, as he has done once or twice before, on the side of doing too much, of trying to make the thing too impressive. We would not criticize his conception too carelessly, for in this instance, as in other similar cases before, it was pretty evident that the orchestra did not carry it out well. Side by side with a superbly vigorous accent would come a place where the stroke was weakened and the effect blurred by the band not coming in exactly together, a weakness which was made doubly conspicuous by the grandiose pomposity of the intention. The extreme deliberateness of the tempo, too, gave one more time to feel the damping effect of such lapses than one would have had if the movement had not been taken so very slow, in which case it is quite probable that the lapses would not have occurred. But, for the rest, the symphony went grandly, the general vigor both of the conception and the performance being distinctly fine.

Mr Faelten fairly outdid himself in his superb playing of Mr. Maas's concerto. In point of brilliancy, sentiment, and musicianly solidity of style, he left absolutely nothing to be desired. No composer could ask for a finer and more exhaustive performance of his work. A double recall has seldom been so well earned. The concerto itself, which has twice been played here by the composer, shines by the excellence of its form, and by occasional moments, as toward the close of the Intermezzo, of great beauty.

The next programme is: Bennett, overture, "The Naiads;" Massenet, aria, from "Marie Magdeleine;" Floersheim, scherzo; Berlioz, "La Captive;" Beethoven, symphony No. 6 in F ("Pastoral"). Mrs. Walter C. Wyman will be the singer.

VEN EVENING REGISTER,

E NEW HAVEN EVENI

Next Monday evening the last concert of the Boston Symphony series will be given at the Hyperion. Joseffy will make his appearance on this occasion, and the program gives promise that the concert will be the best of the series. Tickets are now on sale at Steinert's music store.

At Proctor's Opera house for three nights commencing next Monday and at

ERICAN ART JOURNAL

W YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 8, 1890.

Seventeenth Symphony Concert.

ONLY three numbers and ninety minutes, but such numbers and such minutes! It opened with Weber's beautiful Oberon Overture, beautifully played, some parts taken at a slower tempo than we are used to; but what matters it? Why don't the Bostonians revive this good opera, written for the English tongue and people and only some sixty years old? How well a new text would replace the old one and mate the noble songs.

Next came Joseffy, who has not been with us before for some time, to play Liszt's A-minor Concerto, one of those brilliant technical compositions, better suited to the expert than the general public, but played with a broad dash which won loud applause.

The novelty was the most enticing recent symphony I have chanced to hear, the Irish Symphony, written only three years ago by a Dublinite, Charles Villiers Stanford.

Though I can't trace it anywhere, I fancy there must be in me a strain of Irish blood somewhere; the Hibernian melodies move me so much. The working out section of the first movement of Stanford's symphony, Allegro Moderato, is rather long and somewhat dull. Otherwise the whole composition is replete with the beauty of a maid of Erin's upper crust, and the wit of her stalwart boys. The second movement, Allegro Molto Vivace, with its bounding suggestions of the jig and fiddler, is surpassed by the third movement, Andante con Moto, introducing the harp, with an old air, "Try if it's in Tune," and the four notes of the Lament of the Sons of Usnach, worked up into variegated forms.

Delightful again is the last movement, Allegro Vivace, introducing two songs, Brian the Brave and Let Erin Remember the Days of Old, the latter repeated at the close in a different key. The distinctness of instruments throughout is remarkable and the work is one to be proud of.

THE REGISTER.

SATURDAY MARCH 8

The closing concert of the Boston Symphony series will take place at the Hyperion Monday evening, March 17, and promises to be the most attractive of all. On this occasion Joseffy will be seen.

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

The last of the concerts of the Boston Symphony course will be given at the Hyperion Monday evening, March 17. On this occasion the brilliant piano soloist, Rafael Joseffy, will take part, and Arthur Nikisch will act as conductor. The program will include the Schubert unfinished symphony, Rubenstein's "Bal Costume," and a number of other choice pieces.

BOSTON HERALD.

FRIDAY, MARCH 14, 1890.

CONCERT AT CAMBRIDGE.

There was the usual large and fashionable audience of Cambridge residents and Harvard students at the Symphony concert in Sanders Theatre last night. The soloist of the evening was Miss Rose Stewart. Her best effort was the "Mad Song," Thomas' "Hamlet." The selections for the orchestra were well rendered, especially the well known "Unfinished Symphony" of Schubert and Weber's "Freischutz" overture. With the exception of these two numbers, the concert, as a whole, was not up to the usual high standard of the orchestra's work.

Boston Commonwealth.

MARCH 15, 1890.

Boston Symphony orchestra. The fifth and last concert in the Sanders Theatre was given Thursday night. For the twentieth concert of the season in Music Hall, tonight the programme is: Bennett, overture to "The Naiads;" Massent, aria from "Marie Magdelene;" Floersheim, Scherzo; Berlioz, "La Captive," for contralto and orchestra; Beethoven, sixth symphony. Mrs. Walter C. Wyman will be the singer.

HAVEN EVENING REGISTER,

RIDAY MARCH 14, 1890.

At the Theaters.

The concluding concert of the Boston symphony series, which will be given at the Hyperion next Monday evening, promises to be the most attractive of all. Rafael Joseffy will be heard in some of his best selections on the piano, and, this, together with the other numbers on the program, will afford pleasure to those who attend.

[89]

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 12, 1890.

——Carl Faelten was the soloist at last Saturday night's Nikisch concert in Boston. He played the C minor piano concerto of the late lamented Louis Maas with good effect. The rest of the program consisted of a Mendelssohn overture, "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage;" Schubert's "Funeral March," orchestrated by Liszt, and Schumann's first symphony. Next Saturday the program will include W. Sterndale Bennett's overture, "The Naiads;" Massenet's aria, "Marie Magdelene;" Otto Floersheim's scherzo for orchestra; Berlioz's "La Captive," dramatic scene for contralto and orchestra, and Beethoven's symphony No. 6 (pastorale). The soloist will be Mrs. Walter C. Wyman.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, MAR. 15, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The Symphony audience of this evening will have the pleasure of hearing two songs by Mrs. Walter C. Wyman, the contralto (from St. Louis, we think) who was heard here once under Mr. Gericke's régime just upon her return from Europe. Her voice is very interesting, although not emotional, smooth and rising easily from dignified lower notes to clear and slightly incisive upper ones; her style is unaffected, quiet and well developed, and her enunciation is pure. Both voice and style would now be benefited by replacing the French music, which she evidently much affects, by warm Italian and solid English songs; for the French text tends to thin the tone, while its spirit—necessarily adapted to the peculiarities of the language and of the national voice—does not inspire ardor of feeling or breadth of accent. Her songs for tonight are Berlioz's "La Captive," with its picturesquely poetic orchestral accompaniment and an air, with piano, from Massenet's "Marie Magdalene." It was in the latter that she made the more impression yesterday afternoon, the melody being tender, gracious and attractive in itself and the delivery being calm and pure. The Berlioz song, written in Rome to an "Orientale" of Victor Hugo, has a warm glow even in its melancholy, and it should be sung with a warmth and pathos which could not be found either in the tones or in the accentuation of Mrs. Wyman, although she gave a charming sweetness and equity to it all. There is a novelty on the programme—a Scherzo, by Mr. Otto Floersheim, of the New York Musical Courier, an "Elevation" of whose writing was played by Mr. Gericke, and may possibly be remembered as a clever spinning out of very slender material into quite a tenacious little web. This Scherzo is, to put it mildly, decidedly queer, and we hardly knew what to make of it. Apparently the main idea and its treatment are intended to be humorous, and we believe that an orchestra of Italians could play it so as to set themselves and their audience all a-laughing; but yesterday it was read with such a sombre gravity and deliberation, and yet with such a hesitancy as one might expect in a performance of "Box and Cox" by a couple of returned Methodist missionaries. It has two trios, one of which—the pleasant and most natural part of the whole thing—would make a very nice waltz, having a lingering swing and a persuasive theme. There seems no particular reason why this composition should have been played when some tens of thousands of better things wait unheard, unless it were in the way of interchange of courtesies with the Courier, which has been complimentary to the Symphony concerts in its city. The appositely aqueos overture, Sterndale Bennett's "Naiads," begins the programme, and we hope it will be less dully played tonight than yesterday, when the beauty of its finer passages and the keen delicacy of its contrasts were lost in a serious and little shaded reading, in which there was not one pianissimo, and scarcely a single piano, from beginning to end, and the occasional trombone accents were roughly snarled out. The Symphony will be Beethoven's "Pastoral," which, if [illegible] of storm already on hand, at least holds out good promise of ultimate fair weather. The programme for the ensuing concert, which does not take place until the last Saturday evening in the month, will be this: Brahms, "Tragic" overture; Vieuxtemps, concerto for violin, in A-minor; Dvórak, Symphony No. 1, in D, Op. 60. Soloist, Mr. Otto Roth.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, MARCH 16, 1890.

THE SYMPHONIES.

TWENTIETH CONCERT.

Last evening's selections were: Bennett's Overture, "The Naiads"; Berlioz' Revery for Contralto, "La Captive"; Otto Floersheim's Scherzo for Orchestra; Massenet's Aria, "Marie Magdelene," and Beethoven's Symphony No. 6, (Pastorale).

Otto Floersheim's scherzo was the only novelty. It is a well-orchestrated piece of music, vitally rhythmical, pleasing and reflective yet for the most part an admirable morceau au bal. Mrs. Walter C. Wyman, the soloist, has hardly a pure contralto voice as claimed, but her tones which have a decidedly mezzo soprano quality are both musical and true. Her vocal delivery, while somewhat inanimate, is in all other respects exceptionally refined and artistic, and she sings with a sincerity and intelligence that are highly creditable. Mr. Nikisch interpreted the symphony in a very conservative manner, and the playing of the orchestra throughout the concert was quite as usual; in brief, excellent.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1889-90.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

V. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, MARCH 13TH, AT 7.45, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

MOZART.	SYMPHONY in E flat. (Koechel 543). Adagio; Allegro.—Andante.— Minuetto and Trio.—Allegretto.—Finale.—Allegro.
A. THOMAS.	MAD SONG from "Hamlet."
SCHUBERT.	UNFINISHED SYMPHONY in B minor. Allegro.—Andante con moto.
RUBINSTEIN.	PERSIAN LOVE SONGS. a) EXTASE. b) DANS CETTE BRISE SERENE. c) TES YEUX D'AZUR.
WEBER.	OVERTURE. "Freischuetz.'

SOLOIST:

MISS ROSE STEWART.

The Piano used is a Chickering.

N HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, MARCH 15, 1890

THE NINETEENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.—

Mendelssohn.....Overture, "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage."
Louis Maas.....Concerto for Pianoforte, in C minor, op. 12.
Allegro maestoso.
Intermezzo (Andante).
Presto
Schubert.....Funeral March, orchestrated by Liszt
Schumann.....Symphony No. 1, in B-flat

It was the Moritz Hauptmann, the conservative cantor at Leipsic, who shortly before his death wrote as follows concerning the Gewandhaus concerts: "'The Heroic Symphony,' 'Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage,' 'E-flat Major Concerto of Beethoven,' these are all excellent pieces when they are well played; but we have heard them so often; we know in advance each and every note and effect. I should often like to hear something different, something unknown to me, either of the past or the present. Let us not always have the highest mountain peaks, without valleys, without hills. Nor is it good for people to hear only music which is well known to them; for losing themselves in gloomy admiration, they give up the use of the critical faculty. Anything new annoys them, for they do not know what should be said about it. We do not need nine symphonies of Beethoven every winter. That is too much of a good thing. Where only the best is given, there ceases to be any 'best.' Every day should not be Sunday."

These remarks of Hauptmann might well be applied to our own audiences and to the programs set before them. There is a difference however; no one here can tell how that which is worn and familiar will sound under the baton of Mr. Nikisch. His nature controls his stick, and as he waves it in incantation, loved faces which once were full of purity and peace, now appear with features distorted with pain and torn with passion; they no longer smile upon us. The Hungarians descend upon us; and all music, whatever its nationality, is now the music of Hungary played in Hungarian fashion. Boston is fast becoming a Hungarian village; after Easter, if the weather is only favorable, the Csárdás will be danced upon the Common; and the Rákocsy march will be played by the bands St. Patrick's day. At Music Hall movements which we have known from childhood, rhythms and tempi with which we have summered and wintered, now appear as strangers; and they are disguised, as at a midnight masquerade.

"Behold, I make all things new," should be written upon the program books, on the title page, just above the name of Arthur Nikisch, conductor.

The people applauded the performance of the Schumann symphony; and expressions of delight were frequent and honest. It was played, to be sure, with great spirit; it was played with a sweep and a swing and a dash and a crash; fit music to accompany the stage direction, "alarum without." The temperature of the crowd rose steadily with the din; for the majority prefer noise and glaring effects to beauty and finish of detail. The performance of the Symphony was chiefly characterized by an absence of any piano effects. Take the first movement for instance. The passages in sixteenth notes given to the violas against the wood-wind which was marked by Schumann "p sempre" distracted, and indeed monopolized the attention; and the over-occurring dynamic marks of the composer were ruthlessly disregarded. The second movement so beautiful in its proportions, so exquisite in its details;—but it is better not to speak of the performance, for piano and forte and song and accompaniment seemed merely convertible terms without any special meaning. And so with the other two movements. There was fire, there was an imperious, applause-provoking swing; there was also a strange lack of musical instinct on the part of the conductor; and the spirit of Schumann fled, aghast. But the crowd applauded, and so Mr. Nikisch was encouraged.

Saturday the monthly dose of Mendelssohn was administered, this time in the shape of the "Meeresstille" Overture. Mr. Nikisch paid a handsome tribute to the memory of Louis Maas by putting upon the program the pianoforte concerto of the late composer. It is a scholarly work, showing more skilful writing than spontaneity. The piano-part was admirably played by Mr. Carl Faelten, who entered thoroughly into the spirit of the work and played it with a reverential care well fitted to the occasion. The funeral March of Schubert, even with Liszt's instrumentation, is cheap and tedious.

Boston Journal.

MORNING EDITION.

MONDAY MORNING, MARCH 17, 1890.

The Symphony Concert.

Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony has been given an interpretation nearly every season of the Music Hall concerts, so that the beauty of this remarkable composition is known to the frequenters of the symphonies as well, perhaps, as any number that is put on the programme. An enthusiastic admirer of the piece and of Beethoven exclaimed, after the fine rendition of Saturday evening, "And the man who wrote this symphony was deaf!" It expressed at great deal, and we are always reminded when we hear this composition of the remark of an old and experienced instructor in music that "Beethoven was on the top of a mountain in his writings for instruments, but down in the valley in writings for the voice." At all events, we seldom see an audience follow a symphony more closely than during its performance. The orchestra evidently felt the sympathy of the audience in the work and its rendition, and Mr. Nikisch's interpretation has not been surpassed by any former performances of this symphony. Great applause greeted him after each movement, and it would be a difficult matter to say which of them was the most exquisitely rendered. The three closing movements, representing the gathering of the country people, the storm, followed by that beautiful passage indicating thanksgiving and rest after the tempest, were given without a break, thus adding to the effect and bringing the whole symphony into a harmonious and symmetrical whole. Great praise is due the orchestra and conductor for one of the grandest interpretations of any work given this season.

Sterndale Bennett's Overture, "The Naiads," was in harmony with the symphony. The gentle melody, the leading idea which is heard through the entire overture, and of which the audience never wearies, is exceedingly interesting, and was an appropriate opening number. A scherzo, by Otto Floersheim, the editor of the New York Musical Courier, was given for the first time in Boston, and it proved to be a bright and happy number, and it was capitally rendered.

The soloist was Mrs. Walter C. Wyman, contralto, who gave a reverie, "La Captive" by Berlioz, with orchestral accompaniment, and an aria from "Marie Magdelene," by Massenet. Mrs. Wyman sang last year at these concerts, but her appearances have not been frequent in this city. Both of these selections were given an artistic and sympathetic rendering—the reverie, especially, being well suited to her voice, and the accompaniment was finely scored and beautifully played. The aria served to show the remarkable range of her voice, and she received a very enthusiastic encore, which was fully deserved. There is no symphony this week. Otto Roth is to be the soloist at the next concert, giving a concerto by Vieuxtemps. The symphony is to be Dvorak's No. 1.

AMERICAN ART JOURNAL

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 8, 1890.

Seventeenth Symphony Concert.

ONLY three numbers and ninety minutes, but such numbers and such minutes! It opened with Weber's beautiful Oberon Overture, beautifully played, some parts taken at a slower tempo than we are used to; but what matters it? Why don't the Bostonians revive this good opera, written for the English tongue and people and only some sixty years old? How well a new text would replace the old one and mate the noble songs.

Next came Joseffy, who has not been with us before for some time, to play Liszt's A-minor Concerto, one of those brilliant technical compositions, better suited to the expert than the general public, but played with a broad dash which won loud applause.

The novelty was the most enticing recent symphony I have chanced to hear, the Irish Symphony, written only three years ago by a Dublinite, Charles Villiers Stanford.

Though I can't trace it anywhere, I fancy there must be in me a strain of Irish blood somewhere, the Hibernian melodies move me so much. The working out section of the first movement of Stanford's symphony, Allegro Moderato, is rather long and somewhat dull. Otherwise the whole composition is replete with the beauty of a maid of Erin's upper crust, and the wit of her stalwart boys. The second movement, Allegro Molto Vivace, with its bounding suggestions of the jig and fiddler, is surpassed by the third movement, Andante con Moto, introducing the harp, with an old air, "Try if it's in Tune," and the four notes of the Lament of the Sons of Usnach, worked up into variegated forms.

Delightful again is the last movement, Allegro Vivace, introducing two songs, Brian the Brave and Let Erin Remember the Days of Old, the latter repeated at the close in a different key. The distinctness of instruments throughout is remarkable and the work is one to be proud of.

THE REGISTER.

SATURDAY MARCH 8

The closing concert of the Boston Symphony series will take place at the Hyperion Monday evening, March 17, and promises to be the most attractive of all. On this occasion Joseffy will be seen.

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

The last of the concerts of the Boston Symphony course will be given at the Hyperion Monday evening, March 17. On this occasion the brilliant piano soloist, Rafael Joseffy, will take part, and Arthur Nikisch will act as conductor. The program will include the Schubert unfinished symphony, Rubenstein's "Bal Costume," and a number of other choice pieces.

BOSTON HERALD.

FRIDAY, MARCH 14, 1890.

CONCERT AT CAMBRIDGE.

There was the usual large and fashionable audience of Cambridge residents and Harvard students at the Symphony concert in Sanders Theatre last night. The soloist of the evening was Miss Rose Stewart. Her best effort was the "Mad Song," Thomas' "Hamlet." The selections for the orchestra were well rendered, especially the well known "Unfinished Symphony" of Schubert and Weber's "Freischutz" overture. With the exception of these two numbers, the concert, as a whole, was not up to the usual high standard of the orchestra's work.

Boston Commonwealth.

MARCH 15, 1890.

Boston Symphony orchestra. The fifth and last concert in the Sanders Theatre was given Thursday night. For the twentieth concert of the season in Music Hall, tonight the programme is: Bennett, overture to "The Naiads;" Massent, aria from "Marie Magdelene;" Floersheim, Scherzo; Berlioz, "La Captive," for contralto and orchestra; Beethoven, sixth symphony. Mrs. Walter C. Wyman will be the singer.

HAVEN EVENING REGISTER,

FRIDAY MARCH 14, 1890.

At the Theaters.

The concluding concert of the Boston symphony series, which will be given at the Hyperion next Monday evening, promises to be the most attractive of all. Rafael Joseffy will be heard in some of his best selections on the piano, and, this, together with the other numbers on the program, will afford pleasure to those who attend.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 12, 1890.

——Carl Faelten was the soloist at last Saturday night's Nikisch concert in Boston. He played the C minor piano concerto of the late lamented Louis Maas with good effect. The rest of the program consisted of a Mendelssohn overture, "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage;" Schubert's "Funeral March," orchestrated by Liszt, and Schumann's first symphony. Next Saturday the program will include W. Sterndale Bennett's overture, "The Naiads;" Massenet's aria, "Marie Magdelene;" Otto Floersheim's scherzo for orchestra; Berlioz's "La Captive," dramatic scene for contralto and orchestra, and Beethoven's symphony No. 6 (pastorale). The soloist will be Mrs. Walter C. Wyman.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, MAR. 15, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The Symphony audience of this evening will have the pleasure of hearing two songs by Mrs. Walter C. Wyman, the contralto (from St. Louis, we think) who was heard here once under Mr. Gericke's régime just upon her return from Europe. Her voice is very interesting, although not emotional, smooth and rising easily from dignified lower notes to clear and slightly incisive upper ones; her style is unaffected, quiet and well developed, and her enunciation is pure. Both voice and style would now be benefited by replacing the French music, which she evidently much affects, by warm Italian and solid English songs; for the French text tends to thin the tone, while its spirit—necessarily adapted to the peculiarities of the language and of the national voice—does not inspire ardor of feeling or breadth of accent. Her songs for tonight are Berlioz's "La Captive," with its picturesquely poetic orchestral accompaniment and an air, with piano, from Massenet's "Marie Magdalene." It was in the latter that she made the more impression yesterday afternoon, the melody being tender, gracious and attractive in itself and the delivery being calm and pure. The Berlioz song, written in Rome to an "Orientale" of Victor Hugo, has a warm glow even in its melancholy, and it should be sung with a warmth and pathos which could not be found either in the tones or in the accentuation of Mrs. Wyman, although she gave a charming sweetness and equity to it all. There is a novelty on the programme—a Scherzo, by Mr. Otto Floersheim, of the New York Musical Courier, an "Elevation" of whose writing was played by Mr. Gericke, and may possibly be remembered as a clever spinning out of very slender material into quite a tenacious little web. This Scherzo is, to put it mildly, decidedly queer, and we hardly knew what to make of it. Apparently the main idea and its treatment are intended to be humorous, and we believe that an orchestra of Italians could play it so as to set themselves and their audience all a-laughing; but yesterday it was read with such a sombre gravity and deliberation, and yet with such a hesitancy as one might expect in a performance of "Box and Cox" by a couple of returned Methodist missionaries. It has two trios, one of which—the pleasant and most natural part of the whole thing—would make a very nice waltz, having a lingering swing and a persuasive theme. There seems no particular reason why this composition should have been played when some tens of thousands of better things wait unheard, unless it were in the way of interchange of courtesies with the Courier, which has been complimentary to the Symphony concerts in its city. The appositely aqueos overture, Sterndale Bennett's "Naiads," begins the programme, and we hope it will be less dully played tonight than yesterday, when the beauty of its finer passages and the keen delicacy of its contrasts were lost in a serious and little shaded reading, in which there was not one pianissimo, and scarcely a single piano, from beginning to end, and the occasional trombone accents were roughly snarled out. The Symphony will be Beethoven's "Pastoral," which, if it [illegible] of storm already on hand, at least holds out good promise of ultimate fair weather. The programme for the ensuing concert, which does not take place until the last Saturday evening in the month, will be this: Brahms, "Tragic" overture; Vieuxtemps, concerto for violin, in A-minor; Dvórak, Symphony No. 1, in D, Op. 60. Soloist, Mr. Otto Roth.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, MARCH 16, 1890.

THE SYMPHONIES.

TWENTIETH CONCERT.

Last evening's selections were: Bennett's Overture, "The Naiads"; Berlioz' Revery for Contralto, "La Captive"; Otto Floersheim's Scherzo for Orchestra; Massenet's Aria, "Marie Magdelene," and Beethoven's Symphony No. 6, (Pastorale).

Otto Floersheim's scherzo was the only novelty. It is a well-orchestrated piece of music, vitally rhythmical, pleasing and reflective yet for the most part an admirable morceau au bal. Mrs. Walter C. Wyman, the soloist, has hardly a pure contralto voice as claimed, but her tones which have a decidedly mezzo soprano quality are both musical and true. Her vocal delivery, while somewhat inanimate, is in all other respects exceptionally refined and artistic, and she sings with a sincerity and intelligence that are highly creditable. Mr. Nikisch interpreted the symphony in a very conservative manner, and the playing of the orchestra throughout the concert was quite as usual; in brief, excellent.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1889-90.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

V. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, MARCH 13TH, AT 7.45, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

MOZART.	SYMPHONY in E flat. (Koechel 543). Adagio; Allegro.—Andante.— Minuetto and Trio.—Allegretto.—Finale.—Allegro.
A. THOMAS.	MAD SONG from "Hamlet."
SCHUBERT.	UNFINISHED SYMPHONY in B minor. Allegro.—Andante con moto.
RUBINSTEIN.	PERSIAN LOVE SONGS. a) EXTASE. b) DANS CETTE BRISE SERENE. c) TES YEUX D'AZUR.
WEBER.	OVERTURE. "Freischuetz.'

SOLOIST:

MISS ROSE STEWART.

The Piano used is a Chickering.

N HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, MARCH 15, 1890

THE NINETEENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.—

Mendelssohn.....Overture, "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage."
Louis Maas.....Concerto for Pianoforte, in C minor, op. 12.
Allegro maestoso.
Intermezzo (Andante).
Presto
Schubert.....Funeral March, orchestrated by Liszt
Schumann.....Symphony No. 1, in B-flat

It was the Moritz Hauptmann, the conservative cantor at Leipsic, who shortly before his death wrote as follows concerning the Gewandhaus concerts: "'The Heroic Symphony,' 'Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage,' 'E-flat Major Concerto of Beethoven,' these are all excellent pieces when they are well played; but we have heard them so often; we know in advance each and every note and effect. I should often like to hear something different, something unknown to me, either of the past or the present. Let us not always have the highest mountain peaks, without valleys, without hills. Nor is it good for people to hear only music which is well known to them; for losing themselves in gloomy admiration, they give up the use of the critical faculty. Anything new annoys them, for they do not know what should be said about it. We do not need nine symphonies of Beethoven every winter. That is too much of a good thing. Where only the best is given, there ceases to be any 'best.' Every day should not be Sunday."

These remarks of Hauptmann might well be applied to our own audiences and to the programs set before them. There is a difference however; no one here can tell how that which is worn and familiar will sound under the baton of Mr. Nikisch. His nature controls his stick, and as he waves it in incantation, loved faces which once were full of purity and peace, now appear with features distorted with pain and torn with passion; they no longer smile upon us. The Hungarians descend upon us; and all music, whatever its nationality, is now the music of Hungary played in Hungarian fashion. Boston is fast becoming a Hungarian village; after Easter, if the weather is only favorable, the Csárdás will be danced upon the Common; and the Rákoczcy march will be played by the bands St. Patrick's day. At Music Hall movements which we have known from childhood, rhythms and tempi with which we have summered and wintered, now appear as strangers; and they are disguised, as at a midnight masquerade.

"Behold, I make all things new," should be written upon the program books, on the title page, just above the name of Arthur Nikisch, conductor.

The people applauded the performance of the Schumann symphony; and expressions of delight were frequent and honest. It was played, to be sure, with great spirit; it was played with a sweep and a swing and a dash and a crash; fit music to accompany the stage direction, "alarum without." The temperature of the crowd rose steadily with the din; for the majority prefer noise and glaring effects to beauty and finish of detail. The performance of the Symphony was chiefly characterized by an absence of any piano effects. Take the first movement for instance. The passages in sixteenth notes given to the violas against the wood-wind which was marked by Schumann "p sempre" distracted, and indeed monopolized the attention; and the ever-occurring dynamic marks of the composer were ruthlessly disregarded. The second movement so beautiful in its proportions, so exquisite in its details;—but it is better not to speak of the performance, for piano and forte and song and accompaniment seemed merely convertible terms without any special meaning. And so with the other two movements. There was fire, there was an imperious, applause-provoking swing; there was also a strange lack of musical instinct on the part of the conductor; and the spirit of Schumann fled, aghast. But the crowd applauded, and so Mr. Nikisch was encouraged.

Saturday the monthly dose of Mendelssohn was administered, this time in the shape of the "Meeresstille" Overture. Mr. Nikisch paid a handsome tribute to the memory of Louis Maas by putting upon the program the pianoforte concerto of the late composer. It is a scholarly work, showing more skilful writing than spontaneity. The piano-part was admirably played by Mr. Carl Faelten, who entered thoroughly into the spirit of the work and played it with a reverential care well fitted to the occasion. The funeral March of Schubert, even with Liszt's instrumentation, is cheap and tedious.

Boston Journal.

MORNING EDITION.

MONDAY MORNING, MARCH 17, 1890.

The Symphony Concert.

Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony has been given an interpretation nearly every season of the Music Hall concerts, so that the beauty of this remarkable composition is known to the frequenters of the symphonies as well, perhaps, as any number that is put on the programme. An enthusiastic admirer of the piece and of Beethoven exclaimed, after the fine rendition of Saturday evening, "And the man who wrote this symphony was deaf!" It expressed a great deal, and we are always reminded when we hear this composition of the remark of an old and experienced instructor in music that "Beethoven was on the top of a mountain in his writings for instruments, but down in the valley in writings for the voice." At all events, we seldom see an audience follow a symphony more closely than during its performance. The orchestra evidently felt the sympathy of the audience in the work and its rendition, and Mr. Nikisch's interpretation has not been surpassed by any former performances of this symphony. Great applause greeted him after each movement, and it would be a difficult matter to say which of them was the most exquisitely rendered. The three closing movements, representing the gathering of the country people, the storm, followed by that beautiful passage indicating thanksgiving and rest after the tempest, were given without a break, thus adding to the effect and bringing the whole symphony into a harmonious and symmetrical whole. Great praise is due the orchestra and conductor for one of the grandest interpretations of any work given this season.

Sterndale Bennett's Overture, "The Naiads," was in harmony with the symphony. The gentle melody, the leading idea which is heard through the entire overture, and of which the audience never wearies, is exceedingly interesting, and was an appropriate opening number. A scherzo, by Otto Floersheim, the editor of the New York Musical Courier, was given for the first time in Boston, and it proved to be a bright and happy number, and it was capitally rendered.

The soloist was Mrs. Walter C. Wyman, contralto, who gave a reverie, "La Captive" by Berlioz, with orchestral accompaniment, and an aria from "Marie Magdelene," by Massenet. Mrs. Wyman sang last year at these concerts, but her appearances have not been frequent in this city. Both of these selections were given an artistic and sympathetic rendering—the reverie, especially, being well suited to her voice, and the accompaniment was finely scored and beautifully played. The aria served to show the remarkable range of her voice, and she received a very enthusiastic encore, which was fully deserved. There is no symphony this week. Otto Roth is to be the soloist at the next concert, giving a concerto by Vieuxtemps. The symphony is to be Dvorak's No. 1.

[89]

AMERICAN ART JOURNAL

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 8, 1890.

Seventeenth Symphony Concert.

ONLY three numbers and ninety minutes, but such numbers and such minutes! It opened with Weber's beautiful Oberon Overture, beautifully played, some parts taken at a slower tempo than we are used to; but what matters it? Why don't the Bostonians revive this good opera, written for the English tongue and people and only some sixty years old? How well a new text would replace the old one and mate the noble songs.

Next came Joseffy, who has not been with us before for some time, to play Liszt's A-minor Concerto, one of those brilliant technical compositions, better suited to the expert than the general public, but played with a broad dash which won loud applause.

The novelty was the most enticing recent symphony I have chanced to hear, the Irish Symphony, written only three years ago by a Dublinite, Charles Villiers Stanford.

Though I can't trace it anywhere, I fancy there must be in me a strain of Irish blood somewhere, the Hibernian melodies move me so much. The working out section of the first movement of Stanford's symphony, Allegro Moderato, is rather long and somewhat dull. Otherwise the whole composition is replete with the beauty of a maid of Erin's upper crust, and the wit of her stalwart boys. The second movement, Allegro Molto Vivace, with its bounding suggestions of the jig and fiddler, is surpassed by the third movement, Andante con Moto, introducing the harp, with an old air, "Try if it's in Tune," and the four notes of the Lament of the Sons of Usnach, worked up into variegated forms.

Delightful again is the last movement, Allegro Vivace, introducing two songs, Brian the Brave and Let Erin Remember the Days of Old, the latter repeated at the close in a different key. The distinctness of instruments throughout is remarkable and the work is one to be proud of.

THE REGISTER.

SATURDAY MARCH 8

The closing concert of the Boston Symphony series will take place at the Hyperion Monday evening, March 17, and promises to be the most attractive of all. On this occasion Joseffy will be seen.

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

The last of the concerts of the Boston Symphony course will be given at the Hyperion Monday evening, March 17. On this occasion the brilliant piano soloist, Rafael Joseffy, will take part, and Arthur Nikisch will act as conductor. The program will include the Schubert unfinished symphony, Rubenstein's "Bal Costume," and a number of other choice pieces.

BOSTON HERALD.

FRIDAY, MARCH 14, 1890.

CONCERT AT CAMBRIDGE.

There was the usual large and fashionable audience of Cambridge residents and Harvard students at the Symphony concert in Sanders Theatre last night. The soloist of the evening was Miss Rose Stewart. Her best effort was the "Mad Song," Thomas' "Hamlet." The selections for the orchestra were well rendered, especially the well known "Unfinished Symphony" of Schubert and Weber's "Freischutz" overture. With the exception of these two numbers, the concert, as a whole, was not up to the usual high standard of the orchestra's work.

Boston Commonwealth.

MARCH 15, 1890.

Boston Symphony orchestra. The fifth and last concert in the Sanders Theatre was given Thursday night. For the twentieth concert of the season in Music Hall, tonight the programme is: Bennett, overture to "The Naiads;" Massent, aria from "Marie Magdelene;" Floersheim, Scherzo; Berlioz, "La Captive," for contralto and orchestra; Beethoven, sixth symphony. Mrs. Walter C. Wyman will be the singer.

HAVEN EVENING REGISTER,

FRIDAY MARCH 14, 1890.

At the Theaters.

The concluding concert of the Boston symphony series, which will be given at the Hyperion next Monday evening, promises to be the most attractive of all. Rafael Joseffy will be heard in some of his best selections on the piano, and, this, together with the other numbers on the program, will afford pleasure to those who attend.

[89]

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 12, 1890.

——Carl Faelten was the soloist at last Saturday night's Nikisch concert in Boston. He played the C minor piano concerto of the late lamented Louis Maas with good effect. The rest of the program consisted of a Mendelssohn overture, "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage;" Schubert's "Funeral March," orchestrated by Liszt, and Schumann's first symphony. Next Saturday the program will include W. Sterndale Bennett's overture, "The Naiads;" Massenet's aria, "Marie Magdelene;" Otto Floersheim's scherzo for orchestra; Berlioz's "La Captive," dramatic scene for contralto and orchestra, and Beethoven's symphony No. 6 (pastorale). The soloist will be Mrs. Walter C. Wyman.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, MAR. 15, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The Symphony audience of this evening will have the pleasure of hearing two songs by Mrs. Walter C. Wyman, the contralto (from St. Louis, we think) who was heard here once under Mr. Gericke's régime just upon her return from Europe. Her voice is very interesting, although not emotional, smooth and rising easily from dignified lower notes to clear and slightly incisive upper ones; her style is unaffected, quiet and well developed, and her enunciation is pure. Both voice and style would now be benefited by replacing the French music, which she evidently much affects, by warm Italian and solid English songs; for the French text tends to thin the tone, while its spirit—necessarily adapted to the peculiarities of the language and of the national voice—does not inspire ardor of feeling or breadth of accent. Her songs for tonight are Berlioz's "La Captive," with its picturesquely poetic orchestral accompaniment and an air, with piano, from Massenet's "Marie Magdalene." It was in the latter that she made the more impression yesterday afternoon, the melody being tender, gracious and attractive in itself and the delivery being calm and pure. The Berlioz song, written in Rome to an "Orientale" of Victor Hugo, has a warm glow even in its melancholy, and it should be sung with a warmth and pathos which could not be found either in the tones or in the accentuation of Mrs. Wyman, although she gave a charming sweetness and equity to it all. There is a novelty on the programme—a Scherzo, by Mr. Otto Floersheim, of the New York Musical Courier, an "Elevation" of whose writing was played by Mr. Gericke, and may possibly be remembered as a clever spinning out of very slender material into quite a tenacious little web. This Scherzo is, to put it mildly, decidedly queer, and we hardly knew what to make of it. Apparently the main idea and its treatment are intended to be humorous, and we believe that an orchestra of Italians could play it so as to set themselves and their audience all a-laughing; but yesterday it was read with such a sombre gravity and deliberation, and yet with such a hesitancy as one might expect in a performance of "Box and Cox" by a couple of returned Methodist missionaries. It has two trios, one of which—the pleasant and most natural part of the whole thing—would make a very nice waltz, having a lingering swing and a persuasive theme. There seems no particular reason why this composition should have been played when some tens of thousands of better things wait unheard, unless it were in the way of interchange of courtesies with the Courier, which has been complimentary to the Symphony concerts in its city. The appositely aqueos overture, Sterndale Bennett's "Naiads," begins the programme, and we hope it will be less dully played tonight than yesterday, when the beauty of its finer passages and the keen delicacy of its contrasts were lost in a serious and little shaded reading, in which there was not one pianissimo, and scarcely a single piano, from beginning to end, and the occasional trombone accents were roughly snarled out. The Symphony will be Beethoven's "Pastoral," which, if it adds something to the stock of storm already on hand, at least holds out good promise of ultimate fair weather. The programme for the ensuing concert, which does not take place until the last Saturday evening in the month, will be this: Brahms, "Tragic" overture; Vieuxtemps, concerto for violin, in A-minor; Dvórak, Symphony No. 1, in D, Op. 60. Soloist, Mr. Otto Roth.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, MARCH 16, 1890.

THE SYMPHONIES.

TWENTIETH CONCERT.

Last evening's selections were: Bennett's Overture, "The Naiads"; Berlioz' Revery for Contralto, "La Captive"; Otto Floersheim's Scherzo for Orchestra; Massenet's Aria, "Marie Magdelene," and Beethoven's Symphony No. 6, (Pastorale).

Otto Floersheim's scherzo was the only novelty. It is a well-orchestrated piece of music, vitally rhythmical, pleasing and reflective yet for the most part an admirable morceau au bal. Mrs. Walter C. Wyman, the soloist, has hardly a pure contralto voice as claimed, but her tones which have a decidedly mezzo soprano quality are both musical and true. Her vocal delivery, while somewhat inanimate, is in all other respects exceptionally refined and artistic, and she sings with a sincerity and intelligence that are highly creditable. Mr. Nikisch interpreted the symphony in a very conservative manner, and the playing of the orchestra throughout the concert was quite as usual; in brief, excellent.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1889-90.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

V. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, MARCH 13TH, AT 7.45, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

MOZART.	SYMPHONY in E flat. (Koechel 543). Adagio; Allegro.—Andante.— Minuetto and Trio.—Allegretto.—Finale.—Allegro.
A. THOMAS.	MAD SONG from "Hamlet."
SCHUBERT.	UNFINISHED SYMPHONY in B minor. Allegro.—Andante con moto.
RUBINSTEIN.	PERSIAN LOVE SONGS. a) EXTASE. b) DANS CETTE BRISE SERENE. c) TES YEUX D'AZUR.
WEBER.	OVERTURE. "Freischuetz.'

SOLOIST:

MISS ROSE STEWART.

The Piano used is a Chickering.

N HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, MARCH 15, 1890

THE NINETEENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.—

Mendelssohn.....Overture, "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage."
Louis Maas.....Concerto for Pianoforte, in C minor, op. 12.
Allegro maestoso.
Intermezzo (Andante).
Presto
Schubert.....Funeral March, orchestrated by Liszt
Schumann.....Symphony No. 1, in B-flat

It was the Moritz Hauptmann, the conservative cantor at Leipsic, who shortly before his death wrote as follows concerning the Gewandhaus concerts: "'The Heroic Symphony,' 'Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage,' 'E-flat Major Concerto of Beethoven,' these are all excellent pieces when they are well played; but we have heard them so often; we know in advance each and every note and effect. I should often like to hear something different, something unknown to me, either of the past or the present. Let us not always have the highest mountain peaks, without valleys, without hills. Nor is it good for people to hear only music which is well known to them; for losing themselves in gloomy admiration, they give up the use of the critical faculty. Anything new annoys them, for they do not know what should be said about it. We do not need nine symphonies of Beethoven every winter. That is too much of a good thing. Where only the best is given, there ceases to be any 'best.' Every day should not be Sunday."

These remarks of Hauptmann might well be applied to our own audiences and to the programs set before them. There is a difference however; no one here can tell how that which is worn and familiar will sound under the baton of Mr. Nikisch. His nature controls his stick, and as he waves it in incantation, loved faces which once were full of purity and peace, now appear with features distorted with pain and torn with passion; they no longer smile upon us. The Hungarians descend upon us; and all music, whatever its nationality, is now the music of Hungary played in Hungarian fashion. Boston is fast becoming a Hungarian village; after Easter, if the weather is only favorable, the Csárdás will be danced upon the Common; and the Rákocscy march will be played by the bands St. Patrick's day. At Music Hall movements which we have known from childhood, rhythms and tempi with which we have summered and wintered, now appear as strangers; and they are disguised, as at a midnight masquerade.

"Behold, I make all things new," should be written upon the program books, on the title page, just above the name of Arthur Nikisch, conductor.

The people applauded the performance of the Schumann symphony; and expressions of delight were frequent and honest. It was played, to be sure, with great spirit; it was played with a sweep and a swing and a dash and a crash; fit music to accompany the stage direction, "alarum without." The temperature of the crowd rose steadily with the din; for the majority prefer noise and glaring effects to beauty and finish of detail. The performance of the Symphony was chiefly characterized by an absence of any piano effects. Take the first movement for instance. The passages in sixteenth notes given to the violas against the wood-wind which was marked by Schumann "p sempre" distracted, and indeed monopolized the attention; and the ever-occurring dynamic marks of the composer were ruthlessly disregarded. The second movement so beautiful in its proportions, so exquisite in its details;—but it is better not to speak of the performance, for piano and forte and song and accompaniment seemed merely convertible terms without any special meaning. And so with the other two movements. There was fire, there was an imperious, applause-provoking swing; there was also a strange lack of musical instinct on the part of the conductor; and the spirit of Schumann fled, aghast. But the crowd applauded, and so Mr. Nikisch was encouraged.

Saturday the monthly dose of Mendelssohn was administered, this time in the shape of the "Meeresstille" Overture. Mr. Nikisch paid a handsome tribute to the memory of Louis Maas by putting upon the program the pianoforte concerto of the late composer. It is a scholarly work, showing more skilful writing than spontaneity. The piano-part was admirably played by Mr. Carl Faelten, who entered thoroughly into the spirit of the work and played it with a reverential care well fitted to the occasion. The funeral March of Schubert, even with Liszt's instrumentation, is cheap and tedious.

Boston Journal.

MORNING EDITION.

MONDAY MORNING, MARCH 17, 1890.

The Symphony Concert.

Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony has been given an interpretation nearly every season of the Music Hall concerts, so that the beauty of this remarkable composition is known to the frequenters of the symphonies as well, perhaps, as any number that is put on the programme. An enthusiastic admirer of the piece and of Beethoven exclaimed, after the fine rendition of Saturday evening, "And the man who wrote this symphony was deaf!" It expressed at great deal, and we are always reminded when we hear this composition of the remark of an old and experienced instructor in music that "Beethoven was on the top of a mountain in his writings for instruments, but down in the valley in writings for the voice." At all events, we seldom see an audience follow a symphony more closely than during its performance. The orchestra evidently felt the sympathy of the audience in the work and its rendition, and Mr. Nikisch's interpretation has not been surpassed by any former performances of this symphony. Great applause greeted him after each movement, and it would be a difficult matter to say which of them was the most exquisitely rendered. The three closing movements, representing the gathering of the country people, the storm, followed by that beautiful passage indicating thanksgiving and rest after the tempest, were given without a break, thus adding to the effect and bringing the whole symphony into a harmonious and symmetrical whole. Great praise is due the orchestra and conductor for one of the grandest interpretations of any work given this season.

Sterndale Bennett's Overture, "The Naiads," was in harmony with the symphony. The gentle melody, the leading idea which is heard through the entire overture, and of which the audience never wearies, is exceedingly interesting, and was an appropriate opening number. A scherzo, by Otto Floersheim, the editor of the New York Musical Courier, was given for the first time in Boston, and it proved to be a bright and happy number, and it was capitally rendered.

The soloist was Mrs. Walter C. Wyman, contralto, who gave a reverie, "La Captive" by Berlioz, with orchestral accompaniment, and an aria from "Marie Magdelene," by Massenet. Mrs. Wyman sang last year at these concerts, but her appearances have not been frequent in this city. Both of these selections were given an artistic and sympathetic rendering—the reverie, especially, being well suited to her voice, and the accompaniment was finely scored and beautifully played. The aria served to show the remarkable range of her voice, and she received a very enthusiastic encore, which was fully deserved. There is no symphony this week. Otto Roth is to be the soloist at the next concert, giving a concerto by Vieuxtemps. The symphony is to be Dvorak's No. 1.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

STEINWAY HALL, NEW YORK.

Tuesday Evening, March 18, at 8.

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager Boston Symphony Orchestra.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, PHILADELPHIA.

Wednesday Evening, March 19, at 8.

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager Boston Symphony Orchestra.

BURDITT & NORTH, Managers of Philadelphia Concerts

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

SEASON 1889-90.

Leave Boston Monday, March 17, 1 P. M., Providence Depot.
Arrive in New Haven Monday, 6 P. M.
NEW HAVEN HOTEL.
Concert at Hyperion Theatre, 8 P. M.
Leave New Haven directly after concert. Sleeping cars at Depot.
Arrive in New York Tuesday, Mar. 18.
REHEARSAL at Steinway Hall, at 12 M,
GRAND CENTRAL HOTEL, 673 Broadway.
Concert at Steinway Hall, 8 P. M.
Leave New York Wednesday, Mar. 19, at 11 A. M., via Baltimore and Ohio Railroad. Ferry at Liberty Street.
Arrive Philadelphia, 1.45 P. M.
CONTINENTAL HOTEL.
Concert at Academy of Music, 8 P. M.
Leave Philadelphia Thursday, Mar. 20. at 11.10 A. M., Baltimore and Ohio Depot, 24th and Chestnut Streets.
Arrive Baltimore, 1.45 P. M.
CARROLLTON HOUSE.
Concert at Lyceum Theatre, 8 P. M.
Leave Baltimore Friday, Mar. 21, at 9.15 A. M., Camden Station, Camden and Eutaw Streets.
Arrive Washington, 10.15 A. M.
WILLARD'S HOTEL.
Concert at Lincoln Hall, 8 P. M.
Leave Washington directly after Concert.
Arrive New York Saturday, Mar. 22, at 7 A. M.
Leave New York, 10 A. M., Grand Central Depot.
Arrive Boston, 4.30 P. M., Providence Depot.

Instruments must be ready and marked to-night (Saturday), after the Concert.

Members of the Orchestra not playing in New Haven will leave for New York, Monday, Mar. 17, via Fall River Line. Train leaves Old Colony Depot at 6 P. M.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 16.

The Boston Symphony Concert.

Last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened with Sterndale Bennett's suave and beautiful overture, "The Naiads." Its grace, tenderness and refinement were finely brought out in the performance, the flowing passages for the violins being given with especial delicacy and clearness. The reading was admirably colored, and the performance was in every way gratifying. The Symphony was Beethoven's "The Pastoral," which received a clear, clean cut and interesting reading, that had in it nothing that conflicted greatly with the generally received view of the work. We think that the first movement was taken perhaps at a slightly too rapid pace for the production of the effect evidently intended, but of late it has been the custom so to read this movement. The tempo indicated is allegro ma non troppo, or, in other words, gay, but not too much so, but it was taken allegro, which imparted to it a certain "chipper" jauntiness that appears out of keeping The andante was charmingly played. In fact, the performance of the whole symphony left but little to desire. A novelty was a scherzo by Mr. Otto Floersheim of New York. It is a bright, cleverly written work, full of genial humor in its first part, which is now and then quite striking in its harmonies. It has two trios, both characterized by graceful melodiousness, though scarcely in the true Scherzo vein. The instrumentation is skillful throughout, and pleasing and interesting in effect. The score is not over-crowded, and the composer has shown an admirable appreciation of the characteristic timbres of the various instruments, both singly and in combination. It was listened to with attention and made a pleasant impression. The soloist was Mrs. Walter C. Wyman, who sang an aria from Massenet's "Marie Magdalene" and Berlioz's "La Captive." Mrs. Wyman's voice is well trained, smooth and pure in quality, and her tone production is excellent. She sings with skill and ease, but without warmth of style or variety of tone color, and in a manner almost phlegmatic as far as expression is concerned. A tendency toward the fault of excessive rising portamento should be corrected. Her best effect of the evening was made in the Massenet aria, which was interestingly sung. In the Berlioz song she was less successful, owing to the coldness of her style, which was unfavorable to the expression of the fervor and the tenderness demanded by the words and music. Mrs. Wyman was heartily applauded, and recalled twice after each effort. There will be no concert this week. The next programme is: "Tragic" overture, Brahms; Concerto for violin, A-minor, Vieuxtemps; Symphony No. 1 in D, Dvorak. Mr. Otto Roth will be the soloist.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, MARCH 16, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Director Arthur Nikisch gave the Symphony concert patrons a programme of rare merit last evening, and its performance was as commendable as its several selections. Mrs. Walter C. Wyman of Chicago, whose appearance at these concerts last season will be pleasantly recalled, was again the soloist, and chose as her selections an aria from Massenet's "Maria Magdelene" and the revery for contralto, "La Captive," by Berlioz. The singer was in excellent voice, and again gave great satisfaction. She displayed rare intelligence, good taste and much dramatic strength in the Berlioz "Reverie," and her singing in this charming selection was most heartily appreciated by the audience. The really remarkable range of her voice was shown in the Massenet aria, sung with piano accompaniment, and her interpretation of this vocal gem challenged criticism. The success of the singer was the cause of quite an ovation after each of her appearances, and she fully merited all the favor shown her. Mr. Otto Floersheim's scherzo for orchestra was the instrumental novelty of the evening, and added a most enjoyable number to the season's repertoire. The composer has caught the correct idea in the writing of such a movement, for it is a clever bit of bright musical humor, light, dainty and graceful, cleverly orchestrated and eminently suited to please the listener. If this was not made altogether distinct in the reading given by Mr. Nikisch, it could not be charged to the composer. Mr. Nikisch appeared to take a somewhat serious view of the work, and told the musical joke as though it was a solemn statement of fact. It was finely played from the standpoint of the conductor, and gained the applause of the audience. "The Naiads" overture made a bright opening number, and Mr. Nikisch gave a very commendable performance of the "Pastoral" symphony as a finale to this well contrasted and happily chosen programme. The orchestra makes another tour during the coming week, and resumes its home concerts on the 29th inst., when the programme will be: Brahm's "Tragic" overture; Vieuxtemps' concerto for violin, in A minor, and Dvorak's Symphony No. 1, in D, op. 60. Mr. Otto Roth will be the soloist.

NEW HAVEN, SUNDAY, MARCH 16

New Haven Union

The Symphony conceot to-morrow evening will be the last in the series given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Hyperion Theatre. This concert will be an exceptionally good one and no one who enjoys first-class music should fail to attend. The programme as arranged is exceptionally good, Joseffy's appearance as the soloist alone being an event worthy of patronage. The concert will be under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, who has gained such a strong hold on New Haven people.

[90]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

STEINWAY HALL, NEW YORK.

Tuesday Evening, March 18, at 8.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1889-90

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager Boston Symphony Orchestra.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, PHILADELPHIA.

Wednesday Evening, March 19, at 8.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1889-90

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager Boston Symphony Orchestra.

BURDITT & NORTH, Managers of Philadelphia Concerts

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

SEASON 1889-90.

Leave Boston Monday, March 17, 1 P. M., Providence Depot.
Arrive in New Haven Monday, 6 P. M.
NEW HAVEN HOTEL.
Concert at Hyperion Theatre, 8 P. M.
Leave New Haven directly after concert. Sleeping cars at Depot.
Arrive in New York Tuesday, Mar. 18.
REHEARSAL at Steinway Hall, at 12 M.
GRAND CENTRAL HOTEL, 673 Broadway.
Concert at Steinway Hall, 8 P. M.
Leave New York Wednesday, Mar. 19, at 11 A. M., via Baltimore and Ohio Railroad. Ferry at Liberty Street.
Arrive Philadelphia, 1.45 P. M.
CONTINENTAL HOTEL.
Concert at Academy of Music, 8 P. M.
Leave Philadelphia Thursday, Mar. 20, at 11.10 A. M., Baltimore and Ohio Depot, 24th and Chestnut Streets.
Arrive Baltimore, 1.45 P. M.
CARROLLTON HOUSE.
Concert at Lyceum Theatre, 8 P. M.
Leave Baltimore Friday, Mar. 21, at 9.15 A. M., Camden Station, Camden and Eutaw Streets.
Arrive Washington, 10.15 A. M.
WILLARD'S HOTEL.
Concert at Lincoln Hall, 8 P. M.
Leave Washington directly after Concert.
Arrive New York Saturday, Mar. 22, at 7 A. M.
Leave New York, 10 A. M., Grand Central Depot.
Arrive Boston, 4.30 P. M., Providence Depot.

Instruments must be ready and marked to-night (Saturday), after the Concert.

Members of the Orchestra not playing in New Haven will leave for New York, Monday, Mar. 17, via Fall River Line. Train leaves Old Colony Depot at 6 P. M.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 16.

The Boston Symphony Concert.

Last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened with Sterndale Bennett's suave and beautiful overture, "The Naiads." Its grace, tenderness and refinement were finely brought out in the performance, the flowing passages for the violins being given with especial delicacy and clearness. The reading was admirably colored, and the performance was in every way gratifying. The Symphony was Beethoven's "The Pastoral," which received a clear, clean cut and interesting reading, that had in it nothing that conflicted greatly with the generally received view of the work. We think that the first movement was taken perhaps at a slightly too rapid pace for the production of the effect evidently intended, but of late it has been the custom so to read this movement. The tempo indicated is allegro ma non troppo, or, in other words, gay, but not too much so, but it was taken allegro, which imparted to it a certain "chipper" jauntiness that appears out of keeping The andante was charmiugly played. In fact, the performance of the whole symphony left but little to desire. A novelty was a scherzo by Mr. Otto Floersheim of New York. It is a bright, cleverly written work, full of genial humor in its first part, which is now and then quite striking in its harmonies. It has two trios, both characterized by graceful melodiousness, though scarcely in the true Scherzo vein. The instrumentation is skilful throughout, and pleasing and interesting in effect. The score is not over-crowded, and the composer has shown an admirable appreciation of the characteristic timbres of the various instruments, both singly and in combination. It was listened to with attention and made a pleasant impression. The soloist was Mrs. Walter C. Wyman, who sang an aria from Massenet's "Marie Magdalene" and Berlioz's "La Captive." Mrs. Wyman's voice is well trained, smooth and pure in quality, and her tone production is excellent. She sings with skill and ease, but without warmth of style or variety of tone color, and in a manner almost phlegmatic as far as expression is concerned. A tendency toward the fault of excessive rising portamento should be corrected. Her best effect of the evening was made in the Massenet aria, which was interestingly sung. In the Berlioz song she was less successful, owing to the coldness of her style, which was unfavorable to the expression of the fervor and the tenderness demanded by the words and music. Mrs. Wyman was heartily applauded, and recalled twice after each effort. There will be no concert this week. The next programme is: "Tragic" overture, Brahms; Concerto for violin, A-minor, Vieuxtemps; Symphony No. 1 in D, Dvorak. Mr. Otto Roth will be the soloist.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, MARCH 16, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Director Arthur Nikisch gave the Symphony concert patrons a programme of rare merit last evening, and its performance was as commendable as its several selections. Mrs. Walter C. Wyman of Chicago, whose appearance at these concerts last season will be pleasantly recalled, was again the soloist, and chose as her selections an aria from Massenet's "Maria Magdelene" and the revery for contralto, "La Captive," by Berlioz. The singer was in excellent voice, and again gave great satisfaction. She displayed rare intelligence, good taste and much dramatic strength in the Berlioz "Reverie," and her singing in this charming selection was most heartily appreciated by the audience. The really remarkable range of her voice was shown in the Massenet aria, sung with piano accompaniment, and her interpretation of this vocal gem challenged criticism. The success of the singer was the cause of quite an ovation after each of her appearances, and she fully merited all the favor shown her. Mr. Otto Floersheim's scherzo for orchestra was the instrumental novelty of the evening, and added a most enjoyable number to the season's repertoire. The composer has caught the correct idea in the writing of such a movement, for it is a clever bit of bright musical humor, light, dainty and graceful, cleverly orchestrated and eminently suited to please the listener. If this was not made altogether distinct in the reading given by Mr. Nikisch, it could not be charged to the composer. Mr. Nikisch appeared to take a somewhat serious view of the work, and told the musical joke as though it was a solemn statement of fact. It was finely played from the standpoint of the conductor, and gained the applause of the audience. "The Naiads" overture made a bright opening number, and Mr. Nikisch gave a very commendable performance of the "Pastoral" symphony as a finale to this well contrasted and happily chosen programme. The orchestra makes another tour during the coming week, and resumes its home concerts on the 29th inst., when the programme will be: Brahm's "Tragic" overture; Vieuxtemps' concerto for violin, in A minor, and Dvorak's Symphony No. 1, in D, op. 60. Mr. Otto Roth will be the soloist.

NEW HAVEN, SUNDAY, MARCH 16.

New Haven Union

The Symphony concert to-morrow evening will be the last in the series given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Hyperion Theatre. This concert will be an exceptionally good one and no one who enjoys first-class music should fail to attend. The programme as arranged is exceptionally good, Joseffy's appearance as the soloist alone being an event worthy of patronage. The concert will be under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, who has gained such a strong hold on New Haven people.

[90]

[91]

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, MAR. 17, 1890.

The Symphony Concert Saturday Night—Mrs. Wyman as Soloist.

It was a light programme, all in all, one which did not demand very much of the auditor, and pleased the great public without offending the classical musician. Sterndale Bennett is not exactly a name to conjure with in this Wagnerian epoch, but the cool, refined style of "The Naiads" overture had something of the charm which in literature is found in vers. de Societé. The work was suave from beginning to end, and it was evident that Bennett, rather than Gade, deserved the title of "Mrs. Mendelssohn."

Mrs. Walter C. Wyman was the soloist, and sang two very thankless songs, proving her artistic powers by winning a double recall after each of them. Berlioz's "La Captive" is not very singable music, nor does the sensuous languor which pervades it appeal very strongly to the average auditor, but its tone coloring is a study and the charming use that is made of the flute, and the mysterious effects of the pianissimo strokes of cymbals and bass drum cannot but impress even the non-musician. It is not every singer who would choose such a number, in which whatever triumph is achieved must be shared with the orchestra, but it is pleasant to record that Mrs. Wyman sang not only with the most beautiful quality of tone, but with a purity of intonation in the difficult and strange modulations, and a steady surety of phrasing that proved her a good musician. The same high qualities were shown in the Massenet aria which came later in the programme, and which was given with piano accompaniment (Mr. Max Zach at the piano) which of course robbed the work of one of its chief charms—the orchestration. The scherzo by Mr. Otto Floersheim did not make as marked an impression as the "Elevation" played here a year ago, but it was shapely and short, and its trio had a languid beauty which contrasted well with the skipping style of its chief theme, and its brief coda was effective. The use of the oboe in the chief theme, and the pizzicati, gave an energetic style to the beginning which reminded of Berlioz, and the whole work seemed more in the French school than the other compositions of this talented New Yokrer. It was a musicianly and worthy number. Programme music has always a charm for the public beyond anything that the so-called "pure" music can offer, and in spite of Bach's concerto, "On the departure of a beloved brother," Rameau's "La Poule" (wherein the clucking of a hen was imitated on the spinet 170 years ago) and sundry other sporadic productions of realistic character, the Pastoral symphony remains the beginning of "programme-music," as it remains the greatest example of its school. Here the laity have something tangible the call of the cuckoo, the quail, the nightingale, are so real that there is no possibility of dilating with the wrong emotion. This musical poultry yard, the weakest thing in any of the nine symphonies, was as usual applauded to the echo; and if the passage did not deserve it, at least the performance did, for it was an intelligent, straightforward reading, without any attempt to sensationalize in any manner. Indeed the playing of the village band in the scherzo was too refined, and the oboe gave the bagpipe-like dance with misplaced sweetness. But the bassoon was as comical as necessary (the tipsy bassanist is one of the slyest jokes ever perpetrated in music) and the wonderful development of a single bar of the chief theme of the first movement was made as clear as could be wished. The storm was well performed, also, the especially deep phrases, below the compass of the four-stringed contrabass, making their due effect, the piping of the wind on the piccolo and the first rift in the clouds, represented on the flute, being noticeable features. There have been many storms in the musical repertoire; indeed, one can find the earliest specimen of this school in ancient Athens, where Dorian, on being asked to hear a representation of a storm at sea, upon the Kithara, said at its conclusion, "I have heard better tempests in a pot of boiling water!" but from Haydn's storm in "The Seasons" to St. Saens tornado in "The Deluge," from Bach's "Ye Lightnings, ye Thunders!" to the prelude to "Die Walküre," there is not a truer picture of nature in her wild moods than this one of that lover of nature—Beethoven. The fact that the composer neglected the English horn is well known (he used it but once in all his life, in the woodwind trio, op. 87, and even here it is not quite sure whether he had this instrument in mind), and therefore the clarinet takes the part of the shepherd's pipe, an instrument which Schumann ("Manfred"), Rossini ("William Tell" overture) and Wagner ("Tannhauser") have all represented by English horn, but the clarinet becomes prominent enough, and not only here, but in the difficult passages of the second movement, was admirably played. The French horn, too, was excellently handled, and in fact the horns are as good a department as any in our orchestra. The manifest improvement over the reading and performance of the symphony of the preceding concert gives cause for felicitation.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Post

MONDAY MORNING, MARCH 17, 1890.

TWENTIETH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Another most delightful concert, and this time of exactly the right length and with a carefully balanced programme:

Overture—"The Naiads" W. Sterndale Bennett
"La Captive"—Reverie for contralto and orchestra ..... Berlioz
Scherzo ..... Otto Floersheim
First time.
Aria from "Marie Magdelene" ..... Massenet
Pastoral Symphony No. 6 ..... Beethoven

"The Naiads" is one of the most classical productions of the English school of composition, and one which is certain to remain in the repertory of symphony concert institutions another generation at least. If the influence of Mendelssohn is very strongly felt at times, this is excusable and not objectionable, and compared with much of the more modern English music the work is a masterpiece. The playing of the violins throughout was exquisite, and the whole work was played with the greatest daintiness, delicacy and grace. It was a remarkably perfect reading. Mrs. Walter C. Wyman was the soloist, and she more than fulfilled all the enthusiastic things which have been said about her singing. The voice itself is unusually beautiful; full, warm and rich and with a remarkable compass, add to this lovely voice a most thorough and finished vocal training in the best French school and you have the material with which this artist is equipped. But it too often happens that singers with beautiful, well-trained voices are not musically intelligent, and here again Mrs. Wyman is possessed of great advantages, for she is an artist to her finger tips, and it seems second nature to her thoroughly to understand the works of the French school of composition. A singer who would rather sing for art's sake than merely to make an effect is a decided rara avis in our day, but Mrs. Wyman, in giving the Boston audience an opportunity again to hear Berlioz's little masterpiece, "La Captive," gave proof that she does not seek the ephemeral applause which follows a high note or a brilliant scale, but rather the solid artistic appreciation which is sure to be accorded to the beautiful rendering of a beautiful work. She sang the reverie in a most delightful fashion and was warmly applauded. But she was heard to even greater advantage in the Massenet aria, which was sung in an almost perfect fashion. A sweet melody, a rich voice and an artistic understanding of the work in hand—what more could the most hypercritical listener desire? The very warm applause with which Mrs. Wyman was greeted at the close was surely an assurance to her that the Boston public will be very glad to see her back again in the festival week of the Händel and Haydn society.

Mr. Floersheim's scherzo is quite a charming little work, and its instrumentation is very clever and effective. He shows a keen appreciation for the various delicate and dainty orchestral effects, and his work is essentially melodic. The first trio seems rather more in the nature of a waltz than one would expect in a symphonic scherzo, but the second trio is eminently appropriate. It is to be hoped that we may have an opportunity of judging Mr. Floersheim's qualifications as a composer in some longer sustained effort. The reading of the pastoral symphony adds another leaf to Mr. Nikisch's Beethoven laurel wreath. It was simply beautiful. Especially the scherzo (the oboe passages splendidly played by Mr. Sautet) and the grand storm scene were magnificently rendered, and the peaceful close was as flowing and graceful as possible. Those atrabilious objectors who assume beforehand that everything Mr. Nikisch does will be wrong were doubtless disgusted, but the public was simply delighted. There will be no concert next week, and on the following Saturday, March 29, the following programme will be played: Brahms's "Tragic Overture," Vieuxtemps' violin concerto, A minor (Mr. Otto Roth) and the Dvorak Symphony in D, No. 1.

ARTHUR WELD.

Boston Sunday Globe.

TWENTY-FOUR PAGES.

SUNDAY, MARCH 16, 1890.

A DELIGHTFUL OFFERING.

The Symphony Programme Yesterday, with Mrs. W. C. Wyman as Soloist.

Beethoven's beautiful "Pastoral" symphony has often been heard in Boston. But as respects delicacy, smoothness and completeness of effect the interpretation given yesterday by the Boston Symphony orchestra, under Mr. Nikisch's direction, must rank as pre-eminent. If ever there were programme music, this master-work must deserve that characterization. All the colors of the tone-picture are presented with the skill of a true artist. Disregarding the conventional pauses the leader gives the third, fourth and closing movements without a break. The allegro was a delight, and the closing measures could not have better expressed the great composer's mind and thought.

Mrs. Walter C. Wyman, whose singing is as rich and expressive as ever, gave Berlioz' "Captive" revery with much sympathy and skill. She was scarcely less fortunate with the air from Massenet's "Mary Magdalen." After both numbers the contralto was recalled very cordially.

Sterndale Bennett's overture, "The Naiads," charmingly given, opened the programme. A very pleasant impression was made by the novelty of the concert—a scherzo by Otto Floersheim, the musician and critic of New York. It is symphonic in style and treatment, and a work that will please scholastic and amateur alike.

There is to be no concert this week. The return of the orchestra on the 28th inst. will present the musicians in a programme of these selections: Brahm's "Tragic" overture, Vieuxtemp's concerto for violin in A minor (Otto Roth being the soloist), and Dvorak's first symphony.

Boston Evening Transcript.

MONDAY, MARCH 17, 1890.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The programme of the twentieth symphony concert was as follows;

Bennett: Overture, "The Naiads."
Berlioz: "La Captive," revery for contralto and orchestra.
Floersheim: Scherzo.
Massenet: Air from "Marie Magdeleine."
Beethoven: Symphony No. 6, in F (Pastoral).

Mrs Walter C. Wyman was the singer.

It is a good while since Bennett's "Naiads" has been played here; at the old Harvard Musical symphony concerts it used to be a regular repertory piece, but since their cessation it has hardly been heard at all. Its melodic beauty, the perfection of its form, and its delightful orchestration make it always welcome, and especially so nowadays, when melodic beauty and perfection of form are not so common as they were once. It is one of the few things written by a follower of Mendelssohn that smack neither of servile imitation nor of Kapellmeistermusik; the working out shows not merely ability, knowledge and skill, but talent of a high order. It was ex-exquisitely played, with admirable delicacy and finish.

Mr. Floersheim's scherzo is a pleasing little work, showing great skill in handling the orchestra, and no little ingenuity in the development. One feels throughout that the composer had to keep himself rather in hand not to fall into the Strauss waltz vein—in one of the trios, indeed, he gives you something very like a reminiscence of the "Wahlstimmen"; but although the waltz seems always just round the corner, as it were, you never quite get into it.

The Pastoral symphony was superbly played, in accordance with sound traditions throughout, with fine finish and complete effectiveness. The last movement, in particular, went with uncommon clearness.

Mrs. Wyman sang Berlioz's lovely "La Captive" excellently; in the first two verses, perhaps, with less effectiveness than she sings some other things, but in the last verse with great beauty and depth of sentiment. And what a wonderful effect that coming in of the second orchestra is in this verse! Berlioz had some secrets that he imparted to no one; although the whole present French school owes its whole treatment of the orchestra mainly to him, no one has yet been able quite to reproduce his orchestration. One regretted that tqe non-arrival of the orchestral parts necessitated Mrs. Wyman's singing the Massenet air with pianoforte accompaniment; it were hard to imagine an air that more needed the orchestra. It has the merit of most of Massenet's vocal writing in that it enables the singer to make a strong emotional impression; and, although the melody somewhat lacks definiteness of form, it is by no means devoid of beauty of a certain sort. Mrs. Wyman sang it superbly, in the largest, noblest style. Never has the beauty of her voice, or the perfection of her singing been more conspicuous. And she had a triumph of the sort that all true artists like best; a double and treble recall after two songs in no wise calculated to tickle the popular ear.

The next programme is: Brahms, tragic overture; Vieuxtemps, violin concerto in A minor; Dvorák, symphony No. 1, in D. Mr. Otto Roth will be the violinist.

THE RICHMOND DISPATCH.

SUNDAY.....MARCH 9, 1890.

A GREAT MUSICAL TREAT

In Store for Richmond Music Lovers.

In May next what they term a Musical Festival will be given under the auspices of the Mozart Association. Of the chorus for the occasion we know nothing of our own knowledge, but the feature, and the one sufficient of itself to make the festival a decided success, is the engagement of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This great band, with its seventy-five or eighty performers under the direction of the famous conductor, Arthur Nikisch, is by long odds (Thomas not excepted) the finest in this country, and is said by competent critics to be equal to any in Europe. The Orchestra has been kept up and brought to its present perfection through the backing and the munificent purse of Mr. Higginson, a musical enthusiast of Boston. It was organized about eight or nine years ago, and in that time no expense has been spared and Mr. Higginson has guaranteed all losses. Noted directors from the capitals of Europe have been secured at large salaries and they have been allowed the pick of the world's musicians.....

The orchestra has never played further South than Baltimore and Washington. It has already given three concerts in each of these cities during the winter just past and the fourth of the series will be rendered during the coming week. The programme to be played in Baltimore on the 20th instant is:

Symphony in G.....Haydn
Bell Song, from Lakme.....Delibes
Mlle. De Vere.
Unfinished Symphony.....Schubert
Peaks of Brazil.....
Miss De Vere.
Huldigung's March.....Wagner

The Mozart Association have acted wisely in securing this great musical organization. It will do more to elevate the musical taste of the members than years of the average concerts given. A rich musical treat is in store for Richmond.

Boston Courier.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The ever beautiful Pastoral symphony of Beethoven (No. 6) is very familiar in Boston, but it is safe to add that it was never given with greater freshness, sweetness and beauty than last evening, when it came last on the programme of the Symphony concert. The serenity and delicacy of the second movement, the gayety of the third, the strength of the passages known as "the storm," and the dignity of the closing allegretto, were alike rendered with a masterly skill aud precision hardly to be over praised. There is no characteristic of Beethoven's music more marked than its sanity, and it is in precisely this particular that the performance last night was most heartily to be commended as among memorable interpretations. The programme began with W. Sterndale Bennett's overture, "The Naids," which is fresh and pleasing, and which has not been heard here often enough to have lost its novelty. The only other orchestral selection besides the symphony was a scherzo for orchestra, by Otto Floersheim. It is in C minor, and while well defined and not without melodic beauty, seems fragmentary and detached when thus heard, as if it were a fragment of a symphony of which the rest is needed to make clear its relevance and full significance. It was well received, and shows both thought and, in a moderate degree, originality. It is well and skillfully scored. The soloist of the evening was Mrs. Walter C. Wyman, of Chicago, who sang a reverie from "La Captive," by Berlioz, and an aria from Massenet's "Maria Magdeline," in both of which she elicited very warm applause. Mrs. Wyman's voice is rich and pleasing in quality, and is managed with admirable skill. Her limitation is a lack of dramatic force, which renders her singing somewhat colorless and monotonous. This was especially noticeable in the Berlioz aria, which needed a fire and a passionate longing which was beyond her reach. The rich orchestral accompaniment made her singing the more colorless by contrast, but her admirable vocalization carried her through successfully, at least if the expression of delight on the part of the audience is to be taken as a criterion.

Boston Daily Traveller.

MONDAY, MARCH 17, 1890.

Twentieth Symphony Concert, Mrs. W. C. Wyman, Soloist.

The programme of the twentieth Symphony concert was:

W. Sterndale Bennett.....Overture, "The Naiads"
Berlioz.....Revery for Contralto, "La Captive"
Otto Floersheim.....Scherzo for Orchestra
(First time in Boston.)
Massenet.....Aria, from "Marie Magdelene"
Beethoven.....Symphony No. 6 (Pastoral)

Mrs. W. C. Wyman was the soloist. Bennett's suave music is well worth an occasional hearing; his Naiads, however, possess too few tunes, they sport according to rule, but are more precise than seductive. Mr. Floersheim's Scherzo is a clever piece, remindful of Schumann, not alone in form (it has two trios), but in harmonization. The scherzo theme itself is piquant, but after a single hearing we are inclined to think the effect of the final bars might be made clearer by a change in instrumentation. Mr. Nikisch read the "Pastoral" Symphony most interestingly, albeit the first movement was too slow. The lovely adagio was a perfect mirror of nature: we do not remember hearing so vividly before in the orchestra that undertone which may represent the hum of insects or the murmur of trees, above which float the voices of the wood songsters, The Storm was indeed a "cataclysm." How true to nature is Berlioz in his picture of the scherzo, of which he says:

In the allegro the poet carries us into the midst of a happy gathering of peasants. They dance and laugh, at first with moderation; the bagpipes play a gay air, accompanied by a bassoon which can play but two notes. Beethoven doubtless intended to characterize a good old German peasant mounted on a cask, with a dilapidated old instrument, from which he can only draw two notes in the key of F, the dominant and the tonic. Every time that the oboe strikes up the bagpipe song, fresh and gay as a young girl in her Sunday clothes, the old bassoon comes in, puffing his two notes; when the melodic phrase modulates, the bassoon shuts up, counts tranquilly his rests until the original key permits him to come in with his imperturbable f-c-f.

There was much excellent playing on the part of individual performers and groups of instruments.

Mrs. Wyman, whose singing was only recently commended by us, chose two characteristic pieces from French masters. Berlioz's "La Captive," an exquisite musical fancy, is the sort of thing that only a real musician would select for concert performance, as it is wholly subjective in character. The excerpts from Massenet's sacred drama of "Marie Magdelena" was sung with the accompaniment of pianoforte, owing to the non-arrival of the orchestral parts. Although, by this mishap, shorn of much of its individuality, the selection proved very interesting, leading one to pleasantly anticipate the coming production by the Cecelia of that composer's "Eve," a work drawn on similar lines to his "Mary Magdelene." Mrs. Wyman's voice has great compass, and she vocalizes well; she lacks passion, a quality needed in the Berlioz song. After each selection the singer was twice recalled. There will be no concert this week. The next programme will present Brahms's Tragic overture, Dvorák's D major symphony and the A minor violin concerto by Vieuxtemps. Mr. Otto Roth will be the soloist.

[91]

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, MAR. 17, 1890.

The Symphony Concert Saturday Night—Mrs. Wyman as Soloist.

It was a light programme, all in all, one which did not demand very much of the auditor, and pleased the great public without offending the classical musician. Sterndale Bennett is not exactly a name to conjure with in this Wagnerian epoch, but the cool, refined style of "The Naiads" overture had something of the charm which in literature is found in vers de Societé. The work was suave from beginning to end, and it was evident that Bennett, rather than Gade, deserved the title of "Mrs. Mendelssohn."

Mrs. Walter C. Wyman was the soloist, and sang two very thankless songs, proving her artistic powers by winning a double recall after each of them. Berlioz's "La Captive" is not very singable music, nor does the sensuous languor which pervades it appeal very strongly to the average auditor, but its tone coloring is a study and the charming use that is made of the flute, and the mysterious effects of the pianissimo strokes of cymbals and bass drum cannot but impress even the non-musician. It is not every singer who would choose such a number, in which whatever triumph is achieved must be shared with the orchestra, but it is pleasant to record that Mrs. Wyman sang not only with the most beautiful quality of tone, but with a purity of intonation in the difficult and strange modulations, and a steady surety of phrasing that proved her a good musician. The same high qualities were shown in the Massenet aria which came later in the programme, and which was given with piano accompaniment (Mr. Max Zach at the piano) which of course robbed the work of one of its chief charms—the orchestration. The scherzo by Mr. Otto Floersheim did not make as marked an impression as the "Elevation" played here a year ago, but it was shapely and short, and its trio had a languid beauty which contrasted well with the skipping style of its chief theme, and its brief coda was effective. The use of the oboe in the chief theme, and the pizzicati, gave an energetic style to the beginning which reminded of Berlioz, and the whole work seemed more in the French school than the other compositions of this talented New Yokrer. It was a musicianly and worthy number. Programme music has always a charm for the public beyond anything that the so-called "pure" music can offer, and in spite of Bach's concerto, "On the departure of a beloved brother," Rameau's "La Poule" (wherein the clucking of a hen was imitated on the spinet 170 years ago) and sundry other sporadic productions of realistic character, the Pastoral symphony remains the beginning of "programme-music," as it remains the greatest example of its school. Here the laity have something tangible the call of the cuckoo, the quail, the nightingale, are so real that there is no possibility of dilating with the wrong emotion. This musical poultry yard, the weakest thing in any of the nine symphonies, was as usual applauded to the echo; and if the passage did not deserve it, at least the performance did, for it was an intelligent, straightforward reading, without any attempt to sensationalize in any manner. Indeed the playing of the village band in the scherzo was too refined, and the oboe gave the bagpipe-like dance with misplaced sweetness. But the bassoon was as comical as necessary (the tipsy bassanist is one of the slyest jokes ever perpetrated in music) and the wonderful development of a single bar of the chief theme of the first movement was made as clear as could be wished. The storm was well performed, also, the especially deep phrases, below the compass of the four-stringed contrabass, making their due effect, the piping of the wind on the piccolo and the first rift in the clouds, represented on the flute, being noticeable features. There have been many storms in the musical repertoire; indeed, one can find the earliest specimen of this school in ancient Athens, where Dorian, on being asked to hear a representation of a storm at sea, upon the Kithara, said at its conclusion, "I have heard better tempests in a pot of boiling water!" but from Haydn's storm in "The Seasons" to St. Saens tornado in "The Deluge," from Bach's "Ye Lightnings, ye Thunders!" to the prelude to "Die Walküre," there is not a truer picture of nature in her wild moods than this one of that lover of nature—Beethoven. The fact that the composer neglected the English horn is well known (he used it but once in all his life, in the woodwind trio, op. 87, and even here it is not quite sure whether he had this instrument in mind), and therefore the clarinet takes the part of the shepherd's pipe, an instrument which Schumann ("Manfred"), Rossini ("William Tell" overture) and Wagner ("Tannhauser") have all represented by English horn, but the clarinet becomes prominent enough, and not only here, but in the difficult passages of the second movement, was admirably played. The French horn, too, was excellently handled, and in fact the horns are as good a department as any in our orchestra. The manifest improvement over the reading and performance of the symphony of the preceding concert gives cause for felicitation.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Post

MONDAY MORNING, MARCH 17, 1890.

TWENTIETH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Another most delightful concert, and this time of exactly the right length and with a carefully balanced programme:

Overture—"The Naiads" W. Sterndale Bennett
"La Captive"—Reverie for contralto and orchestra.....Berlioz
Scherzo.....Otto Floersheim
First time.
Aria from "Marie Magdelene".....Massenet
Pastoral Symphony No. 6.....Beethoven

"The Naiads" is one of the most classical productions of the English school of composition, and one which is certain to remain in the repertory of symphony concert institutions another generation at least. If the influence of Mendelssohn is very strongly felt at times, this is excusable and not objectionable, and compared with much of the more modern English music the work is a masterpiece. The playing of the violins throughout was exquisite, and the whole work was played with the greatest daintiness, delicacy and grace. It was a remarkably perfect reading. Mrs. Walter C. Wyman was the soloist, and she more than fulfilled all the enthusiastic things which have been said about her singing. The voice itself is unusually beautiful; full, warm and rich and with a remarkable compass, add to this lovely voice a most thorough and finished vocal training in the best French school and you have the material with which this artist is equipped. But it too often happens that singers with beautiful, well-trained voices are not musically intelligent, and here again Mrs. Wyman is possessed of great advantages, for she is an artist to her finger tips, and it seems second nature to her thoroughly to understand the works of the French school of composition. A singer who would rather sing for art's sake, than merely to make an effect is a decided rara avis in our day, but Mrs. Wyman, in giving the Boston audience an opportunity again to hear Berlioz's little masterpiece, "La Captive," gave proof that she does not seek the ephemeral applause which follows a high note or a brilliant scale, but rather the solid artistic appreciation which is sure to be accorded to the beautiful rendering of a beautiful work. She sang the reverie in a most delightful fashion and was warmly applauded. But she was heard to even greater advantage in the Massenet aria, which was sung in an almost perfect fashion. A sweet melody, a rich voice and an artistic understanding of the work in hand—what more could the most hypercritical listener desire? The very warm applause with which Mrs. Wyman was greeted at the close was surely an assurance to her that the Boston public will be very glad to see her back again in the festival week of the Händel and Haydn society.

Mr. Floersheim's scherzo is quite a charming little work, and its instrumentation is very clever and effective. He shows a keen appreciation for the various delicate and dainty orchestral effects, and his work is essentially melodic. The first trio seems rather more in the nature of a waltz than one would expect in a symphonic scherzo, but the second trio is eminently appropriate. It is to be hoped that we may have an opportunity of judging Mr. Floersheim's qualifications as a composer in some longer sustained effort. The reading of the pastoral symphony adds another leaf to Mr. Nikisch's Beethoven laurel wreath. It was simply beautiful. Especially the scherzo (the oboe passages splendidly played by Mr. Santet) and the grand storm scene were magnificently rendered; and the peaceful close was as flowing and graceful as possible. Those atrabilious objectors who assume beforehand that everything Mr. Nikisch does will be wrong were doubtless disgusted, but the public was simply delighted. There will be no concert next week, and on the following Saturday, March 29, the following programme will be played: Brahms's "Tragic Overture," Vieuxtemps' violin concerto, A minor (Mr. Otto Roth) and the Dvorak Symphony in D, No. 1.

ARTHUR WELD.

Boston Sunday Globe.

TWENTY-FOUR PAGES.

SUNDAY, MARCH 16, 1890.

A DELIGHTFUL OFFERING.

The Symphony Programme Yesterday, with Mrs. W. C. Wyman as Soloist.

Beethoven's beautiful "Pastoral" symphony has often been heard in Boston. But as respects delicacy, smoothness and completeness of effect the interpretation given yesterday by the Boston Symphony orchestra, under Mr. Nikisch's direction, must rank as pre-eminent. If ever there were programme music, this master-work must deserve that characterization. All the colors of the tone-picture are presented with the skill of a true artist. Disregarding the conventional pauses the leader gives the third, fourth and closing movements without a break. The allegro was a delight, and the closing measures could not have better expressed the great composer's mind and thought.

Mrs. Walter C. Wyman, whose singing is as rich and expressive as ever, gave Berlioz' "Captive" revery with much sympathy and skill. She was scarcely less fortunate with the air from Massenet's "Mary Magdalen." After both numbers the contralto was recalled very cordially.

Sterndale Bennett's overture, "The Naiads," charmingly given, opened the programme. A very pleastant impression was made by the novelty of the concert—a scherzo by Otto Floersheim, the musician and critic of New York. It is symphonic in style and treatment, and a work that will please scholastic and amateur alike.

There is to be no concert this week. The return of the orchestra on the 28th inst. will present the musicians in a programme of these selections: Brahm's "Tragic" overture, Vieuxtemp's concerto for violin in A minor (Otto Roth being the soloist), and Dvorak's first symphony.

Boston Evening Transcript.

MONDAY, MARCH 17, 1890.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The programme of the twentieth symphony concert was as follows;

Bennett: Overture. "The Naiads."
Berlioz: "La Captive," revery for contralto and orchestra.
Floersheim: Scherzo.
Massenet: Air from "Marie Magdeleine."
Beethoven: Symphony No. 6, in F (Pastoral).

Mrs Walter C. Wyman was the singer.

It is a good while since Bennett's "Naiads" has been played here; at the old Harvard Musical symphony concerts it used to be a regular repertory piece, but since their cessation it has hardly been heard at all. Its melodic beauty, the perfection of its form, and its delightful orchestration make it always welcome, and especially so nowadays, when melodic beauty and perfection of form are not so common as they were once. It is one of the few things written by a follower of Mendelssohn that smack neither of servile imitation nor of Kapellmeistermusik; the working out shows not merely ability, knowledge and skill, but talent of a high order. It was ex-exquisitely played, with admirable delicacy and finish.

Mr. Floersheim's scherzo is a pleasing little work, showing great skill in handling the orchestra, and no little ingenuity in the development. One feels throughout that the composer had to keep himself rather in hand not to fall into the Strauss waltz vein—in one of the trios, indeed, he gives you something very like a reminiscence of the "Wahlstimmen"; but although the waltz seems always just round the corner, as it were, you never quite get into it.

The Pastoral symphony was superbly played, in accordance with sound traditions throughout, with fine finish and complete effectiveness. The last movement, in particular, went with uncommon clearness.

Mrs. Wyman sang Berlioz's lovely "La Captive" excellently; in the first two verses, perhaps, with less effectiveness than she sings some other things, but in the last verse with great beauty and depth of sentiment. And what a wonderful effect that coming in of the second orchestra is in this verse! Berlioz had some secrets that he imparted to no one; although the whole present French school owes its whole treatment of the orchestra mainly to him, no one has yet been able quite to reproduce his orchestration. One regretted that the non-arrival of the orchestral parts necessitated Mrs. Wyman's singing the Massenet air with pianoforte accompaniment; it were hard to imagine an air that more needed the orchestra. It has the merit of most of Massenet's vocal writing in that it enables the singer to make a strong emotional impression; and, although the melody somewhat lacks definiteness of form, it is by no means devoid of beauty of a certain sort. Mrs. Wyman sang it superbly, in the largest, noblest style. Never has the beauty of her voice, or the perfection of her singing been more conspicuous. And she had a triumph of the sort that all true artists like best: a double and treble recall after two songs in no wise calculated to tickle the popular ear.

The next programme is: Brahms, tragic overture; Vieuxtemps, violin concerto in A minor; Dvorák, symphony No. 1, in D. Mr. Otto Roth will be the violinist.

THE RICHMOND DISPATCH.

SUNDAY.....MARCH 9, 1890.

A GREAT MUSICAL TREAT

In Store for Richmond Music Lovers.

In May next what they term a Musical Festival will be given under the auspices of the Mozart Association. Of the chorus for the occasion we know nothing of our own knowledge, but the feature, and the one sufficient of itself to make the festival a decided success, is the engagement of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This great band, with its seventy-five or eighty performers under the direction of the famous conductor, Arthur Nikisch, is by long odds (Thomas not excepted) the finest in this country, and is said by competent critics to be equal to any in Europe. The Orchestra has been kept up and brought to its present perfection through the backing and the munificent purse of Mr. Higginson, a musical enthusiast of Boston. It was organized about eight or nine years ago, and in that time no expense has been spared and Mr. Higginson has guaranteed all losses. Noted directors from the capitals of Europe have been secured at large salaries and they have been allowed the pick of the world's musicians

The orchestra has never played further South than Baltimore and Washington. It has already given three concerts in each of these cities during the winter just past and the fourth of the series will be rendered during the coming week. The programme to be played in Baltimore on the 20th instant is:

Symphony in G.....Haydn
Bell Song, from Lakme.....Delibes
Mlle. De Vere.
Unfinished Symphony.....Schubert
Peaks of Brazil.....
Miss De Vere.
Huldsgung's March.....Wagner

The Mozart Association have acted wisely in securing this great musical organization. It will do more to elevate the musical taste of the members than years of the average concerts given. A rich musical treat is in store for Richmond.

Boston Courier.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The ever beautiful Pastoral symphony of Beethoven (No. 6) is very familiar in Boston, but it is safe to add that it was never given with greater freshness, sweetness and beauty than last evening, when it came last on the programme of the Symphony concert. The serenity and delicacy of the second movement, the gayety of the third, the strength of the passages known as "the storm," and the dignity of the closing allegretto, were alike rendered with a masterly skill aud precision hardly to be over praised. There is no characteristic of Beethoven's music more marked than its sanity, and it is in precisely this particular that the performance last night was most heartily to be commended as among memorable interpretations. The programme began with W. Sterndale Bennett's overture, "The Naids," which is fresh and pleasing, and which has not been heard here often enough to have lost its novelty. The only other orchestral selection besides the symphony was a scherzo for orchestra, by Otto Floersheim. It is in C minor, and while well defined and not without melodic beauty, seems fragmentary and detached when thus heard, as if it were a fragment of a symphony of which the rest is needed to make clear its relevance and full significance. It was well received, and shows both thought and, in a moderate degree, originality. It is well and skillfully scored. The soloist of the evening was Mrs. Walter C. Wyman, of Chicago, who sang a reverie from "La Captive," by Berlioz, and an aria from Massenet's "Maria Magdeline," in both of which she elicited very warm applause. Mrs. Wyman's voice is rich and pleasing in quality, and is managed with admirable skill. Her limitation is a lack of dramatic force, which renders her singing somewhat colorless and monotonous. This was especially noticeable in the Berlioz aria, which needed a fire and a passionate longing which was beyond her reach. The rich orchestral accompaniment made her singing the more colorless by contrast, but her admirable vocalization carried her through successfully, at least if the expression of delight on the part of the audience is to be taken as a criterion.

Boston Daily Traveller.

MONDAY, MARCH 17, 1890.

Twentieth Symphony Concert, Mrs. W. C. Wyman, Soloist.

The programme of the twentieth Symphony concert was:

W. Sterndale Bennett.....Overture, "The Naiads"
Berlioz.....Revery for Contralto, "La Captive"
Otto Floersheim.....Scherzo for Orchestra
(First time in Boston.)
Massenet.....Aria, from "Marie Magdelene"
Beethoven.....Symphony No. 6 (Pastoral)

Mrs. W. C. Wyman was the soloist. Bennett's suave music is well worth an occasional hearing; his Naiads, however, possess too few tunes, they sport according to rule, but are more precise than seductive. Mr. Floersheim's Scherzo is a clever piece, reminded of Schumann, not alone in form (it has two trios), but in harmonization. The scherzo theme itself is piquant, but after a single hearing we are inclined to think the effect of the final bars might be made clearer by a change in instrumentation. Mr. Nikisch read the "Pastoral" Symphony most interestingly, albeit the first movement was too slow. The lovely adagio was a perfect mirror of nature: we do not remember hearing so vividly before in the orchestra that undertone which may represent the hum of insects or the murmur of trees, above which float the voices of the wood songsters, The Storm was indeed a "cataclysm." How true to nature is Berlioz in his picture of the scherzo, of which he says:

In the allegro the poet carries us into the midst of a happy gathering of peasants. They dance and laugh, at first with moderation; the bagpipes play a gay air, accompanied by a bassoon which can play but two notes. Beethoven doubtless intended to characterize a good old German peasant mounted on a cask, with a dilapidated old instrument, from which he can only draw two notes in the key of F, the dominant and the tonic. Every time that the oboe strikes up the bagpipe song, fresh and gay as a young girl in her Sunday clothes, the old bassoon comes in, puffing his two notes; when the melodic phrase modulates, the bassoon shuts up, counts tranquilly his rests until the original key permits him to come in with his imperturbable f-c-f.

There was much excellent playing on the part of individual performers and groups of instruments.

Mrs. Wyman, whose singing was only recently commended by us, chose two characteristic pieces from French masters. Berlioz's "La Captive," an exquisite musical fancy, is the sort of thing that only a real musician would select for concert performance, as it is wholly subjective in character. The excerpts from Massenet's sacred drama of "Marie Magdelena" was sung with the accompaniment of pianoforte, owing to the non-arrival of the orchestral parts. Although, by this mishap, shorn of much of its individuality, the selection proved very interesting, leading one to pleasantly anticipate the coming production by the Cecelia of that composer's "Eve," a work drawn on similar lines to his "Mary Magdelene." Mrs. Wyman's voice has great compass, and she vocalizes well; she lacks passion, a quality needed in the Berlioz song. After each selection the singer was twice recalled. There will be no concert this week. The next programme will present Brahms's Tragic overture, Dvorák's D major symphony and the A minor violin concerto by Vieuxtemps. Mr. Otto Roth will be the soloist.

[92]

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 19, 1890.

Boston Letter.

BOSTON is more musical than any other city in the United States, New York not excluded. This assertion has been made so frequently that it sounds stale, and yet we, with our metropolitan local patriotism, would feign deny it, until by an occasional visit to the Hub we are forcibly reminded again of its truth. It is not in the number of its concerts, nor in the quality of them that New York is musically inferior to Boston; it is in the quality of the audiences, their unflagging interest in everything musical and their true and unaffected enthusiasm that the latter city shows its musical superiority. Take a concert like last Saturday's twentieth Symphony Concert and its preceding public rehearsal. It rained all Friday and it snowed all Saturday. In New York on such unpropitious occasions all concert attendance, even that at our six Philharmonic concerts, decreases in number most materially and the atmosphere puts a damper on all musical enthusiasm in listeners and performers alike. Not so in Boston. Music Hall last Friday afternoon was crowded to overflowing and the ladies had to sit even on the steps of the orchestral platform, a fact which I deem detrimental to the sonority of the orchestra in a hall of not naturally very good acoustic properties.

The same state of affairs prevailed on Saturday night, when there was not a vacant seat in the house, and all listened with closest attention and were not afraid to bestow intelligent applause on conductor, soloist and performers. It must be a pleasure to play for such weekly audiences, and the orchestra showed this fact in the unflagging zeal, minute care and yet freedom and sweep with which they played each number on the program and which they sustain all the season round. No better strings, no better wood wind, in fact no better orchestra could be gathered together or is in existence to-day than the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and they are united in an artistic and friendly ensemble which finds its culmination in the admiration, nay, love they bear their conductor, Arthur Nikisch.

While it is an all too frequent happening in many orchestras in New York that the musicians mentally and even openly rebel against their conductor, for whom they possess a feeling akin to hostility and quite often of utter disdain, and while frictions caused by professional jealousy are of but too numerous occurrence here and in other cities, the Boston Symphony Orchestra vie with each other in their devotion to their conductor and in their obedience and fulfillment of even his slightest wishes and indications, and at the same time they are as fraternal, amicable and free from jealousy among each other as the members of no other orchestra in the world. The result is a perfect ensemble and performances superior to which no other city can boast of.

They played last Friday and Saturday W. Sterndale Bennett's refined and ultra Mendelssohnian, "The Naïads" overture, with a finish impossible to excel; they performed the writer's rather difficult "Scherzo" in a manner that made the composer's heart laugh, and they, obedient to Nikisch's original intentions, gave a reading of Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony that made the "grand old man's" somewhat threadbare and hackneyed work gain renewed interest. Especially was this the case with the soporific slow movement, in which the slightly accelerated tempo and the subduing of the nauseatingly reiterated twelve-eighth accompanying figure created a favorable change from the accepted version, while "The Storm" was played with so much forcefulness and dramatic verve that it lost considerable of the "tempest in a teapot" quality it naturally possesses and habitually assumes under other conductors.

The soloist at this concert was Mrs. Walter C. Wyman, of Chicago, a contralto of excellent vocal material and musical attainments, subdued, however, by a lack of artistic fire and the inability of vocal coloring and dramatic feeling and expression. She sang Berlioz's "La Captive" and an aria from Massenet's "Mary Magdalen," both in excellently pronounced French, and the latter musicianly accompanied at the piano by Mr. Zach, as the orchestral parts did not arrive in time for the performance.

The lady was well received and enthusiastically applauded, as, in fact, were all the numbers of the program,

---

The Times

PHILADELPHIA, MARCH 20, 1890.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

An Agreeable and Successful Concert at the Academy.

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last evening was one of the most delightful of this whole season. The programme was well chosen and well arranged and the work of the orchestra was never finer. The concert opened with the lovely symphony in G of Haydn, a perfectly clear and joyous piece of pure music to which Mr. Nikisch gave a very bright and poetical interpretation. This was worthily followed by the great Henselt concerto, in which Joseffy played the piano part with his own exquisite smoothness, yet with no lack of masculinity, and the romantic orchestration was superbly treated. The remaining portion of the programme was of inferior interest. It included a long overture, so-called, by Tschaikowsky, richly instrumented but taking a long time to say very little; some parts of Rubinstein's "Bal Costume," including the Spanish number beautifully played, and the prelude of the "Meistersinger." This completed a wide range in time as in character and closed a particularly successful concert. There will be but one more of the series.

HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, MARCH 22, 1890

THE TWENTIETH SYMPHONY CONCERT.—

W. Sterndale Bennett.....Overture, "The Naiads"
Berlioz.....Revery for Contralto, "La Captive"
Otto Floersheim.....Scherzo for Orchestra
(First time in Boston.)
Massenet.....Aria, from "Marie Magdelene"
Beethoven.....Symphony No. 6 (Pastoral)

The program of last Saturday was a mild sedative, if not a somniferous potion.

The first number was an amiable Overture by an amiable Englishman, a rare combination, as difficult to find as the mandragora which sings.

The English have had one great composer,—Purcell; they have had several musicians who wrote "pretty" music. Among them was Sterndale Bennett, who was so fond of Mendelssohn that he imitated his musical dress and copied his musical gait.

The cup which he gives you to drink is the familiar brew of Mendelssohn recommended for family use.

The Naiads are English Naiads and they frolic in bathing suits; for, according to the Rev. Mr. Haweis music and morals should always go hand in hand. The water in which they float is the water of the Thames; it is not the Rhine of Wagner, it is not the pellucid play-ground of the fair beings seen in the dreams of Von Weber.

Still this Overture of Bennett is agreeable; it soothes; it aids and does not disturb digestion.

The other orchestral numbers were a Scherzo by Otto Floersheim and the Pastoral Symphony. These numbers, as well as the Overture were well played by the orchestra.

At the risk of offending the sensitive souls who look upon Mr. Nikisch as a musical Messiah sent to us from Leipsic for our salvation, it may be said that the last movement of the symphony was taken so slowly that it dragged; the second movement might have been a shade faster; and in the scherzo the hold of the first violins and trumpet was exaggerated and theatrical. As a whole it was exceedingly well played; nor should the admirable work of Mr. Sautet and the first bassoon be passed by unnoticed.

Mrs. Walter C. Wyman was the soloist. She sang "La Captive" by Berlioz and an aria from Massenet's "Marie Magdelene."

Mrs. Wyman has a pleasing voice and considerable skill. At times, however, there is a nasal quality which offends; and she has a trick of attacking high notes with an upward slide that is disagreeable and amateurish. She sang her selections without emotion, bringing to mind the singer mentioned by Hesychius, upon whose lips icicles formed as he sang. She was heartily applauded.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, MARCH 23, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA'S TOUR

During the week just ended the Boston Symphony orchestra has made its third tour in the cities along the eastern coast, under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch and the business management of Mr. Charles A. Ellis and his assistant, Fred K. Comer, to whose conscientious efforts so much of the success of this Boston institution is due. Director Nikisch has again won a pronounced triumph in New Haven, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, and has established himself as a favorite with the musical and social circles of all these cities. In New York, Steinway Hall held the largest orchestral audience of the season and the receipts in the other cities were still in advance of these of any previous visit of the orchestra to these cities. Mr. Rufael Joseffy, pianist, and Mlle. de Vere, the soprano, shared the soloist's honors until Washington was reached, when Miss Mary Howe, the young singer of Brattleboro, Vt., recently back from Europe, simply captured the musical patrons of the capital and carried all before her. The tour is admitted to have been the most successful ever made by the orchestra under any conductor, and the concerts given by the organization have come to be looked upon quite as much as established institutions in the cities visited as they are in Boston.

The World

JOSEPH PULITZER.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR AT NOS. 31 AND 32 PARK ROW.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 19, 1890.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Nikisch Wins Golden Opinions Again in the Metropolis.

A happier arrangement could not have been desired than the programme presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the fourth and last concert given under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch last night at Steinway Hall. It included two symphonies, both familiar—Schumann's first in B flat and Beethoven's C Minor—and an overture to "Richard III." by Volckmann, an effective piece of descriptive music more like a symphonic poem than an overture. On the occasion of the first concert of this excellent organization under Mr. Nikisch in December last Schumann's Fourth Symphony was given, and we had occasion then to admire the splendid work of the orchestra and the understanding and appreciation shown by Mr. Nikisch for Schumann's music. Last night the beautiful and melodious First Symphony was equally well given and both conductor and orchestra deserve praise for the rendition.

It is a pleasure to record the fact that Mr. Nikisch offered no new "reading" of the Fifth. It was a noble performance, done with enthusiasm and vigor, without any striving after eccentricity and without pedantry. The rendition was well nigh a faultless one, the first movement being given with splendid precision, and the whole marked by the smoothness and finish which are such noted characteristics in the playing of this orchestra. There was no soloist. The house was crowded with an appreciative and enthusiastic audience. The concert was one of the best given by the Boston Orchestra in New York.

THURSDAY, MARCH 20, 1890.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy.

The fourth concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last night at the Academy of Music in presence of one of the largest audiences which has attended any concert this season. Every seat in the house was sold and a considerable number of people were forced to stand.

The symphony was, for a change, placed first upon the programme. This is certainly better than making it the concluding number. Hayden's symphony in G (No. 13 B & H) was chosen and this must not be confounded with the "Surprise" symphony which is in the same key. Last night's symphony is not one of the better known of Hayden's symphonic compositions nor does it deserve the popularity which the Salomon series for instance still retain. Of the four movements, the second (largo) is the most taking. It is a lovely and melodious number, and there is a phrase for 'cellos in it which was exquisitely played last night. The themes of all the movements are extremely simple, the composer having evidently found inspiration in the rustic life in which he lived during his long service with Prince Esterhazey.

The novelty of last night's programme was the Russian, Tschaikowsky's, overture-fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet." It is not programme music and the composer has given no suggestions as to what episode in the lives of the unhappy lovers he has chosen to illustrate. The work, in fact, might as easily have been entitled "Cymbeline" or "Rosalind and Orlando." It is full of those bizarre effects in which modern composers, tempted by the possibilities of the modern orchestra, are so apt to indulge. It is highly characteristic of the composer, and in spite of its occasional flowing legato passages, one can readily see at times the barbaric tastes of the Tartar, who is proverbially to be discovered when the Muscovite is scratched. The work, however, is full of musicianly writing, is marked by bits of beautiful melody, and is altogether a very interesting composition.

Another Russian sword followed the overture, in the shape of three of the four movements of Rubinstein's "Bal Costume" music. This is very familiar, but as played by Mr. Nikisch's band, new beauties were discovered. The charming dance music was given with delightful feeling and the last movement on Spanish themes was played with a snap and vim that was exceedingly pleasant and the effort received the warmest reception of the evening. Wagner's well-known "Meistersinger" overture was the concluding number.

The soloist was Mr. Rafael Joseffy, who played Henselt's F minor concerto, appearing here for the first time under Mr. Nikisch's leadership. The concerto has been played here before, but was probably a novelty to the majority of the audience. It is a work of great difficulty, written by one who was first a pianist and then a composer for the purpose of exhibiting his own virtuosity. The composition is too long and is therefore tiresome in places, but it serves its purpose admirably. The themes are well defined and no lack of ideas is exhibited, but, curiously enough, it is to the orchestra that the most taking phrases are given instead of to the piano. Henselt, as a performer, loved to obtain quaint effects by striking more than an octave, and the arpeggios which occur so frequently in each of the three movements exhibit all the difficulties which might be expected in a composer of Henselt's turn of mind. Mr. Joseffy last night surpassed himself in his exhibition of digital dexterity. From what has been said of the composition it is evident that there are no intellectually subtle ideas to be brought out, but that the technical difficulties are enormous. These difficulties were met and overcome with surprising ease by the executant, who, at the conclusion of the concerto was recalled again and again. It cannot be denied, however, that Mr. Joseffy has a score of compositions in his repertory which would have proved more musically satisfying.

It is said that at the next concert, which will be the last of the series, Mr. Nikisch intends interpreting a Mozart symphony. If this statement proves to be well founded it is to be hoped that the glorious "Jupiter" will be chosen.

THE MORNING HERALD

FRIDAY, MARCH 21, 1890.

The Bostonians Give a Delightful Concert.

A large, fashionable and appreciative audience assembled last night in the Lyceum Theatre, the occasion being the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the conductorship of Mr. Arthur Nikisch. The music consisted of five numbers, of which three were orchestra pieces and two were arias by Mlle. Clementine de Vere. The programme opened with Haydn's Symphony in G, No. 13, the rendition of which called forth many expressions of pleasure and praise. The next piece, an aria from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," was sung very sweetly by Mlle. De Vere, and was much applauded. This was followed by Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony," No. 8, in B minor, a noble fragment embodying the deepest emotion of the composer. An aria from David's "Les Perles de Bresil," sung by Mlle. De Vere, was well rendered and warmly received by the audience. The concert ended with Wagner's "Huldigung's March" by the orchestra.

The concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are always justly celebrated for their high standard of musical excellence, and the one given last night was no exception to the rule. Those who had the pleasure of being present were lavish in praise of the enjoyment which the concert afforded, and great credit is due for the excellent manner in which the numbers, both vocal and instrumental, were given. Mr. Nikisch, as a leader, has many excellent qualities, and the orchestra is composed of musicians of the highest order.

AND COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER

FRIDAY, MARCH 21, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Performance by the Boston Orchestra at the Lyceum.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its fourth concert of the present season at the Lyceum Theater last evening before a large and fashionable audience. The program consisted mostly of classic music, but had a modern Wagner ending. The first work was Haydn's Symphony in G major, No. 13, Breitkoff & Haertel edition. This was followed by a Mozart aria, and this by the Schubert unfinished symphony, No. 8, in B minor, the three numbers following each other in proper chronological, as well as artistic, sequence. An aria by David from "Les Perles de Bresil," and the "Huldigungs March" by Wagner completed the program.

The great majority of the musical people present would have preferred a program of works by modern composers, as the Haydn and Schubert symphonies have been played so often in Baltimore, the latter only a couple of weeks ago, and the former many times during the numerous concerts at the Peabody. The fine manner in which the two symphonies were rendered atoned somewhat for their lack of novelty, and it is, no doubt, well to go back occasionally to the old classic compositions, pure and simple, and listen again to the dainty melodies and strict harmonies that delighted our foreign forefathers.

But the American public ear has heard too much of the full, large modern orchestra to be contented with the works which were at least satisfactorily rendered under the direction of their composers with only twenty-five men. Of course, Haydn would have danced in his queue and knee-breeches to have heard his work rendered as it was last evening. But the modern public has been led to expect modern works for the modern orchestra, and it listens to hear Berlioz, Rubinstein and Wagner. Haydn was a great composer in his time, but not in this time.

Herr Nikesch's rendition of the works was excellent, his shading exquisite, and while he brings out their charming daintiness, it is impossible to make them large in form or their effects grand in style, or to develop very much modern enthusiasm. The modern taste has advanced with the modern orchestra.

In the matter of vocal art the case is entirely different. The human voice is no greater to-day than it was two hundred or a thousand years ago; and an air that was charming then can excite the same pleasure to-day. This fact was fully demonstrated in the fine artistic triumph which Miss De Vere achieved in the beautiful scene and cavatina, "Dove Sono," from Mozart's opera, "The Marriage of Figaro." It is as simple and classic as a Greek robe, but full of pathos, love and tenderness in every word and note. Miss De Vere gave it a perfect rendition, and was heartily recalled. Still, the preference for the modern aria was shown in the enthusiasm worked by her singing of the David aria from "Les Perles de Bresil." Her perfect execution of this difficult air, with all its fioriture, was a revelation of the possibilities of a well-trained voice. Her vocalization is faultless; her crescendos and diminuendos, scales and general agility are the best that have been heard in this city for years, if they have ever been surpassed. She responded to a double recall, but the audience applauded till she repeated her work. It was a rare treat.

The orchestra gives one more concert this season.

The Sun.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 19, 1890.

Last Night's Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

There were few, if any, vacant seats at Steinway Hall last night, and when it is borne in mind that the floor of the house holds upward of eleven hundred spectators it will be understood that the audience was of no ordinary proportions. In point of fact, the fourth and last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra brought together the largest and most representative assemblage that has listened to Mr. Nikisch and his musicians since their first appearance here in December last. The enthusiasm of the throng was in direct proportion to its numbers, so that the visit of the Boston players will no doubt be as pleasant a memory for them as it is sure to be for the music-loving public of New York.

The programme of the evening included only three numbers—Schumann's symphony in B flat, No. 1; Volkmann's "Richard III.," overture, and Beethoven's C minor, symphony No. 5. It appealed, of course, most strongly to the admirers of those relatively simple works that enjoyed universal reverence before complexity and elaboration displaced in a measure such beauty and grandeur as were appreciable at once and compelled recognition without preface or commentary; it was naturally less impressive for the partisans of the advanced school, to whom the sunny mood of the "Spring Symphony" is scarcely congenial, and for whom Beethoven, the symphonist begins and ends with the Ninth Symphony. Both compositions, however, are so familiar to the frequenter of the concert room that no detailed reference to either is required. The one novelty on the programme—the overture—may be described as a symphonic poem of rather reduced proportions, in which only one part, illustrative presumably of the battle of Bosworth Field, and introducing, in a somewhat trivial fashion, the tune "The Campbells are Comin'," may be cited as distinctly recognizable as connected with the drama to which the composition serves as a prelude. The instrumentation is distinctly modern, though not as dangerous as might have been anticipated.

The orchestra went through its task with unflagging spirit, unfailing responsiveness to Mr. Nikisch's impulsive but steady beat, and perfect accuracy. As was mentioned some time ago, something of the almost finical refinement noticeable in the playing of the band under Mr. Gericke's direction has been sacrificed to feeling, vivacity, and breadth, and increased effect has been the outcome of the change. In the Schumann symphony, Mr. Nikisch's reading was, as a whole, more conservative than romantic; in the Beethoven work the rather feverish modern spirit was more readily discernible. Equally expressive, well balanced, and finished performances of the two masterpieces New York audiences will certainly not listen to until Mr. Nikisch and his men return to us next season.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 19, 1890.

Boston Letter.

BOSTON is more musical than any other city in the United States, New York not excluded. This assertion has been made so frequently that it sounds stale, and yet we, with our metropolitan local patriotism, would feign deny it, until by an occasional visit to the Hub we are forcibly reminded again of its truth. It is not in the number of its concerts, nor in the quality of them that New York is musically inferior to Boston; it is in the quality of the audiences, their unflagging interest in everything musical and their true and unaffected enthusiasm that the latter city shows its musical superiority. Take a concert like last Saturday's twentieth Symphony Concert and its preceding public rehearsal. It rained all Friday and it snowed all Saturday. In New York on such unpropitious occasions all concert attendance, even that at our six Philharmonic concerts, decreases in number most materially and the atmosphere puts a damper on all musical enthusiasm in listeners and performers alike. Not so in Boston. Music Hall last Friday afternoon was crowded to overflowing and the ladies had to sit even on the steps of the orchestral platform, a fact which I deem detrimental to the sonority of the orchestra in a hall of not naturally very good acoustic properties.

The same state of affairs prevailed on Saturday night, when there was not a vacant seat in the house, and all listened with closest attention and were not afraid to bestow intelligent applause on conductor, soloist and performers. It must be a pleasure to play for such weekly audiences, and the orchestra showed this fact in the unflagging zeal, minute care and yet freedom and sweep with which they played each number on the program and which they sustain all the season round. No better strings, no better wood wind, in fact no better orchestra could be gathered together or is in existence to-day than the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and they are united in an artistic and friendly ensemble which finds its culmination in the admiration, nay, love they bear their conductor, Arthur Nikisch.

While it is an all too frequent happening in many orchestras in New York that the musicians mentally and even openly rebel against their conductor, for whom they possess a feeling akin to hostility and quite often of utter disdain, and while frictions caused by professional jealousy are of but too numerous occurrence here and in other cities, the Boston Symphony Orchestra vie with each other in their devotion to their conductor and in their obedience and fulfillment of even his slightest wishes and indications, and at the same time they are as fraternal, amicable and free from jealousy among each other as the members of no other orchestra in the world. The result is a perfect ensemble and performances superior to which no other city can boast of.

They played last Friday and Saturday W. Sterndale Bennett's refined and ultra Mendelssohnian, "The Naïads" overture, with a finish impossible to excel; they performed the writer's rather difficult "Scherzo" in a manner that made the composer's heart laugh, and they, obedient to Nikisch's original intentions, gave a reading of Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony that made the "grand old man's" somewhat threadbare and hackneyed work gain renewed interest. Especially was this the case with the soporific slow movement, in which the slightly accelerated tempo and the subduing of the nauseatingly reiterated twelve-eighth accompanying figure created a favorable change from the accepted version, while "The Storm" was played with so much forcefulness and dramatic verve that it lost considerable of the "tempest in a teapot" quality it naturally possesses and habitually assumes under other conductors.

The soloist at this concert was Mrs. Walter C. Wyman, of Chicago, a contralto of excellent vocal material and musical attainments, subdued, however, by a lack of artistic fire and the inability of vocal coloring and dramatic feeling and expression. She sang Berlioz's "La Captive" and an aria from Massenet's "Mary Magdalen," both in excellently pronounced French, and the latter musicianly accompanied at the piano by Mr. Zach, as the orchestral parts did not arrive in time for the performance.

The lady was well received and enthusiastically applauded, as, in fact, were all the numbers of the program,

The Times

PHILADELPHIA, MARCH 20, 1890.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

An Agreeable and Successful Concert at the Academy.

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last evening was one of the most delightful of this whole season. The programme was well chosen and well arranged and the work of the orchestra was never finer. The concert opened with the lovely symphony in G of Haydn, a perfectly clear and joyous piece of pure music to which Mr. Nikisch gave a very bright and poetical interpretation. This was worthily followed by the great Henselt concerto, in which Joseffy played the piano part with his own exquisite smoothness, yet with no lack of masculinity, and the romantic orchestration was superbly treated. The remaining portion of the programme was of inferior interest. It included a long overture, so-called, by Tschaikowsky, richly instrumented but taking a long time to say very little; some parts of Rubinstein's "Bal Costume," including the Spanish number beautifully played, and the prelude of the "Meistersinger." This completed a wide range in time as in character and closed a particularly successful concert. There will be but one more of the series.

HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, MARCH 22, 1890

THE TWENTIETH SYMPHONY CONCERT.—

W. Sterndale Bennett.....Overture, "The Naiads"
Berlioz.....Revery for Contralto, "La Captive"
Otto Floersheim.....Scherzo for Orchestra
(First time in Boston.)
Massenet.....Aria, from "Marie Magdelene"
Beethoven.....Symphony No. 6 (Pastoral)

The program of last Saturday was a mild sedative, if not a somniferous potion.

The first number was an amiable Overture by an amiable Englishman, a rare combination, as difficult to find as the mandragora which sings.

The English have had one great composer,—Purcell; they have had several musicians who wrote "pretty" music. Among them was Sterndale Bennett, who was so fond of Mendelssohn that he imitated his musical dress and copied his musical gait.

The cup which he gives you to drink is the familiar brew of Mendelssohn recommended for family use.

The Naiads are English Naiads and they frolic in bathing suits; for, according to the Rev. Mr. Haweis music and morals should always go hand in hand. The water in which they float is the water of the Thames; it is not the Rhine of Wagner, it is not the pellucid play-ground of the fair beings seen in the dreams of Von Weber.

Still this Overture of Bennett is agreeable; it soothes; it aids and does not disturb digestion.

The other orchestral numbers were a Scherzo by Otto Floersheim and the Pastoral Symphony. These numbers, as well as the Overture were well played by the orchestra.

At the risk of offending the sensitive souls who look upon Mr. Nikisch as a musical Messiah sent to us from Leipsic for our salvation, it may be said that the last movement of the symphony was taken so slowly that it dragged; the second movement might have been a shade faster; and in the scherzo the hold of the first violins and trumpet was exaggerated and theatrical. As a whole it was exceedingly well played; nor should the admirable work of Mr. Sautet and the first bassoon be passed by unnoticed.

Mrs. Walter C. Wyman was the soloist. She sang "La Captive" by Berlioz and an aria from Massenet's "Marie Magdelene."

Mrs. Wyman has a pleasing voice and considerable skill. At times, however, there is a nasal quality which offends; and she has a trick of attacking high notes with an upward slide that is disagreeable and amateurish. She sang her selections without emotion, bringing to mind the singer mentioned by Hesychius, upon whose lips icicles formed as he sang. She was heartily applauded.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, MARCH 23, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA'S TOUR

During the week just ended the Boston Symphony orchestra has made its third tour in the cities along the eastern coast, under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch and the business management of Mr. Charles A. Ellis and his assistant, Fred K. Comer, to whose conscientious efforts so much of the success of this Boston institution is due. Director Nikisch has again won a pronounced triumph in New Haven, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, and has established himself as a favorite with the musical and social circles of all these cities. In New York, Steinway Hall held the largest orchestral audience of the season and the receipts in the other cities were still in advance of these of any previous visit of the orchestra to these cities. Mr. Rufiael Joseffy, pianist, and Mlle. de Vere, the soprano, shared the soloist's honors until Washington was reached, when Miss Mary Howe, the young singer of Brattleboro, Vt., recently back from Europe, simply captured the musical patrons of the capital and carried all before her. The tour is admitted to have been the most successful ever made by the orchestra under any conductor, and the concerts given by the organization have come to be looked upon quite as much as established institutions in the cities visited as they are in Boston.

The World

JOSEPH PULITZER.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR AT NOS. 31 AND 32 PARK ROW.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 19, 1890.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Nikisch Wins Golden Opinions Again in the Metropolis.

A happier arrangement could not have been desired than the programme presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the fourth and last concert given under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch last night at Steinway Hall. It included two symphonies, both familiar—Schumann's first in B flat and Beethoven's C Minor—and an overture to "Richard III." by Volckmann, an effective piece of descriptive music more like a symphonic poem than an overture. On the occasion of the first concert of this excellent organization under Mr. Nikisch in December last Schumann's Fourth Symphony was given, and we had occasion then to admire the splendid work of the orchestra and the understanding and appreciation shown by Mr. Nikisch for Schumann's music. Last night the beautiful and melodious First Symphony was equally well given and both conductor and orchestra deserve praise for the rendition.

It is a pleasure to record the fact that Mr. Nikisch offered no new "reading" of the Fifth. It was a noble performance, done with enthusiasm and vigor, without any striving after eccentricity and without pedantry. The rendition was well nigh a faultless one, the first movement being given with splendid precision, and the whole marked by the smoothness and finish which are such noted characteristics in the playing of this orchestra. There was no soloist. The house was crowded with an appreciative and enthusiastic audience. The concert was one of the best given by the Boston Orchestra in New York.

The Philadelphia Press.

THURSDAY, MARCH 20, 1890.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy.

The fourth concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last night at the Academy of Music in presence of one of the largest audiences which has attended any concert this season. Every seat in the house was sold and a considerable number of people were forced to stand.

The symphony was, for a change, placed first upon the programme. This is certainly better than making it the concluding number. Hayden's symphony in G (No. 13 B & H) was chosen and this must not be confounded with the "Surprise" symphony which is in the same key. Last night's symphony is not one of the better known of Hayden's symphonic compositions nor does it deserve the popularity which the Salomon series for instance still retain. Of the four movements, the second (largo) is the most taking. It is a lovely and melodious number, and there is a phrase for 'cellos in it which was exquisitely played last night. The themes of all the movements are extremely simple, the composer having evidently found inspiration in the rustic life in which he lived during his long service with Prince Esterhazey.

The novelty of last night's programme was the Russian, Tschaikowsky's, overture-fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet." It is not programme music and the composer has given no suggestions as to what episode in the lives of the unhappy lovers he has chosen to illustrate. The work, in fact, might as easily have been entitled "Cymbeline" or "Rosalind and Orlando." It is full of those bizarre effects in which modern composers, tempted by the possibilities of the modern orchestra, are so apt to indulge. It is highly characteristic of the composer, and in spite of its occasional flowing legato passages, one can readily see at times the barbaric tastes of the Tartar, who is proverbially to be discovered when the Muscovite is scratched. The work, however, is full of musicianly writing, is marked by bits of beautiful melody, and is altogether a very interesting composition.

Another Russian' sword followed the overture, in the shape of three of the four movements of Rubinstein's "Bal Costume" music. This is very familiar, but as played by Mr. Nikisch's band, new beauties were discovered. The charming dance music was given with delightful feeling and the last movement on Spanish themes was played with a snap and vim that was exceedingly pleasant and the effort received the warmest reception of the evening. Wagner's well-known "Meistersinger" overture was the concluding number.

The soloist was Mr. Rafael Joseffy, who played Henselt's F minor concerto, appearing here for the first time under Mr. Nikisch's leadership. The concerto has been played here before, but was probably a novelty to the majority of the audience. It is a work of great difficulty, written by one who was first a pianist and then a composer for the purpose of exhibiting his own virtuosity. The composition is too long and is therefore tiresome in places, but it serves its purpose admirably. The themes are well defined and no lack of ideas is exhibited, but, curiously enough, it is to the orchestra that the most taking phrases are given instead of to the piano. Henselt, as a performer, loved to obtain quaint effects by striking more than an octave, and the arpeggios which occur so frequently in each of the three movements exhibit all the difficulties which might be expected in a composer of Henselt's turn of mind. Mr. Joseffy last night surpassed himself in his exhibition of digital dexterity. From what has been said of the composition it is evident that there are no intellectually subtle ideas to be brought out but that the techuical difficulties are enormous. These difficulties were met and overcome with surprising ease by the executant, who, at the conclusion of the concerto was recalled again and again. It cannot be denied, however, that Mr. Joseffy has a score of compositions in his repertory which would have proved more musically satisfying.

It is said that at the next concert, which will be the last of the series, Mr. Nikisch intends interpreting a Mozart symphony. If this statement proves to be well founded it is to be hoped that the glorious "Jupiter" will be chosen.

THE MORNING HERALD

FRIDAY, MARCH 21, 1890.

The Bostonians Give a Delightful Concert.

A large, fashionable and appreciative audience assembled last night in the Lyceum Theatre, the occasion being the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the conductorship of Mr. Arthur Nikisch. The music consisted of five numbers, of which three were orchestra pieces and two were arias by Mlle. Clementine de Vere. The programme opened with Haydn's Symphony in G, No. 13, the rendition of which called forth many expressions of pleasure and praise. The next piece, an aria from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," was sung very sweetly by Mlle. De Vere, and was much applauded. This was followed by Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony," No. 8, in B minor, a noble fragment embodying the deepest emotion of the composer. An aria from David's "Les Perles de Bresil," sung by Mlle. De Vere, was well rendered and warmly received by the audience. The concert ended with Wagner's "Huldigung's March" by the orchestra.

The concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are always justly celebrated for their high standard of musical excellence, and the one given last night was no exception to the rule. Those who had the pleasure of being present were lavish in praise of the enjoyment which the concert afforded, and great credit is due for the excellent manner in which the numbers, both vocal and instrumental, were given. Mr. Nikisch, as a leader, has many excellent qualities, and the orchestra is composed of musicians of the highest order.

Baltimore American AND COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER

FRIDAY, MARCH 21, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Performance by the Boston Orchestra at the Lyceum.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its fourth concert of the present season at the Lyceum Theater last evening before a large and fashionable audience. The program consisted mostly of classic music, but had a modern Wagner ending. The first work was Haydn's Symphony in G major, No. 13, Breitkoff & Haertel edition. This was followed by a Mozart aria, and this by the Schubert unfinished symphony, No. 8, in B minor, the three numbers following each other in proper chronological, as well as artistic, sequence. An aria by David from "Les Perles de Bresil," and the "Huldigungs March" by Wagner completed the program.

The great majority of the musical people present would have preferred a program of works by modern composers, as the Haydn and Schubert symphonies have been played so often in Baltimore, the latter only a couple of weeks ago, and the former many times during the numerous concerts at the Peabody. The fine manner in which the two symphonies were rendered atoned somewhat for their lack of novelty, and it is, no doubt, well to go back occasionally to the old classic compositions, pure and simple, and listen again to the dainty melodies and strict harmonies that delighted our foreign forefathers.

But the American public ear has heard too much of the full, large modern orchestra to be contented with the works which were at least satisfactorily rendered under the direction of their composers with only twenty-five men. Of course, Haydn would have danced in his queue and knee-breeches to have heard his work rendered as it was last evening. But the modern public has been led to expect modern works for the modern orchestra, and it listens to hear Berlioz, Rubinstein and Wagner. Haydn was a great composer in his time, but not in this time.

Herr Nikesch's rendition of the works was excellent, his shading exquisite, and while he brings out their charming daintiness, it is impossible to make them large in form or their effects grand in style, or to develop very much modern enthusiasm. The modern taste has advanced with the modern orchestra.

In the matter of vocal art the case is entirely different. The human voice is no greater to-day than it was two hundred or a thousand years ago; and an air that was charming then can excite the same pleasure to-day. This fact was fully demonstrated in the fine artistic triumph which Miss De Vere achieved in the beautiful scene and cavatina, "Dove Sono," from Mozart's opera, "The Marriage of Figaro." It is as simple and classic as a Greek robe, but full of pathos, love and tenderness in every word and note. Miss De Vere gave it a perfect rendition, and was heartily recalled. Still, the preference for the modern aria was shown in the enthusiasm worked by her singing of the David aria from "Les Perles de Bresil." Her perfect execution of this difficult air, with all its floriture, was a revelation of the possibilities of a well-trained voice. Her vocalization is faultless; her crescendos and diminuendos, scales and general agility are the best that have been heard in this city for years, if they have ever been surpassed. She responded to a double recall, but the audience applauded till she repeated her work. It was a rare treat.

The orchestra gives one more concert this season.

The Sun.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 19, 1890.

Last Night's Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

There were few, if any, vacant seats at Steinway Hall last night, and when it is borne in mind that the floor of the house holds upward of eleven hundred spectators it will be understood that the audience was of no ordinary proportions. In point of fact, the fourth and last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra brought together the largest and most representative assemblage that has listened to Mr. Nikisch and his musicians since their first appearance here in December last. The enthusiasm of the throng was in direct proportion to its numbers, so that the visit of the Boston players will no doubt be as pleasant a memory for them as it is sure to be for the music-loving public of New York.

The programme of the evening included only three numbers—Schumann's symphony in B flat, No. 1; Volkmann's "Richard III." overture, and Beethoven's C minor, symphony No. 5. It appealed, of course, most strongly to the admirers of those relatively simple works that enjoyed universal reverence before complexity and elaboration displaced in a measure such beauty and grandeur as were appreciable at once and compelled recognition without preface or commentary; it was naturally less impressive for the partisans of the advanced school, to whom the sunny mood of the "Spring Symphony" is scarcely congenial, and for whom Beethoven the symphonist begins and ends with the Ninth Symphony. Both compositions, however, are so familiar to the frequenter of the concert room that no detailed reference to either is required. The one novelty on the programme—the overture—may be described as a symphonic poem of rather reduced proportions, in which only one part, illustrative presumably of the battle of Bosworth Field, and introducing, in a somewhat trivial fashion, the tune "The Campbells are Comin'," may be cited as distinctly recognizable as connected with the drama to which the composition serves as a prelude. The instrumentation is distinctly modern, though not as dangerous as might have been anticipated.

The orchestra went through its task with unflagging spirit, unfailing responsiveness to Mr. Nikisch's impulsive but steady beat, and perfect accuracy. As was mentioned some time ago, something of the almost finical refinement noticeable in the playing of the band under Mr. Gericke's direction has been sacrificed to feeling, vivacity, and breadth, and increased effect has been the outcome of the change. In the Schumann symphony, Mr. Nikisch's reading was, as a whole, more conservative than romantic; in the Beethoven work the rather feverish modern spirit was more readily discernible. Equally expressive, well balanced, and finished performances of the two masterpieces New York audiences will certainly not listen to until Mr. Nikisch and his men return to us next season.

[92]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

[93]

...Thursday, March 20, 1890.

...y of Music—Boston Symphony Concert.

...on Symphony Orchestra never ... audience than the one that ... the Academy last night, and never ... one in this city more thoroughly. ... symphony which topped the pro... (where the LEDGER has so often ... intimated it should always be placed) ... Haydyn's G (No. 13), and a more buoyant, ... and brilliant performance of it ... probably not been heard in Philadel... Had it not been the number that was ... started at 10 o'clock—instead of the "Meistersinger" overture, it is certain it would not have been as keenly enjoyed as it was with the audience fresh in spirit and keen in interest, particularly as the two succeeding numbers contained passages that bordered on the tedious. The whole symphony was delightfully given, but the gem was the largo given with exquisite expression by the band.

Henselt's pianoforte concerto in F minor (Op. 16) followed, with Rafael Joseffy at the solo instrument. This is a composition that is not likely to gain in general favor by frequent hearings. It has enough of the show-piece element in it to allow of an exposition of virtuosity by such a player as Joseffy; but with this goes a mass of not particularly well scored orchestration on ideas that are disjointed and of no striking originality. Mr. Joseffy played some of the bravura passages with a little more of noise than of force; but, otherwise, his execution was, as usual, brilliantly clear, facile and artistic. A portion of the audience endeavored to induce him by repeated recalls to add to the concerto one of the smaller pianoforte solos in which he so distinctly excels, but he gracefully declined by bowing himself in each time he was called out.

The only other encore that was pressed was the Spanish ("Toreador") number of Rubinstein's "Bal Costume" duet (which was given with splendid spirit and stirring effectiveness), but this was not conceded.

The novelty of the evening was an overture, fantasie, as he calls it, by Tschaikowsky, with the title of "Romeo and Juliet," a composition of imposing proportions and style, but which might almost as well be styled the "Hamlet" or the "Julius Cæsar." It has less of the quaint rhythm than his work usually shows, and is frequently on the Hungarian Rhapsody order of Liszt, but if the music is not uniformly important it is generally original and broadly colored. Altogether the concert was one of the greatest successes the Boston Orchestra has achieved, and the fact can unhesitatingly be credited most largely to the skill and earnestness of its present accomplished leader, Arthur Nikisch.

The Washington Post.

WASHINGTON, MARCH 22, 1890.

A MUSICAL EVENT.

The Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Lincoln Hall.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its third concert at the Lincoln Music Hall last night in the presence of an immense audience. As early as 2 o'clock yesterday afternoon every seat in the house had been sold, and the walls were fringed by scores of people, who, being unable to obtain seats, willingly stood during the two hours the concert was in progress. The boxes were filled, and the scene presented by the vast and attentive audience was an inspiring one. The enthusiasm which pervaded the assemblage vented itself in demonstrative applause, and Mr. Nikisch received from the German legation a huge wreath of laurel, tied with broad ribbons of the German colors.

Nothing more musically stimulating and satisfactory has been heard in Washington than Mr. Nikisch's interpretation of the three numbers on the programme, the beautiful Fingal's Cave overture, the intensely emotional prelude to Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde," and the immortal fifth symphony of Beethoven. Mr. Nikisch seems to cast aside tradition in his readings and imbues the score with his own personality and thought, the latter influenced, though not entirely dominated by, Wagnerian ideas. It is a characteristic of his work that he dissects or lays bare with consummate skill the ideas and themes of the compositions which he undertakes to interpret. Nothing is opaque or turbid; every bar is permeated with light.

It was this characteristic that emphasized the beauty of the overture, and certainly nothing could have been more soulful, more intense than the Tristan prelude. One cannot imagine a more vivid portrayal of the rapture and the anguish of Tristan's fateful love, or a reading more perfect in both its mechanical execution and its conception. A reverential, almost devotional mood seemed to pervade the entire orchestra. From the love motive of the opening bars to the ecstatic chords which picture the lovers' defiance of death, there was a steady progression toward a wonderful climax that never faltered for an instant, and was as certain, deliberate, and enthralling as fate itself.

The rendition of the symphony was marked by a number of original and striking ideas. The opening bars were noticeably prolonged, and thus made doubly impressive, and the whole first movement was superbly given; the romantic coloring of the andante was beautifully pictured; the unique scherzo, with its curious runs for the double basses, and its impressive ending was given with charming elasticity of rhythm, while the triumphal finale was electrically exalting.

The soloist of the evening was Miss Mary Howe, who repeated her previous success, and was, indeed, compelled, after her recalls, to repeat the bell song from "Lakmé." Her voice, as previously stated in The Post, is a pure soprano of high range, exquisite execution, marvelous flexibility, and of great sweetness, especially in the higher register.

Philadelphia Inquirer.

THURSDAY, MARCH 20, 1890.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its fourth concert for the season at the Academy of Music last night before an audience which filled every seat in the auditorium, excepting the upper gallery, and even overflowing into the aisles. The symphony was Haydn's, in G major, and while the music, which does not employ the basses, seemed thin and colorless, it was beautiful in its way and served to exhibit the splendid quality of Mr. Nikisch's strings.

It was, however, in Rubinstein's "Bal Costume" numbers and Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture that the vertuosity of the orchestra was chiefly shown, and here its execution was dazzling in its brilliancy. The feature of the evening, however, was Joseffy's interpretation of Henselt's interesting but extraordinarily difficult piano forte concert in F minor. In all the years he has been playing here Joseffy has done nothing so great, both technically and intellectually, as this, and the repeated recalls which it elicited were thoroughly well deserved.

THE RECORD.

Philadelphia, Thursday, March 20, 1890.

—Last evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its fourth concert of the season at the Academy of Music. Joseffy played the Henselt concerto with masterly skill and true musical feeling, and the work of the orchestra was almost perfection. Three movements of Rubinstein's "Bal Costume" were rendered with delightful vivacity and entrain. Haydn's Symphony in G, Tschaikowsky's fantastic "Romeo and Juliet" overture, and the "Meistersaenger" vorspiel were the remaining numbers of the programme.

Boston Post

MONDAY MORNING, MARCH 24, 1890

THE TRIP OF THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The trip of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last week to New Haven, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington was by far the most successful ever made. In New York, with no soloist and two symphonies, the fourth of Schumann and the fifth of Beethoven, there was the largest audience at any orchestral concert this season. The Academy of Music in Philadelphia, seating 3000, was filled to overflowing with an assemblage very like our own Boston audience. In Baltimore the influence of the Peabody Institute Orchestra, which gives a series of symphony concerts each season, was shown in a very large attendance of educated musicians, together with the representatives of Baltimore's best society. But in Washington the orchestra scored its greatest triumph. The new Lincoln Hall seats 1600 people, and every seat in the house was sold at noon on the day of the concert. The full limit of admission tickets was disposed of in a few moments after the doors were opened, and hundreds were turned away. A great laurel wreath tied with the national colors of Hungary was presented to Mr. Nikisch. Everybody in Washington goes in full dress to these concerts, and the spacious auditorium, the handsome boxes and both balconies completely filled with a brilliant company, comprising statesmen, diplomats, society leaders and musicians, the superb playing of the orchestra—all made a red letter night in Washington's brilliant season.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, MARCH 23, 1890.

The fourth and last concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra drew an overflowing audience to Steinway hall, on Tuesday evening, says Town Topics. Two symphonies and a dramatic overture were performed; Schumann's No. 1, in B flat major, and Beethoven's No. 5 in C minor, with Volkmann's overture to "Richard III." These works made up a rather novel programme in these days of advanced music. The performance was a very smooth and effective one, although it left no such vivid impression as that listened to at the third concert. The Schumann symphony was particularly well played; of the Beethoven number, I have heard renderings that pleased me better through classical repose and elegance, and also through tonal richness. All the same, the efforts of the Boston Symphony orchestra are the most finished to be admired in the United States at the present writing. I make this admission with some shame, for the fact that New York is dependent upon Boston for orchestral playing of the best sort reflects little credit upon the artistic sentiment and liberality of our wealthy fellow-citizens.

Boston Daily Traveller.

MONDAY MARCH 24, 1890.

Last week's tour of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was the most successful the organization has had. In New York the audience was much larger than at any of the earlier concerts this season, and it should be borne in mind that the average attendance in all foreign cities upon Mr. Nikisch's concerts, has greatly exceeded that under Mr. Gericke. Philadelphia was as enthusiastic as ever over Mr. Nikisch and the playing, while in Washington Miss Mary Howe shared the honors generously bestowed by a vast audience. Mr. Joseffy and Miss De Vere and Miss Howe were the soloists. The orchestra does not make another tour until May, when the annual Western trip will occupy four weeks.

LINCOLN MUSIC HALL, - - WASHINGTON.

Friday Evening, March 21, at 8.

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Washington Concerts are under the management of BURDITT & NORTH.

Grand Opera House, New Bedford.

CONCERT,

UNDER THE AUSPICES OF THE

YOUNG MEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION,

BY THE

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

MONDAY EVENING, MARCH 24TH, 1890, AT 8 O'CLOCK.

PROGRAMME.

WAGNER,	OVERTURE. "Tannhæuser."
MEYERBEER.	ARIA. "Le Prophete." MISS EDMANDS.
GRIEG.	SUITE. "Peer Gynt." op. 46. DAYBREAK. THE DEATH OF AASE. ANITRA'S DANCE. IN THE HALLS OF THE KING OF THE DOVRE MOUNTAINS. (The imps are chasing Peer Gynt.)
	SONGS with PIANO.
PARRY.	a) THE POET'S SONG.
TAUBERT.	b) SLUMBER SONG.
MACDOWELL.	c) THE BLUEBELL. MISS EDMANDS.
BEETHOVEN.	SYMPHONY in C minor, No. 5. Allegro con brio.—Andante con moto. Allegro (Scherzo).—Allegro. (Finale).

SOLOIST:

MISS GERTRUDE EDMANDS.

The Piano used is a Chickering.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

[93]

LEDGER AND TRANSCRIPT.

Philadelphia, Thursday, March 20, 1890.

Academy of Music—Boston Symphony Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra never had a larger audience than the one that crowded the Academy last night, and never pleased one in this city more thoroughly. The symphony which topped the programme (where the LEDGER has so often kindly intimated it should always be placed) was Haydn's G (No. 13), and a more buoyant, fervid and brilliant performance of it has probably not been heard in Philadelphia. Had it not been the number that was being started at 10 o'clock—instead of the "Meistersinger" overture, it is certain it would not have been as keenly enjoyed as it was with the audience fresh in spirit and keen in interest, particularly as the two succeeding numbers contained passages that bordered on the tedious. The whole symphony was delightfully given, but the gem was the largo given with exquisite expression by the band.

Henselt's pianoforte concerto in F minor (Op. 16) followed, with Rafael Joseffy at the solo instrument. This is a composition that is not likely to gain in general favor by frequent hearings. It has enough of the show-piece element in it to allow of an exposition of virtuosity by such a player as Joseffy; but with this goes a mass of not particularly well scored orchestration on ideas that are disjointed and of no striking originality. Mr. Joseffy played some of the bravura passages with a little more of noise than of force; but, otherwise, his execution was, as usual, brilliantly clear, facile and artistic. A portion of the audience endeavored to induce him by repeated recalls to add to the concerto one of the smaller pianoforte solos in which he so distinctly excels, but he gracefully declined by bowing himself in each time he was called out.

The only other encore that was pressed was the Spanish ("Toreador") number of Rubinstein's "Bal Costume" duet (which was given with splendid spirit and stirring effectiveness), but this was not conceded.

The novelty of the evening was an overture, fantasie, as he calls it, by Tschaikowsky, with the title of "Romeo and Juliet," a composition of imposing proportions and style, but which might almost as well be styled the "Hamlet" or the "Julius Cæsar." It has less of the quaint rhythm than his work usually shows, and is frequently on the Hungarian Rhapsody order of Liszt, but if the music is not uniformly important it is generally original and broadly colored. Altogether the concert was one of the greatest successes the Boston Orchestra has achieved, and the fact can unhesitatingly be credited most largely to the skill and earnestness of its present accomplished leader, Arthur Nikisch.

The Washington Post.

WASHINGTON, MARCH 22, 1890.

A MUSICAL EVENT.

The Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Lincoln Hall.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its third concert at the Lincoln Music Hall last night in the presence of an immense audience. As early as 2 o'clock yesterday afternoon every seat in the house had been sold, and the walls were fringed by scores of people, who, being unable to obtain seats, willingly stood during the two hours the concert was in progress. The boxes were filled, and the scene presented by the vast and attentive audience was an inspiring one. The enthusiasm which pervaded the assemblage vented itself in demonstrative applause, and Mr. Nikisch received from the German legation a huge wreath of laurel, tied with broad ribbons of the German colors.

Nothing more musically stimulating and satisfactory has been heard in Washington than Mr. Nikisch's interpretation of the three numbers on the programme, the beautiful Fingal's Cave overture, the intensely emotional prelude to Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde," and the immortal fifth symphony of Beethoven. Mr. Nikisch seems to cast aside tradition in his readings and imbues the score with his own personality and thought, the latter influenced, though not entirely dominated by, Wagnerian ideas. It is a characteristic of his work that he dissects or lays bare with consummate skill the ideas and themes of the compositions which he undertakes to interpret. Nothing is opaque or turbid; every bar is permeated with light.

It was this characteristic that emphasized the beauty of the overture, and certainly nothing could have been more soulful, more intense than the Tristan prelude. One cannot imagine a more vivid portrayal of the rapture and the anguish of Tristan's fateful love, or a reading more perfect in both its mechanical execution and its conception. A reverential, almost devotional mood seemed to pervade the entire orchestra. From the love motive of the opening bars to the ecstatic chords which picture the lovers' defiance of death, there was a steady progression toward a wonderful climax that never faltered for an instant, and was as certain, deliberate, and enthralling as fate itself.

The rendition of the symphony was marked by a number of original and striking ideas. The opening bars were noticeably prolonged, and thus made doubly impressive, and the whole first movement was superbly given; the romantic coloring of the andante was beautifully pictured; the unique scherzo, with its curious runs for the double basses, and its impressive ending was given with charming elasticity and life, while the triumphal finale was absolutely exalting.

The soloist of the evening was Miss Mary Howe, who repeated her previous success, and was, indeed, compelled, after four recalls, to repeat the bell song from "Lakme." Her voice, as previously stated in THE POST, is a pure soprano of high range, exquisite execution, marvelous flexibility, and of great sweetness, especially in the higher register.

Philadelphia Inquirer.

THURSDAY, MARCH 20, 1890.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its fourth concert for the season at the Academy of Music last night before an audience which filled every seat in the auditorium, excepting the upper gallery, and even overflowing into the aisles. The symphony was Haydn's, in G major, and while the music, which does not employ the basses, seemed thin and colorless, it was beautiful in its way and served to exhibit the splendid quality of Mr. Nikisch's strings.

It was, however, in Rubinstein's "Bal Costume" numbers and Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture that the vertuosity of the orchestra was chiefly shown, and here its execution was dazzling in its brilliancy. The feature of the evening, however, was Joseffy's interpretation of Henselt's interesting but extraordinarily difficult piano forte concert in F minor. In all the years he has been playing here Joseffy has done nothing so great, both technically and intellectually, as this, and the repeated recalls which it elicited were thoroughly well deserved.

THE RECORD.

Philadelphia, Thursday, March 20, 1890.

—Last evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its fourth concert of the season at the Academy of Music. Joseffy played the Henselt concerto with masterly skill and true musical feeling, and the work of the orchestra was almost perfection. Three movements of Rubinstein's "Bal Costume" were rendered with delightful vivacity and entrain. Haydn's Symphony in G, Tschaikowsky's fantastic "Romeo and Juliet" overture, and the "Meistersaenger" vorspiel were the remaining numbers of the programme.

Boston Post

MONDAY MORNING, MARCH 24, 1890.

THE TRIP OF THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The trip of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last week to New Haven, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington was by far the most successful ever made. In New York, with no soloist and two symphonies, the fourth of Schumann and the fifth of Beethoven, there was the largest audience at any orchestral concert this season. The Academy of Music in Philadelphia, seating 3000, was filled to overflowing with an assemblage very like our own Boston audience. In Baltimore the influence of the Peabody Institute Orchestra, which gives a series of symphony concerts each season, was shown in a very large attendance of educated musicians, together with the representatives of Baltimore's best society. But in Washington the orchestra scored its greatest triumph. The new Lincoln Hall seats 1600 people, and every seat in the house was sold at noon on the day of the concert. The full limit of admission tickets was disposed of in a few moments after the doors were opened, and hundreds were turned away. A great laurel wreath tied with the national colors of Hungary was presented to Mr. Nikisch. Everybody in Washington goes in full dress to these concerts, and the spacious auditorium, the handsome boxes and both balconies completely filled with a brilliant company, comprising statesmen, diplomats, society leaders and musicians, the superb playing of the orchestra —all made a red letter night in Washington's brilliant season.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, MARCH 23, 1890.

The fourth and last concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra drew an overflowing audience to Steinway hall, on Tuesday evening, says Town Topics. Two symphonies and a dramatic overture were performed; Schumann's No. 1, in B flat major, and Beethoven's No. 5 in C minor, with Volkmann's overture to "Richard III." These works made up a rather novel programme in these days of advanced music. The performance was a very smooth and effective one, although it left no such vivid impression as that listened to at the third concert. The Schumann symphony was particularly well played; of the Beethoven number, I have heard renderings that pleased me better through classical repose and elegance, and also through tonal richness. All the same, the efforts of the Boston Symphony orchestra are the most finished to be admired in the United States at the present writing. I make this admission with some shame, for the fact that New York is dependent upon Boston for orchestral playing of the best sort reflects little credit upon the artistic sentiment and liberality of our wealthy fellow-citizens.

Boston Daily Traveller.

MONDAY MARCH 24, 1890.

Last week's tour of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was the most successful the organization has had. In New York the audience was much larger than at any of the earlier concerts this season, and it should be borne in mind that the average attendance in all foreign cities upon Mr. Nikisch's concerts, has greatly exceeded that under Mr. Gericke. Philadelphia was as enthusiastic as ever over Mr. Nikisch and the playing, while in Washington Miss Mary Howe shared the honors generously bestowed by a vast audience. Mr. Joseffy and Miss De Vere and Miss Howe were the soloists. The orchestra does not make another tour until May, when the annual Western trip will occupy four weeks.

LINCOLN MUSIC HALL, - - WASHINGTON.

Friday Evening, March 21, at 8.

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Washington Concerts are under the management of BURDITT & NORTH.

Grand Opera House, New Bedford.

CONCERT,

UNDER THE AUSPICES OF THE

YOUNG MEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION,

BY THE

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

MONDAY EVENING, MARCH 24TH, 1890, AT 8 O'CLOCK.

PROGRAMME.

WAGNER,	OVERTURE. "Tannhæuser."
MEYERBEER.	ARIA. "Le Prophete." MISS EDMANDS.
GRIEG.	SUITE. "Peer Gynt." op. 46. DAYBREAK. THE DEATH OF AASE. ANITRA'S DANCE. IN THE HALLS OF THE KING OF THE DOVRE MOUNTAINS. (The imps are chasing Peer Gynt.)
	SONGS with PIANO.
PARRY.	a) THE POET'S SONG.
TAUBERT.	b) SLUMBER SONG.
MACDOWELL.	c) THE BLUEBELL. MISS EDMANDS.
BEETHOVEN.	SYMPHONY in C minor, No. 5. Allegro con brio.—Andante con moto. Allegro (Scherzo).—Allegro. (Finale).

SOLOIST:

MISS GERTRUDE EDMANDS.

The Piano used is a Chickering.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

[93]

LEDGER AND TRANSCRIPT.

Philadelphia, Thursday, March 20, 1890.

Academy of Music—Boston Symphony Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra never had a larger audience than the one that crowded the Academy last night, and never pleased one in this city more thoroughly. The symphony which topped the programme (where the LEDGER has so often kindly intimated it should always be placed) was Hadyn's G (No. 13), and a more buoyant, fervid and brilliant performance of it has probably not been heard in Philadelphia. Had it not been the number that was being started at 10 o'clock—instead of the "Meistersinger" overture, it is certain it would not have been as keenly enjoyed as it was with the audience fresh in spirit and keen in interest, particularly as the two succeeding numbers contained passages that bordered on the tedious. The whole symphony was delightfully given, but the gem was the largo given with exquisite expression by the band.

Henselt's pianoforte concerto in F minor (Op. 16) followed, with Rafael Joseffy at the solo instrument. This is a composition that is not likely to gain in general favor by frequent hearings. It has enough of the show-piece element in it to allow of an exposition of virtuosity by such a player as Joseffy; but with this goes a mass of not particularly well scored orchestration on ideas that are disjointed and of no striking originality. Mr. Joseffy played some of the bravura passages with a little more of noise than of force; but, otherwise, his execution was, as usual, brillantly clear, facile and artistic. A portion of the audience endeavored to induce him by repeated recalls to add to the concerto one of the smaller pianoforte solos in which he so distinctly excels, but he gracefully declined by bowing himself in each time he was called out.

The only other encore that was pressed was the Spanish ("Toreador") number of Rubinstein's "Bal Costume" duet (which was given with splendid spirit and stirring effectiveness), but this was not conceded.

The novelty of the evening was an overture, fantasie, as he calls it, by Tschaikowsky, with the title of "Romeo and Juliet," a composition of imposing proportions and style, but which might almost as well be styled the "Hamlet" or the "Julius Cæsar." It has less of the quaint rhythm than his work usually shows, and is frequently on the Hungarian Rhapsody order of Liszt, but if the music is not uniformly important it is generally original and broadly colored. Altogether the concert was one of the greatest successes the Boston Orchestra has achieved, and the fact can unhesitatingly be credited most largely to the skill and earnestness of its present accomplished leader, Arthur Nikisch.

The Washington Post.

WASHINGTON, MARCH 22, 1890.

A MUSICAL EVENT.

The Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Lincoln Hall.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its third concert at the Lincoln Music Hall last night in the presence of an immense audience. As early as 2 o'clock yesterday afternoon every seat in the house had been sold, and the walls were fringed by scores of people, who, being unable to obtain seats, willingly stood during the two hours the concert was in progress. The boxes were filled, and the scene presented by the vast and attentive audience was an inspiring one. The enthusiasm which pervaded the assemblage vented itself in demonstrative applause, and Mr. Nikisch received from the German legation a huge wreath of laurel, tied with broad ribbons of the German colors.

Nothing more musically stimulating and satisfactory has been heard in Washington than Mr. Nikisch's interpretation of the three numbers on the programme, the beautiful Fingal's Cave overture, the intensely emotional prelude to Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde," and the immortal fifth symphony of Beethoven. Mr. Nikisch seems to cast aside tradition in his readings and imbues the score with his own personality and thought, the latter influenced, though not entirely dominated by, Wagnerian ideas. It is a characteristic of his work that he dissects or lays bare with consummate skill the ideas and themes of the compositions which he undertakes to interpret. Nothing is opaque or turbid; every bar is permeated with light.

It was this characteristic that emphasized the beauty of the overture, and certainly nothing could have been more soulful, more intense than the Tristan prelude. One cannot imagine a more vivid portrayal of the rapture and the anguish of Tristan's fateful love, or a reading more perfect in both its mechanical execution and its conception. A reverential, almost devotional mood seemed to pervade the entire orchestra. From the love motive of the opening bars to the ecstatic chords which picture the lovers' defiance of death, there was a steady progression toward a wonderful climax that never faltered for an instant, and was as certain, deliberate, and enthralling as fate itself.

The rendition of the symphony was marked by a number of original and striking ideas. The opening bars were noticeably prolonged, and thus made doubly impressive, and the whole first movement was superbly given; the romantic coloring of the andante was beautifully pictured; the unique scherzo, with its curious runs for the double basses, and its impressive ending was given with charming elasticity and life, while the triumphal finale was absolutely exalting.

The soloist of the evening was Miss Mary Howe, who repeated her previous success, and was, indeed, compelled, after four recalls, to repeat the bell song from "Lakme." Her voice, as previously stated in THE POST, is a pure soprano of high range, exquisite execution, marvelous flexibility, and of great sweetness, especially in the higher register.

Philadelphia Inquirer.

THURSDAY, MARCH 20, 1890.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its fourth concert for the season at the Academy of Music last night before an audience which filled every seat in the auditorium, excepting the upper gallery, and even overflowing into the aisles. The symphony was Haydn's, in G major, and while the music, which does not employ the basses, seemed thin and colorless, it was beautiful in its way and served to exhibit the splendid quality of Mr. Nikisch's strings.

It was, however, in Rubinstein's "Bal Costume" numbers and Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture that the vertuosity of the orchestra was chiefly shown, and here its execution was dazzling in its brilliancy. The feature of the evening, however, was Josefly's interpretation of Henselt's interesting but extraordinarily difficult piano forte concert in F minor. In all the years he has been playing here Joseffy has done nothing so great, both technically and intellectually, as this, and the repeated recalls which it elicited were thoroughly well deserved.

THE RECORD.

Philadelphia, Thursday, March 20, 1890.

—Last evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its fourth concert of the season at the Academy of Music. Joseffy played the Henselt concerto with masterly skill and true musical feeling, and the work of the orchestra was almost perfection. Three movements of Rubinstein's "Bal Costume" were rendered with delightful vivacity and entrain. Haydn's Symphony in G, Tschaikowsky's fantastic "Romeo and Juliet" overture, and the "Meistersaenger" vorspiel were the remaining numbers of the programme.

Boston Post

MONDAY MORNING, MARCH 24,' 1890

THE TRIP OF THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The trip of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last week to New Haven, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington was by far the most successful ever made. In New York, with no soloist and two symphonies, the fourth of Schumann and the fifth of Beethoven, there was the largest audience at any orchestral concert this season. The Academy of Music in Philadelphia, seating 3000, was filled to overflowing with an assemblage very like our own Boston audience. In Baltimore the influence of the Peabody Institute Orchestra, which gives a series of symphony concerts each season, was shown in a very large attendance of educated musicians, together with the representatives of Baltimore's best society. But in Washington the orchestra scored its greatest triumph. The new Lincoln Hall seats 1600 people, and every seat in the house was sold at noon on the day of the concert. The full limit of admission tickets was disposed of in a few moments after the doors were opened, and hundreds were turned away. A great laurel wreath tied with the national colors of Hungary was presented to Mr. Nikisch. Everybody in Washington goes in full dress to these concerts, and the spacious auditorium, the handsome boxes and both balconies completely filled with a brilliant company, comprising statesmen, diplomats, society leaders and musicians, the superb playing of the orchestra —all made a red letter night in Washington's brilliant season.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, MARCH 23, 1890.

The fourth and last concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra drew an overflowing audience to Steinway hall, on Tuesday evening, says Town Topics. Two symphonies and a dramatic overture were performed; Schumann's No. 1, in B flat major, and Beethoven's No. 5 in C minor, with Volkmann's overture to "Richard III." These works made up a rather novel programme in these days of advanced music. The performance was a very smooth and effective one, although it left no such vivid impression as that listened to at the third concert. The Schumann symphony was particularly well played; of the Beethoven number, I have heard renderings that pleased me better through classical repose and elegance, and also through tonal richness. All the same, the efforts of the Boston Symphony orchestra are the most finished to be admired in the United States at the present writing. I make this admission with some shame, for the fact that New York is dependent upon Boston for orchestral playing of the best sort reflects little credit upon the artistic sentiment and liberality of our wealthy fellow-citizens.

Boston Daily Traveller.

MONDAY MARCH 24, 1890.

Last week's tour of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was the most successful the organization has had. In New York the audience was much larger than at any of the earlier concerts this season, and it should be borne in mind that the average attendance in all foreign cities upon Mr. Nikisch's concerts, has greatly exceeded that under Mr. Gericke. Philadelphia was as enthusiastic as ever over Mr. Nikisch and the playing, while in Washington Miss Mary Howe shared the honors generously bestowed by a vast audience. Mr. Joseffy and Miss De Vere and Miss Howe were the soloists. The orchestra does not make another tour until May, when the annual Western trip will occupy four weeks.

LINCOLN MUSIC HALL, - - WASHINGTON.

Friday Evening, March 21, at 8.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1889-90

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Washington Concerts are under the management of BURDITT & NORTH.

Grand Opera House, New Bedford.

CONCERT,

UNDER THE AUSPICES OF THE

YOUNG MEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION,

BY THE

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

MONDAY EVENING, MARCH 24TH, 1890, AT 8 O'CLOCK

PROGRAMME.

WAGNER,	OVERTURE. "Tannhæuser."
MEYERBEER.	ARIA. "Le Prophete." MISS EDMANDS.
GRIEG.	SUITE. "Peer Gynt." op. 46. DAYBREAK. THE DEATH OF AASE. ANITRA'S DANCE. IN THE HALLS OF THE KING OF THE DOVRE MOUNTAINS. (The imps are chasing Peer Gynt.)
	SONGS with PIANO.
PARRY.	a) THE POET'S SONG.
TAUBERT.	b) SLUMBER SONG.
MACDOWELL.	c) THE BLUEBELL. MISS EDMANDS.
BEETHOVEN.	SYMPHONY in C minor, No. 5. Allegro con brio.—Andante con moto. Allegro (Scherzo).—Allegro. (Finale).

SOLOIST:

MISS GERTRUDE EDMANDS.

The Piano used is a Chickering.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Lyceum Theatre, - - Baltimore,

Thursday Evening, March 20, at 8.

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Baltimore Concerts are under the management of BURDITT & NORTH.

New-Yorker Staats-Zeitung.

Mittwoch den 19. März 189(

Steinway Hall. Vor total gefülltem Hause gab gestern Abend das „Bostoner Sinfonie-Orchester" sein viertes und letztes Konzert für diese Saison in Steinway Hall. Seitdem Herr Arthur Nikisch die Leitung dieses in seiner Art einzig dastehenden, ausgezeichneten Orchesters übernommen hat, haben die Konzerte desselben ohne Frage neuen Reiz für die New-Yorker Musikfreunde gewonnen. Trotzdem das gestrige Konzert nur reine Instrumental-Musik bot und das Programm nicht mehr als drei Nummern zählte, war, wie gesagt, der Saal (und auch die erste Gallerie) vollkommen gefüllt. Schumann's erste Sinfonie in B-Dur, der man ja auch den Namen Frühlings-Sinfonie beigelegt hat, wurde recht flott und frisch gespielt. Volkmann's hier längst bei Seite gelegte Ouverture „Richard der Dritte" wollte trotz der sorgfältigen Ausführung nicht recht munden. Aber die in jeder Hinsicht ganz vorzüglich gespielte fünfte Sinfonie von Beethoven in C-Moll, in welcher durch die Auffassung des Herrn Nikisch manche neue, frappante Wirkung erzielt wurde, rief den Enthusiasmus des Publikums wach, der sich denn auch nach jedem Satze durch demonstrativen Beifall bemerklich machte. Das Andante und das Scherzo wurden aber auch wirklich vollendet, mit poetischem Schwung und Feuer gespielt. In der nächsten Saison werden die Bostoner Musiker höchst wahrscheinlich sechsmal in New-York konzertiren.

Clipping from Tribune Dec

Date 3/17

Boston Symphony Concert.

The fourth and last but one of the Boston Symphony concerts this season will take place at the Academy of Music next Wednesday evening under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch. Upon this occasion the programme will consist of five numbers, all instrumental. The symphony will be Haydn's familiar work in G major, No. 13, B. & H. Other selections are an overture-fantasie, or symphonic poem, "Romeo and Juliet," by Tschaieowsky; the Meistersinger' Vorspiel, Rubinstein's "Bal Costume," and Henselt's gigantic concerto for two pianofortes in F minor. Mr. Rafael Joseffy, who has not played with the Boston Orchestra [illegible] will be the soloist.

Clipping No.

Clipping from Palladium New Haven Conn

Date 3/18

The concert given last evening by the Boston Symphony orchestra closed the most brilliant, satisfactory and successful series of orchestral entertainments ever given in New Haven.

Leaders like Arthur Nikisch are, like poets, born, not made. His orchestra is like a grand organ under the hand of its master. We have had during the four concerts a varied selection from the best of the old and of the modern master composers. There has been nothing trivial and nothing monotonous. To have heard all is to have have had a musical education by a royal road.

The first number upon the programme was the weird "Sakuntala," overtured by the famous composer of "The Queen of Sheba," Goldmark. The same style of composition which made the gorgeous opera in which Madame Lehman won her first renown in New York, so attractive, is apparent in the overture. It has been well said that in the work of Goldmark we find a felicitious blending of the music of the music of the Italian school and the earlier methods of Wagner. "Sakuntala" tells with oriental smoothness the story from the Sanskrit legends, vivified by the fire and genius of the Wagnerian school. No better leader to interpret the beautiful story could be found than Herr Nikisch.

The concerto by Mr Raphael Joseffy was rendered in the charming manner that well known pianist always gives to his pleased audiences. It would require the pen of a professional musical writer to depict in proper words the pleasure and enthusiasm of the large audience over the concluding piece of the programme, Rubenstein's "Bal Costume," the overture from "Die Meistersinger." If Mr. Ellis, the manager, will bring Herr Nikisch and the always-welcome Boston Symphony orchestra to New Haven next year, he may be sure of still larger audiences.

[94]

"Italia," a Dramatic Suite for Orchestra, by Arthur Weld, an American Composer.

This work received its first hearing at the 18th Boston Symphony Concert, three weeks since. The following review is from the pen of Mr. Philip Hale, in the Boston Home Journal:

Mr. Arthur Weld prepared for the "Programme Notes" a sketch of his Dramatic Suite "Italia," played here last week for the first time. This sketch is excellent, in that it is of a truly explanatory nature; it is short and sensible. Let us look at the Suite itself. The hymn with which it opens is interesting in its subject and treatment. Scholarship is shown without the palpable and blighting presence of pedantry. There is a knowledge shown of the character of the different instruments and a healthy employment of this knowledge. There is no break between the first and second movements, and possibly for this reason the mixture of movements seems too long spun out, and the attention of the hearer flags. Nor is the subject of the barcarole particularly interesting. The third movement, "a miniature scherzo and trio," is admirable from nearly every point of view, and is musically the best-balanced number of the work. Upon the fourth movement, "Amalfi; Una Sera d'Amore," Mr. Weld has evidently spent much earnest work. It is planned upon a large scale and is most elaborately treated. As is often the case, in spite of this toil, the movement is weak and inconsequential. There are a few charming passages, but there is a superfluity of detail; incessant modulations lead the hearer to no resting place; the passion which should shake the whole like a fierce pulse is frittered away into little bits; and it is too long. Mr. Weld is a young man; a man of strong mind and of marked individuality. It is curious that in a scene where one should naturally expect the exuberance and the unbridled passion characteristic of a composer of his age, that there should be such a lack of blood, such an absence of sensuousness. The woman who breathes the air of Italy is not the blonde of the north, the woman of Heine, who has no heart, and whose breast of snow covers the ice which lies beneath; her beauty is the bellezza folgorante; she is the sister of Juliet of Verona, whom the northern woman calls immodest. She has never been told that passionate love is shameful, nor could she, unmoved, speculate and calculate upon the relative value of males presented as attractions in the matrimonial market. Her love is without reason; when she loves it is with elemental passion. But the love scene of the Suite surely takes place in the foggy north; and love is cold and stops to think and question. On the contrary, the last movement, "Il Carnevale," is eminently characteristic. It is full of life; it reproduces the bustle, the good nature, the trivialty of the scene. It abounds in passages of exceedingly clever instrumentation. It is realistic and yet musical. It shows imagination; it shows a sense of color not seen in the other movements. If here and there passages may strike a smug and orthodox citizen as vulgar, that is the fault of the Carneval and not of Mr. Weld. With the exception of this last movement, the composer has not been fortunate in his "local coloring." The hymn or choral could be chanted by monks of other lands; the barcarole does not suggest the streets of water, does not recall the dead Venetian women of Browning, dear dead women whose hair of gold used to hang and brush their bosoms; while the slow movement is distinctly German, and we miss the dolore which eternally rhymes with amore in Italian strains. But this has nothing to do with the true musical merits and faults of the composition. It is an uneven work; the thoughts are not always worthy of the robes which cover them; admirable passages stand side by side with crudities; but there is very much more to be praised than blamed. Mr. Weld has publicly given evidence that he has a sensitive and musical nature; that he has studied long and well; that he is often ingenious in the art of putting things He steers clear of common places, and this is seen even in what at first hearing appeared crude and weak; he does not follow slavishly in ruts pointed out and approved by many, because they cannot strike out paths for themselves. Above all, he has shown that he can write for an orchestra; he is not afraid of daring combinations and striking contrasts; and, men and brethren, this writing for the orchestra is no easy task.

Mr. Weld directed his Suite and at the close was enthusiastically applauded. The orchestra, under his careful direction, played with precision and intelligence.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Lyceum Theatre, - - Baltimore,

Thursday Evening, March 20, at 8.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1889-90

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Baltimore Concerts are under the management of BURDITT & NORTH.

AMERICAN ART JOURNAL

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 22, 1890.

[94]

"Italia," a Dramatic Suite for Orchestra, by Arthur Weld, an American Composer.

This work received its first hearing at the 18th Boston Symphony Concert, three weeks since. The following review is from the pen of Mr. Philip Hale, in the Boston Home Journal:

Mr. Arthur Weld prepared for the "Programme Notes" a sketch of his Dramatic Suite "Italia," played here last week for the first time. This sketch is excellent, in that it is of a truly explanatory nature; it is short and sensible. Let us look at the Suite itself. The hymn with which it opens is interesting in its subject and treatment. Scholarship is shown without the palpable and blighting presence of pedantry. There is a knowledge shown of the character of the different instruments and a healthy employment of this knowledge. There is no break between the first and second movements, and possibly for this reason the mixture of movements seems too long spun out, and the attention of the hearer flags. Nor is the subject of the barcarole particularly interesting. The third movement, "a miniature scherzo and trio," is admirable from nearly every point of view, and is musically the best-balanced number of the work. Upon the fourth movement, "Amalfi; Una Sera d'Amore," Mr. Weld has evidently spent much earnest work. It is planned upon a large scale and is most elaborately treated. As is often the case, in spite of this toil, the movement is weak and inconsequential. There are a few charming passages, but there is a superfluity of detail; incessant modulations lead the hearer to no resting place; the passion which should shake the whole like a fierce pulse is frittered away into little bits; and it is too long. Mr. Weld is a young man; a man of strong mind and of marked individuality. It is curious that in a scene where one should naturally expect the exuberance and the unbridled passion characteristic of a composer of his age, that there should be such a lack of blood, such an absence of sensuousness. The woman who breathes the air of Italy is not the blonde of the north, the woman of Heine, who has no heart, and whose breast of snow covers the ice which lies beneath; her beauty is the bellezza folgorante; she is the sister of Juliet of Verona, whom the northern woman calls immodest. She has never been told that passionate love is shameful, nor could she, unmoved, speculate and calculate upon the relative value of males presented as attractions in the matrimonial market. Her love is without reason; when she loves it is with elemental passion. But the love scene of the Suite surely takes place in the foggy north; and love is cold and stops to think and question. On the contrary, the last movement, "Il Carnevale," is eminently characteristic. It is full of life; it reproduces the bustle, the good nature, the trivialty of the scene. It abounds in passages of exceedingly clever instrumentation. It is realistic and yet musical. It shows imagination; it shows a sense of color not seen in the other movements. If here and there passages may strike a smug and orthodox citizen as vulgar, that is the fault of the Carneval and not of Mr. Weld. With the exception of this last movement, the composer has not been fortunate in his "local coloring." The hymn or choral could be chanted by monks of other lands; the barcarole does not suggest the streets of water, does not recall the dead Venetian women of Browning, dear dead women whose hair of gold used to hang and brush their bosoms; while the slow movement is distinctly German, and we miss the dolore which eternally rhymes with amore in Italian strains. But this has nothing to do with the true musical merits and faults of the composition. It is an uneven work; the thoughts are not always worthy of the robes which cover them; admirable passages stand side by side with crudities; but there is very much more to be praised than blamed. Mr. Weld has publicly given evidence that he has a sensitive and musical nature; that he has studied long and well; that he is often ingenious in the art of putting things He steers clear of common places, and this is seen even in what at first hearing appeared crude and weak; he does not follow slavishly in ruts pointed out and approved by many, because they cannot strike out paths for themselves. Above all, he has shown that he can write for an orchestra; he is not afraid of daring combinations and striking contrasts; and, men and brethren, this writing for the orchestra is no easy task.

Mr. Weld directed his Suite and at the close was enthusiastically applauded. The orchestra, under his careful direction, played with precision and intelligence.

New-Yorker Staats-Zeitung.

Mittwoch den 19. März 189(

Steinway Hall. Vor total gefülltem Hause gab gestern Abend das „Bostoner Sinfonie-Orchester" sein viertes und letztes Konzert für diese Saison in Steinway Hall. Seitdem Herr Arthur Nikisch die Leitung dieses in seiner Art einzig dastehenden, ausgezeichneten Orchesters übernommen hat, haben die Konzerte desselben ohne Frage neuen Reiz für die New-Yorker Musikfreunde gewonnen. Trotzdem das gestrige Konzert nur reine Instrumental-Musik bot und das Programm nicht mehr als drei Nummern zählte, war, wie gesagt, der Saal (und auch die erste Gallerie) vollkommen gefüllt. Schumann's erste Sinfonie in B-Dur, der man ja auch den Namen Frühlings-Sinfonie beigelegt hat, wurde recht flott und frisch gespielt. Volkmann's hier längst bei Seite gelegte Ouverture „Richard der Dritte" wollte trotz der sorgfältigen Ausführung nicht recht munden. Aber die in jeder Hinsicht ganz vorzüglich gespielte fünfte Sinfonie von Beethoven in C-Moll, in welcher durch die Auffassung des Herrn Nikisch manche neue, frappante Wirkung erzielt wurde, rief den Enthusiasmus des Publikums wach, der sich denn auch nach jedem Satze durch demonstrativen Beifall bemerklich machte. Das Andante und das Scherzo wurden aber auch wirklich vollendet, mit poetischem Schwung und Feuer gespielt. In der nächsten Saison werden die Bostoner Musiker höchst wahrscheinlich sechsmal in New-York konzertiren.

Clipping from Tribune

Date 3/17

Boston Symphony Concert.

The fourth and last but one of the Boston Symphony concerts this season will take place at the Academy of Music next Wednesday evening under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch. Upon this occasion the programme will consist of five numbers, all instrumental. The symphony will be Haydn's familiar work in G major, No. 13, B. & H. Other selections are an overture-fantasie, or symphonic poem, "Romeo and Juliet," by Tschaieowsky; the Meistersinger's Vorspiel, Rubinstein's "Bal Costume," and Henselt's gigantic concerto for the pianoforte in F minor. Mr. Rafael Joseffy, who has not played with the Boston Orchestra before, will be the soloist.

Clipping from Palladium

New Haven Conn

Date 3/18

The concert given last evening by the Boston Symphony orchestra closed the most brilliant, satisfactory and successful series of orchestral entertainments ever given in New Haven.

Leaders like Arthur Nikisch are, like poets, born, not made. His orchestra is like a grand organ under the hand of its master. We have had during the four concerts a varied selection from the best of the old and of the modern master composers. There has been nothing trivial and nothing monotonous. To have heard all is to have have had a musical education by a royal road.

The first number upon the programme was the weird "Sakuntala," overtured by the famous composer of "The Queen of Sheba," Goldmark. The same style of composition which made the gorgeous opera in which Madame Lehman won her first renown in New York, so attractive, is apparent in the overture. It has been well said that in the work of Goldmark we find a felicitious blending of the music of the music of the Italian school and the earlier methods of Wagner. "Sakuntala" tells with oriental smoothness the story from the Sanskrit legends, vivified by the fire and genius of the Wagnerian school. No better leader to interpret the beautiful story could be found than Herr Nikisch.

The concerto by Mr Raphael Joseffy was rendered in the charming manner that well known pianist always gives to his pleased audiences. It would require the pen of a professional musical writer to depict in proper words the pleasure and enthusiasm of the large audience over the concluding piece of the programme, Rubenstein's "Bal Costume," the overture from "Die Meistersinger." If Mr. Ellis, the manager, will bring Herr Nikisch and the always-welcome Boston Symphony orchestra to New Haven next year, he may be sure of still larger audiences.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Lyceum Theatre, - - Baltimore,

Thursday Evening, March 20, at 8.

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Baltimore Concerts are under the management of BURDITT & NORTH.

New-Yorker Staats-Zeitung.

Mittwoch den 19. März 189(

Steinway Hall. Vor total gefülltem Hause gab gestern Abend das „Bostoner Sinfonie-Orchester" sein viertes und letztes Konzert für diese Saison in Steinway Hall. Seitdem Herr Arthur Nikisch die Leitung dieses in seiner Art einzig dastehenden, ausgezeichneten Orchesters übernommen hat, haben die Konzerte desselben ohne Frage neuen Reiz für die New-Yorker Musikfreunde gewonnen. Trotzdem das gestrige Konzert nur reine Instrumental-Musik bot und das Programm nicht mehr als drei Nummern zählte, war, wie gesagt, der Saal (und auch die erste Gallerie) vollkommen gefüllt. Schumann's erste Sinfonie in B-Dur, der man ja auch den Namen Frühlings-Sinfonie beigelegt hat, wurde recht flott und frisch gespielt. Volkmann's hier längst bei Seite gelegte Ouverture „Richard der Dritte" wollte trotz der sorgfältigen Ausführung nicht recht munden. Aber die in jeder Hinsicht ganz vorzüglich gespielte fünfte Sinfonie von Beethoven in C-Moll, in welcher durch die Auffassung des Herrn Nikisch manche neue, frappante Wirkung erzielt wurde, rief den Enthusiasmus des Publikums wach, der sich denn auch nach jedem Satze durch demonstrativen Beifall bemerklich machte. Das Andante und das Scherzo wurden aber auch wirklich vollendet, mit poetischem Schwung und Feuer gespielt. In der nächsten Saison werden die Bostoner Musiker höchst wahrscheinlich sechsmal in New-York konzertiren.

Clipping from Tribune ...

Date ... 3/

Boston Symphony Concert.

The fourth and last but one of the Boston Symphony concerts this season will take place at the Academy of Music next Wednesday evening under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch. Upon this occasion the programme will consist of five numbers, all instrumental. The symphony will be Haydn's familiar work in G major, No. 13, B. & H. Other selections are an overture-fantasie, or symphonic poem, "Romeo and Juliet," by Tschaicowsky; the Meistersinger Vorspiel, Rubinstein's "Bal Costume," and Henselt's gigantic concerto for the pianoforte in F minor. Mr. Rafael Joseffy, who has not played with the Boston Orchestra before, will be the soloist.

Clipping No. ...

Clipping from Palladium
New Haven Conn

Date 3/18

The concert given last evening by the Boston Symphony orchestra closed the most brilliant, satisfactory and successful series of orchestral entertainments ever given in New Haven.

Leaders like Arthur Nikisch are, like poets, born, not made. His orchestra is like a grand organ under the hand of its master. We have had during the four concerts a varied selection from the best of the old and of the modern master composers. There has been nothing trivial and nothing monotonous. To have heard all is to have have had a musical education by a royal road.

The first number upon the programme was the weird "Sakuntala," overtured by the famous composer of "The Queen of Sheba," Goldmark. The same style of composition which made the gorgeous opera in which Madame Lehman won her first renown in New York, so attractive, is apparent in the overture. It has been well said that in the work of Goldmark we find a felicitious blending of the music of the music of the Italian school and the earlier methods of Wagner. "Sakuntala" tells with oriental smoothneas the story from the Sanskrit legends, vivified by the fire and genius of the Wagnerian school. No better leader to interpret the beautiful story could be found than Herr Nikisch.

The concerto by Mr Raphael Joseffy was rendered in the charming manner that well known pianist always gives to his pleased audiences. It would require the pen of a professional musical writer to depict in proper words the pleasure and enthusiasm of the large audience over the concluding piece of the programme, Rubenstein's "Bal Costume," the overture from "Die Meistersinger." If Mr. Ellis, the manager, will bring Herr Nikisch and the always-welcome Boston Symphony orchestra to New Haven next year, he may be sure of ... larger audiences.

[94]

"Italia," a Dramatic Suite for Orchestra, by Arthur Weld, an American Composer.

This work received its first hearing at the 18th Boston Symphony Concert, three weeks since. The following review is from the pen of Mr. Philip Hale, in the Boston Home Journal:

Mr. Arthur Weld prepared for the "Programme Notes" a sketch of his Dramatic Suite "Italia," played here last week for the first time. This sketch is excellent, in that it is of a truly explanatory nature; it is short and sensible. Let us look at the Suite itself. The hymn with which it opens is interesting in its subject and treatment. Scholarship is shown without the palpable and blighting presence of pedantry. There is a knowledge shown of the character of the different instruments and a healthy employment of this knowledge. There is no break between the first and second movements, and possibly for this reason the mixture of movements seems too long spun out, and the attention of the hearer flags. Nor is the subject of the barcarole particularly interesting. The third movement, "a miniature scherzo and trio," is admirable from nearly every point of view, and is musically the best-balanced number of the work. Upon the fourth movement, "Amalfi; Una Sera d'Amore," Mr. Weld has evidently spent much earnest work. It is planned upon a large scale and is most elaborately treated. As is often the case, in spite of this toil, the movement is weak and inconsequential. There are a few charming passages, but there is a superfluity of detail; incessant modulations lead the hearer to no resting place; the passion which should shake the whole like a fierce pulse is frittered away into little bits; and it is too long. Mr. Weld is a young man; a man of strong mind and of marked individuality. It is curious that in a scene where one should naturally expect the exuberance and the unbridled passion characteristic of a composer of his age, that there should be such a lack of blood, such an absence of sensuousness. The woman who breathes the air of Italy is not the blonde of the north, the woman of Heine, who has no heart, and whose breast of snow covers the ice which lies beneath; her beauty is the bellezza folgorante; she is the sister of Juliet of Verona, whom the northern woman calls immodest. She has never been told that passionate love is shameful, nor could she, unmoved, speculate and calculate upon the relative value of males presented as attractions in the matrimonial market. Her love is without reason; when she loves it is with elemental passion. But the love scene of the Suite surely takes place in the foggy north; and love is cold and stops to think and question. On the contrary, the last movement, "Il Carnevale," is eminently characteristic. It is full of life; it reproduces the bustle, the good nature, the trivialty of the scene. It abounds in passages of exceedingly clever instrumentation. It is realistic and yet musical. It shows imagination; it shows a sense of color not seen in the other movements. If here and there passages may strike a smug and orthodox citizen as vulgar, that is the fault of the Carneval and not of Mr. Weld. With the exception of this last movement, the composer has not been fortunate in his "local coloring." The hymn or choral could be chanted by monks of other lands; the barcarole does not suggest the streets of water, does not recall the dead Venetian women of Browning, dear dead women whose hair of gold used to hang and brush their bosoms; while the slow movement is distinctly German, and we miss the dolore which eternally rhymes with amore in Italian strains. But this has nothing to do with the true musical merits and faults of the composition. It is an uneven work; the thoughts are not always worthy of the robes which cover them; admirable passages stand side by side with crudities; but there is very much more to be praised than blamed. Mr. Weld has publicly given evidence that he has a sensitive and musical nature; that he has studied long and well; that he is often ingenious in the art of putting things. He steers clear of common places, and this is seen even in what at first hearing appeared crude and weak; he does not follow slavishly in ruts pointed out and approved by many, because they cannot strike out paths for themselves. Above all, he has shown that he can write for an orchestra; he is not afraid of daring combinations and striking contrasts; and, men and brethren, this writing for the orchestra is no easy task.

Mr. Weld directed his Suite and at the close was enthusiastically applauded. The orchestra, under his careful direction, played with precision and intelligence.

[95]

THE

STEINWAY HALL

PROGRAMME.

NEW YORK, TUESDAY, MARCH 18TH, 1890.

FOURTH SUBSCRIPTION CONCERT

OF THE

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, ... Conductor.

TUESDAY EVENING, MARCH 18th, 1890,

AT 8 O'CLOCK.

PROGRAMME.

SCHUMANN.—SYMPHONY No. 1, in B flat.

Andante un poco maestoso.
Allegro molto vivace.
Larghetto.
Scherzo.
Allegro animato e grazioso.

VOLKMANN.—OVERTURE to Shakespeare's Richard III., Op. 68.

BEETHOVEN.—SYMPHONY No. 5, in C minor.

Allegro con brio.
Andante con moto.
Allegro (Scherzo).
Allegro (Finale).

Manager, ... CHARLES A. ELLIS.

Steinway & Sons' Pianos used at these Concerts.

Clipping from Union
New Haven Ct
Date 3/17

...ger necessary.

AMUSEMENTS.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

This evening the Symphony Orchestra will give the last concert in its line at the Hyperion. It will be without one of the best of the four. Arthur Nikisch will be the conductor and Joseffy the soloist.

Clipping from News
New Haven - Conn
Date 3/17

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concert under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, will take place at the Hyperion this evening. The program is an especially fine one, including the well known Overture from die Meistersinger by Wagner and Schubert's Unfinished Symphony in B Minor. The soloist for the evening is Mr. Rafael Joseffy, who will render Schumann's Concerto in A Minor. This is the last chance there will be this year of hearing this great orchestra play here, and all who avail themselves of the opportunity will be fully paid.

Clipping from Record
Phil Pa
Date 3/20

—The big Actors' Fund benefit will be given this afternoon at the Chestnut Street Opera House. The seats are nearly all sold, and the long and interesting programme will begin at 2 o'clock.

—Last evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its fourth concert of the season at the Academy of Music. Joseffy played the Henselt concerto with masterly skill and true musical feeling, and the work of the orchestra was almost perfection. Three movements of Rubinstein's "Bal Costume" were rendered with delightful vivacity and entrain. Haydn's Symphony in G, Tschaikowsky's fantastic "Romeo and Juliet" overture, and the "Meistersaenger" vorspiel were the remaining numbers of the programme.

Boston Daily Traveller.

THURSDAY, MARCH 27, 1890.

The regular rehearsal and concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week, will present Brahms's tragic overture, Vieuxtemp's violin concerto in A minor, and Dvorák's D major symphone.

Next Wednesday afternon the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the third young people's concert of the season. The occasion will be made notable because of the first appearance here of Mr. Theodore Reichmann, leading baritone of the Metropolitan Opera House, New York. Mr. Kneisel will also play a solo. The orchestral selections comprise: Overture, "Mignon," Thomas; "Danse Macabe," St. Saens; minuet and dance of the sylphs, from "The Damnation of Faust," Berlioz; and the "Tannhäuser" march.

[95]

THE

STEINWAY HALL

PROGRAMME.

NEW YORK, TUESDAY, MARCH 18TH, 1890.

FOURTH SUBSCRIPTION CONCERT

OF THE

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, ... Conductor.

TUESDAY EVENING, MARCH 18th, 1890,

AT 8 O'CLOCK.

PROGRAMME.

SCHUMANN.—SYMPHONY No. 1, in B flat.

Andante un poco maestoso.
Allegro molto vivace.
Larghetto.
Scherzo.
Allegro animato e grazioso.

VOLKMANN.—OVERTURE to Shakespeare's Richard III., Op. 68.

BEETHOVEN.—SYMPHONY No. 5, in C minor.

Allegro con brio.
Andante con moto.
Allegro (Scherzo).
Allegro (Finale).

Manager, ... CHARLES A. ELLIS.

Steinway & Sons' Pianos used at these Concerts.

Clipping from Union
New Haven Ct
Date 3/17

longer necessary.

AMUSEMENTS.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

This evening the Symphony Orchestra will give the last concert in its line at the Hyperion. It will be without one of the best of the four. Arthur Nikisch will be the conductor and Joseffy the soloist.

Clipping from News
New Haven - Conn
Date 3/17

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concert under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, will take place at the Hyperion this evening. The program is an especially fine one, including the well known Overture from die Meistersinger by Wagner and Schubert's Unfinished Symphony in B Minor. The soloist for the evening is Mr. Rafael Joseffy, who will render Schumann's Concerto in A Minor. This is the last chance there will be this year of hearing this great orchestra play here, and all who avail themselves of the opportunity will be fully paid.

Clipping from Record
Phil Pa
Date 3/20

—The big Actors' Fund benefit will be given this afternoon at the Chestnut Street Opera House. The seats are nearly all sold, and the long and interesting programme will begin at 2 o'clock.

—Last evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its fourth concert of the season at the Academy of Music. Joseffy played the Henselt concerto with masterly skill and true musical feeling, and the work of the orchestra was almost perfection. Three movemenis of Rubinstein's "Bal Costume" were rendered with delightful vivacity and entrain. Haydn's Symphony in G, Tschaikowsky's fantastic "Romeo and Juliet" overture, and the "Meistersaenger" vorspiel were the remaining numbers of the programme.

Boston Daily Traveller.

THURSDAY, MARCH 27, 1890.

The regular rehearsal and concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week, will present Brahms's tragic overture, Vieuxtemp's violin concerto in A minor, and Dvorák's D major symphone.

Next Wednesday afternon the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the third young people's concert of the season. The occasion will be made notable because of the first appearance here of Mr. Theodore Reichmann, leading baritone of the Metropolitan Opera House, New York. Mr. Kneisel will also play a solo. The orchestral selections comprise: Overture, "Mignon," Thomas; "Danse Macabe," St. Saens; minuet and dance of the sylphs, from "The Damnation of Faust," Berlioz; and the "Tannhäuser" march.

THE STEINWAY HALL PROGRAMME.

NOVELLO, EWER & CO.,

NEW YORK AND LONDON,

Music Publishers and Importers.

NEW COMPOSITIONS BY

ANTON DVORAK,

THIRTEEN PIANOFORTE PIECES,

OP. 85,

IN THREE BOOKS, EACH $1.50.

LIEBESLIEDER,

(LOVE SONGS,)

For Voice, with Piano Accompaniment, Op. 83, $1.50.

Special Depot of the Publications of ARTHUR P. SCHMIDT, of Boston.

JUST PUBLISHED:

HENRY HOLDEN HUSS,

DREI BAGATELLEN

FOR PIANOFORTE,

No. 1. Etude melodique, ...40 Cents
No. 2. Albumblatt, ...35 "
No. 3. Pastorale, ...35 "

Eastern Agents for the Publications of

WM. ROHLFING & CO., MILWAUKEE, WISC.

All music performed at Steinway Hall constantly in stock in the best and cheapest standard editions. Lists and Catalogues mailed free.

NOVELLO, EWER & CO.,

21 E. 17th St. (3 doors W. of B'way),

NEW YORK.

GEO. GEMÜNDER, Jr.,

27 Union Sq., NEW YORK.

FINE VIOLINS, BOWS, CASES, &C.

REPAIRING & RECONSTRUCTING.

THE BEST

MUSICAL

INSTRUCTION TO BE OBTAINED AT THE

METROPOLITAN CONSERVATORY

21 E. 14TH STREET, NEW YORK.

The Most Select Musical School in the United States.

EXCEPTIONAL ADVANTAGES.

ALL BRANCHES TAUGHT.

Among the eminent musicians actually employed at the Conservatory are:

Dudley Buck, Albert R. Parsons, Director Pianoforte Department; Harry Rowe Shelley, Paolo Giorza, Silas G. Pratt and Etelka Utassi.

Applicants without musical talent not accepted.

Send for Circular.

H. W. GREENE, General Manager. C. B. HAWLEY, Musical Director.

THE AMERICAN MUSICIAN.

EDITORS:

JNO. C. FREUND and J. TRAVIS QUIGG.

An illustrated 32 page paper, published every Saturday at 835 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

For Sale by all News Agents at ten cents per copy. Mailed to Subscribers at $4.00 a year in advance.

Largest Musical Paper with Largest Circulation in America.

The Steinway Hall Programme.

OFFICE, 109 & 111 E. 14TH STREET.

ADELINA PATTI AND CHARLES GOUNOD.

(CABLEGRAM.)

PARIS, Dec. 1, 1888.

Messrs. Steinway, New York:

Maestro Gounod enthusiastic over your piano at rehearsal of "Romeo and Juliet," held at my hotel. He would like to know price of same. Answer paid.

ADELINA PATTI, Hotel Bristol.

NEW YORK, Dec. 1, 1888.

Adelina Patti, Hotel Bristol, Paris:

Please cable number stamped on piano to Steinway, New York. Answer paid.

PARIS, Dec. 2, 1888.

Steinway, New York:

Piano 59,951. Compliments.

ADELINA PATTI.

The instrument proved to be a Steinway concert parlor grand; price was cabled over, at once accepted, and piano ordered by cable to be delivered to Maestro Charles Gounod, who sent the following cable dispatch:

PARIS, Dec. 6, 1888.

Mess. Steinway, Facteur Pianos, New York:

Mille graces, lettre suit. GOUNOD.

(TRANSLATION.)

Thousand thanks, letter follows. GOUNOD.

Letter from the Celebrated Composer CHARLES GOUNOD.

[TRANSLATION.]

PARIS, December 6th, 1888.

My dear Mr. STEINWAY:

I caused a cablegram to be sent to you this very day to transmit to you in the quickest way all my thanks for the superb Grand Piano and the liberal terms that you have made me thereon, and by which you respond in the most generous and princely manner to the wish of my delicious interprète, Mme. Adelina Patti, and to my lifelong admiration for your magnificent instruments.

Although I have not the talent of execution to develop all the resources of this Steinway Grand, nevertheless I hope that as artist I possess at least everything requisite to appreciate all its wonderful qualities and merits, and above all to realize your consideration enabling me to be the possessor of so perfect an instrument which your graciousness makes still more precious to me.

Accept, I beg of you, the assurance of my kindest regards with which I remain sincerely yours,

CHARLES GOUNOD.

LONDON DAILY TELEGRAPH, Nov. 27, 1888.

[Paris Correspondence.]

M. Gounod—whom I have just met at Madame Adelina Patti's -is most enthusiastic on the rendering of his music by the diva. I mentioned yesterday that he went through at her hotel the principal scenes in which Juliet appears, singing the part of Romeo as only M. Gounod knows how to sing. None who have not heard the composer at the piano can realize what effect can be produced by a singer who has no voice. This afternoon he contented himself with merely running his fingers over the keys in order to show how fine was the tone of the Steinway piano, and he was loud in its praise. The stories about M. Gounod being in bad health are quite unfounded.

METROPOLITAN OPERA HOUSE.

GRAND OPERA IN GERMAN

LAST WEEK OF THE OPERA.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 19th, 1890,

DIE GOETTERDAEMMERUNG.

LAST NIGHT OF THE OPERA,

FRIDAY, MARCH 21st,

DIE MEISTERSINGER, (BY REQUEST.)

SATURDAY, MARCH 22nd, 1890,

LAST GRAND MATINEE,

SIEGFRIED.

BOX OFFICE OPEN DAILY FROM 9 TO 6.

STEINWAY'S PIANOS USED EXCLUSIVELY.

1863 Twenty-Seventh Year. 1890

AMERICAN ART JOURNAL,

23 UNION SQUARE.

A Weekly Critical Review of Musical Art.

WM. M. THOMS, Editor.

Published Every Saturday. Quoted as an Authority on Musical Matters all over the World. Subscription, $3.00 per annum.

A CORDIAL INVITATION IS EXTENDED BY

Mr. J. W. CURRIER

TO ALL LOVERS OF MUSIC TO CALL AT

No. 18 East Seventeenth Street

AND HEAR THE

MASON & RISCH

New Improved Vocalion.

The best interpreter of Sacred, Orchestral, Operatic Music and Music Drama. The instrument is particularly adapted for Churches, Lodges, Private Music Rooms, Etc.

WOLFSOHN'S MUSICAL BUREAU, 331 EAST 14TH ST.

Concerts, Receptions, Musicales, &c., arranged.

JUST PUBLISHED:

"FROM THE TONE WORLD."

ESSAYS BY LOUIS EHLERT.

Translated from the German by HELEN D. TRETBAR.

CONTENTS:

Carl Tausig.—Robert Schumann and his School.—Frederic Chopin.—Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdi.—Robert Volkmann.—Tristan and Isolde, by Richard Wagner (2 Essays).—The Stage Festival at Baireuth.—A Scene from "Die Meistersinger."—Offenbach and the Second Empire.—Gervinus and purely instrumental Music.—Music Teaching and the Public.—Wagner, Makart and Hamerling. A Parallel.—Gounod contra Wagner.

288 Pages.—Cloth, $1.50.

MAILED UPON RECEIPT OF PRICE.

Published by

C. F. TRETBAR,

109 E. 14th Street, New York.

For sale at G. Schirmer's, 35 Union Sq.; Edw. Schuberth & Co.'s, 23 Union Sq.; and at the Music and Book Stores.

Miss LILLIE BERG,

The leading exponent in America of "LAMPERTI'S METHOD." European masters and composers annually consulted for style and interpretation. DELSARTE studies. Teachers for vocal and piano under Miss Berg's direct supervision at moderate rates. 337 West 59th Street. Send for Circular.

VIOLINS.

The largest and best selected stock in this country.

Do'nt buy elsewhere before examining my collection.

FINEST BOWS, BOXES, ITALIAN STRINGS.

Highest Grade of Repairing.

Satisfaction Guaranteed.

VICTOR S. FLECHTER,

23 Union Square.

THE STEINWAY HALL PROGRAMME.

THE NATIONAL Conservatory of Music
OF AMERICA,
Nos. 126 & 128 East 17th Street,
NEW YORK.

OFFICERS:

President, JEANNETTE M. THURBER.
Treasurer, RICHARD IRVIN, Jr.
Secretary, CHAS. INSLEE PARDEE, A. M.

INCORPORATORS:

Mrs. AUGUST BELMONT, Mrs. RICHARD IRVIN, Jr.
Mrs. WM. T. BLODGETT, Mrs. F. B. THURBER,
Mrs. THOMAS W. WARD,
AUGUST BELMONT, RICHARD IRVIN, Jr.,
ANDREW CARNEGIE, HENRY G. MARQUAND,
WILLIAM G. CHOATE, JESSE SELIGMAN,
†JOSEPH W. DREXEL, FRANCIS B. THURBER,
PARKE GODWIN WILLIAM K. VANDERBILT,
WILLIAM R. GRACE.

Founded for the benefit of Musical Talent in the United States, and conferring its benefits free upon all applicants sufficiently gifted to warrant the prosecution of a thorough course of studies and unable to pay for the same; and upon others of the requisite aptitude on the payment of a small fee.

THE COURSE

Embraces, as that of all European Conservatories of note, instruction in Singing, operatic and miscellaneous, Solfeggio, Stage Deportment, Elocution, Piano, Violin, Cello, Harmony, Counterpoint and Composition, Fencing, Italian, History of Music, Chorus and Orchestral Classes, etc. The

LIST OF PROFESSORS

Includes Monsieur Theophile Manoury, Principal of Vocal Department, Miss Eleanor Warner Everest, Mr. Christian Fritsch; Messrs. Frencelli, Pizzarello, Dulcken and Perrot, Messrs. Klein and Finck, Mr. Rafael Joseffy, Misses Pinney, Margulies and Comstock, Messrs. Huneker and Winkler, Mr. Leopold Lichtenberg, Mr. Jan Koert, Mr. Victor Herbert, Mr. W. V. Holt, Messrs. Senac and Bibeyran, Signor Cianelli, Mr. John Cheshire, Harp; Mr. Otto Oesterle, Flute; Mr. Joseph Schreurs, Clarinet; Mr. Rudolph Reuter, Bassoon; Mr. Arthur Trepte, Oboe; Mr. Ludwig Manoly, Contra-basso.

Children's classes in Solfeggio are held bi-weekly; Mr. F. Van der Stucken, Chorus Master and Leader of the Orchestra holds weekly Rehearsals.

THE NATIONAL CONSERVATORY IS THE ONLY MUSICAL INSTITUTE

In America in which the ground work of a thorough musical education is laid, and the structure afterward carried to completion. Its professors have been appointed without consideration of expense and wholly on their merits and reputation, and they form an

ADMIRABLE FACULTY

With no end in view but the impartment of knowledge and the consequent elevation of the public taste, with no other revenue than that contributed by lovers of music and the very small returns derived from the nominal tuition charged, and with no contribution whatever from talented candidates for admission unable to pay for high class tuition, it is believed that the National Conservatory addresses itself to all patriotic and music loving Americans as a

NATIONAL ENTERPRISE

Of the utmost importance to the artistic future of the land.

The Semi-Annual Entrance Examinations will take place as follows: VOICE, Monday, January 6th, 1890, from 10 to 12 A. M., 2 to 5 and 8 to 10 P. M. PIANO, Tuesday, January 7th, from 10 to 12 A. M. and 2 to 5 P. M. VIOLIN and 'CELLO, Wednesday, January 8th, from 2 to 5 and 8 to 10 P. M. CHORUS, Wednesday Eve'g, January 8th, from 8 to 10 o'clock. ORCHESTRA, Saturday Evening, January 11th, from 8 to 10 o'clock.

All communications to

CHAS. INSLEY PARDEE, A. M., Sec'y,
126 & 128 E. 17th St., NEW YORK.

AMERICAN PIANOS IN TROPICAL CLIMATES.

Via Brindisi.

Messrs. STEINWAY & SONS,
New York, U. S. A.

DEAR SIRS: I feel that I ought to tell you how much we prize your piano. It has been tuned but once since we came to this country in 1883, and so far as I can see, is just as good as when we got it in 1876. I would not take $1000 for it if I could not get another like it. All my daughters play and would hardly know what to do without it. You are doing grand work in giving such grand instruments to the music loving world. Wishing you still greater success,

Yours very truly,
B. D. WYCKOFF.

Subathee Panjab, India, March 15th, 1887.

Mme. ADELINA PATTI.

CHICAGO, ILL., Jan. 4th, 1882.

To Messrs. STEINWAY & SONS,
NEW YORK.

DEAR SIRS: Allow me to express to you the great satisfaction and pleasure that I have experienced from the use of your famous Pianos, which you have placed at my disposal during the concert tour now in course of progress in the United States.

During my artistic career in the art centres of the world, I have used the pianos of nearly all celebrated manufacturers, but none of them can be compared to yours—none possess to such a marvelous degree that sympathetic, poetic and singing tone quality which distinguishes the Steinway as peerless among them all. Before returning to Europe, I shall select and purchase one of your Grand pianos for Craig-y-nos Castle, my residence in South Wales.

Respectfully yours,
ADELINA PATTI.

FRANZ ABT.

NEW YORK, July 6th, 1872.

Messrs. STEINWAY & SONS:

GENTLEMEN: Permit me to thank you for the magnificent Upright Piano which you kindly placed at my disposal during my brief sojourn in New York, and I can only repeat what I have so often expressed verbally—that during my long career as Artist and Composer, I have met with many fine European and American Piano-Fortes, but none that combine grandeur and poetry of tone, elasticity of touch, in short, everything that renders a piano perfect, to such a high degree as your celebrated Piano-Fortes.

Very truly yours,
FRANZ ABT.

FELICIEN DAVID.

PARIS, June 28th, 1867.

Messrs. STEINWAY & SONS,
NEW YORK.

GENTLEMEN: I am only too happy to give you, in these lines, a very sincere testimonial of my admiration for the Pianos manufactured by your House.

In my idea they are superior to all that I have heard or tried to the present day, and in giving you this certificate, I not only fulfill a duty of conscience, but at the same time do render justice to the man and manufacturer who has realized in his productions the greatest progress in the art of Piano-making.

Accept, gentlemen, my best wishes for your well-merited success, and believe me

Your devoted
FELICIEN DAVID.

A. BRAUTIGAM,
MANUFACTURER OF AND DEALER IN
Upright, Square and Grand Piano-Fortes,
8 EAST 17th STREET,
Near 5th Ave., —— NEW YORK.

STEINWAY PIANOS TO RENT.

Rare Old Violins for Sale.

MME. DÉSIRÉE ARTÔT-DE PADILLA

Begs to announce that her address is

64 RUE JAUFFRAY, PARIS, FRANCE,

And that she is prepared to receive pupils professional and amateur.

Kuyler's
BONBONS, CHOCOLATES,
NOVELTIES IN FANCY BASKETS AND BONBONNIERES,
863 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

TRY OUR COCOA
FOR BREAKFAST AND SUPPER.

PURE!! HEALTHFUL!!!

SOLD BY LEADING GROCERS.

Miss MARIE KREBS.

NEW YORK, May 17, 1872.

Messrs. STEINWAY & SONS.

GENTLEMEN:—Ere leaving America to fulfill engagements in Europe, permit me to thank you for the many courtesies extended to me, but above all for your kindness in furnishing for my Concerts, during the last two seasons, your magnificent Concert Grands, the most perfect instruments I have met with during my artistic career.

Their tone is marvelously grand, of exquisite poetical and sympathetic quality, which was to me a perfect revelation when trying the Steinway Piano for the first time; and it is just this thoroughly musical quality of tone, invariably characterizing your Pianos, which so grows upon both the hearer and player, that a cultivated musical ear will prefer the tone of your Pianos to all others. The touch is simply perfect, elastic, pliable, and promptly responding to all and every demand made by the pianist.

After thoroughly testing your Pianos, both in private and public, I can conscientiously say that the Steinway Pianos are superior to all other American or European instruments known to me.

Yours sincerely,
MARIE KREBS.

MARIE ROZE-MAPLESON.

NEW YORK, July 19th, 1878.

Messrs. STEINWAY & SONS.

Possessing, as you do, the highest testimonials for your celebrated Pianos, from the greatest musicians of the age, it would be supererogation on my part to endorse the opinions of such Judges as Rubinstein and Liszt; but I cannot refrain from praising your pianos, for the wonderful manner in which they sustain the voice.

MARIE ROZE-MAPLESON.

Clipping from Union New Haven Ct
Date 3/19

...r necessary.

AMUSEMENTS.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

This evening the Symphony Orchestra will give the last concert in its line at the Hyperion. It will be without one of the best of the four. Arthur Nikisch will be the conductor and Joseffy the soloist.

Clipping from News New Haven - Conn
Date 3/17

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concert under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, will take place at the Hyperion this evening. The program is an especially fine one, including the well known Overture from die Meistersinger by Wagner and Schubert's Unfinished Symphony in B Minor. The soloist for the evening is Mr. Rafael Joseffy, who will render Schumann's Concerto in A Minor. This is the last chance there will be this year of hearing this great orchestra play here, and all who avail themselves of the opportunity will be fully paid.

Clipping from Record Phil Pa
Date 3/20

—The big Actors' Fund benefit will be given this afternoon at the Chestnut Street Opera House. The seats are nearly all sold, and the long and interesting programme will begin at 2 o'clock.

—Last evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its fourth concert of the season at the Academy of Music. Joseffy played the Henselt concerto with masterly skill and true musical feeling, and the work of the orchestra was almost perfection. Three movements of Rubinstein's "Bal Costume" were rendered with delightful vivacity and entrain. Haydn's Symphony in G, Tschaikowsky's fantastic "Romeo and Juliet" overture, and the "Meistersaenger" vorspiel were the remaining numbers of the programme.

Boston Daily Traveller.

THURSDAY, MARCH 27, 1890.

The regular rehearsal and concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week, will present Brahms's tragic overture, Vieuxtemp's violin concerto in A minor, and Dvorák's D major symphone.

Next Wednesday afternon the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the third young people's concert of the season. The occasion will be made notable because of the first appearance here of Mr. Theodore Reichmann, leading baritone of the Metropolitan Opera House, New York. Mr. Kneisel will also play a solo. The orchestral selections comprise: Overture, "Mignon," Thomas; "Danse Macabe," St. Saens; minuet and dance of the sylphs, from "The Damnation of Faust," Berlioz; and the "Tannhäuser" march.

THE STEINWAY HALL PROGRAMME.

RICHARD WAGNER.

TWO LETTERS FROM RICHARD WAGNER.

During the Grand Operatic Festival at Bayreuth in 1876, a number of new Grand pianos of the most celebrated European as well as of several American makers had been placed at Mr. Richard Wagner's disposal; among them a new Centennial Concert Grand piano made by "Steinway & Sons" of New York, which from its wonderful power, beauty and sympathetic quality far outshone all rival instruments and which Mr. Richard Wagner at once chose for his own private use.

In the beginning of 1879 Mr. Wagner was requested by Mr. Theo. Steinway to send this piano to the Steinway Central European depot, in order to receive the latest invention, the "Tone Pulsator," patented July, 1878. On sending the Grand, Mr. Wagner writes as follows:

"BAYREUTH, March 11th, 1879.

My dear Mr. Steinway.

I miss my Steinway Grand as one misses a beloved wife; it is wanting constantly, wanting everywhere. I no longer indulge in music since that Grand is gone, and trust its absence will not be too long protracted.

Very truly yours,

RICHARD WAGNER."

The following letter was written to Mr. Theodore Steinway by the great master shortly after the return of the Steinway Grand (now containing the Tone Pulsator) to his home:

"BAYREUTH, April 11th, 1879.

My dear Mr. Steinway.

Really, you ought personally to have witnessed the gratification which I experienced upon receiving back your magnificent Grand piano; you certainly would not have asked me to add another word.

I do indeed deem it humiliating for so many other branches of art, that this art of building piano-fortes alone should so closely approach such undeniable ideal perfection. I know of nothing in Painting, Sculpture, Architecture, Literature and unfortunately also Music, which—since I have comprehension of same—could compare with the masterly perfection reached in piano forte building.

From your communication, however, I readily perceive with what enthusiastic love you seek to attain the incorporation of the most "spirituelle" tone into the piano which heretofore had only served as the exponent of actual musical sound. Our great Tone-Masters, when writing the grandest creations for the piano-forte, seem to have had a presentiment of the ideal Grand Piano, as now attained by yourselves. A Beethoven Sonata, a Bach Chromatic Fantasia can only be appreciated when rendered upon one of your piano-fortes.

Although I do not possess the slightest dexterity in piano-forte playing, I delight in being able to do justice to your assumption of my inborn and cultivated sense of tone. For Sounds of such Beauty as those coming from my Steinway Grand, flatter and coax the most agreeable Tone-picture from my harmonic melodic senses.

In a word, "I find your Grand piano of wondrous beauty. It is a noble work of Art." And with a thousand thanks for this attention, I delight in being able to call myself

Your friend,

RICHARD WAGNER."

FRANZ LISZT.

WEIMAR, September 3rd, 1873.

Messrs. STEINWAY & SONS.

GENTS: The magnificent Steinway Grand Piano now stands in my music room, and presents a harmonic totality of admirable qualities, a detailed enumeration of which is the more superfluous, as this instrument fully justifies the world-wide reputation that for years you have everywhere enjoyed.

After so much well-deserved praise, permit me to also add my homage, and the expression of my undisguised admiration, with which I remain,

Very sincerely yours,

FRANZ LISZT.

THEODORE THOMAS.

CINCINNATI, July 19th, 1873.

Messrs. STEINWAY & SONS.

GENTLEMEN: I consider the Steinway Piano the best Piano at present made, and that is the reason why I use it in private and also in my public concerts. As long as the Pianos of Messrs. Steinway & Sons retain that high degree of excellence of manufacture, and those admirable qualities which have always distinguished them, I shall continue to use them, in preference to a other pianos.

Respectfully yours,

THEODORE THOMAS.

ANTON RUBINSTEIN.

NEW YORK, May 24th, 1873.

Messrs. STEINWAY & SONS.

GENTLEMEN: On the eve of returning to Europe, I deem it my pleasant duty to express to you my most heartfelt thanks for all the kindness and courtesy you have shown me during my stay in the United States; but also, and above all, for your unrivaled Piano-Fortes, which once more have done full justice to their world-wide reputation, both for excellence and capacity of enduring the severest trials. For during all my long and difficult journeys all over America, in a very inclement season, I used and have been enabled to use your Pianos exclusively in my two hundred and fifteen concerts, and also in private, with the most eminent satisfaction and effect.

Yours, very truly,

ANTON RUBINSTEIN.

ANTON SEIDL.

BERLIN, June 4th, 1887.

Messrs. STEINWAY & SONS,
NEW YORK.

GENTLEMEN:—It affords me the greatest pleasure to express to you my delight in the grand piano that you have recently shipped to our mutual friend, Mr. Albert Niemann. The wondrous beauty of its tone and quality, its easy touch, its enchanting pianos and glorious fortes, the perfect evenness from the lowest tones to the very highest—the latter of a distinctness I have never met with heretofore—all produce an entrancing effect. Unrequested I am compelled to express to you my highest admiration. Upon this grand piano the world-famed musical authority, Heinrich Ehrlich, performed an adagio by Beethoven; friend Franz Rummel played a Beethoven sonata and some of Bach's titanic music, while I essayed to interpret the orchestral language of Wagner. Everything sounded entrancing and sublime.

In the admiration of this your masterwork, and in the expectation of a speedy, joyful meeting, I remain, with highest esteem, your devoted

ANTON SEIDL.

H. A. ROST, STEAM PRINTING ESTABLISHMENT 14 FRANKFORT STREET, NEW YORK.

Clipping from Union
New Haven Ct
Date 8/17

...nger necessary.

AMUSEMENTS.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

This evening the Symphony Orchestra will give the last concert in its line at the Hyperion. It will be without one of the best of the four. Arthur Nikisch will be the conductor and Joseffy the soloist.

Clipping from News
New Haven - Conn
Date 8/17

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concert under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, will take place at the Hyperion this evening. The program is an especially fine one, including the well known Overture from die Meistersinger by Wagner and Schubert's Unfinished Symphony in B Minor. The soloist for the evening is Mr. Rafael Joseffy, who will render Schumann's Concerto in A Minor. This is the last chance there will be this year of hearing this great orchestra play here, and all who avail themselves of the opportunity will be fully paid.

Clipping from Re
Phil
Date

—The big Actors ...
given this afternoon ...
Street Opera House. T... all sold, and the lon... programme will begin...

—Last evening the ...
Orchestra gave its fou... season at the Academy ... played the Henselt con...
skill and true music...
work of the orchestr... fection. Three move...
stein's "Bal Costume... with delightful viva...
Haydn's Symphony in ... fantastic "Romeo and ...
and the "Meistersaen...
the remaining numb...
gramme.

Stockbridge Programme

CIRCULATION, 32,000. PORTLAND, FEB. 26, 1890. CHAS. PAINE, PRINTER.

HINDS' HONEY AND ALMOND CREAM

FOR THE FACE, HANDS, SKIN, AND COMPLEXION.

FROM ANNIE LOUISE CARY (Raymond.)

My thanks for the bottle of HONEY AND ALMOND CREAM are late in being made, but I wished to test it thoroughly. I am greatly delighted with it, and wish you would send a dozen bottles to my New York address.

Sept. 21, 1888. ANNIE LOUISE RAYMOND.

BY TELEGRAPH.

(From the distinguished prima donna, who sang in the Stockbridge Course last season.)

NEW YORK, April 21, 1888.

To A. S. HINDS, Portland, Me.:—I leave for Europe next Tuesday. Send me at once six large bottles HONEY AND ALMOND CREAM to Westminster Hotel.

FRUSCH MADI.

LONDON, Eng., Aug. 8, 1888.

MR. A. S. HINDS:

Sir:—Having had a bottle of your HONEY AND ALMOND CREAM from Mme. Frusch Madi, and finding it agreeable to me, would you kindly send six bottles of the same to

MR. RUDI LANDAUER,

Rue et hotel de Helder, Paris.

HOTEL VENDOME, NEW YORK, Feb. 4, 1887.

MR. HINDS:

Will you please send me as soon as possible, one and a half dozen HONEY AND ALMOND CREAM. I got two bottles when in Portland last fall, and like it so much that I want to distribute some among my friends in the hotel. I have never used anything for rendering the skin smooth that I like so much as this CREAM.

Yours very truly,

MRS. STANLEY.

HOTEL VENDOME, NEW YORK, April 20, 1887.

MR. HINDS:—My friends are delighted with the CREAM. One lady has sent an order through her druggist for six bottles. She told me she has never found anything before that she could use, her skin being very sensitive.

MRS. STANLEY.

MR. A. S. HINDS:

Dear Sir:—I have used your HONEY AND ALMOND CREAM for a long time, in families where I have been called, and consider it invaluable for chafing and irritation of infants. I invariably recommend it in preference to anything else, and have always derived great satisfaction from its use.

Also, as a dressing for blisters, I have found it superior to anything I ever used, giving immediate relief and healing quickly.

MRS. H. J. POTTER, Nurse,

124 Emery Street, Portland.

MR. A. S. HINDS:

I have been troubled with Salt Rheum on my hands very badly for several years; at times they have been so bad that I could not use them. I have tried everything. Last March I saw your CREAM advertised and thought, as a last resort, I would try it; before I had used one bottle my hands were perfectly well. I think I cannot be without it. Thanking you for ever making such a blessing, I remain, etc.,

MRS. E. A. THOMAS.

PRICE, - - 50 CENTS.
SPECIAL SIZE, - $1.00.

PREPARED BY

A. S. HINDS, Pharmacist,

PORTLAND, ME.

PROGRAMME.

THIRTEENTH ENTERTAINMENT.

Wednesday Evening, Feb. 26th.

GRAND CONCERT

—BY THE—

BOSTON

Symphony Orchestra.

(60 MUSICIANS.)

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor,

MR. FRANZ KNEISEL, Soloist.

1. OVERTURE, "Tannhaeuser," Wagner
2. TWO MOVEMENTS FROM CONCERTO FOR VIOLIN, Mendelssohn

   MR. KNEISEL.
3. SUITE, "Peer Gynt," Grieg
   - "Daybreak."
   - "The Death of Aase."
   - "Anitra's Dance."
   - "In the Halls of the King of the Dovre Mountains."

   (The imps are chasing Peer Gynt.)
4. AIR HONGROIS, Ernst

   MR. KNEISEL.
5. SYMPHONY in C Minor No. 5, Beethoven

   Allegro con brio.—Andante con moto.—Allegro (Scherzo).—Allegro. (Finale.)

NOTE.—The doors will be kept closed during the performance of each number on the programme.

The Fourteenth Entertainment in this Course will be a Grand Concert by Mr. Whitney Mockbridge, and the Portland Philharmonic Orchestra, Wednesday Evening, Mar. 19th. Tickets 50 and 75 Cents.

Less Money Required.

It affords us much pleasure to be able to report to our Portland patrons that less money will be needed this season for the purchase of furniture.

Better value is the rule in Chamber and Parlor Suits and the designs overreach any attempt yet made by the factories.

Parlor Suits in stuffed over styles are most fashionable and $60 will buy what would have cost $90 last season.

Our specialties are a Crushed Plush Suit at $45, a Spring Edge Plush Suit for $55, and Silk Plush for $65. All splendid goods.

Chamber Sets in Oak at $55 and $60, are massive, rich and convenient. Large Mirrors are the rule.

Splendid Ash and Antique Sets with the Cheval Mirror, so greatly admired, are offered at $30, and so on throughout all our departments.

We are pleased to state that careful buying enables us to save you money.

Carpets are elegant, so are Draperies.

Your presence at our store will offord us considerale pleasure and be of interest to you.

—THE—

Atkinson House Furnishing Co.,

HEADQUARTERS:

Cor. Pearl and Middle Streets,

PORTLAND, MAINE.

BRANCHES: Auburn, Rockland, Bangor, Biddeford, Norway, Gardiner, Waterville.

ISAAC C. ATKINSON, - Gen'l Manager.

Clipping from Mercury New Bedford Mass

Date 1

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Great Musical Treat at the Opera House.

The Young Men's Christian Association made not less than $375 for its building fund from the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in the Opera House last evening.

There was a crowded house and a good part of the audience was late, as is usual. The number which had not gained admittance at the advertised hour for commencing the concert was so large that it was not deemed advisable to commence promptly on time.

Mr. Arthur Nikisch, the new conductor of the orchestra, is a slender little man with a dark complexion, a full black beard, a shock of black hair with no parting, a rather expressive face, and a black dress coat of miraculous fit. His movements are very deliberate, rarely manifesting anything that could possibly be described as animation. He has been the subject of some hostile criticism by the musical critics of Boston, but while some have asserted that the orchestra shows signs of deterioration under his leadership, it is also true that this season has been one of the most successful, if not the most successful, the orchestra has ever had.

The programme was as follows:

Overture—Tannhauser. Wagner
Aria—Le Prophete. Meyerbeer
Miss Edmands.

Suite—Peer Gynt. Grieg
Daybreak.
The Death of Aase.
Anitra's Dance.
In the halls of the king of the Dovre Mountains. (The imps are chasing Peer Gynt.)

Songs with piano.
a. The Poet's Song. Parry
b. Slumber Song. Tauberi
c. The Bluebell. MacDowell
Miss Edmands.

Symphony in C minor, No. 5. Beethoven
Allegro con brio.—Andante con moto.—Allegro (Scherzo).—Allegro. (Finale.)

Of the instrumental numbers, the audience liked the Suite by Grieg, "Peer Gynt," best. It is of the style which is rather vaguely described by that sadly overworked word "popular." All the movements are very striking, and afford much scope for the exhibition of novel orchestral effects. The almost magical control of the leader over his orchestra was shown in a marked degree. Some of the audience tried hard to force a repetition of the last movement by persistent applause, but Mr. Nikisch only bowed gravely, and very properly ignored the demand.

Miss Gertrude Edmands was the soloist, and her appearance was a complete and unqualified success. All her selections were magnificently given, and won the hearty and well deserved applause of the entire audience.

The concert was a great success from every point of view, and the Young Men's Christian Association merits the thanks of the musical community for its enterprise in bringing this superb organization to New Bedford. Few better pleased audiences have visited the Opera House this season, and few entertainments have been so completely satisfactory. The association is in the line of good work when it provides such enjoyment for the people.

Clipping from Herald Baltimore Md

Date 3/21

...Corner, John R. Bland, William P. Harvey, S. B. Hasson, N. B. Talbott, Joseph Shipley, Col. William G. Scarlett, H. J. Broening, Barreda Turner and Leon Seliger.

The Bostonians Give a Delightful Concert.

A large, fashionable and appreciative audience assembled last night in the Lyceum Theatre, the occasion being the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the conductorship of Mr. Arthur Nikisch. The music consisted of five numbers, of which three were orchestra pieces and two were arias by Mlle. Clementine de Vere. The programme opened with Haydn's Symphony in G, No. 13, the rendition of which called forth many expressions of pleasure and praise. The next piece, an aria from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," was sung very sweetly by Mlle. De Vere, and was much applauded. This was followed by Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony," No. 8, in B minor, a noble fragment embodying the deepest emotion of the composer. An aria from David's "Les Perles de Bresil," sung by Mlle. De Vere, was well rendered and warmly received by the audience. The concert ended with Wagner's "Huldigung's March" by the orchestra.

The concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are always justly celebrated for their high standard of musical excellence, and the one given last night was no exception to the rule. Those who had the pleasure of being present were lavish in praise of the enjoyment which the concert afforded, and great credit is due for the excellent manner in which the numbers, both vocal and instrumental, were given. Mr. Nikisch, as a leader, has many excellent qualities, and the orchestra is composed of musicians of the highest order.

...Philadelphia Ti...

Date 3/20

...California.

THE FOURTH CONCERT.

Capital Rendering of Haydn's G Majo Symphony at the Academy.

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place las night at the Academy of Music before a audience limited only by the capacity o the house, was chiefly notable for a capita rendering of Haydn's major symphony.

Mr. Nikisch certainly deserves the thanks of all music lovers for reviving some of Papa Haydn's works which other conductors ignore in favor of modern composers. We have of late had such a surfeit of so-called program-music that the revival of classic work of such surpassing beauty as the Haydn Symphony, must be considered a welcome relief. No further proof of the truth of the assertion need be given than the appreciation with which the Overture Fantasie to "Romeo and Juliet," by Tschaikowsky, which was played later in the evening.

Why the composer should have imagined the noisy conglomeration of sound to be an opening to Shakespeare's tender tragedy must remain a riddle to the most unbiased listener. It might as well have been an overture to Rider Haggard's "She" or to any other blood-curdling mystery.

Three numbers from Rubinstein's "Bal Costume," the performance of the first Berger et Bergere not being up to the usual standard of the orchestra, and a very fine rendition of the prelude to "Die Meistersinger" completed the orchestral selections.

Mr. Rafael Joseffy was the soloist, and distinguished himself by a masterly performance of Heuselt's concerto. It is d... deed doubtful whether the favorite pianist has ever played with so much verve in th... city. Mr. Nikisch again directed all th... orchestral numbers from memory.

Date 3/20

Tesla ... at least half a dozen languages ... thirty-three years of age.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA CONCERT.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, was finely successful at the Academy of Music last evening. The occasion was most noticeable, viewed either from the point of excellence of programme and performance, or from the hearty evidences of popular interest shown both in an attendance of unusual character and in applause of a pronounced kind. The Academy has rarely been better filled and the spirit of enjoyment was manifest. The entertainment consisted of a Haydn Symphony (No. 13), Henselt's Piano Forte Concerto in F, Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" fantaisie, Rubenstein's "Bal Costume," and the overture to Der Meistersinger. The selections were given in the order here stated, and it may be seen from it that there was an evident plan to contrast the music of different periods. In Haydn we had an extreme simplicity, almost the orchestral beginnings; Henselt illustrated a middle period; while from that on the programme emphasized ever more strongly the full richness and wealth of resource of modern instrumentation. The contrasts were very suggestive indeed, and, oddly enough, the places of special enjoyment were found to be the two most widely separated tone-fields. Anything more unlike than the primitive ingenuousness of Haydn and the involved harmonies of Wagner can hardly be conceived, yet those two things were undeniedly the ones which excited the keenest delight last evening. There is splendid richness in the Tschaikowsky music also, and in the Henselt as well, although it is to be feared that the solo part dulled attention to much the best portion of work, the orchestral division;—but this is to ... pected in a composition arranged with the view ... giving a virtuoso especial opportunity. Mr. Joseffy carried the piano forte part with splendid vigor and expression,—his beauty of touch suffering nothing from the contrasting passages of force;—a quite masterful exhibition. The Rubinstein music was rather insignificant compared with the rest, though it has a popular cast which gained it much applause. It was a noble concert truly, and the monster assemblance streamed away from the Academy when it was over in a great state of exhilation and delight.

THE EVENING STAR.

WASHINGTON.

SATURDAY ..... March 22, 1890

The Symphony Concert.

An audience that filled Lincoln music hall to its utmost capacity last evening renewed and verified the assurance of the deep interest felt by the generous culture of Washington in the work of the Boston symphony orchestra and its remarkable conductor, Mr. Nikisch. Much of this was doubtless due as well to the reappearance of Miss Mary Howe, who made her most ambitious attempt in the bell song from Delibes' "Lakme," an aria whose florid elaborations have a much clearer musical significance than many others of its class and in the performance of which must be met a correspondingly greater demand upon the singer's abilities. Not only did Miss Howe reveal again, and even more fully than before, the beautiful freshness, flexibility and the wide compass of her voice, but she gave to the whole aria that individual color, half French, half oriental, that constitutes its great charm. It was a thoroughly enjoyable performance. The magic of Mr. Nikisch's touch upon Beethoven's Fifth Symphony revealed new beauties and in the marvelous prelude to Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde" the orchestra rose to the fullest measure of its ability and gave a performance of immensely moving power—a performance reaching the summit of the emotional expressiveness of this wonderful bit of Wagner's work

[96]

REDUCTION

RATIO

14x

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

1.0

1.1

1.25

1.4

1.6

1.8

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

3.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

Messrs. Owen, Moore & Co. are at present selling a fourteen button length French Kid Glove at $2.00; as good in color and quality as any they have ever sold before for $3.50.

FINE LEATHER GOODS,

Holiday Goods,

ARTISTIC WALL PAPERS,

—AT—

LORING, SHORT & HARMON'S,

Booksellers and Stationers,

CONGRESS ST., - OPP. PREBLE HOUSE.

THE

New England Organ Co.

Manufacturers of the World's Favorite's, the Woodward & Brown,

—AND—

Lawrence & Son

PIANOS.

Also, the Celebrated

New England Organ.

Prices Lower than any other Music House in the State for First-Class Goods.

Tuning and Repairing a Specialty.

Pianos Tuned by the year, by a thoroughly competent Tuner, and fully warranted.

394 CONGRESS STREET,

Opposite City Hall, - PORTLAND, ME.

M. E. FAIRWEATHER,

Dressmaking and Fancy Work,

593 CONGRESS ST.,

PORTLAND, - MAINE.

"And I want to say, 'To my husband,' in an appropriate place," said the widow in conclusion to Slab, the gravestone man. "Yessum," said Slab. And the inscription went on: "To my husband in an appropriate place."

Wibble—What do you think of adopting the sun-flower as the national flower.

Wabble—Pretty good idea I think. It is typical of quite a numerous class of Americans. It makes a big spread all summer, and is very seedy in the fall.

"Mr. Affable, I have looked at your expense account," said the head of the house, peering over his glasses at the traveling salesman, "and there is one of them here I I do not understand. It is mucilage, $118. what does that mean?"

"It means," said the salesman, who had a good week's business and was correspondingly reckless, "It means, that is where you get stuck."

"How jaded your horse looks, cabman!" remarked the old lady, as she dismounted from the cab. "Is not the bit uncomfortably large for his mouth?" "It ain't the big bit in his mouth, mum. It's the small bit in his stomach."

"I'm in the oil business," he explained. "I sometimes handle as much as ten thousand barrels of crude in a single day."

"Is it possible!" she responded. "Ten thousand? It must make you very tired."

Lawyer—"Do you understand the nature of an oath, madam?"

Witness—"Well, I should say I did. My husband took off the screens yesterday, and is putting up the stovepipes to-day."

ABNER W. LOWELL,

Successor to WM. S. LOWELL,

Fashionable Stationer,

Wedding, Party and Visiting Cards.

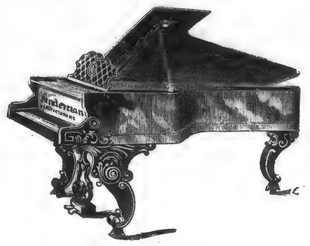
513 CONGRESS ST.

ROBERT B. SWIFT,

OPTICIAN.

513 CONGRESS STREET.

PIANOS.



Steinway,

The Leader of the World.

Hardman,

Renowned for Tone and Durability.

Lindeman,

Superb Touch and Singing Qualities.

Smith American,

Favorite of all who know them.

Fischer,

Elegant Uprights, Squares and Grands.

Newby & Evans,

The Best Low Priced Piano Made.

Tuning, Repairing and Renting.

H. A. WOODWARD,

540 CONGRESS ST., Rines Building.

Pupils thoroughly instructed in SHORTHAND and TYPE-WRITING. Lessons given day and evening.

MISS A. L. SAWYER,

Brown Block, - 537 Congress Street.

A fine line of Gents' Waukenphast Bals. and Congress Boots.

Call and see them and get our prices.

J. P. WELCH, - 421 Congress St.

Full Dress Furnishings.

We make a specialty of Full Dress and Party Goods in our furnishing department, carrying at all times a large assortment of DRESS SHIRTS IN PLAIN AND EMBROIDERED BOSOMS.

Fine Lawn and Satin Neckwear.

The Gant De Luxe Gloves.

The Latest Styles in Collars.

DRESS COAT SHIELDS, &c., &c. TRY OUR FIVE PLY LINEN COLLARS. CUSTOM MADE DRESS COATS AND VESTS TO LOAN.

HASKELL & JONES,

Lancaster Building, - 470 Congress St.

YOU will find at our new store, everything usually kept in a well regulated

Book and Stationery Store.

STEVENS & JONES,

UNDER FALMOUTH HOTEL,

PORTLAND, - - MAINE.

Grewer's Vienna Cafe,

508 CONGRESS ST.

After the Entertainment, call at GREWER'S CAFE for ICE CREAM OR LUNCH.

Oysters served in Every Style.

I have fitted up rooms elegantly, for private parties, and most cordially invite your inspection.

For Fall and Winter

FOOTWEAR

—CALL AT—

SMITH & CRAM'S,

121 Exchange St., - Near Congress.

C. H. LAMSON

WATCHES & JEWELRY,

Clocks, Spectacles, &c.

SPECIAL SALE OF

OPERA GLASSES.

Best Imported, Large Assortment.

177 MIDDLE ST., - - PORTLAND.

COMING!

P. S. GILMORE

And His Full Band in

3 Jubilee Concerts,

At City Hall. Tickets now on sale at Stockbridge's.

Everything in the Music Line at Stockbridge's. Music, Music Books, Musical Instruments, Trimmings, Merchandise, 540 Congress Street, Rines Build'g.

The Excellence of the Productions from

WEST & CALDERWOOD'S

Catering and Confectionery Store,

534 CONGRESS STREET,

(Next door to the Bakery) is being testified to daily by increasing sales.

The Purest and Freshest Bon Bons, The Finest Charlotte Russe, The Best Ice Cream, The Nicest Pastry,

The Coldest Soda, The Daintiest Ices, The Most Delicate Sherbets, The Richest Chocolates, are only a few of the many kinds of goods made and sold. Families supplied.

"Smith used to be one of the quietest men going," remarked Jones, the other day, "mild and inoffensive, but now I hear he is constantly in hot water with his neighbors." "O well," said Brown, "you must understand that he has lately bought a dog."

Head of Firm—Mr. Travers, while you were at lunch your tailor called to collect a bill. I am surprised and pained, sir, to learn that you are in arrears. Isn't it possible for you to live on your salary? Travers—Certainly it is, sir; but you don't expect me to support my creditors, too?

Little Bertrand had promised his mother always to count one hundred before speaking after becoming angry. One day his sister snatched an orange from him, and his angry retort came in a suspiciously short time. "Bertrand," said his mother, "did you count one hundred?" "Yes'm" "How did you count it?" "Ten, twenty, thirty, forty, fifty, sixty, seventy, eighty, ninety, hund'ed."

"Mr. Sharpleigh," said the gentleman's wife. "Yes, my dear." "You must think me exceedingly dull of perception." "Indeed I do not." "It is very unkind and disagreeable of you, too." "What do you mean?" "I suppose you thought I wouldn't notice it." "Notice what?" "That you did nothing this morning but whistle 'With All Her Faults I Love Her Still.' And I'll say right here that I may have faults; I know it as well as anybody; but I won't be still no matter how much you throw out hints."

BOYNTON THE JEWELER.

If you break the MAINSPRING of your Watch, you can have a new one put in and warranted Two Years for

ONE DOLLAR.

I Clean Watches and warrant them for $1.

WATCH CRYSTALS, 10 CTS.

The Store with the Sidewalk Clock.

LADIES

Who are accustomed to wearing FINE SHOES, will please take notice that

WYER GREENE & CO.,

Have the exclusive sale in Portland of the celebrated

Laird, Schober & Mitchell Fine Shoes.

We also use the Goodyear Glove Company's RUBBERS.

539 CONGRESS STREET.

CHAS. F. DAM,

Sign and Banner Painter,

118 EXCHANGE ST.,

PORTLAND, - MAINE.

PUT UP EXPRESSLY

FOR FAMILY USE

in 3, 5, and 10 lb. pails and 10 lb. tubs; also by the tierce, barrel, half barrels and tubs; is for sale by every first-class grocer and provision dealer—all lard rendered by us is free from all Cotton Seed Oil, Tallow, Suet, and other adulterations so commonly used, and WARRANTED STRICTLY PURE. None genuine without our name stamped upon the package.

PURE LARD

JOHN P. SQUIRE & CO.,

BOSTON, MASS.

CHAS. PAINE,

PLAIN AND FANCY

PRINTING

AT REASONABLE PRICES.

118 EXCHANGE ST.

MILLINERY.

Fine Marabout Pompoms and Ostrich Tips in delicate shades for evening wear.

JOHN E. PALMER,

No. 543 Congress St.

Clipping from News New Haven Conn

Date 3/17

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concert under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, will take place at the Hyperion this evening. The program is an especially fine one, including the well known Overture from die Meistersinger by Wagner and Schubert's Unfinished Symphony in B Minor. The soloist for the evening is Mr. Rafael Joseffy, who will render Schumann's Concerto in A Minor. This is the last chance there will be this year of hearing this great orchestra play here, and all who avail themselves of the opportunity will be fully paid.

Clipping from Record Phil Pa

Date 3/20

—The big Acolian Fund Concert was given this afternoon at the Chestnut Street Opera House. The seats are nearly all sold, and the long and interesting programme will begin at 2 o'clock.

—Last evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its fourth concert of the season at the Academy of Music. Joseffy played the Henselt concerto with masterly skill and true musical feeling, and the work of the orchestra was almost perfection. Three movements of Rubinstein's "Bal Costume" were rendered with delightful vivacity and entrain. Haydn's Symphony in G, Tschaikowsky's fantastic "Romeo and Juliet" overture, and the "Meistersaenger" vorspiel were the remaining numbers of the programme.

Boston Daily Traveller.

THURSDAY, MARCH 27, 1890.

The regular rehearsal and concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week, will present Brahms's tragic overture, Vieuxtemp's violin concerto in A minor, and Dvorák's D major symphone.

Next Wednesday afternon the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the third young people's concert of the season. The occasion will be made notable because of the first appearance here of Mr. Theodore Reichmann, leading baritone of the Metropolitan Opera House, New York. Mr. Kneisel will also play a solo. The orchestral selections comprise: Overture, "Mignon," Thomas; "Danse Macabe," St. Saens; minuet and dance of the sylphs, from "The Damnation of Faust," Berlioz; and the "Tannhäuser" march.

Clipping from Herald Baltimore Md

Date 3/24

...Conductor Stasny, James ... Corner, John R. Bland, William P. Harvey, S. B. Hasson, N. E. Pollock, Joseph Shipley, Col. William G. Scarlett, H. J. Broening, Barreda Parker and Leon Seliger.

The Bostonians Give a Delightful Concert.

A large, fashionable and appreciative audience assembled last night in the Lyceum Theatre, the occasion being the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the conductorship of Mr. Arthur Nikisch. The music consisted of five numbers, of which three were orchestra pieces and two were arias by Mlle. Clementine de Vere. The programme opened with Haydn's Symphony in G, No. 13, the rendition of which called forth many expressions of pleasure and praise. The next piece, an aria from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," was sung very sweetly by Mlle. De Vere, and was much applauded. This was followed by Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony," No. 8, in B minor, a noble fragment embodying the deepest emotion of the composer. An aria from David's "Les Perles de Bresil," sung by Mlle. De Vere, was well rendered and warmly received by the audience. The concert ended with Wagner's "Huldigung's March" by the orchestra.

The concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are always justly celebrated for their high standard of musical excellence, and the one given last night was no exception to the rule. Those who had the pleasure of being present were lavish in praise of the enjoyment which the concert afforded, and great credit is due for the excellent manner in which the numbers, both vocal and instrumental, were given. Mr. Nikisch, as a leader, has many excellent qualities, and the orchestra is composed of musicians of the highest order.

Philadelphia Ti...

Date 3/20

...California.

THE FOURTH CONCERT.

Capital Rendering of Haydn's G Major Symphony at the Academy.

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place last night at the Academy of Music before an audience limited only by the capacity of the house, was chiefly notable for a capital rendering of Haydn's major symphony.

Mr. Nikisch certainly deserves the thanks of all music lovers for reviving some of Papa Haydn's works which other conductors ignore in favor of modern composers. We have of late had such a surfeit of so-called program-music that the revival of classic work of such surpassing beauty as the Haydn Symphony, must be considered a welcome relief. No further proof of the truth of the assertion need be given than the appreciation with which the Overture Fantasie to "Romeo and Juliet," by Tschaikowsky, which was played later in the evening.

Why the composer should have imagined the noisy conglomeration of sound to be an opening to Shakespeare's tender tragedy must remain a riddle to the most unbiased listener. It might as well have been an overture to Rider Haggard's "She" or to any other blood-curdling mystery.

Three numbers from Rubinstein's "Bal Costume," the performance of the first Berger et Bergere not being up to the usual standard of the orchestra, and a very fine rendition of the prelude to "Die Meistersinger" completed the orchestral selections. Mr. Rafael Joseffy was the soloist, and distinguished himself by a masterly performance of Henselt's concerto. It is indeed doubtful whether the favorite pianist has ever played with so much verve in the city. Mr. Nikisch again directed all the orchestral numbers from memory.

Date ... '20

...is thirty-three years of age.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA CONCERT.

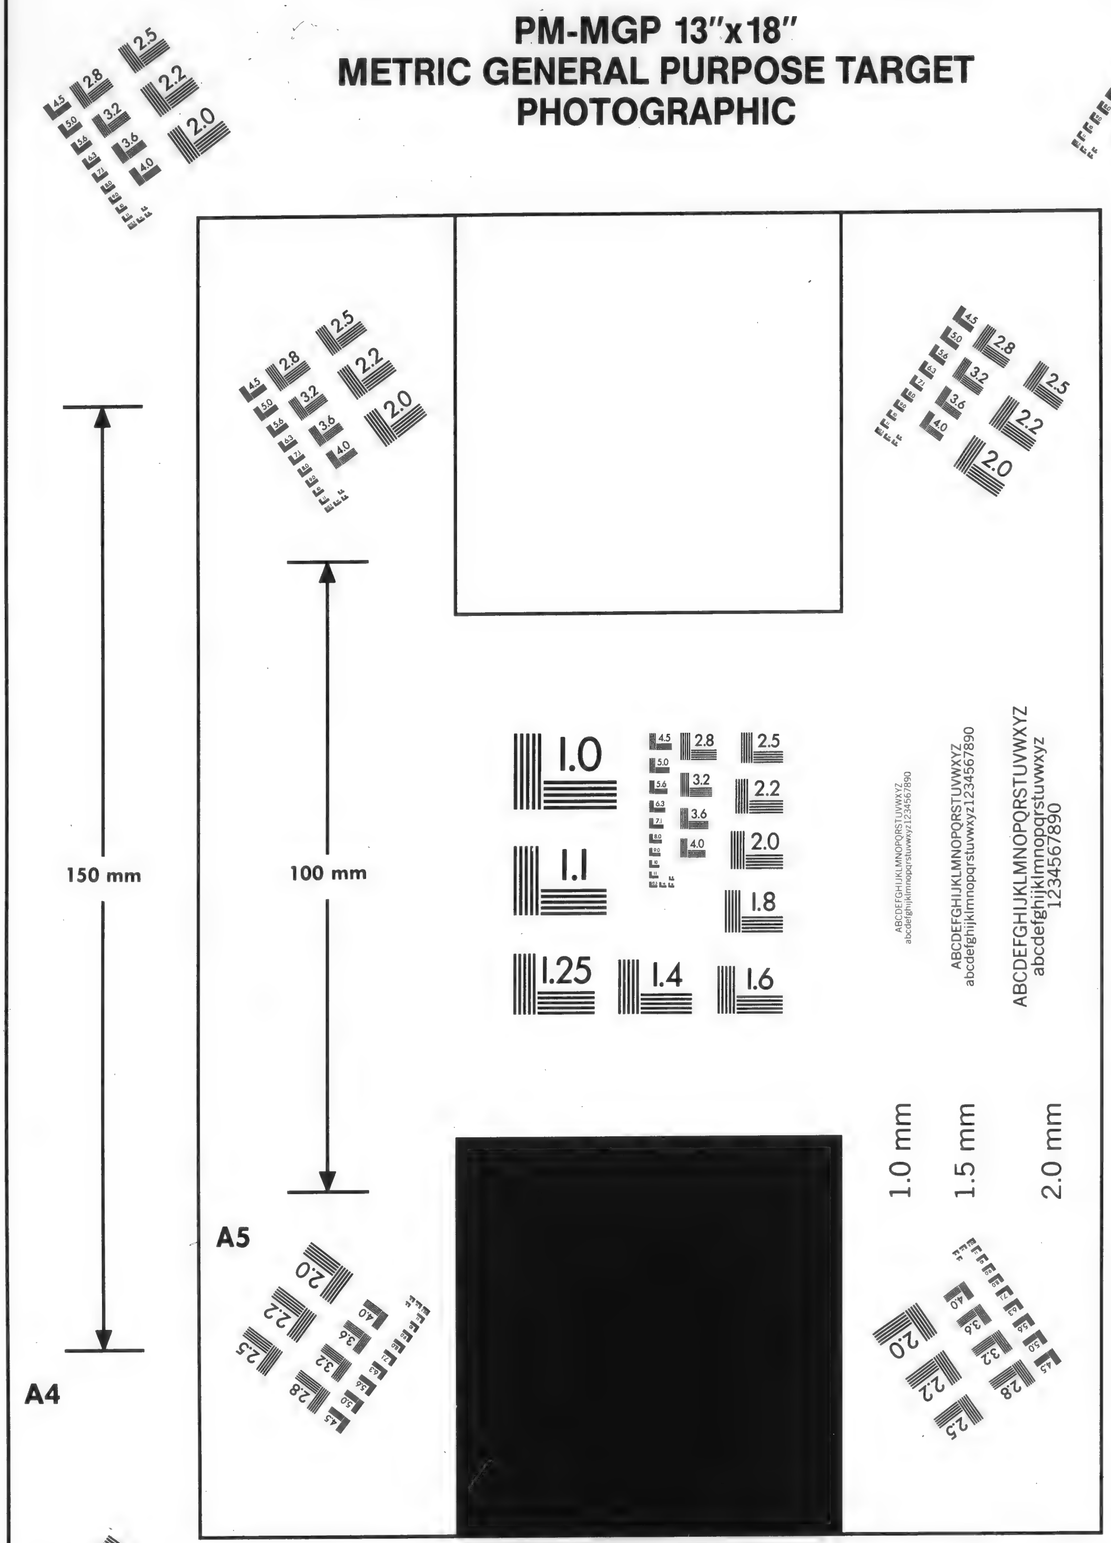
The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, was finely successful at the Academy of Music last evening. The occasion was most noticeable, viewed either from the point of excellence of programme and performance, or from the hearty evidences of popular interest shown both in an attendance of unusual character and in applause of a pronounced kind. The Academy has rarely been better filled and the spirit of enjoyment was manifest. The entertainment consisted of a Haydn Symphony (No. 13), Henselt's Piano Forte Concerto in F, Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" fantasie, Rubenstein's "Bal Costume," and the overture to Der Meistersinger. The selections were given in the order here stated, and it may be seen from it that there was an evident plan to contrast the music of different periods. In Haydn we had an extreme simplicity, almost the orchestral beginnings; Henselt illustrated a middle period; while from that on the programme emphasized ever more strongly the full richness and wealth of resource of modern instrumentation. The contrasts were very suggestive indeed, and, oddly enough, the places of special enjoyment were found to be the two most widely separated tone-fields. Anything more unlike than the primitive ingenuousness of Haydn and the involved harmonies of Wagner can hardly be conceived, yet those two things were undoubtedly the ones which excited the keenest delight last evening. There is splendid richness in the Tschaikowsky music also, and in the Henselt as well, although it is to be feared that the solo-seat dulled attention to much the best piano work, the orchestral division;—but this is to be expected in a composition arranged with the view giving a virtuoso especial opportunity. Mr. Joseffy carried the piano forte part with splendid vigor and expression,—his beauty of touch suffering nothing from the contrasting passages of force;—a quite masterful exhibition. The Rubinstein music was rather insignificant compared with the rest, though it has a popular cast which evoked much applause. It was a noble concert every, and the master assembly streamed away from the Academy when all was over in a state of admiration and delight.

REDUCTION RATIO 12x

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

3.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

STEIC

PR

FOURTH

BOSTON SY

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH

TUESDAY EV

SCHUMANN.

VOLKMANN.

BEETHOVEN

Manager, ...

Stein

M

ing a Frenc
as go as any before

FINE

ARTIS

LORING

Bo

CONGRESS

New I

Man

Wood

New

Prices
House in Tuning

Pianos Tun tent Tuner, a

394

Opposite Ci

STOCKBRIDGE COURSE.

DIAMONDS! FINE JEWELRY!

Waltham Watches.

WM. SENTER & CO.,

51 Exchange Street, - Portland, Me.

WHEN YOU PURCHASE

Clothing, Hats, Caps,

OR FURNISHINGS,

Come Direct to the Leading Clothing House in this City, where you will find the Latest Styles, the Largest Assortment to select from, and the Lowest Prices in the City.

Handsome new designs in Fancy Vests.

Full Dress Suits, always on hand.

SMOKING JACKETS and HOUSE COATS, in great variety.

FRED R. FARRINGTON,

Clothier, Hatter and Furnisher,

542 CONGRESS ST., New Rines Building.

NOW READY!

The Pioneer Text-book in the New Era of Writing by TOUCH,

"Practical Typewriting."

A Manual of Instruction in the All-Finger (piano style) Method. Price, $1.00.

Short-hand Lessons as usual. Situations secured pupils.

BATES TORREY, - 190 High St.

BUSINESS Education.

Shaw's Business College,

Brown and Congress Streets.

Has Theoretical, Practical and Ladies' Departments in Separate rooms, and accepts no payment in advance.

F. L. SHAW, Principal.

MORRILL & ROSS,

—DEALERS IN—

Provisions and Groceries,

671 CONGRESS STREET,

Telephone 414. (State St. Square.) Portland.

Goods Delivered in any part of the City.

NELSON TENNEY & CO.,

Manufacturers, Jobbers and Retailers of

STOVES, RANGES, FURNACES,

Pieced, Stamped and Japanned Tinware,

Agate Ware and Kitchen Furnishing Goods.

100 EXCHANGE ST.,

Jose Block, - PORTLAND, ME.

HER SOLE REASON.

I courted her full many a day,
But though I begged on bended knee,
She would not say me yea or nay,
Nor put me out of misery.

Ere long I learned her keep device—
No more she had me at her beck—
For while I strove to check my sighs,
She strove to size my check.

"Time will tell," is an old saying. So will a woman.

Lady—(in intelligence office): "Have you ever minded children before?"

Nurse—"No, mum; but I've made many a choild mind me."

"What prompted you to rob this man's till?" asked the Judge of the prisoner. "My family physician, sir," was the reply; "he told me it was absolutely necessary that I should have a little change."

"Been skating this year, old man?" "Yes; I went out the other day for about five minutes." "Why didn't you stay longer?" "I stayed until one of the small boys asked me if I had skated before for a good many years, and then I thought it was about time to give it up."

"We have had a sad loss at our house," remarked Binks, this morning, to Christie. "Why, what's wrong?" inquired Christie, sympathetically. "My mother-in-law died last night," and the tears came to his eyes. "Pshaw!" said Christie, in a tone of relief, "that's nothing" "Ah, but, my dear fellow, you forgot she had a twelve-hundred-dollar pension, and we lived with her."

THE Lamson STUDIO.

MAKES A SPECIALTY OF

Fine Water Colors, Crayons and Pastels,

Copying and Enlarging Old Pictures.

In fact everything from a Minnette to a Life-size Photograph executed in the best manner.

Studio, Opposite FALMOUTH HOTEL,

(Up One Flight Only.)

All Negative preserved in a Fire Proof Vault.

LUNG PROTECTORS,
HOT WATER BOTTLES,
CHAMOIS SKINS,

FOR SALE BY

H. H. HAY & SON,

PHARMACISTS,

Junct. Free and Middle Sts.

J. A. MERRILL & CO.,

JEWELERS.

Middle Street, - Portland, Me.

DIAMONDS FINE WATCHES

Choice Maine Tourmalines

Novelties in Sterling Silver.

J. A. MERRILL. A. KEITH.

STEPHEN JOHNSON,

LADIES' AND GENTS'

Restaurant and Dining Hall,

43 EXCHANGE ST., PORTLAND.

KUM & C

A Full Stock of the Finest

Pianos and Organs

Ever shown in any Warerooms, in any City, in any Country, on the Globe. Also,

STOOLS AND COVERS.

Tuning and Repairing.

Thurston's Piano House,

3 Free St. Block,

PORTLAND, - MAINE.

Clipping from Union
New Haven Ct
Date 3/17

AMUSEMENTS.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

vening the Symphony Orchestra the last concert in its line at the It will be without one of the four. Arthur Nikisch will be ctor and Joseffy the soloist.

Clipping from News
New Haven - Conn
Date 3/17

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concert under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, will take place at the Hyperion this evening. The program is an especially fine one, including the well known Overture from die Meistersinger by Wagner and Schubert's Unfinished Symphony in B Minor. The soloist for the evening is Mr. Rafael Joseffy, who will render Schumann's Concerto in A Minor. This is the last chance there will be this year of hearing this great orchestra play here, and all who avail themselves of the opportunity will be fully paid.

Clipping from Record
Phil Pa
Date 3/20

—The Actors' Fund benefit will be given this afternoon at the Chestnut Street Opera House. The seats are nearly all sold, and the long and interesting programme will begin at 2 o'clock.

—Last evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its fourth concert of the season at the Academy of Music. Joseffy played the Henselt concerto with masterly skill and true musical feeling, and the work of the orchestra was almost perfection. Three movements of Rubinstein's "Bal Costume" were rendered with delightful vivacity and entrain. Haydn's Symphony in G, Tschaikowsky's fantastic "Romeo and Juliet" overture, and the "Meistersaenger" vorspiel were the remaining numbers of the programme.

Boston Daily Traveller.

THURSDAY, MARCH 27, 1890.

The regular rehearsal and concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week, will present Brahms's tragic overture, Vieuxtemp's violin concerto in A minor, and Dvorák's D major symphone.

Next Wednesday afternon the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the third young people's concert of the season. The occasion will be made notable because of the first appearance here of Mr. Theodore Reichmann, leading baritone of the Metropolitan Opera House, New York. Mr. Kneisel will also play a solo. The orchestral selections comprise: Overture, "Mignon," Thomas; "Danse Macabe," St. Saens; minuet and dance of the sylphs, from "The Damnation of Faust," Berlioz; and the "Tannhäuser" march.

Clipping from Herald
Baltimore Md
Date 3/21

U. Corner, John R. Bland, William P. Harvey, S. B. Hasson, N. B. Talbott, Joseph Shipley, Col. William G. Scarlett, H. J. Broening, Barreda Turner and Leon Selliger.

The Bostonians Give a Delightful Concert.

A large, fashionable and appreciative audience assembled last night in the Lyceum Theatre, the occasion being the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the conductorship of Mr. Arthur Nikisch. The music consisted of five numbers, of which three were orchestra pieces and two were arias by Mlle. Clementine de Vere. The programme opened with Haydn's Symphony in G, No. 13, the rendition of which called forth many expressions of pleasure and praise. The next piece, an aria from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," was sung very sweetly by Mlle. De Vere, and was much applauded. This was followed by Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony," No. 8, in B minor, a noble fragment embodying the deepest emotion of the composer. An aria from David's "Les Perles de Bresil," sung by Mlle. De Vere, was well rendered and warmly received by the audience. The concert ended with Wagner's "Huldigung's March" by the orchestra.

The concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are always justly celebrated for their high standard of musical excellence, and the one given last night was no exception to the rule. Those who had the pleasure of being present were lavish in praise of the enjoyment which the concert afforded, and great credit is due for the excellent manner in which the numbers, both vocal and instrumental, were given. Mr. Nikisch, as a leader, has many excellent qualities, and the orchestra is composed of musicians of the highest order.

Clipping from Call
Philadelphia
Date 3/

California.

THE FOURTH CONCE

Capital Rendering of Haydn's Symphony at the Academy

The fourth concert of the Bost phony Orchestra, which took p night at the Academy of Music audience limited only by the ca the house, was chiefly notable for rendering of Haydn's major symp

Mr. Nikisch certainly deserves th of all music lovers for reviving Papa Haydn's works which other tors ignore in favor of modern co We have of late had such a surfe called program-music that the re classic work of such surpassing b the Haydn Symphony, must be co a welcome relief. No further proo truth of the assertion need be gi the appreciation with which the Fantasie to "Romeo and Juliet," by kowsky, which was played later evening.

Why the composer should have f the noisy conglomeration of sound opening to Shakespeare's tender must remain a riddle to the most u listener. It might as well have overture to Rider Haggard's "She any other blood-curdling mystery.

Three numbers from Rubinstein Costume," the performance of t Berger et Bergere not being up to th standard of the orchestra, and a v rendition of the prelude to "Die singer" completed the orchestral sel

Mr. Rafael Joseffy was the solo distinguished himself by a maste formance of Henselt's concerto. I dead doubtful whether the favorite has ever played with so much ver city. Mr. Nikisch again directed orchestral numbers in a masterly

E.

LUNG PROTECTORS,
HOT WATER BOTTLES,
CHAMOIS SKINS,
FOR SALE BY
H. H. HAY & SON,
PHARMACISTS,
Junct. Free and Middle Sts.

J. A. MERRILL & CO.,
JEWELERS.
Middle Street, - Portland, Me.
DIAMONDS FINE WATCHES
Choice Maine Tourmalines
Novelties in Sterling Silver.
J. A. MERRILL. A. KEITH.

STEPHEN JOHNSON,
LADIES' AND GENTS'
Restaurant * and * Dining * Hall,
43 EXCHANGE ST., PORTLAND.

KUM & C
A Full Stock of the Finest
Pianos and Organs
Ever shown in any Warerooms, in any City, in any Country, on the Globe. Also,
STOOLS * AND * COVERS.
Tuning and Repairing.
Thurston's Piano House,
3 Free St. Block,
PORTLAND, - MAINE.

Clipping from Mercury
New Bedford Mass
Date 1

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Great Musical Treat at the Opera House.

The Young Men's Christian Association made not less than $375 for its building fund from the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in the Opera House last evening.

There was a crowded house and a good part of the audience was late, as is usual. The number which had not gained admission at the advertised hour for commencing the concert was so large that it was not deemed advisable to commence promptly on time.

Mr. Arthur Nikisch, the new conductor of the orchestra, is a slender little man with a dark complexion, a full black beard, a shock of black hair with no parting, a rather inexpressive face, and a black dress coat of miraculous fit. His movements are very deliberate, rarely manifesting anything that could possibly be described as animation. He has been the subject of some hostile criticism by the musical critics of Boston, but while some have asserted that the orchestra shows signs of deterioration under his leadership, it is also true that this season has been one of the most successful, if not the most successful, the orchestra has ever had.

The programme was as follows:

Overture—Tannhauser. Wagner
Aria—Le Prophete. Meyerbeer
Miss Edmands.
Suite—Peer Gynt. Grieg
Daybreak.
The Death of Aase.
Anitra's Dance.
In the halls of the king of the Dovre Mountains. (The imps are chasing Peer Gynt.)
Songs with piano.
a. The Poet's Song. Parry
b. Slumber Song. Tauberi
c. The Bluebell. MacDowell
Miss Edmands.
Symphony in C minor, No. 5. Beethoven
Allegro con brio.—Andante con moto.—Allegro (Scherzo).—Allegro. (Finale.)

Of the instrumental numbers, the audience liked the Suite by Grieg, "Peer Gynt," best. It is of the style which is rather vaguely described by that sadly overworked word "popular." All the movements are very striking, and afford much scope for the exhibition of novel orchestral effects. The almost magical control of the leader over his orchestra was shown in a marked degree. Some of the audience tried hard to force a repetition of the last movement by persistent applause, but Mr. Nikisch only bowed gravely, and very properly ignored the demand.

Miss Gertrude Edmands was the soloist, and her appearance was a complete and unqualified success. All her selections were magnificently given, and won the hearty and well deserved applause of the entire audience.

The concert was a great success from every point of view, and the Young Men's Christian Association merits the thanks of the musical community for its enterprise in bringing this superb organization to New Bedford. Few better pleased audiences have visited the Opera House this season, and few entertainments have been so completely satisfactory. The association is in the line of good work when it provides such enjoyment for the people.

Clipping from Telegraph
Phila-Pa
3
Date 20

Clipping from Herald
Baltimore Md
3/21
Date

THE FOURTH CONCERT.

Capital Rendering of Haydn's G Major Symphony at the Academy.

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place last night at the Academy of Music before an audience limited only by the capacity of the house, was chiefly notable for a capital rendering of Haydn's major symphony.

Mr. Nikisch certainly deserves the thanks of all music lovers for reviving some of Papa Haydn's works which other conductors ignore in favor of modern composers. We have of late had such a surfeit of so-called program-music that the revival of classic work of such surpassing beauty as the Haydn Symphony, must be considered a welcome relief. No further proof of the truth of the assertion need be given than the appreciation with which the Overture Fantasie to "Romeo and Juliet," by Tschaikowsky, which was played later in the evening.

Why the composer should have imagined the noisy conglomeration of sound to be an opening to Shakespeare's tender tragedy must remain a riddle to the most unbiased listener. It might as well have been an overture to Rider Haggard's "She" or to any other blood-curdling mystery.

Three numbers from Rubinstein's "Bal Costume," the performance of the first Berger et Bergere not being up to the usual standard of the orchestra, and a very fine rendition of the prelude to "Die Meistersinger" completed the orchestral selections.

Mr. Rafael Joseffy was the soloist, and distinguished himself by a masterly performance of Henselt's concerto. It is indeed doubtful whether the favorite pianist has ever played with so much verve in this city. Mr. Nikisch again directed all the orchestral numbers from memory.

Tesla speaks at least half a dozen languages. He is thirty-three years of age.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA CONCERT.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, was finely successful at the Academy of Music last evening. The occasion was most noticeable, viewed either from the point of excellence of programme and performance, or from the hearty evidences of popular interest shown both in an attendance of unusual character and in applause of a pronounced kind. The Academy has rarely been better filled and the spirit of enjoyment was manifest. The entertainment consisted of a Haydn Symphony (No. 13), Henselt's Piano Forte Concerto in F, Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" fantaisie, Rubenstein's "Bal Costume," and the overture to Der Meistersinger. The selections were given in the order here stated, and it may be seen from it that there was an evident plan to contrast the music of different periods. In Haydn we had an extreme simplicity, almost the orchestral beginnings; Henselt illustrated a middle period; while from that on the programme emphasized ever more strongly the full richness and wealth of resource of modern instrumentation. The contrasts were very suggestive indeed, and, oddly enough, the places of special enjoyment were found to be the two most widely separated tone-fields. Anything more unlike than the primitive ingenuousness of Haydn and the involved harmonies of Wagner can hardly be conceived, yet those two things were undoubtedly the ones which excited the keenest delight last evening. There is splendid richness in the Tschaikowsky music also, and in the Henselt as well, although it is to be feared that the solo part dulled attention to much the best part of the work, the orchestral division;—but this is to be expected in a composition arranged with the view of giving a virtuoso especial opportunity. Mr. Joseffy carried the piano forte part with splendid vigor and expression,—his beauty of touch suffering nothing from the contrasting passages of force; a quite masterful exhibition. The Rubinstein music was rather insignificant compared with the rest, though it has a popular cast which gained it much applause. It was a noble concert truly, and the monster assemblage streamed away from the Academy when all was over in a great state of exaltation and delight.

Clipping from Baltimore Md
Herald
3/21
Date

...Stabler, James
...Corner, John R. Bland, William P. Harvey, S. B. Hasson, N. B. Talbott, Joseph Shipley, Col. William G. Scarlett, H. J. Broening, Barreda Turner and Leon Seliger.

The Bostonians Give a Delightful Concert.

A large, fashionable and appreciative audience assembled last night in the Lyceum Theatre, the occasion being the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the conductorship of Mr. Arthur Nikisch. The music consisted of five numbers, of which three were orchestra pieces and two were arias by Mlle. Clementine de Vere. The programme opened with Haydn's Symphony in G, No. 13, the rendition of which called forth many expressions of pleasure and praise. The next piece, an aria from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," was sung very sweetly by Mlle. De Vere, and was much applauded. This was followed by Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony," No. 8, in B minor, a noble fragment embodying the deepest emotion of the composer. An aria from David's "Les Perles de Bresil," sung by Mlle. De Vere, was well rendered and warmly received by the audience. The concert ended with Wagner's "Huldigung's March" by the orchestra.

The concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are always justly celebrated for their high standard of musical excellence, and the one given last night was no exception to the rule. Those who had the pleasure of being present were lavish in praise of the enjoyment which the concert afforded, and great credit is due for the excellent manner in which the numbers, both vocal and instrumental, were given. Mr. Nikisch, as a leader, has many excellent qualities, and the orchestra is composed of musicians of the highest order.

THE EVENING STAR.
WASHINGTON.
SATURDAY ..... March 22, 1890

The Symphony Concert.

An audience that filled Lincoln music hall to its utmost capacity last evening renewed and verified the assurance of the deep interest felt by the generous culture of Washington in the work of the Boston symphony orchestra and its remarkable conductor, Mr. Nikisch. Much of this was doubtless due as well to the reappearance of Miss Mary Howe, who made her most ambitious attempt in the bell song from Delibes' "Lakme," an aria whose florid elaborations have a much clearer musical significance than many others of its class and in the performance of which must be met a correspondingly greater demand upon the singer's abilities. Not only did Miss Howe reveal again, and even more fully than before, the beautiful freshness, flexibility and the wide compass of her voice, but she gave to the whole aria that individual color, half French, half oriental, that constitutes its great charm. It was a thoroughly enjoyable performance. The magic of Mr. Nikisch's touch upon Beethoven's Fifth Symphony revealed new beauties and in the marvelous prelude to Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde" the orchestra rose to the fullest measure of its ability and gave a performance of immensely moving power—a performance reaching the summit of the emotional expressiveness of this wonderful bit of Wagner's work

[96]

E.

LUNG PROTECTORS,
HOT WATER BOTTLES,
CHAMOIS SKINS,
FOR SALE BY
H. H. HAY & SON,
PHARMACISTS,
Junct. Free and Middle Sts.

J. A. MERRILL & CO.,
JEWELERS.
Middle Street, - Portland, Me.
DIAMONDS FINE WATCHES
oice Maine Tourmalines
Novelties in Sterling Silver.
J. A. MERRILL. A. KEITH.

STEPHEN JOHNSON,
LADIES' AND GENTS'
Restaurant and Dining Hall,
43 EXCHANGE ST., PORTLAND.

KUM & C

A Full Stock of the Finest
Pianos and Organs
Ever shown in any Warerooms, in any City, in any Country, on the Globe. Also,
STOOLS AND COVERS.
Tuning and Repairing.
Thurston's Piano House,
3 Free St. Block,
PORTLAND, - MAINE.

Clipping from Mercury
New Bedford Mass
Date 1

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Great Musical Treat at the Opera House.

The Young Men's Christian Association made not less than $375 for its building fund from the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in the Opera House last evening.

There was a crowded house and a good part of the audience was late, as is usual. The number which had not gained admission at the advertised hour for commencing the concert was so large that it was not deemed advisable to commence promptly on time.

Mr. Arthur Nikisch, the new conductor of the orchestra, is a slender little man with a dark complexion, a full black beard, a shock of black hair with no parting, a rather inexpressive face, and a black dress coat of miraculous fit. His movements are very deliberate, rarely manifesting anything that could possibly be described as animation. He has been the subject of some hostile criticism by the musical critics of Boston, but while some have asserted that the orchestra shows signs of deterioration under his leadership, it is also true that this season has been one of the most successful, if not the most successful, the orchestra has ever had.

The programme was as follows:

Overture—Tannhauser. Wagner
Aria—Le Prophete. Meyerbeer
Miss Edmands.
Suite—Peer Gynt. Grieg
Daybreak.
The Death of Aase.
Anitra's Dance.
In the halls of the king of the Dovre Mountains. (The imps are chasing Peer Gynt.)
Songs with piano.
a. The Poet's Song. Parry
b. Slumber Song. Tauberi
c. The Bluebell. MacDowell
Miss Edmands.
Symphony in C minor, No. 5. Beethoven
Allegro con brio.—Andante con moto.—Allegro (Scherzo).—Allegro. (Finale.)

Of the instrumental numbers, the audience liked the Suite by Grieg, "Peer Gynt," best. It is of the style which is rather vaguely described by that sadly overworked word "popular." All the movements are very striking, and afford much scope for the exhibition of novel orchestral effects. The almost magical control of the leader over his orchestra was shown in a marked degree. Some of the audience tried hard to force a repetition of the last movement by persistent applause, but Mr. Nikisch only bowed gravely, and very properly ignored the demand.

Miss Gertrude Edmands was the soloist, and her appearance was a complete and unqualified success. All her selections were magnificently given, and won the hearty and well deserved applause of the entire audience.

The concert was a great success from every point of view, and the Young Men's Christian Association merits the thanks of the musical community for its enterprise in bringing this superb organization to New Bedford. Few better pleased audiences have visited the Opera House this season, and few entertainments have been so completely satisfactory. The association is in the line of good work when it provides such enjoyment for the people.

Clipping from Call
Philadelphia Pa
Date 6 / 20

Clipping from Telegraph
Paul Minn
Date 3

Clipping from Herald
Baltimore Md
Date 3/21

...ing Soulchman Stabler, James J. Corner, John R. Bland, William P. Harvey, S. B. Hasson, N. E. Parlett, Joseph Shipley, Col. William G. Scarlett, H. J. Broening, Barreda Turner and Leon Selliger.

The Bostonians Give a Delightful Concert.

A large, fashionable and appreciative audience assembled last night in the Lyceum Theatre, the occasion being the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the conductorship of Mr. Arthur Nikisch. The music consisted of five numbers, of which three were orchestra pieces and two were arias by Mlle. Clementine de Vere. The programme opened with Haydn's Symphony in G, No. 13, the rendition of which called forth many expressions of pleasure and praise. The next piece, an aria from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," was sung very sweetly by Mlle. De Vere, and was much applauded. This was followed by Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony," No. 8, in B minor, a noble fragment embodying the deepest emotion of the composer. An aria from David's "Les Perles de Bresil," sung by Mlle. De Vere, was well rendered and warmly received by the audience. The concert ended with Wagner's "Huldigung's March" by the orchestra.

The concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are always justly celebrated for their high standard of musical excellence, and the one given last night was no exception to the rule. Those who had the pleasure of being present were lavish in praise of the enjoyment which the concert afforded, and great credit is due for the excellent manner in which the numbers, both vocal and instrumental, were given. Mr. Nikisch, as a leader, has many excellent qualities, and the orchestra is composed of musicians of the highest order.

...California.

THE FOURTH CONCERT.

Capital Rendering of Haydn's G Majo Symphony at the Academy.

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place las night at the Academy of Music before a audience limited only by the capacity o the house, was chiefly notable for a capita rendering of Haydn's major symphony.

Mr. Nikisch certainly deserves the thanks of all music lovers for reviving some of Papa Haydn's works which other conductors ignore in favor of modern composers. We have of late had such a surfeit of so-called program-music that the revival of classic work of such surpassing beauty as the Haydn Symphony, must be considered a welcome relief. No further proof of the truth of the assertion need be given than the appreciation with which the Overture Fantasie to "Romeo and Juliet," by Tschekowsky, which was played later in the evening.

Why the composer should have imagined the noisy conglomeration of sound to be an opening to Shakespeare's tender tragedy must remain a riddle to the most unbiased listener. It might as well have been an overture to Rider Haggard's "She" or to any other blood-curdling mystery.

Three numbers from Rubinstein's "Bal Costume," the performance of the first Berger et Bergere not being up to the usual standard of the orchestra, and a very fine rendition of the prelude to "Die Meistersinger" completed the orchestral selections.

Mr. Rafael Joseffy was the soloist, and distinguished himself by a masterly pe formance of Heuselt's concerto. It is d deed doubtful whether the favorite pianis has ever played with so much verve in th city. Mr. Nikisch again directed all t orchestral numbers from memory.

Tesla speaks at least half a dozen languages. He is thirty-three years of age.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA CONCERT.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, was finely successful at the Academy of Music last evening. The occasion was most noticeable, viewed either from the point of excellence of programme and performance, or from the hearty evidences of popular interest shown both in an attendance of unusual character and in applause of a pronounced kind. The Academy has rarely been better filled and the spirit of enjoyment was manifest. The entertainment consisted of a Haydn Symphony (No. 13), Henselt's Piano Forte Concerto in F, Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" fantaisie, Rubenstein's "Bal Costume," and the overture to Der Meistersinger. The selections were given in the order here stated, and it may be seen from it that there was an evident plan to contrast the music of different periods. In Haydn we had an extreme simplicity, almost the orchestral beginnings; Henselt illustrated a middle period; while from that on the programme emphasized ever more strongly the full richness and wealth of resource of modern instrumentation. The contrasts were very suggestive indeed, and, oddly enough, the places of special enjoyment were found to be the two most widely separated tone-fields. Anything more unlike than the primitive ingenuousness of Haydn and the involved harmonies of Wagner can hardly be conceived, yet those two things were undoubtedly the ones which excited the keenest delight last evening. There is splendid richness in the Tschaikowsky music also, and in the Henselt as well, although it is to be feared that the solo part dulled attention to much the best part of work, the orchestral division;—but this is to pected in a composition arranged with the view giving a virtuose especial opportunity. Mr. Joseny carried the piano forte part with splendid vigor and expression,—his beauty of touch suffering nothing from the contrasting passages of force; a quite masterful exhibition. The Rubinstein music was rather insignificant compared with the rest, though it has a popular cast which gained it much applause. It was a noble concert truly, and the monster assemblage streamed away from the Academy when all was over in a great state of exaltation and delight.

THE EVENING STAR.

WASHINGTON:
SATURDAY ..... March 22, 1890

The Symphony Concert.

An audience that filled Lincoln music hall to its utmost capacity last evening renewed and verified the assurance of the deep interest felt by the generous culture of Washington in the work of the Boston symphony orchestra and its remarkable conductor, Mr. Nikisch. Much of this was doubtless due as well to the reappearance of Miss Mary Howe, who made her most ambitious attempt in the bell song from Delibes' "Lakme," an aria whose florid elaborations have a much clearer musical significance than many others of its class and in the performance of which must be met a correspondingly greater demand upon the singer's abilities. Not only did Miss Howe reveal again, and even more fully than before, the beautiful freshness, flexibility and the wide compass of her voice, but she gave to the whole aria that individual color, half French, half oriental, that constitutes its great charm. It was a thoroughly enjoyable performance. The magic of Mr. Nikisch's touch upon Beethoven's Fifth Symphony revealed new beauties and in the marvelous prelude to Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde" the orchestra rose to the fullest measure of its ability and gave a performance of immensely moving power—a performance reaching the summit of the emotional expressiveness of this wonderful bit of Wagner's work

Clipping from Eagle
Brooklyn N
Date 3/
19

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The fourth and last of the concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Steinway Hall last night attracted a large audience, with the usual contingent of Brooklynites and of Bostonians in temporary exile. Never has the orchestra been heard to better advantage; never has it played with more fire and enthusiasm; never were its fortissimi more tremendous and impressive. The programme would have been regarded as formidable not long ago, for it was made up of two symphonies and an overture, but the genius of Conductor Nikisch filled every moment of the concert with interest. Schumann's first symphony was rendered with vigor, yet with abundance of expression and contrast; the declamatory phrases were given with Wagnerian energy, and once or twice it might have been truer to the sentiment of the work had the brasses been moderated, while there was a slight lack of blandness in the playing of the larghetto; yet, take it all in all, there has been no fresher and more intellectual performance of this noble work than these musicians offered last evening, nor did the Beethoven fifth symphony efface this impression of nobility, howbeit the plane of the work is supposed to be above that of Schumann. On this Mr. Nikisch gave a reading so original in many points that, until his reasons for violating custom became manifest, he might have been charged with an unsympathetic treatment of the symphony. The opening figure, a triple stroke on G and a fall to E flat, that Beethoven disclosed as his idea of "Fate, knocking at the door," was given very slowly and the E flat was dwelt on at a surprising length, but after that the symphony was taken at the usual tempo. It was evident that Mr. Nikisch desired to emphasize what is really the text, the leitmotif of the composition and fix it strongly on attention at the outset. In the finale the brightness of the strings the boom of the brasses and the vocal tones of the wood wind combined to give splendor to a certain and voluminous unfolding of the triumphant theme, and it compelled the liveliest applause from the audience. The overture was a prelude by Volkmann to Shakspear's "Richard III," a rather gloomy work designed to convey in tone the import of the tragedy, but needing compression and more definite resolutions of harmonic promises. The episode of battle is stirring with its swing and crash of instruments and a distorted verse of "The Campbells are Coming," is introduced to heighten color that can hardly be called local. It is hoped that the Brooklyn concert of this orchestra is still among the possibilities of the season.

Clipping from Bulletin
Phila Pa
Date 3/20

MUSIC.

The Fourth Boston Symphony Concert.

Bad weather and good music come to Philadelphia with Mr. Nikisch and the Boston orchestra at every visit. We had them both last evening. But snow, rain, wind, mud and slush did not prevent the assemblage of a great audience at the Academy of Music, which was filled in every part. The stage, too, was filled by the splendid band, which, of course, never minds the weather.

There was not a note of Beethoven's in the entertainment. The disposition of concert-planners seems to be to put the great master in the background, for a time, at least, and give the public a taste of Mozart or Haydn. These were great men, but they were not the greatest of symphony writers. Haydn's symphony in G is very beautiful, and it is needed for the instruction as well as the enjoyment of the ever-advancing succession of lovers of music. It was heard in perfection last evening and each movement received bountiful applause.

The second piece of the programme was Henselt's Concerto for piano (op. 16), in which Mr. Raffael Joseffy was the pianist. The work itself is ambitious, but not very interesting. Mr. Joseffy, who is a great favorite with our concert-public, performed brilliantly as ever, and was repeatedly called before the curtain; but he declined to play again.

Next followed a composition of the Russian, Tschaikowsky, called an overture-fantasie of Romeo and Juliet. It might as well have any other title, for it has no distinct signification. There is scholarship, without motive, and the learning displayed is scrappy and uncontinuous. Passages that begin romantically are broken off abruptly by something dull, which in its turn is nipped untimely by a boisterous movement of a few bars, followed by something funereal. These may in turn depict the ball, the brawl, the balcony or the tomb scene of Shakespeare's play; but they would fit other scenes of other plays as well. The composition owed its success last evening to the splendid performance of Mr. Nikisch's orchestra. Rubinstein's Bal Costumé ballet music was brilliantly given; but the crowning performance was that of Richard Wagner's Vorspiel to the Meistersinger. This noble, sunshiny overture has never before been given at a concert here with such admirable effect.

HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, MARCH 29, 1890

Some scoffing fault finder, who complains of the feeble effect of the Fifth Symphony as given by our Symphony orchestra, says that he thinks that, if Nikisch only knew of this artillery accessory that proved so effective in Gilmore's hands, he would immediately "order up the guns" in his own behalf. Why! they would come miles in such a case to hear the noise! Beethoven didn't know all the dodges. Guess not!

March 90

REVIEW OF RECENT CONCERTS.

IN BOSTON.

The past month has not been prolific in concerts of the first magnitude. This is generally the case in the season just after the Christmas holidays. The Cecilia Club gave Haydn's "Seasons" for their second concert, and made a good success with it. They did not give the entire work, but the selections were made with such good taste, that the story of the work was comprehensible to all who heard it. On this occasion they united with the Boston Orchestral Club, and the orchestral support was also worthy of praise. The soloists were quite adequate to their parts, and the whole performance was a worthy one. It was a bold thing, however, to transpose the chorus "God of Light" from the end of the first part and make it the finale of the entire work, but in this case there has been no great harm done, for Haydn is not at his very best in the ending of "The Seasons" and was never very proud of the finale.

In chamber concerts the usual fate has ruled. Those who have attended these concerts in the past season know how many postponements took place then, and this season has proved no exception to the past custom. First there came a postponement of a Kneisel concert because the talented violinist lay in the clutches of "the grip," and later on one of the Baermann concerts was omitted because of the illness of the prima donna. But when the Kneisel concert did come it made ample amends for all disappointments, for it gave a program entirely devoted to Beethoven, with Professor Baermann at the piano in a Trio. It was especially notable for the manner in which the Quartet in C minor, op. 18, No. 1, was given.

These early quartets of the master are the perfection of clear part writing. The later quartets have far more grandeur of ideas, but they soar after orchestral effects without the orchestral forces, and while a poetic musician can fill out the suggestions given, the average hearer is lefl by them in a state of considerable bewilderment. The quartet in C major, Op. 59, No. 3, was excellently played, and the contrapuntal work of the finale has seldom received so clear a presentation.

The symphony concerts have gone on in their triumphant career. The chief works have been as follows; Schumann's symphony in E-flat. This work — the "Cologne symphony"—shows the composer in almost the last happy mood which came to his troubled mind, and was composed during the happy time when Schumann had entered upon his duties at Düsseldorf as director, and yielded himself to all the charms of the pleasant Rhine-life which this symphony pictures. It was given with a subtle understanding of the composer's style and meaning, and again showed Mr. Nikisch to be a splendid interpretor of Schumann.

At the same concert a suite by Grieg, entitled "Peer Gynt" was given. It was a very characteristic work, and proved that the present conductor is not going to hold the classical line so tightly drawn as his predecessor, who would not admit such popular works, on the plea that the dignity of the symphony concerts would not allow it. I hold that any work which has good construction and national characteristics is both dignified and educational. At another of these concerts the symphony by Raff entitled "To the Fatherland" was given for the first time. It seemed a rather bombastic affair, showing how easily Raff could put music together, but not possessing in any degree the power of a great national work. It juggled a little with "What is the German Fatherland," but aside from this has no really characteristic effects. At one of the recent concerts of this series, Mr. Nikisch broke through an established precedent, and a very good one, by readily accepting an encore. Hitherto these concerts have been refreshingly free from the attacks of the horny-handed encore fiend, but now no one knows what we may expect in the future. It would have been far better to have adhered to the old rule of refusing repetitions.

L. C. E.

GENERAL REVIEW—ELSEWHERE.

Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde" and "Die Gotterdammerung" are the most important revivals at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, during the past thirty days. In both works Heinrich Vogl appeared and in the latter especially created great enthusiasm. In the October HERALD I included an estimate of Vogl's Tristan in an article on the Bayreuth Festival of 1889. It would seem from the New York verdict that the artist was not quite at his best on his initial appearance in the part, but improved with succeeding representations. Lehmann's Isolde is ranked even greater than Sucher's; I can believe this for it is two years since Lehmann has undertaken the part and she is one whose progress in her art is constant; even in view of Sucher's great dramatic assumption I did not once forget the superior vocal quality of Lehmann's. In "Die Gotterdammerung" Vogl seems to have been very fine as Siegfried, both vocally and histrionically. Other first performances this season are "Aïda," with Perotti, Lehmann and Reichman; Nessler's "The Trumpeter of Sackkingen" with Reichman in the charming title part, and "Die Walküre." Perotti sang the music of Siegmund in the latter work much less satisfactorily than last season when his success was simply not a failure; Lehmann was the Brünnhilde, but the lovely music of Sieglinde in the hands of Miss Weisner was hardly recognizable. Reichman was Wotan and of his assumption the Tribune wrote:—

"It led to the restoration of a considerable fragment of the score which has been omitted in the representation hitherto—notably the recital of the events preceding the opening of the drama in the first act. It was this recital which prompted a witty German critic in 1876 to suggest that if it were necessary for Bruennhilde to learn the contents of the perlong tale, a way was offered by which the audience might be spared being told what they already know—Wotan might buy the libretto and give it to Bruennhilde to read between the acts. A wise excision was made in the recital last night, but Herr Reichmann's impressive declamation of the lines restored was one of the redeeming features of the performance of the second act. Throughout, too, his singing realized many of the requirements of Wagner's system and score."

Beginning on February 26 the Wagner operas and music-dramas were to be given in chronological order as follows:

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 26, 1890.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

THE fourth and last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra drew an even larger and more demonstrative audience to Steinway Hall on Tuesday night than any of its three predecessors had done, and this despite the fact that no soloistic attraction was offered on this occasion.

The program was a well chosen and interesting one, consisting of Schumann's first symphony, the one in B flat, and Beethoven's fifth symphony, the immortal C minor, between which was sandwiched in Volkmann's sombre and almost too darkly colored and "bloodthirsty" overture to Shakespeare's "Richard III." It is a work so full of a relentless, nay heathenish gloom that it loses some of the intended effectiveness through lack of contrast, of which certainly there is no want in the drama which this overture is to preface and in a certain sense to portray. Even the breaking in of the well-known tune of "The Campbells are Coming" in the episode, evidently intended to depict Bosworth Field, is too short breathed to relieve the monotony of sombreness that pervades the entre work. It was played in the most finished and careful manner possible under Mr. Nikisch's concise and imaginative guidance. The same in fact may be said about the two symphonies, which, barring an unfortunate break in the first trumpet for the very opening note of the Schumann symphony, were technically played faultlessly. The Schuman scherzo was taken at a somewhat too slow tempo, but nothing more beautiful than the performance of the slow movement of the Beethoven symphony could well be imagined, and the last movement was played with great spirit, and yet with much breadth and dignity of style.

Clipping from Press
New York N
Date 3/9

ACCOMPLISHED THESE THINGS.

FOR MUSIC LOVERS.

A FINE CONCERT BY THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA AT STEINWAY HALL

Mr. Nikisch's programme at the fourth and last of his series of concerts in this city, which occurred last evening in Steinway Hall, was a tribute certainly to the taste of his audience for the severest style of music. There were only three numbers—Schumann's "Spring" symphony, Volkmann's overture to "Richard III." and Beethoven's Fifth symphony. The comment has often been made that the playing of Mr. Nikisch's band is more enjoyable than that of any solo performer who might be thought to give weight and importance, to say nothing of variety, to his programme, and this thought was uppermost last evening.

Severely dignified as was the programme, the performance was full of interest and gave great enjoyment to an audience that completely filled the hall. The playing of the orchestra was not, as it generally has been, faultless in execution. Mr. Nikisch is sacrificing some of the beauty and delicacy of tone, nice balance and careful finish, in which his predecessor brought the orchestra to a high state of perfection. But he secures, in place of these qualities, a virility, a variety of tone color, an an expressiveness and a dramatic power that are very enjoyable when applied to the classical symphonies.

There is nothing radical or revolutionary in his readings. But there is a body of tone, of splendid masculine power, and the poetic, emotional, romantic and dramatic phases of the music are finely emphasized. The Beethoven symphony aroused the most enthusiasm, and deservedly so, for it has rarely if ever been [illegible]

Clipping from American
Philadelphia Pa
Date 3/20

DRAMATIC [illegible]

The Fourth Boston Symphony Concert at the Academy of Music.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its fourth concert for the season at the Academy of Music last night before an audience which filled every seat in the auditorium, excepting the upper gallery, and even overflowed into the aisles. The symphony was Haydn's in G major, and while this music, which does not employ the brasses, seemed thin and colorless, it was beautiful, too, in its way, and well served to exhibit the splennid quality of Mr. Nikisch's strings. It was, however, in Rubinstein's "Bal Costume" numbers and Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture that the virtuosity of the orchestra was chiefly shown, and here its execution was dazzling in its brilliancy. The feature of the evening, however, was Joseffy's interpretation of Henselt's interesting but extraordinarily difficult piano-forte concerto in F minor. In all the years he has been playing here Joseffy has done nothing so great, both technically and intellectually, as this, and the repeated recalls which it elicited were thoroughly well-deserved. Critical judgment has heretofore ordinarily denied Josefly breadth and power, but in his playing of this concerto—a recognized test of a pianist's ability—he developed both in a very marked degree, and those who say that he can only play Chopin must have seen cause to change their opinion. The Russian composer's overture, the novelty of the programme, was on the whole disappointing. It contains some beautiful episodes, but is too fragmentary and diffuse to be satisfactory. Wagner's "Meistersinger" overture closed a very successful and enjoyable concert.

[97]

Clipping from Eagle
Brooklyn N
Date 3/19

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The fourth and last of the concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Steinway Hall last night attracted a large audience, with the usual contingent of Brooklynites and of Bostonians in temporary exile. Never has the orchestra been heard to better advantage; never has it played with more fire and enthusiasm; never were its fortissimi more tremendous and impressive. The programme would have been regarded as formidable not long ago, for it was made up of two symphonies and an overture, but the genius of Conductor Nikisch filled every moment of the concert with interest. Schumann's first symphony was rendered with vigor, yet with abundance of expression and contrast; the declamatory phrases were given with Wagnerian energy, and once or twice it might have been truer to the sentiment of the work had the brasses been moderated, while there was a slight lack of blandness in the playing of the larghetto; yet, take it all in all, there has been no fresher and more intellectual performance of this noble work than these musicians offered last evening, nor did the Beethoven fifth symphony efface this impression of nobility, howbeit the plane of the work is supposed to be above that of Schumann. On this Mr. Nikisch gave a reading so original in many points that, until his reasons for violating custom became manifest, he might have been charged with an unsympathetic treatment of the symphony. The opening figure, a triple stroke on G and a fall to E flat, that Beethoven disclosed as his idea of "Fate, knocking at the door," was given very slowly and the E flat was dwelt on at a surprising length, but after that the symphony was taken at the usual tempo. It was evident that Mr. Nikisch desired to emphasize what is really the text, the leitmotif of the composition and fix it strongly on attention at the outset. In the finale the brightness of the strings the boom of the brasses and the vocal tones of the wood wind combined to give splendor to a certain and voluminous unfolding of the triumphant theme, and it compelled the liveliest applause from the audience. The overture was a prelude by Volkmann to Shakspear's "Richard III," a rather gloomy work designed to convey in tone the import of the tragedy, but needing compression and more definite resolutions of harmonic promises. The episode of battle is stirring with its swing and crash of instruments and a distorted verse of "The Campbells are Coming," is introduced to heighten color that can hardly be called local. It is hoped that the Brooklyn concert of this orchestra is still among the possibilities of the season.

Clipping from Bulletin
Phila Pa
Date 3/22

...and the Prohibitionists afterwards.

MUSIC.

The Fourth Boston Symphony Concert.

Bad weather and good music come to Philadelphia with Mr. Nikisch and the Boston orchestra at every visit. We had them both last evening. But snow, rain, wind, mud and slush did not prevent the assemblage of a great audience at the Academy of Music, which was filled in every part. The stage, too, was filled by the splendid band, which, of course, never minds the weather.

There was not a note of Beethoven's in the entertainment. The disposition of concert-planners seems to be to put the great master in the background, for a time, at least, and give the public a taste of Mozart or Haydn. These were great men, but they were not the greatest of symphony writers. Haydn's symphony in G is very beautiful, and it is needed for the instruction as well as the enjoyment of the ever-advancing succession of lovers of music. It was heard in perfection last evening and each movement received bountiful applause.

The second piece of the programme was Henselt's Concerto for piano (op. 16), in which Mr. Raffael Joseffy was the pianist. The work itself is ambitious, but not very interesting. Mr. Joseffy, who is a great favorite with our concert-public, performed brilliantly as ever, and was repeatedly called before the curtain; but he declined to play again.

Next followed a composition of the Russian, Tschaikowsky, called an overture-fantaisie of Romeo and Juliet. It might as well have any other title, for it has no distinct signification. There is scholarship, without motive, and the learning displayed is scrappy and uncontinuous. Passages that begin romantically are broken off abruptly by something dull, which in its turn is nipped untimely by a boisterous movement of a few bars, followed by something funereal. These may in turn depict the ball, the brawl, the balcony or the tomb scene of Shakespeare's play; but they would fit other scenes of other plays as well. The composition owed its success last evening to the splendid performance of Mr. Nikisch's orchestra. Rubinstein's Bal Costumé ballet music was brilliantly given; but the crowning performance was that of Richard Wagner's Vorspiel to the Meistersinger. This noble, sunshiny overture has never before been given at a concert here with such admirable effect.

HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, MARCH 29, 1890

Some scoffing fault finder, who complains of the feeble effect of the Fifth Symphony as given by our Symphony orchestra, says that he thinks that, if Nikisch only knew of this artillery accessory that proved so effective in Gilmore's hands, he would immediately "order up the guns" in his own behalf. Why! they would come miles in such a case to hear the noise! Beethoven didn't know all the dodges. Guess not!

March 90

REVIEW OF RECENT CONCERTS.

IN BOSTON.

The past month has not been prolific in concerts of the first magnitude. This is generally the case in the season just after the Christmas holidays. The Cecilia Club gave Haydn's "Seasons" for their second concert, and made a good success with it. They did not give the entire work, but the selections were made with such good taste, that the story of the work was comprehensible to all who heard it. On this occasion they united with the Boston Orchestral Club, and the orchestral support was also worthy of praise. The soloists were quite adequate to their parts, and the whole performance was a worthy one. It was a bold thing, however, to transpose the chorus "God of Light" from the end of the first part and make it the finale of the entire work, but in this case there has been no great harm done, for Haydn is not at his very best in the ending of "The Seasons" and was never very proud of the finale.

In chamber concerts the usual fate has ruled. Those who have attended these concerts in the past season know how many postponements took place then, and this season has proved no exception to the past custom. First there came a postponement of a Kneisel concert because the talented violinist lay in the clutches of "the grip," and later on one of the Baermann concerts was omitted because of the illness of the prima donna. But when the Kneisel concert did come it made ample amends for all disappointments, for it gave a program entirely devoted to Beethoven, with Professor Baermann at the piano in a Trio. It was especially notable for the manner in which the Quartet in C minor, op. 18, No. 1, was given.

These early quartets of the master are the perfection of clear part writing. The later quartets have far more grandeur of ideas, but they soar after orchestral effects without the orchestral forces, and while a poetic musician can fill out the suggestions given, the average hearer is lefl by them in a state of considerable bewilderment. The quartet in C major, Op. 59, No. 3, was excellently played, and the contrapuntal work of the finale has seldom received so clear a presentation.

The symphony concerts have gone on in their triumphant career. The chief works have been as follows; Schumann's symphony in E-flat. This work — the "Cologne symphony"—shows the composer in almost the last happy mood which came to his troubled mind, and was composed during the happy time when Schumann had entered upon his duties at Düsseldorf as director, and yielded himself to all the charms of the pleasant Rhine-life which this symphony pictures. It was given with a subtle understanding of the composer's style and meaning, and again showed Mr. Nikisch to be a splendid interpretor of Schumann.

At the same concert a suite by Grieg, entitled "Peer Gynt" was given. It was a very characteristic work, and proved that the present conductor is not going to hold the classical line so tightly drawn as his predecessor, who would not admit such popular works, on the plea that the dignity of the symphony concerts would not allow it. I hold that any work which has good construction and national characteristics is both dignified and educational. At another of these concerts the symphony by Raff entitled "To the Fatherland" was given for the first time. It seemed a rather bombastic affair, showing how easily Raff could put music together, but not possessing in any degree the power of a great national work. It juggled a little with "What is the German Fatherland," but aside from this has no really characteristic effects. At one of the recent concerts of this series, Mr. Nikisch broke through an established precedent, and a very good one, by readily accepting an encore. Hitherto these concerts have been refreshingly free from the attacks of the horny-handed encore fiend, but now no one knows what we may expect in the future. It would have been far better to have adhered to the old rule of refusing repetitions.

L. C. E.

GENERAL REVIEW—ELSEWHERE.

Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde" and "Die Gotterdammerung" are the most important revivals at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, during the past thirty days. In both works Heinrich Vogl appeared and in the latter especially created great enthusiasm. In the October HERALD I included an estimate of Vogl's Tristan in an article on the Bayreuth Festival of 1889. It would seem from the New York verdict that the artist was not quite at his best on his initial appearance in the part, but improved with succeeding representations. Lehmann's Isolde is ranked even greater than Sucher's; I can believe this for it is two years since Lehmann has undertaken the part and she is one whose progress in her art is constant; even in view of Sucher's great dramatic assumption I did not once forget the superior vocal quality of Lehmann's. In "Die Gotterdammerung" Vogl seems to have been very fine as Siegfried, both vocally and histrionically. Other first performances this season are "Aïda," with Perotti, Lehmann and Reichman; Nessler's "The Trumpeter of Sackkingen" with Reichman in the charming title part, and "Die Walküre." Perotti sang the music of Siegmund in the latter work much less satisfactorily than last season when his success was simply not a failure; Lehmann was the Brünnhilde, but the lovely music of Sieglinde in the hands of Miss Weisner was hardly recognizable. Reichman was Wotan and of his assumption the Tribune wrote:—

"It led to the restoration of a considerable fragment of the score which has been omitted in the representation hitherto—notably the recital of the events preceding the opening of the drama in the first act. It was this recital which prompted a witty German critic in 1876 to suggest that if it were necessary for Bruennhilde to learn the contents of the perlong tale, a way was offered by which the audience might be spared being told what they already know—Wotan might buy the libretto and give it to Bruennhilde to read between the acts. A wise excision was made in the recital last night, but Herr Reichmann's impressive declamation of the lines restored was one of the redeeming features of the performance of the second act. Throughout, too, his singing realized many of the requirements of Wagner's system and score."

Beginning on February 26 the Wagner operas and music-dramas were to be given in chronological order as follows:

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 26, 1890.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

THE fourth and last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra drew an even larger and more demonstrative audience to Steinway Hall on Tuesday night than any of its three predecessors had done, and this despite the fact that no soloistic attraction was offered on this occasion.

The program was a well chosen and interesting one, consisting of Schumann's first symphony, the one in B flat, and Beethoven's fifth symphony, the immortal C minor, between which was sandwiched in Volkmann's sombre and almost too darkly colored and "bloodthirsty" overture to Shakespeare's "Richard III." It is a work so full of a relentless, nay heathenish gloom that it loses some of the intended effectiveness through lack of contrast, of which certainly there is no want in the drama which this overture is to preface and in a certain sense to portray. Even the breaking in of the well-known tune of "The Campbells are Coming" in the episode, evidently intended to depict Bosworth Field, is too short breathed to relieve the monotony of sombreness that pervades the entre work. It was played in the most finished and careful manner possible under Mr. Nikisch's concise and imaginative guidance. The same in fact may be said about the two symphonies, which, barring an unfortunate break in the first trumpet for the very opening note of the Schumann symphony, were technically played faultlessly. The Schuman scherzo was taken at a somewhat too slow tempo, but nothing more beautiful than the performance of the slow movement of the Beethoven symphony could well be imagined, and the last movement was played with great spirit, and yet with much breadth and dignity of style.

Clipping from Press
New York N.Y.
Date 3/19

ACCOMPLISHED THESE THINGS.

FOR MUSIC LOVERS.

A FINE CONCERT BY THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA AT STEINWAY HALL

Mr. Nikisch's programme at the fourth and last of his series of concerts in this city, which occurred last evening in Steinway Hall, was a tribute certainly to the taste of his audience for the severest style of music. There were only three numbers—Schumann's "Spring" symphony, Volkmann's overture to "Richard III." and Beethoven's Fifth symphony. The comment has often been made that the playing of Mr. Nikisch's band is more enjoyable than that of any solo performer who might be thought to give weight and importance, to say nothing of variety, to his programme, and this thought was uppermost last evening.

Severely dignified as was the programme, the performance was full of interest and gave great enjoyment to an audience that completely filled the hall. The playing of the orchestra was not, as it generally has been, faultless in execution. Mr. Nikisch is sacrificing some of the beauty and delicacy of tone, nice balance and careful finish, in which his predecessor brought the orchestra to a high state of perfection. But he secures, in place of these qualities, a virility, a variety of tone color, an an expressiveness and a dramatic power that are very enjoyable when applied to the classical symphonies.

There is nothing radical or revolutionary in his readings. But there is a body of tone, of splendid masculine power, and the poetic, emotional, romantic and dramatic phases of the music are finely emphasized. The Beethoven symphony aroused the most enthusiasm, and deservedly so; for it has rarely if ever been played better here.

Clipping from American
Philadelphia Pa
Date 3/20

DRAMATIC ...

The Fourth Boston Symphony Concert at the Academy of Music.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its fourth concert for the season at the Academy of Music last night before an audience which filled every seat in the auditorium, excepting the upper gallery, and even overflowed into the aisles. The symphony was Haydn's in G major, and while this music, which does not employ the brasses, seemed thin and colorless, it was beautiful, too, in its way, and well served to exhibit the splennid quality of Mr. Nikisch's strings. It was, however, in Rubinstein's "Bal Costume" numbers and Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture that the virtuosity of the orchestra was chiefly shown, and here its execution was dazzling in its brilliancy. The feature of the evening, however, was Joseffy's interpretation of Henselt's interesting but extraordinarily difficult piano-forte concerto in F minor. In all the years he has been playing here Joseffy has done nothing so great, both technically and intellectually, as this, and the repeated recalls which it elicited were thoroughly well-deserved. Critical judgment has heretofore ordinarily denied Joseffy breadth and power, but in his playing of this concerto—a recognized test of a pianist's ability—he developed both in a very marked degree, and those who say that he can only play Chopin must have seen cause to change their opinion. The Russian composer's overture, the novelty of the programme, was on the whole disappointing. It contains some beautiful episodes, but is too fragmentary and diffuse to be satisfactory. Wagner's "Meistersinger" overture closed a very successful and enjoyable concert.

[97]

Clipping from Eagle
Brooklyn N
Date 3/ 19

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The fourth and last of the concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Steinway Hall last night attracted a large audience, with the usual contingent of Brooklynites and of Bostonians in temporary exile. Never has the orchestra been heard to better advantage; never has it played with more fire and enthusiasm; never were its fortissimi more tremendous and impressive. The programme would have been regarded as formidable not long ago, for it was made up of two symphonies and an overture, but the genius of Conductor Nikisch filled every moment of the concert with interest. Schumann's first symphony was rendered with vigor, yet with abundance of expression and contrast; the declamatory phrases were given with Wagnerian energy, and once or twice it might have been truer to the sentiment of the work had the brasses been moderated, while there was a slight lack of blandness in the playing of the larghetto; yet, take it all in all, there has been no fresher and more intellectual performance of this noble work than these musicians offered last evening, nor did the Beethoven fifth symphony efface this impression of nobility, howbeit the plane of the work is supposed to be above that of Schumann. On this Mr. Nikisch gave a reading so original in many points that, until his reasons for violating custom became manifest, he might have been charged with an unsympathetic treatment of the symphony. The opening figure, a triple stroke on G and a fall to E flat, that Beethoven disclosed as his idea of "Fate, knocking at the door," was given very slowly and the E flat was dwelt on at a surprising length, but after that the symphony was taken at the usual tempo. It was evident that Mr. Nikisch desired to emphasize what is really the text, the leitmotif of the composition and fix it strongly on attention at the outset. In the finale the brightness of the strings the boom of the brasses and the vocal tones of the wood wind combined to give splendor to a certain and voluminous unfolding of the triumphant theme, and it compelled the liveliest applause from the audience. The overture was a prelude by Volkmann to Shakspear's "Richard III," a rather gloomy work designed to convey in tone the import of the tragedy, but needing compression and more definite resolutions of harmonic promises. The episode of battle is stirring with its swing and crash of instruments and a distorted verse of "The Campbells are Coming," is introduced to heighten color that can hardly be called local. It is hoped that the Brooklyn concert of this orchestra is still among the possibilities of the season.

Clipping from Bulletin
Phila Pa
Date

...ist and Philharmonists afterwards.

MUSIC.

The Fourth Boston Symphony Concert.

Bad weather and good music come to Philadelphia with Mr. Nikisch and the Boston orchestra at every visit. We had them both last evening. But snow, rain, wind, mud and slush did not prevent the assemblage of a great audience at the Academy of Music, which was filled in every part. The stage, too, was filled by the splendid band, which, of course, never minds the weather.

There was not a note of Beethoven's in the entertainment. The disposition of concert-planners seems to be to put the great master in the background, for a time, at least, and give the public a taste of Mozart or Haydn. These were great men, but they were not the greatest of symphony writers. Haydn's symphony in G is very beautiful, and it is needed for the instruction as well as the enjoyment of the ever-advancing succession of lovers of music. It was heard in perfection last evening and each movement received bountiful applause.

The second piece of the programme was Henselt's Concerto for piano (op. 16), in which Mr. Raffael Joseffy was the pianist. The work itself is ambitious, but not very interesting. Mr. Joseffy, who is a great favorite with our concert-public, performed brilliantly as ever, and was repeatedly called before the curtain; but he declined to play again.

Next followed a composition of the Russian, Tschaikowsky, called an overture-fantaisie of Romeo and Juliet. It might as well have any other title, for it has no distinct signification. There is scholarship, without motive, and the learning displayed is scrappy and uncontinuous. Passages that begin romantically are broken off abruptly by something dull, which in its turn is nipped untimely by a boisterous movement of a few bars, followed by something funereal. These may in turn depict the ball, the brawl, the balcony or the tomb scene of Shakespeare's play; but they would fit other scenes of other plays as well. The composition owed its success last evening to the splendid performance of Mr. Nikisch's orchestra. Rubinstein's Bal Costumé ballet music was brilliantly given; but the crowning performance was that of Richard Wagner's Vorspiel to the Meistersinger. This noble, sunshiny overture has never before been given at a concert here with such admirable effect.

HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, MARCH 29, 1890

Some scoffing fault finder, who complains of the feeble effect of the Fifth Symphony as given by our Symphony orchestra, says that he thinks that, if Nikisch only knew of this artillery accessory that proved so effective in Gilmore's hands, he would immediately "order up the guns" in his own behalf. Why! they would come miles in such a case to hear the noise! Beethoven didn't know all the dodges. Guess not!

March 90

REVIEW OF RECENT CONCERTS.

IN BOSTON.

The past month has not been prolific in concerts of the first magnitude. This is generally the case in the season just after the Christmas holidays. The Cecilia Club gave Haydn's "Seasons" for their second concert, and made a good success with it. They did not give the entire work, but the selections were made with such good taste, that the story of the work was comprehensible to all who heard it. On this occasion they united with the Boston Orchestral Club, and the orchestral support was also worthy of praise. The soloists were quite adequate to their parts, and the whole performance was a worthy one. It was a bold thing, however, to transpose the chorus "God of Light" from the end of the first part and make it the finale of the entire work, but in this case there has been no great harm done, for Haydn is not at his very best in the ending of "The Seasons" and was never very proud of the finale.

In chamber concerts the usual fate has ruled. Those who have attended these concerts in the past season know how many postponements took place then, and this season has proved no exception to the past custom. First there came a postponement of a Kneisel concert because the talented violinist lay in the clutches of "the grip," and later on one of the Baermann concerts was omitted because of the illness of the prima donna. But when the Kneisel concert did come it made ample amends for all disappointments, for it gave a program entirely devoted to Beethoven, with Professor Baermann at the piano in a Trio. It was especially notable for the manner in which the Quartet in C minor, op. 18, No. 1, was given.

These early quartets of the master are the perfection of clear part writing. The later quartets have far more grandeur of ideas, but they soar after orchestral effects without the orchestral forces, and while a poetic musician can fill out the suggestions given, the average hearer is lefl by them in a state of considerable bewilderment. The quartet in C major, Op. 59, No. 3, was excellently played, and the contrapuntal work of the finale has seldom received so clear a presentation.

The symphony concerts have gone on in their triumphant career. The chief works have been as follows; Schumann's symphony in E-flat. This work — the "Cologne symphony"—shows the composer in almost the last happy mood which came to his troubled mind, and was composed during the happy time when Schumann had entered upon his duties at Düsseldorf as director, and yielded himself to all the charms of the pleasant Rhine-life which this symphony pictures. It was given with a subtle understanding of the composer's style and meaning, and again showed Mr. Nikisch to be a splendid interpretor of Schumann.

At the same concert a suite by Grieg, entitled "Peer Gynt" was given. It was a very characteristic work, and proved that the present conductor is not going to hold the classical line so tightly drawn as his predecessor, who would not admit such popular works, on the plea that the dignity of the symphony concerts would not allow it. I hold that any work which has good construction and national characteristics is both dignified and educational. At another of these concerts the symphony by Raff entitled "To the Fatherland" was given for the first time. It seemed a rather bombastic affair, showing how easily Raff could put music together, but not possessing in any degree the power of a great national work. It juggled a little with "What is the German Fatherland," but aside from this has no really characteristic effects. At one of the recent concerts of this series, Mr. Nikisch broke through an established precedent, and a very good one, by readily accepting an encore. Hitherto these concerts have been refreshingly free from the attacks of the horny-handed encore fiend, but now no one knows what we may expect in the future. It would have been far better to have adhered to the old rule of refusing repetitions.

L. C. E.

GENERAL REVIEW—ELSEWHERE.

Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde" and "Die Gotterdammerung" are the most important revivals at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, during the past thirty days. In both works Heinrich Vogl appeared and in the latter especially created great enthusiasm. In the October HERALD I included an estimate of Vogl's Tristan in an article on the Bayreuth Festival of 1889. It would seem from the New York verdict that the artist was not quite at his best on his initial appearance in the part, but improved with succeeding representations. Lehmann's Isolde is ranked even greater than Sucher's; I can believe this for it is two years since Lehmann has undertaken the part and she is one whose progress in her art is constant; even in view of Sucher's great dramatic assumption I did not once forget the superior vocal quality of Lehmann's. In "Die Gotterdammerung" Vogl seems to have been very fine as Siegfried, both vocally and histrionically. Other first performances this season are "Aïda," with Perotti, Lehmann and Reichman; Nessler's "The Trumpeter of Sackkingen" with Reichman in the charming title part, and "Die Walküre." Perotti sang the music of Siegmund in the latter work much less satisfactorily than last season when his success was simply not a failure; Lehmann was the Brünnhilde, but the lovely music of Sieglinde in the hands of Miss Weisner was hardly recognizable. Reichman was Wotan and of his assumption the Tribune wrote:—

"It led to the restoration of a considerable fragment of the score which has been omitted in the representation hitherto—notably the recital of the events preceding the opening of the drama in the first act. It was this recital which prompted a witty German critic in 1876 to suggest that if it were necessary for Bruennhilde to learn the contents of the perlong tale, a way was offered by which the audience might be spared being told what they already know—Wotan might buy the libretto and give it to Bruennhilde to read between the acts. A wise excision was made in the recital last night, but Herr Reichmann's impressive declamation of the lines restored was one of the redeeming features of the performance of the second act. Throughout, too, his singing realized many of the requirements of Wagner's system and score."

Beginning on February 26 the Wagner operas and music-dramas were to be given in chronological order as follows:

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 26, 1890.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

THE fourth and last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra drew an even larger and more demonstrative audience to Steinway Hall on Tuesday night than any of its three predecessors had done, and this despite the fact that no soloistic attraction was offered on this occasion.

The program was a well chosen and interesting one, consisting of Schumann's first symphony, the one in B flat, and Beethoven's fifth symphony, the immortal C minor, between which was sandwiched in Volkmann's sombre and almost too darkly colored and "bloodthirsty" overture to Shakespeare's "Richard III." It is a work so full of a relentless, nay heathenish gloom that it loses some of the intended effectiveness through lack of contrast, of which certainly there is no want in the drama which this overture is to preface and in a certain sense to portray. Even the breaking in of the well-known tune of "The Campbells are Coming" in the episode, evidently intended to depict Bosworth Field, is too short breathed to relieve the monotony of sombreness that pervades the entre work. It was played in the most finished and careful manner possible under Mr. Nikisch's concise and imaginative guidance. The same in fact may be said about the two symphonies, which, barring an unfortunate break in the first trumpet for the very opening note of the Schumann symphony, were technically played faultlessly. The Schuman scherzo was taken at a somewhat too slow tempo, but nothing more beautiful than the performance of the slow movement of the Beethoven symphony could well be imagined, and the last movement was played with great spirit, and yet with much breadth and dignity of style.

Clipping from Press
New York N
Date 3/ 19

Clipping from American
Philadelphia Pa
Date 3/ 20

ACCOMPLISHED THESE THINGS.

FOR MUSIC LOVERS.

A FINE CONCERT BY THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA AT STEINWAY HALL.

Mr. Nikisch's programme at the fourth and last of his series of concerts in this city, which occurred last evening in Steinway Hall, was a tribute certainly to the taste of his audience for the severest style of music. There were only three numbers—Schumann's "Spring" symphony, Volkmann's overture to "Richard III." and Beethoven's Fifth symphony. The comment has often been made that the playing of Mr. Nikisch's band is more enjoyable than that of any solo performer who might be thought to give weight and importance, to say nothing of variety, to his programme, and this thought was uppermost last evening.

Severely dignified as was the programme, the performance was full of interest and gave great enjoyment to an audience that completely filled the hall. The playing of the orchestra was not, as it generally has been, faultless in execution. Mr. Nikisch is sacrificing some of the beauty and delicacy of tone, nice balance and careful finish, in which his predecessor brought the orchestra to a high state of perfection. But he secures, in place of these qualities, a virility, a variety of tone color, an an expressiveness and a dramatic power that are very enjoyable when applied to the classical symphonies.

There is nothing radical or revolutionary in his readings. But there is a body of tone, of splendid masculine power, and the poetic, emotional, romantic and dramatic phases of the music are finely emphasized. The Beethoven symphony aroused the most enthusiasm, and deservedly so; for it has rarely if ever been played better here.

DRAMATIC ...

The Fourth Boston Symphony Concert at the Academy of Music.

The Fourth Boston Symphony Concert at the Academy of Music.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its fourth concert for the season at the Academy of Music last night before an audience which filled every seat in the auditorium, excepting the upper gallery, and even overflowed into the aisles. The symphony was Haydn's in G major, and while this music, which does not employ the brasses, seemed thin and colorless, it was beautiful, too, in its way, and well served to exhibit the splennid quality of Mr. Nikisch's strings. It was, however, in Rubinstein's "Bal Costume" numbers and Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture that the virtuosity of the orchestra was chiefly shown, and here its execution was dazzling in its brilliancy. The feature of the evening, however, was Joseffy's interpretation of Henselt's interesting but extraordinarily difficult piano-forte concerto in F minor. In all the years he has been playing here Joseffy has done nothing so great, both technically and intellectually, as this, and the repeated recalls which it elicited were thoroughly well-deserved. Critical judgment has heretofore ordinarily denied Joseffy breadth and power, but in his playing of this concerto—a recognized test of a pianist's ability—he developed both in a very marked degree, and those who say that he can only play Chopin must have seen cause to change their opinion. The Russian composer's overture, the novelty of the programme, was on the whole disappointing. It contains some beautiful episodes, but is too fragmentary and diffuse to be satisfactory. Wagner's "Meistersinger" overture closed a very successful and enjoyable concert.

[97]

"Rienzi," "Flying Dutchman," "Tannnäuser," "Lohengrin," "Die Meistersinger," "Tristan und Isolde," "Rheingold," "Die Walküre," "Siegfried," "Die Götterdämmerung." No such comprehensive scheme has ever been attempted in this country and already extraordinary interest from all about has been awakened in it. Let me say here for the benefit of those who reside in or near the track of the proposed itinerary of the Metropolitan Company, which will begin in April, that it is a venture undertaken by parties outside the New York establishment, and that Mr. Walter Damrosch, not Mr. Seidl, will be the conductor. It is given out that the orchestra, artists and chorus of the company, as at present constituted, will go upon the tour which will be in wholly responsible hands.

The quasi fiasco attending the production of the new Gilbert and Sullivan piece in New York brought Mr. D'Oyly Carte to the scene, who has reorganized the company and improved it. Meanwhile Mr. John Stetson has given the work in Brooklyn with a company of Americans, and in eminently satisfactory style.

In the field of orchestral concerts happenings have been numerous. The January concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was devoted to Tschaikowsky, Haydn, Liszt and Grieg. The Russian composer was represented by a superb piece of scoring, the "Romeo and Juliet" overture-fantaisie; Mr. Rafael Joseffy played Listz's A-major pianoforte concerto. Tschaikowsky is the rage in New York this season; at the fourth concert of the Symphony Society Mr. Damrosch brought out his fourth symphony, while Mr. Thomas at the fourth Philharmonic played the fifth which was heard for the first time in the country at a Thomas concert last season. Another novelty of the fourth Symphony concert was an arrangement for strings of one of Brahm's set of Liebeslieder waltzes. The playing of the orchestra at the Philharmonic concert was much the best heard from the band this season. Mr. Theodore Reichmann was the soloist and sang an air from Marschner's "Hans Heiling," and the Romanza from "Tannhäuser," both superbly, according to all accounts. Mr. Thomas' Sunday evening concerts at the Lennox Lyceum have become a pronounced success; the programmes, which are made on lines similar to those of the Popular Matinees of two seasons ago, attract enormous audiences; the best soloists are provided. Mr. Thomas is so much pleased with their success that already a series of Summer-evening concerts for May and June is talked of and even into next season Mr. Thomas looks with hopeful eye. Mr. Frank Van der Stucken thinks it necessary to give a few orchestral concerts this season. With a small orchestra the first has taken place in Chickering Hall with a program of standard works. Mr. Van der Stucken is ambitious

In the department of chamber-music the Philarmonic Club presented two novelties: Suite by Charles Kurth, a New York musician, and Dvoràk's Quintet, op. 77. Among the singing clubs the Liederkranz gave a concert which calls for no mention. Two sets of lectures have attracted attention. Prof. F. L. Ritter of Vassar College has talked on general topics, while Mr. H. E. Krehbiel has, with the assistance of Mr. Anton Seidl at the pianoforte, dwelt upon the beauties of Wagner's lyric-dramas.

New England happenings. In New Haven the monthly concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra are very successful, and it should be noted, that whereas formerly, an entire symphony was the exception, so far this season each program has contained one; Schumann's in D minor was chosen for the concert of Feb. 10. Up in Berkshire the Musical Society of Pittsfield, established this season by Mr. G. A. Mietzke, formerly of Rutland, gave Gaul's "Joan of Arc" with Blaisdell's orchestra assisting. The Boston Symphony orchestra played Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony. Grieg's "Peer Gynt," Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture, at Worcester, on Feb. 20; Mr. Joseffy was the soloist, The annual report of the Worcester County Festival Association has just been made public. The Association is at peace with itself and has money at interest. The document contains no self criticism but as the Association is in receipt of plenty of advice from disinterested sources, we do not wonder at the omission. Turning into Canada the first performance of the season by the Toronto Philharmonic Society is noted; Bruch's "Arminius" was given with Mrs. Anna Bulkley Hills. Mr. G. J. Parker and Mr. W. M. Porteous, soloists. The orchestra, made up in part of amateurs, is known as the Torrington Orchestra and is a credit to the perseverance and toil of the capable musician from whom it takes its name, The Montreal "Star" has a critic who signs himself "Symphony" whose efforts are all for the best interests of art. In entering some just strictures upon a local event "Symphony" shows in its true light the reprehensible practise of the manager of a concert party of five known as the Boston Symphony Orchestral Club, who, if he does not always advertise his corps as the Boston Symphony Orchestra—with which it has no connection—is not averse to encouraging the deceit this may cause, for we remark, that the farther removed from Boston he gets the more misleading are his circulars and announcements.

Last season there was much activity in Buffalo, regular orchestral concerts being the more important feature; thus far during 1889–90 the city has been musically dormant. Not only is the orchestra disbanded, but the singing clubs also appear to be inert. The Vocal Society, mixed chorus, Joseph Mischka conductor, was heard in one concert in January, but of the Orpheus and Liedertapel word cometh not. Cleveland furnishes a far more encouraging showing than its companion and neighbor on the lakes. The Vocal Society now in its seventeenth season has given two concerts. "The Hymn of Praise," Rubinstein's "Tower of Babel" and "The Messiah," have been heard, all with orchestra, and the energetic conductor, Alfred Arthur, promises equal attractions during the closing months of the musical year. The Philharmonic Orchestra of sixty, under the conductorship of Emil Ring, is giving a series of concerts which are most creditable. There have been performed at three concerts: Haydn's E-flat symphony (B and H vol. 1.); three movements from Volkmann's symphony in D minor; Rubinstein's "Feramors;" Wagner's "Tannhäuser" overture, selections from "Lohengrin," and the Farewell and Fire-Charm music from "Die Walküre;" Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto; Berlioz's "La France-Juges" overture, etc. Analytical programs carefully written have been printed by this most excellent institution. At the second chamber concert of the Philharmonic String Quartet, Dvoràk's quartet op. 51 was performed. The Beethoven Quartet Club at Pittsburg gave their third chamber concert on Jan. 23, playing quartets by Weber, op. 8, and Bungert op. 18; the last named a Leipzig musician whom Anton Seidl alone regards as a genius. The fine new library given by Andrew Carnegie to Alleghany City has a beautiful organ, among the very best instruments of its kind in the country.

Press Clipping Bureau No.

Clipping from Press
New York N.Y.
Date 3/9

MUSICAL COURIER.

Y YORK, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 26, 1890.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

ourth and last concert of the Boston phony Orchestra drew an even larger and more tive audience to Steinway Hall on Tuesday night of its three predecessors had done, and this de- fact that no soloistic attraction was offered on this ogram was a well chosen and interesting one, of Schumann's first symphony, the one in d Beethoven's fifth symphony, the immortal C tween which was sandwiched in Volkmann's som- most too darkly colored and "bloodthirsty" over- akespeare's "Richard III." It is a work so full rtless, nay heathenish gloom that it loses some ended effectiveness through lack of contrast, of rtainly there is no want in the drama which this is to preface and in a certain sense to portray. breaking in of the well-known tune of "The s are Coming" in the episode, evidently intended Bosworth Field, is too short breathed to relieve tony of sombreness that pervades the entre work. ayed in the most finished and careful manner pos- er Mr. Nikisch's concise and imaginative guidance. e in fact may be said about the two symphonies, arring an unfortunate break in the first trumpet very opening note of the Schumann symphony, were lly played faultlessly. The Schuman scherzo was a somewhat too slow tempo, but nothing more beau- the performance of the slow movement of the n symphony could well be imagined, and the last t was played with great spirit, and yet with much nd dignity of style.

Press Clipping Bureau

Clipping from American
Philadelphia Pa
Date 3/20

ACCOMPLISHED THESE THINGS.

FOR MUSIC LOVERS.

A FINE CONCERT BY THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA AT STEINWAY HALL.

Mr. Nikisch's programme at the fourth and last of his series of concerts in this city, which occurred last evening in Steinway Hall, was a tribute certainly to the taste of his audience for the severest style of music. There were only three numbers—Schumann's "Spring" symphony, Volkmann's overture to "Richard III." and Beethoven's Fifth symphony. The comment has often been made that the playing of Mr. Nikisch's band is more enjoyable than that of any solo performer who might be thought to give weight and importance, to say nothing of variety, to his programme, and this thought was uppermost last evening.

Severely dignified as was the programme, the performance was full of interest and gave great enjoyment to an audience that completely filled the hall. The playing of the orchestra was not, as it generally has been, faultless in execution. Mr. Nikisch is sacrificing some of the beauty and delicacy of tone, nice balance and careful finish, in which his predecessor brought the orchestra to a high state of perfection. But he secures, in place of these qualities, a virility, a variety of tone color, an an expressiveness and a dramatic power that are very enjoyable when applied to the classical symphonies.

There is nothing radical or revolutionary in his readings. But there is a body of tone, of splendid masculine power, and the poetic, emotional, romantic and dramatic phases of the music are finely emphasized. The Beethoven symphony evoked the most enthusiastic and [illegible]

DRAMATIC [illegible]

The Fourth Boston Symphony Concert at the Academy of Music.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its fourth concert for the season at the Academy of Music last night before an audience which filled every seat in the auditorium, excepting the upper gallery, and even overflowed into the aisles. The symphony was Haydn's in G major, and while this music, which does not employ the brasses, seemed thin and colorless, it was beautiful, too, in its way, and well served to exhibit the splennid quality of Mr. Nikisch's strings. It was, however, in Rubinstein's "Bal Costume" numbers and Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture that the virtuosity of the orchestra was chiefly shown, and here its execution was dazzling in its brilliancy. The feature of the evening, however, was Joseffy's interpretation of Henselt's interesting but extraordinarily difficult piano-forte concerto in F minor. In all the years he has been playing here Joseffy has done nothing so great, both technically and intellectually, as this, and the repeated recalls which it elicited were thoroughly well-deserved. Critical judgment has heretofore ordinarily denied Joseffy breadth and power, but in his playing of this concerto—a recognized test of a pianist's ability—he developed both in a very marked degree, and those who say that he can only play Chopin must have seen cause to change their opinion. The Russian composer's overture, the novelty of the programme, was on the whole disappointing. It contains some beautiful episodes, but is too fragmentary and diffuse to be satisfactory. Wagner's "Meistersinger" overture closed a very successful and enjoyable concert.

[97]

Clipping No.

Clipping from Herald New York Ms

Date 3/9

BOSTON S SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The last concert of the season by the Boston Orchestra, given in Steinway Hall last evening under the direction of Herr Nikisch, attracted a very large audience.

With the performance itself there can be no quarrel, the orchestra playing with a beauty of tone, a spirit and a delicacy that cannot be too highly praised, but with the programme one may be allowed to remark that a symphony of Brahms, of Rubinstein or of Tschaikowsky would have been far more interesting to our public than Beethoven's immortal masterpiece in C minor, well played as it was.

The Schumann symphony in B flat, which opened the concert, is always a treat in the way of free, unpretentious joyousness, and it has seldom been better played here than last night. Volkmann's overture

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, MAR. 29, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Mr. Nikisch has given the public the best of opportunities for judging how well his first violinists can play solos, and tonight yet another member of the group at his left hand will be heard, in the concerto in A-minor, by Vieuxtemps. This player is Mr. Otto Roth, one of the younger men of the orchestra, who has shown himself capable of solid, serious chamber work in the Kneisel Quartette, while in the summer-night concerts he has given proof of the strength and brilliancy of style which are necessary to carry a great popular audience as on other occasions he has done prominent service well as leader or performer in orchestral concerts of greater dignity. His is perhaps the strongest tone of any of the Symphony soloists, but it is honest, firm and unexaggerated, easily controlled when the quiet moments come and grace succeeds to fulness. His performance yesterday afternoon was high in merit for its sure grasp, fluent and consistent technique and manly spirit. There is no break in the concerto and Mr. Roth managed finely the transitions from one to another movement, distinguishing each by its true manner and reaching the climax of the finale with unabated energy and clearness. In their different ways the tremendously difficult cadenza of the allegro, and the calm sustained adagio were fine examples of scholarly appreciation and mechanical command. The now unfamiliar style of Vieuxtemps was revived and justified by Mr. Roth's treatment, and the audience recalled him three times, which is a rare compliment at a rehearsal. The other numbers of the programme are two—Brahms's stately and richly colored "Tragic" overture and Dvorak's first Symphony, opulent in fancy and feeling and sumptuous in color. Both works are known here, the symphony being readily recalled by the almost wild furiant which forms the basis of its scherzo, and no sketch of them can now be needed. The orchestra yesterday read the former with broad sentiment and the latter masterfully, and almost passionately at times; yet one could not help wishing that its quietude might have been more subdued and its vehemence less overwhelming. The programme for next week has been thus made up: Wagner, overture, "Flying Dutchman"; Frederic Cliffe, symphony in C-minor (first time in America); Liszt, Rakoczy march.

~~~ There will be given on Wednesday afternoon next the third Young Folks' Popular concert, and it will have an especial interest, because then Herr Reichmann, the leading barytone of the Metropolitan Company, will then make his first appearance in Boston.

~~~ The Kneisel Quartette's fifth concert will be given at Union Hall on Monday evening next, Mr. Perabo assisting.

~~~ The Adamowski Quartette played by special engagement at a very swell New York musicale, a few nights ago.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, MARCH 30, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme played at the 21st of the present season's concerts by the Boston symphony orchestra in Music Hall last evening consisted of Brahm's "Tragic" overture, the violin concerto by Vieuxtemps in A minor, and Dvorak's first symphony in D, op. 60. Mr. Otto Roth, the solo violinist, is a member of the orchestra who has had former hearings in these concerts. Although a painstaking, intelligent and modest player, he is a singularly uninteresting violinist, and fails to show the characteristics demanded for successful solo work in his playing. He plays accurately, but methodically; his intonation is correct, but colorless, and though commanding the technique of his instrument to a commendable degree, he plays with such a lack of freedom that there is little satisfaction in his work. He was very generously applauded for his efforts and is to be congratulated upon the degree of success attending his annual appearance as soloist. The "Tragic" overture is not a cheerful or enlivening composition, nor is the Dvorak symphony calculated to cause intense pleasure to the average listener. Both works were played with admirable intelligence under Mr. Nikisch's baton, and both found appreciation by the audience, apparently. It is possible that the educational value of the programme justified its selection; certainly there was little in it to lead to undue excitement or unseasonable enjoyment. Next Saturday evening's programme is made up of Wagner's overture, "Flying Dutchman," Frederic Cliffe's symphony in C minor (first time in America) and Liszt's "Rakoczy March."

Boston Post

MONDAY MORNING, MARCH 31, 1890.

TWENTY-FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERT.

There was a rather light house Saturday night, compared with the usual crowd which frequents these concerts, which was probably owing to the fact that the general public still needs a powerful amount of "lifting" before they can be raised to the standard which declares a man a musical fool who does not blindly admire every note of music which Messrs. Brahms and Dvorak have written. The programme was as follows:

Brahms.....Tragic Overture, op. 81
Vieuxtemps.....Concerto for violin, No. 5 A minor, op 37
Dvorak...Symphony No. 1 in D Major, op. 60

As a matter of fact these two works are both very enjoyable, and the public had no need to be afraid of them, but the educational onslaughts of the enthusiasts have been so determined and furious that the effects have been indeed disastrous; many people shudder at the prospect of hearing Dvorak's music, and the devout cross themselves at the mere mention of Brahms's name. The Tragic Overture, by the latter composer, is one of the—alas!—too few works from his pen the hearing of which gives distinct pleasure. It is not so replete with musicianly cleverness and general interest as the Academic Overture, but it is without doubt a clear and beautiful composition, and when it is so beautifully played, as any work is bound to be by our orchestra, it cannot fail to please the public. The Vieuxtemps concerto is a light, melodious and refined work of no extraordinary merit, but pleasant to the ear. Mr. Roth played it finely, and was greeted with loud and prolonged enthusiasm. For so young an artist Mr. Roth's work is of an unusually high character, and in a few years he will doubtless have won a place for himself in the front rank of violinists in this country.

With regard to the above-mentioned efforts of the Brahms-Dvorak enthusiasts to make propaganda for their chosen masters throughout the world, it is interesting to study the very valuable statistics published every year by the "Signale" with regard to the performances of different works in all important musical centres. Without going too far into detail, it may be briefly stated that these figures seem to show that while the larger works of Dvorak are steadily and rapidly growing in favor, the Brahms "boom" is practically at a standstill. Of course, there are certain of the great works of Brahms which are so fine and beautiful that they are certain to be repeated many times, but there are, unfortunately, too many others which the cautious public, having once heard them, are apt to avoid with the same prudence which a scalded cat exhibits towards hot water. With Dvorak it is different: he certainly has not the technique of expression—to wit, counterpoint in all its finest niceties and details—that Brahms has, but he has twice the originality and about four times the invention of his great rival, to which must be added a real genius for instrumentation, and this is Brahms's weakest point. Rheinberger is in the habit of saying to his pupils: "Be sure and make your music sound well! If you want to write an exceptionally original, or even extravagantly new, idea, you have won half the battle if you make it sound well," and there was never a truer word said about the art of composition; and with regard to the two men in question, it may be unhesitatingly affirmed that, while Dvorak's music nearly always sounds well, Brahms's very seldom pleases the ear.

In his choral works Brahms is at his best in this particular. He is restricted by the possibilities of the human voice, and he is forced within certain limits which have the most advantageous effect upon his work, and there can be no doubt that if he took half as much pains to make his orchestral and chamber music "sound well" as he is obliged to expend in attaining this desirable result in choral works, his popularity with the musical public would be increased a hundredfold. Now Dvorak does this very thing, and it is nowhere more noticeable than in his beautiful first symphony, which, by the way, was superbly played on this occasion. The first movement is apt to seem a little long, but it was so beautifully played, and the playing of the first horn, oboe and bassoon is especially worthy of praise. The slow movement, with weird but beautiful themes, was very carefully played, but the triumph of the evening for the orchestra and its gifted conductor was reached in the splendid scherzo, which was most magnificently rendered. This scherzo is in the form of a Slavonic dance called the furiant, and the music aptly expresses the name. The whole symphony was loudly applauded. Next week's programme includes Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" overture, Liszt's Rakoczy March and the long-expected symphony by Mr. Frederic Cliffe, which will be heard with the deepest interest.

ARTHUR WELD.

Boston Daily Traveller.

MONDAY MARCH 31, 1890.

Twenty-First Symphony Concert—Mr. Otto Roth, Soloist.

The programme of the twenty-first Symphony concert was:

Brahms. Tragic Overture, op. 81.
Vieuxtemps. Concerto for Violin, in A minor, No. 35, op. 37.
Dvorák. Symphony No. 1. in D, op. 60.

Mr. Otto Roth was the soloist. We were at the last moment prevented from going to the concert. This became a disappointment, particularly because Mr. Nikisch had not been heard before as an interpreter of Dvorak, whose D major Symphony, the three first movements, is a fine example of this most individual and musical colorist. Mr. Roth is an artist always heard with pleasure and we offer our apologies to him for the omission of criticism upon his playing. Brahms we have always with us. This week's programme will present for the first time in the country the symphony in C minor by Frederic Cliffe, a young Englishman, which received high praise from the English critics on the occasion of its initial hearing in England last April. The overture will be Wagner's romantic prelude to "The Flying Ducthman." Liszt's "Rakoczy" march will also be heard for the first time at these concerts.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, MARCH 30, 1890.

TWENTY-FIRST CONCERT.

At the Symphony concert last evening, the programme included the Tragic Overture of Brahms; Concerto for violin. No. 5, in A minor, op. 37; and Symphony No. 1, in D, op. 60.

Mr. Otto Roth was the soloist, He is an uncommonly artistic violinist, and the Vieuxtemps concerto could hardly have found a more congenial interpreter. It is a most effective as well as an exceptionally virtuosic and interesting show piece and in his relation to it Mr. Roth proved himself to be both intrinsically and by cultivation a typical virtuoso. His success with the audience was sympathetic and he was four times enthusiastically recalled.

The overture and symphony were both characteristically well played.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULAR.

For the third Young People's Popular concert in Music hall, Wednesday afternoon, the following remarkably attractive and well-chosen programme has been prepared:

Overture. "Mignon".....A. Thomas
Aria. "Hans Heiling".....Marschner
Mr. Theodor Reichmann.
Symphonic Poem. "Danse Macabre".....Saint-Saens
Air Hongrois. (For Violin.).....Ernst
Mr. Franz Kneisel.
Songs with Piano.
Fruhlingstraum.....Spicker
"Wie bist du meine Koenigin".....Brahms
Mr. Theodor Reichmann.
Minuet de Follets. } from "Faust".....Berlioz
Ballet of Sylphs. }
March from "Tanphæuser.....Wagner

The fifth Kneisel concert of the season will take place in Union hall, tomorrow evening and a fine programme has been arranged. The quartette will be assisted by Miss Gertrude Franklin, soprano, and Mr. Ernst Perabo.

Boston Sunday Globe.

TWENTY-FOUR PAGES.

SUNDAY, MARCH 30, 1890.

Echoes of the Symphony—

Brahm's "Tragic" overture is a work to be heard twice or thrice before its art and power can be fully recognized. Yet even a single hearing, when orchestra and leader are in such sympathy with a composer's thought, as was the case yesterday in Music Hall, must present great attractiveness to every one who can appreciate the best in music. Mr. Nikisch has seldom been more happy than in his reading of this overture. Mr. Otto Roth performed with brilliancy and effect a concerto for violin by Vieuxtemps, and was applauded very warmly. The soloists' honor were not unmerited; the orchestral accompaniment, however, for some reason or other, did not reach the Nikisch standard for this kind of work. Dvorak's First Symphony in D, given with fervor and spirit, proved a most enjoyable concert selection. The scherzo, with its "furiant" motive taken at a tremendous pace, and the brilliant finale, may compare with the very best achievements of our noble Symphony orchestra. This week's programme begins with the "Flying Dutchman" overture, and ends with Liszt's "Rakoczy" march. Frederic Cliffe's symphony in C minor is to be interpreted for the first time in America.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 1, 1890.

The Kneisel Quartette Concert—Von Bulow's Recital.

One of the most uniformly interesting entertainments of this season's course was given by the quartette, assisted by Miss Franklin and Mr. Ernst Perabo, last evening. Brahms was the first author represented, the work chosen being the third of his string quartettes. It is in a lighter, more imaginative vein than Brahms generally writes. Each movement has very strong peculiarities of its own. In the first, the vivace, the quaint rhythmic changes are a constant series of surprises; in the second the lovely harmony is more noticeable than anything else; the third has a fantastic and gipsy like tone given it by the quaint dance rhythms, while the reminiscences of the first movement, ingeniously interwoven with the principal theme in the finale, make it a masterpiece among the works of this greatest of living writers in the classical forms. It goes almost without saying that the playing of Mr. Kneisel and his colleagues was quite as masterly as the work they performed. Miss Franklin sang four Scotch ballads, "Again, My Lyre," "The Sweetest Lad Was Jamie," "Faithful Johnie," and "O, thou art the lad of my heart, Willy," with charming simplicity appropriate to her themes. She was accompanied by piano, violin and 'cello, these parts written for the songs by Beethoven. The number following was by Mr. Arthur Weld, the adagio from a quartet for strings written by him while a pupil in Germany. Judged even from a higher standard than the work of a student, it was worthy of much praise. The themes are not finely contrasted, though each is melodious in itself, there is little development, and as a whole the number had not sufficient variety, although there were some charming passages.

The trio in B flat for piano, violin and violoncello, with which the evening closed, was listened to with the closest and most absorbed attention by the audience. The first movement is peculiar in its almost complete avoidance of the dominant key. The two subjects and the wonderful development furnish all needful interest without side themes. The scherzo must have been written when Beethoven was in a most whimsical mood. The sudden and marked contrast not only in themes but also in mode of treatment and styles of composition are very effective. What but one of the freaks of the great master could have been the introduction of a slow, creeping theme, worked out in complete fugue form, as the trio to a bright and hilarious scherzo. The third movement consisted of variations on a theme of a strangely religious nature. Here more than in former movements the piano part became prominent in fine arpeggio passages. The closing rondo was all animation and brilliancy, and Mr. Perabo played with sparkling vivacity and abandon, thoroughly in the spirit of the work.

Boston Evening Transcript.

MONDAY, MARCH 31, 1890.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The programme of the twenty-first symphony concert was as follows:

Brahms: Tragic Overture, Op. 81.
Vieuxtemps: Violin concerto in A minor, Op. 37.
Dvorák: Symphony No. 1 in D, Op. 60.
Mr. Otto Roth was the violinist.

Brahms's great overture was superbly played, with grand vigor and impressiveness, and in the most finished style. Great as this overture has always seemed, it struck one as more magnificent than ever at this performance. We have heard one musician call it the grandest separate movement for orchestra written since Schumann's "Manfred" overture, and although so sweeping a statement as this is not to be accepted without hesitation, we certainly can think of no overture since Schumann and Mendelssohn's day that can fairly be called as great a work.

Dvorák's first symphony has not been heard here lately. Few of us can have forgotten the extraordinarily brilliant impression produced at its first performance in the Music Hall, and how enthusiastically the work was received even by some judges who were inclined to be skeptical about anything of real merit coming from a composer of the present generation. Few of us, either, can have forgotten how very soon all this enthusiasm cooled down, and how opinions were revised and changed after the second performance. Even now, when the true character of the work, and the weakness of much in it, are better appreciated than at first, it is easy enough to understand the enthusiasm it originally aroused. One might probably look through the whole orchestral literature of the present day without finding another work that began so magnificently as this symphony. The opening measures present, perhaps, the most brilliant and original musical idea in all contemporary symphonic writing. The impression it makes is so surprising and inspiring that this figure is, of itself, enough to carry you through the whole movement, at the first hearing. You think of nothing else, and look for nothing but its reappearance. But, with more familiarity with the work, it ceases to escape you how ill the composer has lived up to the splendor of this exordium. The idea, in itself, is utterly suberb, but when the composer sets himself to work it out, to elaborate and develop it, his hand grows painfully weak. This one theme, and the original notion of substituting the wild Slavonic Furiant for the traditional Scherzo, in the third movement, are about all that is really remarkable in the symphony. And this Furiant, although it is unquestionably written with immense vigor, and shows the composer to have good, hot blood in his veins, is, to our thinking, needlessly ugly and unmusical in some places. As a whole, the work can hardly hope to live beside the composer's far finer second symphony in D minor. It was superbly played, except that Mr. Nikisch once more overshot his mark in trying to impart additional impressiveness to the first theme by a too deliberate tempo. It did not make it more impressive, but only made it drag.

Mr. Roth played the Vienxtemps concerto very beautifully indeed, with true mastery and great beauty of sentiment and style. His treble recall was well earned. The concerto itself, however, does not rise above the level of respectable mediocrity, and, no matter how admirably it is played, one finds it difficult to keep the attention fixed on it. Vieuxtemps had no little native charm as a composer, but it shows itself, as a rule, only in his smaller pieces; in a large musical form it was too liable to evaporate.

The next programme is: Wagner, overture to "Der fliegende Holländer"; Frederic Cliffe, symphony in C minor; Liszt, Rákoczy March.

Boston Post

TUESDAY MORNING, APRIL 1, 1890

FIFTH CONCERT BY THE KNEISEL QUARTETTE.

While a chamber concert lasting from 8 until after 10 o'clock would generally be regarded even by musicians as needlessly prolix, yet last evening in Union Hall one of the longest concerts of the season seemed, nevertheless, just the right length. The Brahms quartette, with which the concert opened, could but have placed all present in just the right mood. Seldom has Brahms written more cheerfully, not to say genially, than in this masterpiece, and yet without the slightest sacrifice of dignity. To find the modern king of contrapuntists—so appropriately ranked with the three royal Bs—genial may not, from any conventional point of view, be the proper thing to do. For in his frequent funeral sermons without words he often has written with such exclusive scholarship that it can truly be said that his happiest, greatest works are least characteristic of the innate trend of his splendid genius. And so it is with his B flat major quartette. Its psychical nearness to the traditional moods of Mozart—save in its allegretto non troppo, which is thoroughly Brahms-like—is no less surprising than welcome; and, as need not be told, masterly. One could but feel grateful to Miss Franklin for the rare opportunity afforded of hearing Beethoven's "Scotch Songs." And she sang them charmingly; that is to say, in her best voice, and with a characteristically refined and heartfelt expression, too, that seemed the perfect complement of four of the most artistically piquant songs that ever a composer wrote. Then followed an adagio molto sostenuto from a quartette in C major, op. 1, by Arthur Weld. The selection seemed perfectly in keeping with the high standard of the concert, it being an exceptionally well made and artistic piece of music, and no less fervent in conception than elevating and refined. The concert ended with Beethoven's noble trio in B flat major. It was superbly interpreted by Messrs. Perabo, Kneisel and Kneisel.

C. L. C.

[98]
~~~

Clipping No.

Clipping from Herald New York May

Date 3/7

BOSTON S SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The last concert of the season by the Boston Orchestra, given in Steinway Hall last evening under the direction of Herr Nikisch, attracted a very large audience.

With the performance itself there can be no quarrel, the orchestra playing with a beauty of tone, a spirit and a delicacy that cannot be too highly praised, but with the programme one may be allowed to remark that a symphony of Brahms, of Rubinstein or of Tschaikowsky would have been far more interesting to our public than Beethoven's immortal masterpiece in C minor, well played as it was.

The Schumann symphony in B flat, which opened the concert, is always a treat in the way of free, unpretentious joyousness, and it has seldom been better played here than last night. Volkmann's overture

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, MAR. 29, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Mr. Nikisch has given the public the best of opportunities for judging how well his first violinists can play solos, and tonight yet another member of the group at his left hand will be heard, in the concerto in A-minor, by Vieuxtemps. This player is Mr. Otto Roth, one of the younger men of the orchestra, who has shown himself capable of solid, serious chamber work in the Kneisel Quartette, while in the summer-night concerts he has given proof of the strength and brilliancy of style which are necessary to carry a great popular audience as on other occasions he has done prominent service well as leader or performer in orchestral concerts of greater dignity. His is perhaps the strongest tone of any of the Symphony soloists, but it is honest, firm and unexaggerated, easily controlled when the quiet moments come and grace succeeds to fulness. His performance yesterday afternoon was high in merit for its sure grasp, fluent and consistent technique and manly spirit. There is no break in the concerto and Mr. Roth managed finely the transitions from one to another movement, distinguishing each by its true manner and reaching the climax of the finale with unabated energy and clearness. In their different ways the tremendously difficult cadenza of the allegro, and the calm sustained adagio were fine examples of scholarly appreciation and mechanical command. The now unfamiliar style of Vieuxtemps was revived and justified by Mr. Roth's treatment, and the audience recalled him three times, which is a rare compliment at a rehearsal. The other numbers of the programme are two—Brahms's stately and richly colored "Tragic" overture and Dvorak's first Symphony, opulent in fancy and feeling and sumptuous in color. Both works are known here, the symphony being readily recalled by the almost wild furiant which forms the basis of its scherzo, and no sketch of them can now be needed. The orchestra yesterday read the former with broad sentiment and the latter masterfully, and almost passionately at times; yet one could not help wishing that its quietude might have been more subdued and its vehemence less overwhelming. The programme for next week has been thus made up: Wagner, overture, "Flying Dutchman"; Frederic Cliffe, symphony in C-minor (first time in America); Liszt, Rakoczy march.

There will be given on Wednesday afternoon next the third Young Folks' Popular concert, and it will have an especial interest, because then Herr Reichmann, the leading barytone of the Metropolitan Company, will then make his first appearance in Boston.

The Kneisel Quartette's fifth concert will be given at Union Hall on Monday evening next, Mr. Perabo assisting.

The Adamowski Quartette played by special engagement at a very swell New York musicale, a few nights ago.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, MARCH 30, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme played at the 21st of the present season's concerts by the Boston symphony orchestra in Music Hall last evening consisted of Brahm's "Tragic" overture, the violin concerto by Vieuxtemps in A minor, and Dvorak's first symphony in D, op. 60. Mr. Otto Roth, the solo violinist, is a member of the orchestra who has had former hearings in these concerts. Although a painstaking, intelligent and modest player, he is a singularly uninteresting violinist, and fails to show the characteristics demanded for successful solo work in his playing. He plays accurately, but methodically; his intonation is correct, but colorless, and though commanding the technique of his instrument to a commendable degree, he plays with such a lack of freedom that there is little satisfaction in his work. He was very generously applauded for his efforts and is to be congratulated upon the degree of success attending his annual appearance as soloist. The "Tragic" overture is not a cheerful or enlivening composition, nor is the Dvorak symphony calculated to cause intense pleasure to the average listener. Both works were played with admirable intelligence under Mr. Nikisch's baton, and both found appreciation by the audience, apparently. It is possible that the educational value of the programme justified its selection; certainly there was little in it to lead to undue excitement or unseasonable enjoyment. Next Saturday evening's programme is made up of Wagner's overture, "Flying Dutchman," Frederic Cliffe's symphony in C minor (first time in America) and Liszt's "Rakoczy March."

Boston Post

MONDAY MORNING, MARCH 31, 1890.

TWENTY-FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERT.

There was a rather light house Saturday night, compared with the usual crowd which frequents these concerts, which was probably owing to the fact that the general public still needs a powerful amount of "lifting" before they can be raised to the standard which declares a man a musical fool who does not blindly admire every note of music which Messrs. Brahms and Dvorak have written. The programme was as follows:

Brahms.....Tragic Overture, op. 81
Vieuxtemps.....
..Concerto for violin, No. 5 A minor, op 37
Dvorak...Symphony No. 1 in D Major, op. 60

As a matter of fact these two works are both very enjoyable, and the public had no need to be afraid of them, but the educational onslaughts of the enthusiasts have been so determined and furious that the effects have been indeed disastrous; many people shudder at the prospect of hearing Dvorak's music, and the devout cross themselves at the mere mention of Brahms's name. The Tragic Overture, by the latter composer, is one of the—alas!—too few works from his pen the hearing of which gives distinct pleasure. It is not so replete with musicianly cleverness and general interest as the Academic Overture, but it is without doubt a clear and beautiful composition, and when it is so beautifully played, as any work is bound to be by our orchestra, it cannot fail to please the public. The Vieuxtemps concerto is a light, melodious and refined work of no extraordinary merit, but pleasant to the ear. Mr. Roth played it finely, and was greeted with loud and prolonged enthusiasm. For so young an artist Mr. Roth's work is of an unusually high character, and in a few years he will doubtless have won a place for himself in the front rank of violinists in this country.

With regard to the above-mentioned efforts of the Brahms-Dvorak enthusiasts to make propaganda for their chosen masters throughout the world, it is interesting to study the very valuable statistics published every year by the "Signale" with regard to the performances of different works in all important musical centres. Without going too far into detail, it may be briefly stated that these figures seem to show that while the larger works of Dvorak are steadily and rapidly growing in favor, the Brahms "boom" is practically at a standstill. Of course, there are certain of the great works of Brahms which are so fine and beautiful that they are certain to be repeated many times, but there are, unfortunately, too many others which the cautious public, having once heard them, are apt to avoid with the same prudence which a scalded cat exhibits towards hot water. With Dvorak it is different: he certainly has not the technique of expression—to wit, counterpoint in all its finest niceties and details—that Brahms has, but he has twice the originality and about four times the invention of his great rival, to which must be added a real genius for instrumentation, and this is Brahms's weakest point. Rheinberger is in the habit of saying to his pupils: "Be sure and make your music sound well! If you want to write an exceptionally original, or even extravagantly new, idea, you have won half the battle if you make it sound well," and there was never a truer word said about the art of composition; and with regard to the two men in question, it may be unhesitatingly affirmed that, while Dvorak's music nearly always sounds well, Brahms's very seldom pleases the ear.

In his choral works Brahms is at his best in this particular. He is restricted by the possibilities of the human voice, and he is forced within certain limits which have the most advantageous effect upon his work, and there can be no doubt that if he took half as much pains to make his orchestral and chamber music "sound well" as he is obliged to expend in attaining this desirable result in choral works, his popularity with the musical public would be increased a hundredfold. Now Dvorak does this very thing, and it is nowhere more noticeable than in his beautiful first symphony, which, by the way, was superbly played on this occasion. The first movement is apt to seem a little long, but it was so beautifully played, and the playing of the first horn, oboe and bassoon is especially worthy of praise. The slow movement, with weird but beautiful themes, was very carefully played, but the triumph of the evening for the orchestra and its gifted conductor was reached in the splendid scherzo, which was most magnificently rendered. This scherzo is in the form of a Slavonic dance called the furiant, and the music aptly expresses the name. The whole symphony was loudly applauded. Next week's programme includes Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" overture, Liszt's Rakoczy March and the long-expected symphony by Mr. Frederic Cliffe, which will be heard with the deepest interest.

ARTHUR WELD.

Boston Daily Traveller.

MONDAY MARCH 31, 1890.

Twenty-First Symphony Concert—Mr. Otto Roth, Soloist.

The programme of the twenty-first Symphony concert was:

Brahms. Tragic Overture, op. 81.
Vieuxtemps. Concerto for Violin, in A minor, No. 35, op. 37.
Dvorák. Symphony No. 1. in D, op. 60.

Mr. Otto Roth was the soloist. We were at the last moment prevented from going to the concert. This became a disappointment, particularly because Mr. Nikisch had not been heard before as an interpreter of Dvorak, whose D major Symphony, the three first movements, is a fine example of this most individual and musical colorist. Mr. Roth is an artist always heard with pleasure and we offer our apologies to him for the omission of criticism upon his playing. Brahms we have always with us. This week's programme will present for the first time in the country the symphony in C minor by Frederic Cliffe, a young Englishman, which received high praise from the English critics on the occasion of its initial hearing in England last April. The overture will be Wagner's romantic prelude to "The Flying Ducthman." Liszt's "Rakoczy" march will also be heard for the first time at these concerts.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, MARCH 30, 1890.

TWENTY-FIRST CONCERT.

At the Symphony concert last evening, the programme included the Tragic Overture of Brahms; Concerto for violin. No. 5, in A minor, op. 37; and Symphony No. 1, in D, op. 60.

Mr. Otto Roth was the soloist, He is an uncommonly artistic violinist, and the Vieuxtemps concerto could hardly have found a more congenial interpreter. It is a most effective as well as an exceptionally virtuosic and interesting show piece and in his relation to it Mr. Roth proved himself to be both intrinsically and by cultivation a typical virtuoso. His success with the audience was sympathetic and he was four times enthusiastically recalled.

The overture and symphony were both characteristically well played.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULAR.

For the third Young People's Popular concert in Music hall, Wednesday afternoon, the following remarkably attractive and well-chosen programme has been prepared:

Overture. "Mignon".....A. Thomas
Aria. "Hans Heiling".....Marschner
Mr. Theodor Reichmann.
Symphonic Poem. "Danse Macabre".....
.....Saint-Saens
Air Hongrois. (For Violin.).....Ernst
Mr. Franz Kneisel.
Songs with Piano.
Fruhlingstraum.....Spicker
"Wie bist du meine Koenigin".....Brahms
Mr. Theodor Reichmann.
Minuet de Follets. } from "Faust".....Berlioz
Ballet of Sylphs. }
March from "Tanphæuser.....Wagner

The fifth Kneisel concert of the season will take place in Union hall, tomorrow evening and a fine programme has been arranged. The quartette will be assisted by Miss Gertrude Franklin, soprano, and Mr. Ernst Perabo.

Boston Sunday Globe.

TWENTY-FOUR PAGES.

SUNDAY, MARCH 30, 1890.

Echoes of the Symphony—

Brahm's "Tragic" overture is a work to be heard twice or thrice before its art and power can be fully recognized. Yet even a single hearing, when orchestra and leader are in such sympathy with a composer's thought, as was the case yesterday in Music Hall, must present great attractiveness to every one who can appreciate the best in music. Mr. Nikisch has seldom been more happy than in his reading of this overture. Mr. Otto Roth performed with brilliancy and effect a concerto for violin by Vieuxtemps, and was applauded very warmly. The soloists' honor were not unmerited; the orchestral accompaniment, however, for some reason or other, did not reach the Nikisch standard for this kind of work. Dvorak's First Symphony in D, given with fervor and spirit, proved a most enjoyable concert selection. The scherzo, with its "furiant" motive taken at a tremendous pace, and the brilliant finale, may compare with the very best achievements of our noble Symphony orchestra. This week's programme begins with the "Flying Dutchman" overture, and ends with Liszt's "Rakoczy" march. Frederic Cliffe's symphony in C minor is to be interpreted for the first time in America.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 1, 1890.

The Kneisel Quartette Concert—Von Bulow's Recital.

One of the most uniformly interesting entertainments of this season's course was given by the quartette, assisted by Miss Franklin and Mr. Ernst Perabo, last evening. Brahms was the first author represented, the work chosen being the third of his string quartettes. It is in a lighter, more imaginative vein than Brahms generally writes. Each movement has very strong peculiarities of its own. In the first, the vivace, the quaint rhythmic changes are a constant series of surprises; in the second the lovely harmony is more noticeable than anything else; the third has a fantastic and gipsy like tone given it by the quaint dance rhythms, while the reminiscences of the first movement, ingeniously interwoven with the principal theme in the finale, make it a masterpiece among the works of this greatest of living writers in the classical forms. It goes almost without saying that the playing of Mr. Kneisel and his colleagues was quite as masterly as the work they performed. Miss Franklin sang four Scotch ballads, "Again, My Lyre," "The Sweetest Lad Was Jamie," "Faithfu' Johnie," and "O, thou art the lad of my heart, Willy," with charming simplicity appropriate to her themes. She was accompanied by piano, violin and 'cello, these parts written for the songs by Beethoven. The number following was by Mr. Arthur Weld, the adagio from a quartet for strings written by him while a pupil in Germany. Judged even from a higher standard than the work of a student, it was worthy of much praise. The themes are not finely contrasted, though each is melodious in itself, there is little development, and as a whole the number had not sufficient variety, although there were some charming passages.

The trio in B flat for piano, violin and violoncello, with which the evening closed, was listened to with the closest and most absorbed attention by the audience. The first movement is peculiar in its almost complete avoidance of the dominant key. The two subjects and the wonderful development furnish all needful interest without side themes. The scherzo must have been written when Beethoven was in a most whimsical mood. The sudden and marked contrast not only in themes but also in mode of treatment and styles of composition are very effective. What but one of the freaks of the great master could have been the introduction of a slow, creeping theme, worked out in complete fugue form, as the trio to a bright and hilarious scherzo. The third movement consisted of variations on a theme of a strangely religious nature. Here more than in former movements the piano part became prominent in fine arpeggio passages. The closing rondo was all animation and brilliancy, and Mr. Perabo played with sparkling vivacity and abandon, thoroughly in the spirit of the work.

Boston Evening Transcript.

MONDAY, MARCH 31, 1890.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The programme of the twenty-first symphony concert was as follows:

Brahms: Tragic Overture, Op. 81.
Vieuxtemps: Violin concerto in A minor, Op. 37.
Dvorák: Symphony No. 1 in D, Op. 60.
Mr. Otto Roth was the violinist.

Brahms's great overture was superbly played, with grand vigor and impressiveness, and in the most finished style. Great as this overture has always seemed, it struck one as more magnificent than ever at this performance. We have heard one musician call it the grandest separate movement for orchestra written since Schumann's "Manfred" overture, and although so sweeping a statement as this is not to be accepted without hesitation, we certainly can think of no overture since Schumann and Mendelssohn's day that can fairly be called as great a work.

Dvorák's first symphony has not been heard here lately. Few of us can have forgotten the extraordinarily brilliant impression produced at its first performance in the Music Hall, and how enthusiastically the work was received even by some judges who were inclined to be skeptical about anything of real merit coming from a composer of the present generation. Few of us, either, can have forgotten how very soon all this enthusiasm cooled down, and how opinions were revised and changed after the second performance. Even now, when the true character of the work, and the weakness of much in it, are better appreciated than at first, it is easy enough to understand the enthusiasm it originally aroused. One might probably look through the whole orchestral literature of the present day without finding another work that began so magnificently as this symphony. The opening measures present, perhaps, the most brilliant and original musical idea in all contemporary symphonic writing. The impression it makes is so surprising and inspiring that this figure is, of itself, enough to carry you through the whole movement, at the first hearing. You think of nothing else, and look for nothing but its reappearance. But, with more familiarity with the work, it ceases to escape you how ill the composer has lived up to the splendor of this exordium. The idea, in itself, is utterly suberb, but when the composer sets himself to work it out, to elaborate and develop it, his hand grows painfully weak. This one theme, and the original notion of substituting the wild Slavonic Furiant for the traditional Scherzo, in the third movement, are about all that is really remarkable in the symphony. And this Furiant, although it is unquestionably written with immense vigor, and shows the composer to have good, hot blood in his veins, is, to our thinking, needlessly ugly and unmusical in some places. As a whole, the work can hardly hope to live beside the composer's far finer second symphony in D minor. It was superbly played, except that Mr. Nikisch once more overshot his mark in trying to impart additional impressiveness to the first theme by a too deliberate tempo. It did not make it more impressive, but only made it drag.

Mr. Roth played the Vienxtemps concerto very beautifully indeed, with true mastery and great beauty of sentiment and style. His treble recall was well earned. The concerto itself, however, does not rise above the level of respectable mediocrity, and, no matter how admirably it is played, one finds it difficult to keep the attention fixed on it. Vieuxtemps had no little native charm as a composer, but it shows itself, as a rule, only in his smaller pieces; in a large musical form it was too liable to evaporate.

The next programme is: Wagner, overture to "Der fliegende Holländer"; Frederic Cliffe, symphony in C minor; Liszt, Rákoczy March.

Boston Post

TUESDAY MORNING, APRIL 1, 1890

FIFTH CONCERT BY THE KNEISEL QUARTETTE.

While a chamber concert lasting from 8 until after 10 o'clock would generally be regarded even by musicians as needlessly prolix, yet last evening in Union Hall one of the longest concerts of the season seemed, nevertheless, just the right length. The Brahms quartette, with which the concert opened, could but have placed all present in just the right mood. Seldom has Brahms written more cheerfully, not to say genially, than in this masterpiece, and yet without the slightest sacrifice of dignity. To find the modern king of contrapuntists—so appropriately ranked with the three royal Bs—genial may not, from any conventional point of view, be the proper thing to do. For in his frequent funeral sermons without words he often has written with such exclusive scholarship that it can truly be said that his happiest, greatest works are least characteristic of the innate trend of his splendid genius. And so it is with his B flat major quartette. Its psychical nearness to the traditional moods of Mozart—save in its allegretto non troppo, which is thoroughly Brahms-like—is no less surprising than welcome; and, as need not be told, masterly. One could but feel grateful to Miss Franklin for the rare opportunity afforded of hearing Beethoven's "Scotch Songs." And she sang them charmingly; that is to say, in her best voice, and with a characteristically refined and heartfelt expression, too, that seemed the perfect complement of four of the most artistically piquant songs that ever a composer wrote. Then followed an adagio molto sostenuto from a quartette in C major, op. 1, by Arthur Weld. The selection seemed perfectly in keeping with the high standard of the concert, it being an exceptionally well made and artistic piece of music, and no less fervent in conception than elevating and refined. The concert ended with Beethoven's noble trio in B flat major. It was superbly interpreted by Messrs. Perabo, Kneisel and Kneisel.

C. L. C.

[98]

Clipping No.

Clipping from Herald New York May

Date 3/7

BOSTON'S SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The last concert of the season by the Boston Orchestra, given in Steinway Hall last evening under the direction of Herr Nikisch, attracted a very large audience.

With the performance itself there can be no quarrel, the orchestra playing with a beauty of tone, a spirit and a delicacy that cannot be too highly praised, but with the programme one may be allowed to remark that a symphony of Brahms, of Rubinstein or of Tschaikowsky would have been far more interesting to our public than Beethoven's immortal masterpiece in C minor, well played as it was.

The Schumann symphony in B flat, which opened the concert, is always a treat in the way of free, unpretentious joyousness, and it has seldom been better played here than last night. Volkmann's overture

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, MAR. 29, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Mr. Nikisch has given the public the best of opportunities for judging how well his first violinists can play solos, and tonight yet another member of the group at his left hand will be heard, in the concerto in A-minor, by Vieuxtemps. This player is Mr. Otto Roth, one of the younger men of the orchestra, who has shown himself capable of solid, serious chamber work in the Kneisel Quartette, while in the summer-night concerts he has given proof of the strength and brilliancy of style which are necessary to carry a great popular audience as on other occasions he has done prominent service well as leader or performer in orchestral concerts of greater dignity. His is perhaps the strongest tone of any of the Symphony soloists, but it is honest, firm and unexaggerated, easily controlled when the quiet moments come and grace succeeds to fulness. His performance yesterday afternoon was high in merit for its sure grasp, fluent and consistent technique and manly spirit. There is no break in the concerto and Mr. Roth managed finely the transitions from one to another movement, distinguishing each by its true manner and reaching the climax of the finale with unabated energy and clearness. In their different ways the tremendously difficult cadenza of the allegro, and the calm sustained adagio were fine examples of scholarly appreciation and mechanical command. The now unfamiliar style of Vieuxtemps was revived and justified by Mr. Roth's treatment, and the audience recalled him three times, which is a rare compliment at a rehearsal. The other numbers of the programme are two—Brahms's stately and richly colored "Tragic" overture and Dvorak's first Symphony, opulent in fancy and feeling and sumptuous in color. Both works are known here, the symphony being readily recalled by the almost wild furiant which forms the basis of its scherzo, and no sketch of them can now be needed. The orchestra yesterday read the former with broad sentiment and the latter masterfully, and almost passionately at times; yet one could not help wishing that its quietude might have been more subdued and its vehemence less overwhelming. The programme for next week has been thus made up: Wagner, overture, "Flying Dutchman"; Frederic Cliffe, symphony in C-minor (first time in America); Liszt, Rakoczy march.

There will be given on Wednesday afternoon next the third Young Folks' Popular concert, and it will have an especial interest, because then Herr Reichmann, the leading barytone of the Metropolitan Company, will then make his first appearance in Boston.

The Kneisel Quartette's fifth concert will be given at Union Hall on Monday evening next, Mr. Perabo assisting.

The Adamowski Quartette played by special engagement at a very swell New York musicale, a few nights ago.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, MARCH 30, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme played at the 21st of the present season's concerts by the Boston symphony orchestra in Music Hall last evening consisted of Brahm's "Tragic" overture, the violin concerto by Vieuxtemps in A minor, and Dvorak's first symphony in D, op. 60. Mr. Otto Roth, the solo violinist, is a member of the orchestra who has had former hearings in these concerts. Although a painstaking, intelligent and modest player, he is a singularly uninteresting violinist, and fails to show the characteristics demanded for successful solo work in his playing. He plays accurately, but methodically; his intonation is correct, but colorless, and though commanding the technique of his instrument to a commendable degree, he plays with such a lack of freedom that there is little satisfaction in his work. He was very generously applauded for his efforts and is to be congratulated upon the degree of success attending his annual appearance as soloist. The "Tragic" overture is not a cheerful or enlivening composition, nor is the Dvorak symphony calculated to cause intense pleasure to the average listener. Both works were played with admirable intelligence under Mr. Nikisch's baton, and both found appreciation by the audience, apparently. It is possible that the educational value of the programme justified its selection; certainly there was little in it to lead to undue excitement or unseasonable enjoyment. Next Saturday evening's programme is made up of Wagner's overture, "Flying Dutchman," Frederic Cliffe's symphony in C minor (first time in America) and Liszt's "Rakoczy March."

Boston Post

MONDAY MORNING, MARCH 31, 1890.

TWENTY-FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERT.

There was a rather light house Saturday night, compared with the usual crowd which frequents these concerts, which was probably owing to the fact that the general public still needs a powerful amount of "lifting" before they can be raised to the standard which declares a man a musical fool who does not blindly admire every note of music which Messrs. Brahms and Dvorak have written. The programme was as follows:

Brahms.....Tragic Overture, op. 81
Vieuxtemps.....
..Concerto for violin, No. 5 A minor, op 37
Dvorak...Symphony No. 1 in D Major, op. 60

As a matter of fact these two works are both very enjoyable, and the public had no need to be afraid of them, but the educational onslaughts of the enthusiasts have been so determined and furious that the effects have been indeed disastrous; many people shudder at the prospect of hearing Dvorak's music, and the devout cross themselves at the mere mention of Brahms's name. The Tragic Overture, by the latter composer, is one of the—alas!—too few works from his pen the hearing of which gives distinct pleasure. It is not so replete with musicianly cleverness and general interest as the Academic Overture, but it is without doubt a clear and beautiful composition, and when it is so beautifully played, as any work is bound to be by our orchestra, it cannot fail to please the public. The Vieuxtemps concerto is a light, melodious and refined work of no extraordinary merit, but pleasant to the ear. Mr. Roth played it finely, and was greeted with loud and prolonged enthusiasm. For so young an artist Mr. Roth's work is of an unusually high character, and in a few years he will doubtless have won a place for himself in the front rank of violinists in this country.

With regard to the above-mentioned efforts of the Brahms-Dvorak enthusiasts to make propaganda for their chosen masters throughout the world, it is interesting to study the very valuable statistics published every year by the "Signale" with regard to the performances of different works in all important musical centres. Without going too far into detail, it may be briefly stated that these figures seem to show that while the larger works of Dvorak are steadily and rapidly growing in favor, the Brahms "boom" is practically at a standstill. Of course, there are certain of the great works of Brahms which are so fine and beautiful that they are certain to be repeated many times, but there are, unfortunately, too many others which the cautious public, having once heard them, are apt to avoid with the same prudence which a scalded cat exhibits towards hot water. With Dvorak it is different: he certainly has not the technique of expression—to wit, counterpoint in all its finest niceties and details—that Brahms has, but he has twice the originality and about four times the invention of his great rival, to which must be added a real genius for instrumentation, and this is Brahms's weakest point. Rheinberger is in the habit of saying to his pupils: "Be sure and make your music sound well! If you want to write an exceptionally original, or even extravagantly new, idea, you have won half the battle if you make it sound well," and there was never a truer word said about the art of composition; and with regard to the two men in question, it may be unhesitatingly affirmed that, while Dvorak's music nearly always sounds well, Brahms's very seldom pleases the ear.

In his choral works Brahms is at his best in this particular. He is restricted by the possibilities of the human voice, and he is forced within certain limits which have the most advantageous effect upon his work, and there can be no doubt that if he took half as much pains to make his orchestral and chamber music "sound well" as he is obliged to expend in attaining this desirable result in choral works, his popularity with the musical public would be increased a hundredfold. Now Dvorak does this very thing, and it is nowhere more noticeable than in his beautiful first symphony, which, by the way, was superbly played on this occasion. The first movement is apt to seem a little long, but it was so beautifully played, and the playing of the first horn, oboe and bassoon is especially worthy of praise. The slow movement, with weird but beautiful themes, was very carefully played, but the triumph of the evening for the orchestra and its gifted conductor was reached in the splendid scherzo, which was most magnificently rendered. This scherzo is in the form of a Slavonic dance called the furiant, and the music aptly expresses the name. The whole symphony was loudly applauded. Next week's programme includes Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" overture, Liszt's Rakoczy March and the long-expected symphony by Mr. Frederic Cliffe, which will be heard with the deepest interest.

ARTHUR WELD.

Boston Daily Traveller.

MONDAY MARCH 31, 1890.

Twenty-First Symphony Concert—Mr. Otto Roth, Soloist.

The programme of the twenty-first Symphony concert was:

Brahms. Tragic Overture, op. 81.
Vieuxtemps. Concerto for Violin, in A minor, No. 35, op. 37.
Dvorák. Symphony No. 1. in D, op. 60.

Mr. Otto Roth was the soloist. We were at the last moment prevented from going to the concert. This became a disappointment, particularly because Mr. Nikisch had not been heard before as an interpreter of Dvorak, whose D major Symphony, the three first movements, is a fine example of this most individual and musical colorist. Mr. Roth is an artist always heard with pleasure and we offer our apologies to him for the omission of criticism upon his playing. Brahms we have always with us. This week's programme will present for the first time in the country the symphony in C minor by Frederic Cliffe, a young Englishman, which received high praise from the English critics on the occasion of its initial hearing in England last April. The overture will be Wagner's romantic prelude to "The Flying Duchman." Liszt's "Rakoczy" march will also be heard for the first time at these concerts.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, MARCH 30, 1890.

TWENTY-FIRST CONCERT.

At the Symphony concert last evening, the programme included the Tragic Overture of Brahms; Concerto for violin, No. 5, in A minor, op. 37; and Symphony No. 1, in D, op. 60.

Mr. Otto Roth was the soloist, He is an uncommonly artistic violinist, and the Vieuxtemps concerto could hardly have found a more congenial interpreter. It is a most effective as well as an exceptionally virtuosic and interesting show piece and in his relation to it Mr. Roth proved himself to be both intrinsically and by cultivation a typical virtuoso. His success with the audience was sympathetic and he was four times enthusiastically recalled.

The overture and symphony were both characteristically well played.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULAR.

For the third Young People's Popular concert in Music hall, Wednesday afternoon, the following remarkably attractive and well-chosen programme has been prepared:

Overture. "Mignon".....A. Thomas
Aria. "Hans Heiling".....Marschner
Mr. Theodor Reichmann.
Symphonic Poem. "Danse Macabre"....
..... Saint-Saens
Air Hongrois. (For Violin.).....Ernst
Mr. Franz Kneisel.
Songs with Piano.
Fruhlingstraum.....Spicker
"Wie bist du meine Koenigin".....Brahms
Mr. Theodor Reichmann.
Minuet de Follets. } from "Faust".....Berlioz
Ballet of Sylphs. }
March from "Tanphæuser.....Wagner

The fifth Kneisel concert of the season will take place in Union hall, tomorrow evening and a fine programme has been arranged. The quartette will be assisted by Miss Gertrude Franklin, soprano, and Mr. Ernst Perabo.

Boston Sunday Globe.

TWENTY-FOUR PAGES.

SUNDAY, MARCH 30, 1890.

Echoes of the Symphony—

Brahm's "Tragic" overture is a work to be heard twice or thrice before its art and power can be fully recognized. Yet even a single hearing, when orchestra and leader are in such sympathy with a composer's thought, as was the case yesterday in Music Hall, must present great attractiveness to every one who can appreciate the best in music. Mr. Nikisch has seldom been more happy than in his reading of this overture. Mr. Otto Roth performed with brilliancy and effect a concerto for violin by Vieuxtemps, and was applauded very warmly. The soloists' honor were not unmerited; the orchestral accompaniment, however, for some reason or other, did not reach the Nikisch standard for this kind of work. Dvorak's First Symphony in D, given with fervor and spirit, proved a most enjoyable concert selection. The scherzo, with its "furiant" motive taken at a tremendous pace, and the brilliant finale, may compare with the very best achievements of our noble Symphony orchestra. This week's programme begins with the "Flying Dutchman" overture, and ends with Liszt's "Rakoczy" march. Frederic Cliffe's symphony in C minor is to be interpreted for the first time in America.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 1, 1890.

The Kneisel Quartette Concert—Von Bulow's Recital.

One of the most uniformly interesting entertainments of this season's course was given by the quartette, assisted by Miss Franklin and Mr. Ernst Perabo, last evening. Brahms was the first author represented, the work chosen being the third of his string quartettes. It is in a lighter, more imaginative vein than Brahms generally writes. Each movement has very strong peculiarities of its own. In the first, the vivace, the quaint rhythmic changes are a constant series of surprises; in the second the lovely harmony is more noticeable than anything else; the third has a fantastic and gipsy like tone given it by the quaint dance rhythms, while the reminiscences of the first movement, ingeniously interwoven with the principal theme in the finale, make it a masterpiece among the works of this greatest of living writers in the classical forms. It goes almost without saying that the playing of Mr. Kneisel and his colleagues was quite as masterly as the work they performed. Miss Franklin sang four Scotch ballads, "Again, My Lyre," "The Sweetest Lad Was Jamie," "Faithful Johnie," and "O, thou art the lad of my heart, Willy," with charming simplicity appropriate to her themes. She was accompanied by piano, violin and 'cello, these parts written for the songs by Beethoven. The number following was by Mr. Arthur Weld, the adagio from a quartet for strings written by him while a pupil in Germany. Judged even from a higher standard than the work of a student, it was worthy of much praise. The themes are not finely contrasted, though each is melodious in itself, there is little development, and as a whole the number had not sufficient variety, although there were some charming passages.

The trio in B flat for piano, violin and violoncello, with which the evening closed, was listened to with the closest and most absorbed attention by the audience. The first movement is peculiar in its almost complete avoidance of the dominant key. The two subjects and the wonderful development furnish all needful interest without side themes. The scherzo must have been written when Beethoven was in a most whimsical mood. The sudden and marked contrast not only in themes but also in mode of treatment and styles of composition are very effective. What but one of the freaks of the great master could have been the introduction of a slow, creeping theme, worked out in complete fugue form, as the trio to a bright and hilarious scherzo. The third movement consisted of variations on a theme of a strangely religious nature. Here more than in former movements the piano part became prominent in fine arpeggio passages. The closing rondo was all animation and brilliancy, and Mr. Perabo played with sparkling vivacity and abandon, thoroughly in the spirit of the work.

Boston Evening Transcript.

MONDAY, MARCH 31, 1890.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The programme of the twenty-first symphony concert was as follows:

Brahms: Tragic Overture, Op. 81.
Vieuxtemps: Violin concerto in A minor, Op. 37.
Dvorák: Symphony No. 1 in D, Op. 60.
Mr. Otto Roth was the violinist.

Brahms's great overture was superbly played, with grand vigor and impressiveness, and in the most finished style. Great as this overture has always seemed, it struck one as more magnificent than ever at this performance. We have heard one musician call it the grandest separate movement for orchestra written since Schumann's "Manfred" overture, and although so sweeping a statement as this is not to be accepted without hesitation, we certainly can think of no overture since Schumann and Mendelssohn's day that can fairly be called as great a work.

Dvorák's first symphony has not been heard here lately. Few of us can have forgotten the extraordinarily brilliant impression produced at its first performance in the Music Hall, and how enthusiastically the work was received even by some judges who were inclined to be skeptical about anything of real merit coming from a composer of the present generation. Few of us, either, can have forgotten how very soon all this enthusiasm cooled down, and how opinions were revised and changed after the second performance. Even now, when the true character of the work, and the weakness of much in it, are better appreciated than at first, it is easy enough to understand the enthusiasm it originally aroused. One might probably look through the whole orchestral literature of the present day without finding another work that began so magnificently as this symphony. The opening measures present, perhaps, the most brilliant and original musical idea in all contemporary symphonic writing. The impression it makes is so surprising and inspiring that this figure is, of itself, enough to carry you through the whole movement, at the first hearing. You think of nothing else, and look for nothing but its reappearance. But, with more familiarity with the work, it ceases to escape you how ill the composer has lived up to the splendor of this exordium. The idea, in itself, is utterly suberb, but when the composer sets himself to work it out, to elaborate and develop it, his hand grows painfully weak. This one theme, and the original notion of substituting the wild Slavonic Furiant for the traditional Scherzo, in the third movement, are about all that is really remarkable in the symphony. And this Furiant, although it is unquestionably written with immense vigor, and shows the composer to have good, hot blood in his veins, is, to our thinking, needlessly ugly and unmusical in some places. As a whole, the work can hardly hope to live beside the composer's far finer second symphony in D minor. It was superbly played, except that Mr. Nikisch once more overshot his mark in trying to impart additional impressiveness to the first theme by a too deliberate tempo. It did not make it more impressive, but only made it drag.

Mr. Roth played the Vienxtemps concerto very beautifully indeed, with true mastery and great beauty of sentiment and style. His treble recall was well earned. The concerto itself, however, does not rise above the level of respectable mediocrity, and, no matter how admirably it is played, one finds it difficult to keep the attention fixed on it. Vieuxtemps had no little native charm as a composer, but it shows itself, as a rule, only in his smaller pieces; in a large musical form it was too liable to evaporate.

The next programme is: Wagner, overture to "Der fliegende Holländer"; Frederic Cliffe, symphony in C minor; Liszt, Rákoczy March.

Boston Post

TUESDAY MORNING, APRIL 1, 1890

FIFTH CONCERT BY THE KNEISEL QUARTETTE.

While a chamber concert lasting from 8 until after 10 o'clock would generally be regarded even by musicians as needlessly prolix, yet last evening in Union Hall one of the longest concerts of the season seemed, nevertheless, just the right length. The Brahms quartette, with which the concert opened, could but have placed all present in just the right mood. Seldom has Brahms written more cheerfully, not to say genially, than in this masterpiece, and yet without the slightest sacrifice of dignity. To find the modern king of contrapuntists—so appropriately ranked with the three royal Bs—genial may not, from any conventional point of view, be the proper thing to do. For in his frequent funeral sermons without words he often has written with such exclusive scholarship that it can truly be said that his happiest, greatest works are least characteristic of the innate trend of his splendid genius. And so it is with his B flat major quartette. Its psychical nearness to the traditional moods of Mozart—save in its allegretto non troppo, which is thoroughly Brahms-like—is no less surprising than welcome; and, as need not be told, masterly. One could but feel grateful to Miss Franklin for the rare opportunity afforded of hearing Beethoven's "Scotch Songs." And she sang them charmingly; that is to say, in her best voice, and with a characteristically refined and heartfelt expression, too, that seemed the perfect complement of four of the most artistically piquant songs that ever a composer wrote. Then followed an adagio molto sostenuto from a quartette in C major, op. 1, by Arthur Weld. The selection seemed perfectly in keeping with the high standard of the concert, it being an exceptionally well made and artistic piece of music, and no less fervent in conception than elevating and refined. The concert ended with Beethoven's noble trio in B flat major. It was superbly interpreted by Messrs. Perabo, Kneisel and Kneisel.

C. L. C.

[98]

UNION HALL, 18 BOLYSTON STREET.

FIFTH SEASON 1889-90.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin.
Mr. OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin.
Mr. LOUIS SVEČENSKI, Viola.
Mr. ANTON HEKKING, Violoncello.

WITH THE ASSISTANCE OF

Mr. ERNST PERABO, and
Miss GERTRUDE FRANKLIN.

V. CONCERT.

MONDAY, MARCH 31ST, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

BRAHMS. QUARTET for STRINGS in B flat, op. 67.
Vivace.—
Andante.—
Adagio (Allegretto non troppo).—
Poco allegretto con variazioni.

BEETHOVEN. FOUR SCOTCH SONGS with accompaniment of PIANOFORTE, VIOLIN and VIOLONCELLO.
a) "AGAIN MY LYRE."
b) "THE SWEETEST LAD."
c) "FAITHFUL JOHNIE."
d) "O, THOU ART THE LAD OF MY HEART, WILLY."

ARTHUR WELD. ADAGIO MOLTO SOSTENUTO, from QUARTET FOR STRINGS in F major.

BEETHOVEN. TRIO for PIANOFORTE, VIOLIN and VIOLONCELLO, in B flat major, op. 97
Allegro moderato.—B flat major.
Scherzo, allegretto—B flat major; with trio.—B flat minor.
Andante cantabile.—D major.
Allegro moderato.—B flat major.

The Pianoforte is a Steinway.

The NEXT CONCERT will be given April 14, at 8 P. M.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.

THURSDAY MORNING, APRIL 3, 1890.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Young People's Popular Concert Yesterday Afternoon.

A splendid programme, on just the right level, and a larger audience than ever, are the pleasant facts that are to be recorded of the third popular concert given in Music Hall yesterday afternoon. The list began with Thomas' overture to "Mignon," with its pretty coquettings with "Io son Titania," the melodious polonaise. Then came the central figure of the occasion—Theodore Reichmann. To say that he made a success would be putting it very mildly; he made the best impression that any baritone has ever made in Boston. He has all Henschel's intelligence and a great deal more than Henschel's voice. He is Standigl redivivus. He sang the aria from "Hans Heiling" with noble breadth, yet with utmost tenderness. His enunciation was always clear and easily followed. In the phrases "Ya! lass mich traumen," and in the constantly reappearing "Ich liebe Dich," the tones were surprisingly well shaped for so massive a voice. But his greatest success was gained in the Lieder which came later on the programme, which Mr. Nikisch accompanied finely, although at first a little too loudly, and in which the beauty of expression was indescribable. Those who have heard August Kreissmann sing Schumann's "Dedication" in days long gone by, may form some idea of the manner in which he gave this song, when I state that this high standard was fully equalled in Brahms' "Wie bist du meine Königin," the sharp contrast between the sombre "Durch öde Wüsten," and the ecstatic and reiterated "Wonnevall," was finely presented, and Schumann's resolute "Wohlauf, noch getrunken" made a good foil to its sweetness. What a fine addition to our rich musical month of April it would be if Mr. Reichmann could be induced to give a series of song recitals in some small hall! He has a large repertoire in this school.

But another soloist stands waiting: Mr. Kneisel won his customary ovation, floral and otherwise, in Ernst s "Air Hongrois." He played with that perfection which we have all come to expect from him. The difficult work in harmonics was entirely flawless, the brilliant skips were intoned as surely as if they were simple passages in the first position, the melody in the highest position was most delicately shaded yet without any claptrap ppppp. a la Remenyi, and the final appearance of the theme on the lower strings (G and D) with constant skips into the highest register of harmonics, was given in a manner that showed how great a virtuoso our musicianly concertmeister is.

The orchestral selections were all effectively played. Strange to say, I thought Mr. Nikisch rather conservative in his reading of the Danse Macabre, but it was technically most excellent. What a lot of sensational effects it gives! The beginning with the hour of midnight sounded on the harp (plagiarized from Berlioz's "Harold Symphony" perhaps), the weird dissonances of the tuning of the violin of death, effected by lowering the E string to E flat, the knocking together of the bones of the dancing skeletons represented by the xylophone (the only occasion on which this trashy instrument has obtained admission to the real orchestral score, but thoroughly in place here), the mysterious pulsations of the bass-drum, as uncanny as anything in the piece, the clash of cymbals, and finally the oboe phrase picturing the crowing of the cock which sends them all into their graves again (there is more of nature in the crowing of the cock in the clock of Strasburg, however) all these points go to make up a saturnalia of morbid music that would have inspired an Edgar Allan Poe. Then came more of the supernatural in Berlioz s "Minuet of the Will o' the Wisps" and the "Dance of the Sylphs." In the former the mockery of the "Serenade of Mephistopheles" was very finely brought out, and in the latter the violins, con sordine, did excellent work. As I had come too late to hear all of the opening number, I made up for it a la Charles Lamb, by going away early, and did not hear the Tannhauser march, but have faith to believe that it was finely performed, as certainly was the case with all the other numbers. The adults of Boston are sorry that the "Young People's Concerts" come so seldom.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

BOSTON HERALD.

TUESDAY, APRIL 1, 1890.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The fifth of the current series of chamber concerts by the Kneisel quartet given at Union Hall last evening was greatly enjoyed by the subscribers to these notable events of the season, the audience well nigh filling every seat in the auditorium. The quartet had the assistance of Miss Gertrude Franklin, soprano, and Mr. Ernst Perabo, pianist, two artists who are always welcome to the concert stage. The instrumental numbers were pleasantly varied by the singing of an unfamiliar group of four Scotch songs by Miss Franklin, who gave these tuneful vocal gems, a most delightful interpretation and quite won the audience by her charmingly artistic vocalization. Mr. Perabo was heard with even more than usual pleasure in Beethovan's trio in B flat, op. 97, for piano, violin and 'cello, the three players, Messrs. Perabo, Kneisel and Hekking, the graceful movements of this composition being given with faultless taste by the performers. The novelty of the evening consisted of the movement for string quartet by Mr. A. Weld, and this proved another most enjoyable example of the genius and skill of the composer, which qualities have already attracted well merited attention to his writings. The quartet by Brahms in B flat completed this excellent programme, all of which was listened to with unabated interest.

Boston Daily Traveller.

TUESDAY, APRIL 1, 1890.

The Kneisel programme was: Quartet in B flat, Brahms; Four "Scotch" Songs by Beethoven, sung by Gertrude Franklin: Adagio for String Quartet in C major, Arthur Weld; Pianoforte trio, Op. 97, in B flat, Beethoven. Mr. Ernst Perabo was the pianist and in the trio his playing was noble; Messrs. Kneisel and Hekking were also at their best in this work. The single movement from Mr. Weld's quartet is such genuinely good music that it excites an interest in the work as a whole, which we hope will soon be heard in public. One more Kneisel concert will be given this season.

Boston Post

WEDNESDAY MORNING, APRIL 2, 1890

Mr. Theodor Reichmann, the eminent baritone of the Metropolitan Opera House of New York, will be heard for the first time in this city at the popular matinee by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this afternoon. The interesting programme which Mr. Nikisch has prepared for this concert is given in full in the advertisement.

BOSTON HERALD.

THURSDAY, APRIL 3, 1890.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Third of the Season's "Young People's Popular" Concerts.

The third and last of the season's "Young People's Populars," at Music Hall yesterday afternoon, by the Boston Symphony orchestra, called out a great audience, and, under Mr. Arthur Nikisch's direction, the following programme was played: Overture, "Mignon," A. Thomas; aria, "Hans Heiling," Marschner; "Danse Macabre," Saint-Saens; "Air Hongrois," Ernst; songs with piano, (a) "Wie bist du meine Koenigin," Brahms; (b) "Wander lied," Schumann; (a) "Menuet des Follets," (b) "Danse des Sylphes," Berlioz; march, "Tannhauser," Wagner. The soloists were Mr. Theodore Reichmann, baritone, of the Metropolitan Opera House company of New York, who made his first appearance in Boston, and Mr. Franz Kneisel, the violinist. The choice of the programme and the manner of its performance both gave unmistakable evidence of the desire of Mr. Nikisch to supply the wants of the patrons of these concerts, and he succeeded most happily in his efforts in this direction. While his readings of the "Mignon" overture and the famous "Danse Macabre" were somewhat at variance with generally accepted interpretations of these numbers, there was a charm in his performances of the two works which quite captivated the hearer, and fully justified the reading given them. The poetic side of the Saint-Saens composition was given prominence rather than the eccentricities, and the work done by the orchestra brought out the manifold beauties of the score with delightful effect, the violin solo being especially well played by Mr. Kneisel. The selections from Berlioz's "Faust" were less successfully read, however, that descriptive of the "Minuet of the Will of the Wisps" suffering from the attempt to give it sharp contrasts which destroyed much of its charms. "The Dance of the Sylphs" was, on the contrary, a gem of orchestral interpretation, as airy and graceful as could be desired. The great "Tannhauser" march was also splendidly played and made a very brilliant ending to the programme. Mr. Reichmann's singing made a notable feature of the concert, and he certainly had a hearty welcome to Boston from his audience on this occasion. He is evidently a singer of experience, and while having the faults common to German vocalists—uncertainty of intonation and incorrect tone production—he sings with so much expression and good taste that it is not surprising that he has gained the good will of the operatic patrons of New York during the season just ended. He sang more surely in the "Hans Heiling" number than in his songs at the piano, but the audience was vastly pleased in these latter numbers, and recalled him so persistently that he added another selection of a sentimental class of composition, a class which appears to find greatest favor with this singer. Mr. Kneisel was heard under the most favorable circumstances in the Ernst number, the piano accompaniment being played by Mr. Nikisch with fine effect, and Mr. Kneisel's playing fairly disarming all criticism. Mr. Nikisch also played the piano accompaniments for the group of songs contributed by Mr. Reichmann.

Boston Post

THURSDAY MORNING, APRIL 3, 1890

THIRD AND LAST YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULAR.

There was a very large and enthusiastic audience in Music Hall yesterday afternoon for the last young people's popular. There is no doubt as to the success of these concerts this year, and the fact that last year they were by no means so well attended was probably owing to the programmes. In this particular Mr. Nikisch is very successful and he seems thoroughly to understand the requirements of a light afternoon concert. The programme:

Overture, "Mignon" ..... A. Thomas
Aria, from "Hans Heiling" ..... Marschner
Mr. Reichmann.
Symphonic poem, "Danse Macabre" ..... Saint-Saëns
Air Hongrois (for violin) ..... Ernst
Mr. Kneisel.
Songs with piano.
Fruhlingstraum ..... Spicker
"Wie bist du meine Koenigin" ..... Brahms
Wanderlied ..... Schumann
Mr. Reichmann.
(a) "Minuet of the Will-o'-the-Wisps."
(b) Dance of Sylphs, from "The Damnation of Faust" ..... Berlioz
March from "Tannhäuser" ..... Wagner

It is rather difficult to understand the great popularity of the overture to "Mignon." It is a thin, commonplace and rather disjointed composition, and, moreover, it is written in the potpourri form which is more in place with a comic opera overture. Still, it is a pleasure to hear anything so well played and it delighted the public immensely. There are a good many fine singers before the public in our day; there are also a number of people who have fine voices. Yet the fine singer who also has a fine voice is a rara avis of the most unusual description, but there is no doubt that Reichmann is all this and more, for he is an artist "by the grace of God." It is second nature to him to sing beautifully, and he seems to feel, as every true artist should, that the possession of his magnificent organ forces a duty upon him—one of the most relentless duties imaginable—service to art, and, feeling this, he sings like an artist. Both the aria and the songs were warmly received, and in the latter instance he was honored by a most determined encore, in response to which he sang Schumann's "Widmung," and sang it admirably. Mr. Kneisel gave a finished performance of the rather trashy Ernst "Air Hongrois." The technical difficulties of this avowedly "exhibition piece" possessed no terror for him, and his brilliant tour de force was long and loudly applauded. All the orchestral numbers were finely played, but especial praise is due to the keenly artistic reading which Mr. Nikisch gave of Saint-Saëns's grewsome but beautiful Danse Macabre.

ARTHUR WELD.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 2, 1890.

——Otto Floersheim has had produced by the Boston Symphony Society his last composition, a scherzo, which was well interpreted by Mr. Nikisch at his last concert. Mr. Floersheim's work is described by the Boston critics as a worthy addition to Mr. Nikisch's répertoire. It is written for orchestra and is a clever bit of bright musical humor, light, dainty and graceful and well orchestrated. It belongs, so the Boston critics say, rather to the French school, reminding one of Berlioz, while the other compositions by Mr. Floersheim belong essentially to the new German influence. The scherzo is probably a number from a suite upon which, it is reported, Mr. Floersh eim has been engaged for some time.—Sunday "World."

[99]

UNION HALL, 18 BOLYSTON STREET.

FIFTH SEASON 1889-90.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin.
Mr. OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin.
Mr. LOUIS SVEČENSKI, Viola.
Mr. ANTON HEKKING, Violoncello.

WITH THE ASSISTANCE OF

Mr. ERNST PERABO, and
Miss GERTRUDE FRANKLIN.

V. CONCERT.

MONDAY, MARCH 31ST, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

BRAHMS. QUARTET for STRINGS in B flat, op. 67.
Vivace.—
Andante.—
Adagio (Allegretto non troppo).—
Poco allegretto con variazioni.

BEETHOVEN. FOUR SCOTCH SONGS with accompaniment of PIANOFORTE, VIOLIN and VIOLONCELLO.
a) "AGAIN MY LYRE."
b) "THE SWEETEST LAD."
c) "FAITHFUL JOHNIE."
d) "O, THOU ART THE LAD OF MY HEART, WILLY."

ARTHUR WELD. ADAGIO MOLTO SOSTENUTO, from QUARTET FOR STRINGS in F major.

BEETHOVEN. TRIO for PIANOFORTE, VIOLIN and VIOLONCELLO, in B flat major, op. 97
Allegro moderato.—B flat major.
Scherzo, allegretto.—B flat major; with trio.—B flat minor.
Andante cantabile.—D major.
Allegro moderato.—B flat major.

The Pianoforte is a Steinway.

The NEXT CONCERT will be given April 14, at 8 P. M.

BOSTON HERALD.

TUESDAY, APRIL 1, 1890.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The fifth of the current series of chamber concerts by the Kneisel quartet given at Union Hall last evening was greatly enjoyed by the subscribers to these notable events of the season, the audience well nigh filling every seat in the auditorium. The quartet had the assistance of Miss Gertrude Franklin, soprano, and Mr. Ernst Perabo, pianist, two artists who are always welcome to the concert stage. The instrumental numbers were pleasantly varied by the singing of an unfamiliar group of four Scotch songs by Miss Franklin, who gave these tuneful vocal gems, a most delightful interpretation and quite won the audience by her charmingly artistic vocalization. Mr. Perabo was heard with even more than usual pleasure in Beethovan's trio in B flat, op. 97, for piano, violin and 'cello, the three players, Messrs. Perabo, Kneisel and Hekking, the graceful movements of this composition being given with faultless taste by the performers. The novelty of the evening consisted of the movement for string quartet by Mr. A. Weld, and this proved another most enjoyable example of the genius and skill of the composer, which qualities have already attracted well merited attention to his writings. The quartet by Brahms in B flat completed this excellent programme, all of which was listened to with unabated interest.

Boston Daily Traveller.

TUESDAY, APRIL 1, 1890.

The Kneisel programme was: Quartet in B flat, Brahms; Four "Scotch" Songs by Beethoven, sung by Gertrude Franklin: Adagio for String Quartet in C major, Arthur Weld; Pianoforte trio, Op. 97, in B flat, Beethoven. Mr. Ernst Perabo was the pianist and in the trio his playing was noble; Messrs. Kneisel and Hekking were also at their best in this work. The single movement from Mr. Weld's quartet is such genuinely good music that it excites an interest in the work as a whole, which we hope will soon be heard in public. One more Kneisel concert will be given this season.

Boston Post

WEDNESDAY MORNING, APRIL 2, 1890

Mr. Theodor Reichmann, the eminent baritone of the Metropolitan Opera House of New York, will be heard for the first time in this city at the popular matinee by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this afternoon. The interesting programme which Mr. Nikisch has prepared for this concert is given in full in the advertisement.

BOSTON HERALD.

THURSDAY, APRIL 3, 1890.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Third of the Season's "Young People's Popular" Concerts.

The third and last of the season's "Young People's Populars," at Music Hall yesterday afternoon, by the Boston Symphony orchestra, called out a great audience, and, under Mr. Arthur Nikisch's direction, the following programme was played: Overture, "Mignon," A. Thomas; aria, "Hans Heiling," Marschner; "Danse Macabre," Saint-Saens; "Air Hongrois," Ernst; songs with piano, (a) "Wie bist du meine Koenigin," Brahms; (b) "Wander lied," Schumann; (a) "Menuet des Follets," (b) "Danse des Sylphes," Berlioz; march, "Tannhauser," Wagner. The soloists were Mr. Theodore Reichmann, baritone, of the Metropolitan Opera House company of New York, who made his first appearance in Boston, and Mr. Franz Kneisel, the violinist. The choice of the programme and the manner of its performance both gave unmistakable evidence of the desire of Mr. Nikisch to supply the wants of the patrons of these concerts, and he succeeded most happily in his efforts in this direction. While his readings of the "Mignon" overture and the famous "Danse Macabre" were somewhat at variance with generally accepted interpretations of these numbers, there was a charm in his performances of the two works which quite captivated the hearer, and fully justified the reading given them. The poetic side of the Saint-Saens composition was given prominence rather than the eccentricities, and the work done by the orchestra brought out the manifold beauties of the score with delightful effect, the violin solo being especially well played by Mr. Kneisel. The selections from Berlioz's "Faust" were less successfully read, however, that descriptive of the "Minuet of the Will of the Wisps" suffering from the attempt to give it sharp contrasts which destroyed much of its charms. "The Dance of the Sylphs" was, on the contrary, a gem of orchestral interpretation, as airy and graceful as could be desired. The great "Tannhauser" march was also splendidly played and made a very brilliant ending to the programme. Mr. Reichmann's singing made a notable feature of the concert, and he certainly had a hearty welcome to Boston from his audience on this occasion. He is evidently a singer of experience, and while having the faults common to German vocalists—uncertainty of intonation and incorrect tone production—he sings with so much expression and good taste that it is not surprising that he has gained the good will of the operatic patrons of New York during the season just ended. He sung more surely in the "Hans Heiling" number than in his songs at the piano, but the audience was vastly pleased in these latter numbers, and recalled him so persistently that he added another selection of a sentimental class of composition, a class which appears to find greatest favor with this singer. Mr. Kneisel was heard under the most favorable circumstances in the Ernst number, the piano accompaniment being played by Mr. Nikisch with fine effect, and Mr. Kneisel's playing fairly disarming all criticism. Mr. Nikisch also played the accompaniments for the group of songs contributed by Mr. Reichmann.

Boston Post

THURSDAY MORNING, APRIL 3, 1890

THIRD AND LAST YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULAR.

There was a very large and enthusiastic audience in Music Hall yesterday afternoon for the last young people's popular. There is no doubt as to the success of these concerts this year, and the fact that last year they were by no means so well attended was probably owing to the programmes. In this particular Mr. Nikisch is very successful and he seems thoroughly to understand the requirements of a light afternoon concert. The programme:

Overture, "Mignon".....A. Thomas
Aria, from "Hans Heiling".....Marschner
Mr. Reichmann.
Symphonic poem, "Danse Macabre"....
.....Saint-Saëns
Air Hongrois (for violin).....Ernst
Mr. Kneisel.
Songs with piano.
Fruhlingstraum.....Spicker
"Wie bist du meine Koenigin".....Brahms
Wanderlied.....Schumann
Mr. Reichmann.
(a) "Minuet of the Will-o'-the-Wisps."
(b) Dance of Sylphs, from "The Damnation of Faust".....Berlioz
March from "Tannhäuser".....Wagner

It is rather difficult to understand the great popularity of the overture to "Mignon." It is a thin, commonplace and rather disjointed composition, and, moreover, it is written in the potpourri form which is more in place with a comic opera overture. Still, it is a pleasure to hear anything so well played and it delighted the public immensely. There are a good many fine singers before the public in our day; there are also a number of people who have fine voices. Yet the fine singer who also has a fine voice is a rara avis of the most unusual description, but there is no doubt that Reichmann is all this and more, for he is an artist "by the grace of God." It is second nature to him to sing beautifully, and he seems to feel, as every true artist should, that the possession of his magnificent organ forces a duty upon him—one of the most relentless duties imaginable—service to art, and, feeling this, he sings like an artist. Both the aria and the songs were warmly received, and in the latter instance he was honored by a most determined encore, in response to which he sang Schumann's "Widmung," and sang it admirably. Mr. Kneisel gave a finished performance of the rather trashy Ernst "Air Hongrois." The technical difficulties of this avowedly "exhibition piece" possessed no terror for him, and his brilliant tour de force was long and loudly applauded. All the orchestral numbers were finely played, but especial praise is due to the keenly artistic reading which Mr. Nikisch gave of Saint-Saëns's grewsome but beautiful Danse Macabre.

ARTHUR WELD.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.

THURSDAY MORNING, APRIL 3, 1890.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Young People's Popular Concert Yesterday Afternoon.

A splendid programme, on just the right level, and a larger audience than ever, are the pleasant facts that are to be recorded of the third popular concert given in Music Hall yesterday afternoon. The list began with Thomas' overture to "Mignon," with its pretty coquettings with "Io son Titania," the melodious polonaise. Then came the central figure of the occasion—Theodore Reichmann. To say that he made a success would be putting it very mildly; he made the best impression that any baritone has ever made in Boston. He has all Henschel's intelligence and a great deal more than Henschel's voice. He is Staudigl redivivus. He sang the aria from "Hans Heiling" with noble breadth, yet with utmost tenderness. His enunciation was always clear and easily followed. In the phrases "Ya! lass mich traumen," and in the constantly reappearing "Ich liebe Dich," the tones were surprisingly well shaped for so massive a voice. But his greatest success was gained in the Lieder which came later on the programme, which Mr. Nikisch accompanied finely, although at first a little too loudly, and in which the beauty of expression was indescribable. Those who have heard August Kreissmann sing Schumann's "Dedication" in days long gone by, may form some idea of the manner in which he gave this song, when I state that this high standard was fully equalled in Brahms' "Wie bist du meine Königin," the sharp contrast between the sombre "Durch öde Wüsten," and the ecstatic and reiterated "Wonnevall," was finely presented, and Schumann's resolute "Wohlauf, noch getrunken" made a good foil to its sweetness. What a fine addition to our rich musical month of April it would be if Mr. Reichmann could be induced to give a series of song recitals in some small hall! He has a large repertoire in this school.

But another soloist stands waiting: Mr. Kneisel won his customary ovation, floral and otherwise, in Ernst's "Air Hongrois." He played with that perfection which we have all come to expect from him. The difficult work in harmonics was entirely flawless, the brilliant skips were intoned as surely as if they were simple passages in the first position, the melody in the highest position was most delicately shaded yet without any claptrap ppppp. a la Remenyi, and the final appearance of the theme on the lower strings (G and D) with constant skips into the highest register of harmonics, was given in a manner that showed how great a virtuoso our musicianly concertmeister is.

The orchestral selections were all effectively played. Strange to say, I thought Mr. Nikisch rather conservative in his reading of the Danse Macabre, but it was technically most excellent. What a lot of sensational effects it gives! The beginning with the hour of midnight sounded on the harp (plagiarized from Berlioz's "Harold Symphony" perhaps), the weird dissonances of the tuning of the violin of death, effected by lowering the E string to E flat, the knocking together of the bones of the dancing skeletons represented by the xylophone (the only occasion on which this trashy instrument has obtained admission to the real orchestral score, but thoroughly in place here), the mysterious pulsations of the bass-drum, as uncanny as anything in the piece, the clash of cymbals, and finally the oboe phrase picturing the crowing of the cock which sends them all into their graves again (there is more of nature in the crowing of the cock in the clock of Strasburg, however) all these points go to make up a saturnalia of morbid music that would have inspired an Edgar Allan Poe. Then came more of the supernatural in Berlioz's "Minuet of the Will o' the Wisps" and the "Dance of the Sylphs." In the former the mockery of the "Serenade of Mephistopheles" was very finely brought out, and in the latter the violins, con sordine, did excellent work. As I had come too late to hear all of the opening number, I made up for it a la Charles Lamb, by going away early, and did not hear the Tannhauser march, but have faith to believe that it was finely performed, as certainly was the case with all the other numbers. The adults of Boston are sorry that the "Young People's Concerts" come so seldom.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Daily Traveller

MONDAY, MAY 12, 1890.

Nowadays it is the boisterous, assertive, pushing and egotistical fellow, who, in all business walks, has the public eye and gets the full meed of public praise. His methods are an implied demand for recognition; he appears to the world as if ticketed with some such legend as this: "I am the great Smith, manager of Jenks's band; I am the band; the band is mine;" or, "Behold in me the creator." According to nineteenth-century ethics, these chaps, whose whole manner is a presumptuous challenge, are really great men; they win favor of some newspapers; are bowed down to by the great minority, and, in short, win a pretty comfortable niche in the world's opinion by their bravado and boasting. But there are yet remaining on the face of the earth a few men, holding positions of great responsibility, who practise different methods, the sort of persons of whom the Scriptures say "by their works ye shall know them." We are led into this vein of reflection by contemplating the quiet, earnest but tremendously effective work of the manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The most modest of men, and one of the youngest ever called to a position of equal importance, Mr. Ellis, from the first implicitly trusted by Mr. Higginson to develop the orchestra, by an exercise of "persistent energy" (good phrase that!) rare tact, and a geniality of spirit,—possessing which one can cross more bridges than without,—has accomplished really great things. When one reads of the progress of the orchestra through the country, the news is accompanied by no scandal, no echo of anything that is disassociated with the actions of gentlemen. This is only one result of the methods of the quiet man at the Music Hall, who burns the candle early and late for the good cause he has so near to his heart.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 2, 1890.

——Otto Floersheim has had produced by the Boston Symphony Society his last composition, a scherzo, which was well interpreted by Mr. Nikisch at his last concert. Mr. Floersheim's work is described by the Boston critics as a worthy addition to Mr. Nikisch's répertoire. It is written for orchestra and is a clever bit of bright musical humor, light, dainty and graceful and well orchestrated. It belongs, so the Boston critics say, rather to the French school, reminding one of Berlioz, while the other compositions by Mr. Floersheim belong essentially to the new German influence. The scherzo is probably a number from a suite upon which, it is reported, Mr. Floersheim has been engaged for some time.—Sunday "World."

UNION HALL, 18 BOLYSTON STREET.

FIFTH SEASON 1889-90.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin.
Mr. OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin.
Mr. LOUIS SVECENSKI, Viola.
Mr. ANTON HEKKING, Violoncello.
WITH THE ASSISTANCE OF
Mr. ERNST PERABO, and
Miss GERTRUDE FRANKLIN.

V. CONCERT.

MONDAY, MARCH 31ST, AT 8 P. M.

PROGRAMME.

BRAHMS. QUARTET for STRINGS in B flat, op. 67.
Vivace.—
Andante.—
Adagio (Allegretto non troppo).—
Poco allegretto con variazioni.

BEETHOVEN. FOUR SCOTCH SONGS with accompaniment of PIANOFORTE, VIOLIN and VIOLONCELLO.
a) "AGAIN MY LYRE."
b) "THE SWEETEST LAD."
c) "FAITHFUL JOHNIE."
d) "O, THOU ART THE LAD OF MY HEART, WILLY."

ARTHUR WELD. ADAGIO MOLTO SOSTENUTO, from QUARTET FOR STRINGS in F major.

BEETHOVEN. TRIO for PIANOFORTE, VIOLIN and VIOLONCELLO, in B flat major, op. 97
Allegro moderato.—B flat major.
Scherzo, allegretto.—B flat major; with trio.—B flat minor.
Andante cantabile.—D major.
Allegro moderato.—B flat major.

The Pianoforte is a Steinway.

The NEXT CONCERT will be given April 14, at 8 P. M.

BOSTON HERALD.

TUESDAY, APRIL 1, 1890.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The fifth of the current series of chamber concerts by the Kneisel quartet given at Union Hall last evening was greatly enjoyed by the subscribers to these notable events of the season, the audience well nigh filling every seat in the auditorium. The quartet had the assistance of Miss Gertrude Franklin, soprano, and Mr. Ernst Perabo, pianist, two artists who are always welcome to the concert stage. The instrumental numbers were pleasantly varied by the singing of an unfamiliar group of four Scotch songs by Miss Franklin, who gave these tuneful vocal gems, a most delightful interpretation and quite won the audience by her charmingly artistic vocalization. Mr. Perabo was heard with even more than usual pleasure in Beethovan's trio in B flat, op. 97, for piano, violin and 'cello, the three players, Messrs. Perabo, Kneisel and Hekking, the graceful movements of this composition being given with faultless taste by the performers. The novelty of the evening consisted of the movement for string quartet by Mr. A. Weld, and this proved another most enjoyable example of the genius and skill of the composer, which qualities have already attracted well merited attention to his writings. The quartet by Brahms in B flat completed this excellent programme, all of which was listened to with unabated interest.

Boston Daily Traveller.

TUESDAY, APRIL 1, 1890.

The Kneisel programme was: Quartet in B flat, Brahms; Four "Scotch" Songs by Beethoven, sung by Gertrude Franklin; Adagio for String Quartet in C major, Arthur Weld; Pianoforte trio, Op. 97, in B flat, Beethoven. Mr. Ernst Perabo was the pianist and in the trio his playing was noble; Messrs. Kneisel and Hekking were also at their best in this work. The single movement from Mr. Weld's quartet is such genuinely good music that it excites an interest in the work as a whole, which we hope will soon be heard in public. One more Kneisel concert will be given this season.

Boston Post

WEDNESDAY MORNING, APRIL 2, 1890

Mr. Theodor Reichmann, the eminent baritone of the Metropolitan Opera House of New York, will be heard for the first time in this city at the popular matinee by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this afternoon. The interesting programme which Mr. Nikisch has prepared for this concert is given in full in the advertisement.

BOSTON HERALD.

THURSDAY, APRIL 3, 1890.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Third of the Season's "Young People's Popular" Concerts.

The third and last of the season's "Young People's Populars," at Music Hall yesterday afternoon, by the Boston Symphony orchestra, called out a great audience, and, under Mr. Arthur Nikisch's direction, the following programme was played: Overture, "Mignon," A. Thomas; aria, "Hans Heiling," Marschner; "Danse Macabre," Saint-Saens; "Air Hongrois," Ernst; songs with piano, (a) "Wie bist du meine Koenigin," Brahms; (b) "Wander lied," Schumann; (a) "Menuet des Follets," (b) "Danse des Sylphes," Berlioz; march, "Tannhauser," Wagner. The soloists were Mr. Theodore Reichmann, baritone, of the Metropolitan Opera House company of New York, who made his first appearance in Boston, and Mr. Franz Kneisel, the violinist. The choice of the programme and the manner of its performance both gave unmistakable evidence of the desire of Mr. Nikisch to supply the wants of the patrons of these concerts, and he succeeded most happily in his efforts in this direction. While his readings of the "Mignon" overture and the famous "Danse Macabre" were somewhat at variance with generally accepted interpretations of these numbers, there was a charm in his performances of the two works which quite captivated the hearer, and fully justified the reading given them. The poetic side of the Saint-Saens composition was given prominence rather than the eccentricities, and the work done by the orchestra brought out the manifold beauties of the score with delightful effect, the violin solo being especially well played by Mr. Kneisel. The selections from Berlioz's "Faust" were less successfully read, however, that descriptive of the "Minuet of the Will of the Wisps" suffering from the attempt to give it sharp contrasts which destroyed much of its charms. "The Dance of the Sylphs" was, on the contrary, a gem of orchestral interpretation, as airy and graceful as could be desired. The great "Tannhauser" march was also splendidly played and made a very brilliant ending to the programme. Mr. Reichmann's singing made a notable feature of the concert, and he certainly had a hearty welcome to Boston from his audience on this occasion. He is evidently a singer of experience, and while having the faults common to German vocalists—uncertainty of intonation and incorrect tone production—he sings with so much expression and good taste that it is not surprising that he has gained the good will of the operatic patrons of New York during the season just ended. He sung more surely in the "Hans Heiling" number than in his songs at the piano, but the audience was vastly pleased in these latter numbers, and recalled him so persistently that he added another selection of a sentimental class of composition, a class which appears to find greatest favor with this singer. Mr. Kneisel was heard under the most favorable circumstances in the Ernst number, the piano accompaniment being played by Mr. Nikisch with fine effect, and Mr. Kneisel's playing fairly disarming all criticism. Mr. Nikisch also played the accompaniments for the group of songs contributed by Mr. Reichmann.

Boston Post

THURSDAY MORNING, APRIL 3, 1890

THIRD AND LAST YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULAR.

There was a very large and enthusiastic audience in Music Hall yesterday afternoon for the last young people's popular. There is no doubt as to the success of these concerts this year, and the fact that last year they were by no means so well attended was probably owing to the programmes. In this particular Mr. Nikisch is very successful and he seems thoroughly to understand the requirements of a light afternoon concert. The programme:

Overture, "Mignon".....A. Thomas
Aria, from "Hans Heiling".....Marschner
Mr. Reichmann.
Symphonic poem, "Danse Macabre"....
.....Saint-Saëns
Air Hongrois (for violin).....Ernst
Mr. Kneisel.
Songs with piano.
Fruhlingstraum.....Spicker
"Wie bist du meine Koenigin".....Brahms
Wanderlied.....Schumann
Mr. Reichmann.
(a) "Minuet of the Will-o'-the-Wisps."
(b) Dance of Sylphs, from "The Damnation of Faust".....Berlioz
March from "Tannhäuser".....Wagner

It is rather difficult to understand the great popularity of the overture to "Mignon." It is a thin, commonplace and rather disjointed composition, and, moreover, it is written in the potpourri form which is more in place with a comic opera overture. Still, it is a pleasure to hear anything so well played and it delighted the public immensely. There are a good many fine singers before the public in our day; there are also a number of people who have fine voices. Yet the fine singer who also has a fine voice is a rara avis of the most unusual description, but there is no doubt that Reichmann is all this and more, for he is an artist "by the grace of God." It is second nature to him to sing beautifully, and he seems to feel, as every true artist should, that the possession of his magnificent organ forces a duty upon him—one of the most relentless duties imaginable—service to art, and, feeling this, he sings like an artist. Both the aria and the songs were warmly received, and in the latter instance he was honored by a most determined encore, in response to which he sang Schumann's "Widmung," and sang it admirably. Mr. Kneisel gave a finished performance of the rather trashy Ernst "Air Hongrois." The technical difficulties of this avowedly "exhibition piece" possessed no terror for him, and his brilliant tour de force was long and loudly applauded. All the orchestral numbers were finely played, but especial praise is due to the keenly artistic reading which Mr. Nikisch gave of Saint-Saëns's grewsome but beautiful Danse Macabre.

ARTHUR WELD.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

THURSDAY MORNING, APRIL 3, 1890.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Young People's Popular Concert Yesterday Afternoon.

A splendid programme, on just the right level, and a larger audience than ever, are the pleasant facts that are to be recorded of the third popular concert given in Music Hall yesterday afternoon. The list began with Thomas' overture to "Mignon," with its pretty coquettings with "Io sou Titania," the melodious polonaise. Then came the central figure of the occasion—Theodore Reichmann. To say that he made a success would be putting it very mildly; he made the best impression that any baritone has ever made in Boston. He has all Henschel's intelligence and a great deal more than Henschel's voice. He is Staudigl redivivus. He sang the aria from "Hans Heiling" with noble breadth, yet with utmost tenderness. His enunciation was always clear and easily followed. In the phrases "Ya! lass mich traumen," and in the constantly reappearing "Ich liebe Dich," the tones were surprisingly well shaped for so massive a voice. But his greatest success was gained in the Lieder which came later on the programme, which Mr. Nikisch accompanied finely, although at first a little too loudly, and in which the beauty of expression was indescribable. Those who have heard August Kreissmann sing Schumann's "Dedication" in days long gone by, may form some idea of the manner in which he gave this song, when I state that this high standard was fully equalled in Brahms' "Wie bist du meine Königin," the sharp contrast between the sombre "Durch öde Wüsten," and the ecstatic and reiterated "Wonnevall," was finely presented, and Schumann's resolute "Wohlauf, noch getrunken" made a good foil to its sweetness. What a fine addition to our rich musical month of April it would be if Mr. Reichmann could be induced to give a series of song recitals in some small hall! He has a large repertoire in this school.

But another soloist stands waiting: Mr. Kneisel won his customary ovation, floral and otherwise, in Ernst s "Air Hongrois." He played with that perfection which we have all come to expect from him. The difficult work in harmonics was entirely flawless, the brilliant skips were intoned as surely as if they were simple passages in the first position, the melody in the highest position was most delicately shaded yet without any claptrap ppppp. a la Remenyi, and the final appearance of the theme on the lower strings (G and D) with constant skips into the highest register of harmonics, was given in a manner that showed how great a virtuoso our musicianly concertmeister is.

The orchestral selections were all effectively played. Strange to say, I thought Mr. Nikisch rather conservative in his reading of the Danse Macabre, but it was technically most excellent. What a lot of sensational effects it gives! The beginning with the hour of midnight sounded on the harp (plagiarized from Berlioz's "Harold Symphony" perhaps), the weird dissonances of the tuning of the violin of death, effected by lowering the E string to E flat, the knocking together of the bones of the dancing skeletons represented by the xylophone (the only occasion on which this trashy instrument has obtained admission to the real orchestral score, but thoroughly in place here), the mysterious pulsations of the bass-drum, as uncanny as anything in the piece, the clash of cymbals, and finally the oboe phrase picturing the crowing of the cock which sends them all into their graves again (there is more of nature in the crowing of the cock in the clock of Strasburg, however) all these points go to make up a saturnalia of morbid music that would have inspired an Edgar Allan Poe. Then came more of the supernatural in Berlioz s "Minuet of the Will o' the Wisps" and the "Dance of the Sylphs." In the former the mockery of the "Serenade of Mephistopheles" was very finely brought out, and in the latter the violins, con sordine, did excellent work. As I had come too late to hear all of the opening number, I made up for it a la Charles Lamb, by going away early, and did not hear the Tannhauser march, but have faith to believe that it was finely performed, as certainly was the case with all the other numbers. The adults of Boston are sorry that the "Young People's Concerts" come so seldom.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Daily Traveller

MONDAY, MAY 12, 1890.

Nowadays it is the boisterous, assertive, pushing and egotistical fellow, who, in all business walks, has the public eye and gets the full meed of public praise. His methods are an implied demand for recognition; he appears to the world as if ticketed with some such legend as this: "I am the great Smith, manager of Jenks's band; I am the band; the band is mine;" or, "Behold in me the creator." According to nineteenth-century ethics, these chaps, whose whole manner is a presumptuous challenge, are really great men; they win favor of some newspapers; are bowed down to by the great minority, and, in short, win a pretty comfortable niche in the world's opinion by their bravado and boasting. But there are yet remaining on the face of the earth a few men, holding positions of great responsibility, who practise different methods, the sort of persons of whom the Scriptures say "by their works ye shall know them." We are led into this vein of reflection by contemplating the quiet, earnest but tremendously effective work of the manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The most modest of men, and one of the youngest ever called to a position of equal importance, Mr. Ellis, from the first implicitly trusted by Mr. Higginson to develop the orchestra, by an exercise of "persistent energy" (good phrase that!) rare tact, and a geniality of spirit,—possessing which one can cross more bridges than without,—has accomplished really great things. When one reads of the progress of the orchestra through the country, the news is accompanied by no scandal, no echo of anything that is disassociated with the actions of gentlemen. This is only one result of the methods of the quiet man at the Music Hall, who burns the candle early and late for the good cause he has so near to his heart.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 2, 1890.

——Otto Floersheim has had produced by the Boston Symphony Society his last composition, a scherzo, which was well interpreted by Mr. Nikisch at his last concert. Mr. Floersheim's work is described by the Boston critics as a worthy addition to Mr. Nikisch's répertoire. It is written for orchestra and is a clever bit of bright musical humor, light, dainty and graceful and well orchestrated. It belongs, so the Boston critics say, rather to the French school, reminding one of Berlioz, while the other compositions by Mr. Floersheim belong essentially to the new German influence. The scherzo is probably a number from a suite upon which, it is reported, Mr. Floersh eim has been engaged for some time.—Sunday "World."

[99]

Although within the past few years Brahms has written much chamber music, no new string quartets have appeared. The one in B flat played to-day, which directly preceded the first symphony, being the third and latest composition in this form of "the youth at whose cradle the Graces and Heroes keep watch." The B flat quartet is livelier, more imaginative than either the C minor, or A minor. Dr. Deiters notes the rhythmical surprises occasioned by the first movement; the adagio he says, is all reverie and lovely harmony; the dance rhythms of the third movement interest us in a strange, fantastic way; above all the charming and ingenious variations which serve as a finale, whose concise theme is a masterpiece of conception and modulation, recall a more peaceful mood.

(First performance at Kneisel Concerts.)

AGAIN, MY LYRE.

Again my Lyre, yet once again,
With tears I wake thy thrilling strain!
O sound to sacred sorrow dear,
I weep, but could forever hear.

Ah! cease, nor more past scenes recall,
Ye plaintive notes, that dying fall!
For lost beneath thy lov'd control,
Sweet Lyre, is my dissolving soul.

Again around me airy forms appear,
And seraph songs are in mine ear!
Ye spirits blest, Oh, bear away
To happier realms my humble lay!

For still my love may deign to hear,
Those human notes that once were dear,
And still one angel-sigh bestow
On her who weeps, who mourns below.

THE SWEETEST LAD WAS JAMIE.

The sweetest lad was Jamie, the sweetest, the dearest.
And well did Jamie love me, and not a fault had he.
Yet one he had, it spoke his praise, he knew not woman's wish to tease.
He knew not all our silly ways. Alas! the woe to me!

For though I loved my Jamie, sincerely and dearly,
Yet often when he wooed me, I held my head on high,
And huff'd and toss'd with saucy air, and danced with Donald at the fair,
And placed his ribbon in my hair, and Jamie passed him by.

So when the war-pipes sounded, dear Jamie he left me,
And now some other maiden will Jamie turn to woo.
My heart will break, and well it may, for who would word of pity say,
To her who threw a heart away, so faithfu' and so true.

Oh, knew he how I loved him, sincerely and dearly,
How I would fly to meet him! oh! happy were the day.
Some kind, kind friend, oh, come atween and tell him of my altered mein!
That Jeanie has not Jeanie been since Jamie went away.

FAITHFU' JOHNIE.

When will you come, again my faithfu' Johnie,
When will you come again?
When the corn is gathered and the leaves are withered,
I will come again, my sweet and bonny.

Then Winter's winds will blow, my faithfu' Johnie,
Then Winter's wind will blow:
Though the day be dark wi' drift, that I cannot see the rift,
I will come again, my sweet and bonny.

O come na by the mair, my faithfu' Johnie,
O come na by the mair,
Though the night were hallow e'en, when the fearfu' sights were seen,
I would meet thee here, my sweet my bonny.

And shall we part again, my faithfu' Johnie?
Shall we then part again?
So long's my eye can see, Jean, that face so dear to me, Jean,
We shan't part again, my sweet, my bonny.

O, THOU ART THE LAD OF MY HEART, WILLY.

O thou art the lad of my heart, Willy!
There's love and there's life and glee.
There's a cheer in thy voice and thy bounding step.
And there's bliss in thy blithsome e'e.
But Oh! how my heart was tried, Willy!
For little I thought to see,
That the lad who won the lasses all,
Would ever be won by me.

Adown this path came Willy!
'Twas just at this hour of eve.
And will he—or will he not, I thought,
My fluttering heart relieve?
So oft as he paused as we sauntered on,
'Twas fear and hope and fear.
But here at the wood, as we parting stood,
'Twas rapture his vows to hear.

Of vows so soft, thy vows Willy!
Who would not like me be proud!
Sweet-lark! with thy soaring echoing song,
Come down from thy rosy cloud,
Come down to thy nest and tell thy mate,
But tell thy mate alone,
Thou hast seen a maid whose heart of love
Is merry and light as thy own.

The accompaniment for pianoforte, violin and violoncello to the songs sung to-day was written by Beethoven.

Mr. Weld wrote his F major quartet in the Tyrol in 1885, during the summer vacation of the Royal Music School at Munich, where he was a pupil of Rheinberger. The adagio molto sostenuto 3-4 F major, is in reduced and simplified sonata form, without any particular development of its two themes. The quartet has had several performances in private.

(First performance at Kneisel Concerts.)

The sketch books of Beethoven show us that the B flat trio—described by Lenz as "a miracle of concerted music"—occupied the master's thoughts in the early months of 1810. The work was completed during the following winter, but not copied in score until March, 1811. The dedication to Prince Rudolf came later being first announced in the printed copies issued by Steiner, of Vienna, in 1816. The trio was not heard in public until three years after its completion, when it was performed for the benefit of Schuppanzigh (a famous quartet violinist of the day) Beethoven playing the pianoforte part. Moncheles—then a youth of twenty—was present, and made the following note in his diary: "April 11. At a matinée in the Römischen Kaiser, I heard a new trio by Beethoven. It was no other than the trio in B flat, and Beethoven himself played the pianoforte part. In how many compositions do we find the word 'new' wrongly placed! But never in Beethoven compositions; least of all in this work, which is full of originality. His playing, apart from the spirit prevailing it, satisfied me less, for it lacks clearness and precision; still I observed several traces of the grand style of playing which I had long since recognised in his compositions." A few weeks later Beethoven made his final appearance as a chamber player in performing the pianoforte part of this work. A compilation of an analysis follows:

The principal subject of the first movement is at once started by the pianoforte and repeated, in the lower octave, by the violin, prior to the development of the figure contained in the first bar. At the beginning of this development, the key abruptly changes to D major, passing thence to G major, and continuing there through what is obviously a preamble to the second subject. The conclusion drawn from this is soon justified—the second subject entering not in the dominant key (F) as usual, but in G. A continuation of this gives a single phrase (cello) to the strings, accompanied by ascending and descending scale

---

BOSTON HERALD.

TUESDAY, APRIL 1, 1890.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The fifth of the current series of chamber concerts by the Kneisel quartet given at Union Hall last evening was greatly enjoyed by the subscribers to these notable events of the season, the audience well nigh filling every seat in the auditorium. The quartet had the assistance of Miss Gertrude Franklin, soprano, and Mr. Ernst Perabo, pianist, two artists who are always welcome to the concert stage. The instrumental numbers were pleasantly varied by the singing of an unfamiliar group of four Scotch songs by Miss Franklin, who gave these tuneful vocal gems, a most delightful interpretation and quite won the audience by her charmingly artistic vocalization. Mr. Perabo was heard with even more than usual pleasure in Beethovan's trio in B flat, op. 97, for piano, violin and 'cello, the three players, Messrs. Perabo, Kneisel and Hekking, the graceful movements of this composition being given with faultless taste by the performers. The novelty of the evening consisted of the movement for string quartet by Mr. A. Weld, and this proved another most enjoyable example of the genius and skill of the composer, which qualities have already attracted well merited attention to his writings. The quartet by Brahms in B flat completed this excellent programme, all of which was listened to with unabated interest.

Boston Daily Traveller.

TUESDAY, APRIL 1, 1890.

The Kneisel programme was: Quartet in B flat, Brahms; Four "Scotch" Songs by Beethoven, sung by Gertrude Franklin: Adagio for String Quartet in C major, Arthur Weld; Pianoforte trio, Op. 97, in B flat, Beethoven. Mr. Ernst Perabo was the pianist and in the trio his playing was noble; Messrs. Kneisel and Hekking were also at their best in this work. The single movement from Mr. Weld's quartet is such genuinely good music that it excites an interest in the work as a whole, which we hope will soon be heard in public. One more Kneisel concert will be given this season.

Boston Post

WEDNESDAY MORNING, APRIL 2, 1890

Mr. Theodor Reichmann, the eminent baritone of the Metropolitan Opera House of New York, will be heard for the first time in this city at the popular matinee by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this afternoon. The interesting programme which Mr. Nikisch has prepared for this concert is given in full in the advertisement.

BOSTON HERALD.

THURSDAY, APRIL 3, 1890.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Third of the Season's "Young People's Popular" Concerts.

The third and last of the season's "Young People's Populars," at Music Hall yesterday afternoon, by the Boston Symphony orchestra, called out a great audience, and, under Mr. Arthur Nikisch's direction, the following programme was played: Overture, "Mignon," A. Thomas; aria, "Hans Heiling," Marschner; "Danse Macabre," Saint-Saens; "Air Hongrois," Ernst; songs with piano, (a) "Wie bist du meine Koenigin," Brahms; (b) "Wander lied," Schumann; (a) "Menuet des Follets," (b) "Danse des Sylphes," Berlioz; march, "Tannhauser," Wagner. The soloists were Mr. Theodore Reichmann, baritone, of the Metropolitan Opera House company of New York, who made his first appearance in Boston, and Mr. Franz Kneisel, the violinist. The choice of the programme and the manner of its performance both gave unmistakable evidence of the desire of Mr. Nikisch to supply the wants of the patrons of these concerts, and he succeeded most happily in his efforts in this direction. While his readings of the "Mignon" overture and the famous "Danse Macabre" were somewhat at variance with generally accepted interpretations of these numbers, there was a charm in his performances of the two works which quite captivated the hearer, and fully justified the reading given them. The poetic side of the Saint-Saens composition was given prominence rather than the eccentricities, and the work done by the orchestra brought out the manifold beauties of the score with delightful effect, the violin solo being especially well played by Mr. Kneisel. The selections from Berlioz's "Faust" were less successfully read, however, that descriptive of the "Minuet of the Will of the Wisps" suffering from the attempt to give it sharp contrasts which destroyed much of its charms. "The Dance of the Sylphs" was, on the contrary, a gem of orchestral interpretation, as airy and graceful as could be desired. The great "Tannhauser" march was also splendidly played and made a very brilliant ending to the programme. Mr. Reichmann's singing made a notable feature of the concert, and he certainly had a hearty welcome to Boston from his audience on this occasion. He is evidently a singer of experience, and while having the faults common to German vocalists—uncertainty of intonation and incorrect tone production—he sings with so much expression and good taste that it is not surprising that he has gained the good will of the operatic patrons of New York during the season just ended. He sang more surely in the "Hans Heiling" number than in his songs at the piano, but the audience was vastly pleased in these latter numbers, and recalled him so persistently that he added another selection of a sentimental class of composition, a class which appears to find greatest favor with this singer. Mr. Kneisel was heard under the most favorable circumstances in the Ernst number, the piano accompaniment being played by Mr. Nikisch with fine effect, and Mr. Kneisel's playing fairly disarming all criticism. Mr. Nikisch also played the accompaniments for the group of songs contributed by Mr. Reichmann.

Boston Post

THURSDAY MORNING, APRIL 3, 1890

THIRD AND LAST YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULAR.

There was a very large and enthusiastic audience in Music Hall yesterday afternoon for the last young people's popular. There is no doubt as to the success of these concerts this year, and the fact that last year they were by no means so well attended was probably owing to the programmes. In this particular Mr. Nikisch is very successful and he seems thoroughly to understand the requirements of a light afternoon concert. The programme:

Overture, "Mignon".....A. Thomas
Aria, from "Hans Heiling".....Marschner
Mr. Reichmann.
Symphonic poem, "Danse Macabre".....Saint-Saëns
Air Hongrois (for violin).....Ernst
Mr. Kneisel.
Songs with piano.
Frühlingstraum.....Spicker
"Wie bist du meine Koenigin".....Brahms
Wanderlied.....Schumann
Mr. Reichmann.
(a) "Minuet of the Will-o'-the-Wisps."
(b) Dance of Sylphs, from "The Damnation of Faust".....Berlioz
March from "Tannhäuser".....Wagner

It is rather difficult to understand the great popularity of the overture to "Mignon." It is a thin, commonplace and rather disjointed composition, and, moreover, it is written in the potpourri form which is more in place with a comic opera overture. Still, it is a pleasure to hear anything so well played and it delighted the public immensely. There are a good many fine singers before the public in our day; there are also a number of people who have fine voices. Yet the fine singer who also has a fine voice is a rara avis of the most unusual description, but there is no doubt that Reichmann is all this and more, for he is an artist "by the grace of God." It is second nature to him to sing beautifully, and he seems to feel, as every true artist should, that the possession of his magnificent organ forces a duty upon him—one of the most relentless duties imaginable—service to art, and, feeling this, he sings like an artist. Both the aria and the songs were warmly received, and in the latter instance he was honored by a most determined encore, in response to which he sang Schumann's "Widmung," and sang it admirably. Mr. Kneisel gave a finished performance of the rather trashy Ernst "Air Hongrois." The technical difficulties of this avowedly "exhibition piece" possessed no terror for him, and his brilliant tour de force was long and loudly applauded. All the orchestral numbers were finely played, but especial praise is due to the keenly artistic reading which Mr. Nikisch gave of Saint-Saëns's grewsome but beautiful Danse Macabre.

ARTHUR WELD.

BOSTON DAILY ADVE
Established 1813
THURSDAY MORNING, APRI

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Young People's Popular Co
terday Afternoon.

A splendid programme, on jus level, and a larger audience tha the pleasant facts that are to b of the third popular concert give Hall yesterday afternoon. The with Thomas' overture to "Mig its pretty coquettings with "I
nia," the melodious polonaise.
the central figure of the occas dore Reichmann. To say that success would be putting it ve
he made the best impression
baritone has ever made in B
has all Henschel's intelligence deal more than Henschel's vo
Staudigl redivivus. He sang from "Haus Heiling" with nobl yet with utmost tenderness. H
tion was always clear and easily
In the phrases "Ya ! lass mich
and in the constantly reappe liebe Dich," the tones were s well shaped for so massive a his greatest success was ga
Lieder which came later on the p
which Mr. Nikisch accompanied though at first a little too loud which the beauty of expressio describable. Those who have gust Kreissmann sing Schuman
cation" in days long gone by,
some idea of the manner
he gave this song, when I state
high standard was fully e
Brahms' "Wie bist du meine
the sharp contrast between
"Durch öde Wüsten," and the e reiterated "Wonnevall," was sented, and Schumann's resolute noch getrunken" made a good sweetness. What a fine addit rich musical month of April it
Mr. Reichmann could be induce series of song recitals in some
He has a large repertoire in thi
But another soloist stands w
Kneisel won his customary ov and otherwise, in Ernst's "Air
He played with that perfectio have all come to expect from difficult work in harmonics w flawless, the brilliant skips w as surely as if they were simp in the first position, the me highest position was most shaded yet without any clap a la Remenyi, and the final ap the theme on the lower string with constant skips into the hi ter of harmonics, was given i that showed how great a virtu
sicianly concertmeister is.
The orchestral selections w fectively played. Strange thought Mr. Nikisch rather in his reading of the Danse
but it was technically most
What a lot of sensational effec
The beginning with the hour o sounded on the harp (plagia
Berlioz's "Harold Symphony
the weird dissonances of the t violin of death, effected by low string to E flat, the knocking the bones of the dancing skel sented by the xylophone (the o on which this trashy instrume tained admission to the rea score, but thoroughly in place mysterious pulsations of the as uncanny as anything in the clash of cymbals, a the oboe phrase pictu crowing of the cock wh them all into their graves aga more of nature in the crowing in the clock of Strasburg, h these points go to make up a s morbid music that would have Edgar Allan Poe. Then came supernatural in Berlioz's "Mi
Will o' the Wisps" and the "D Sylphs." In the former the the "Serenade of Mephistop very finely brought out, and in the violins, con sordine, did exc
As I had come too late to hear opening number, I made up f
Charles Lamb, by going away did not hear the Tannhauser have faith to believe that it performed, as certainly was th
all the other numbers. The Boston are sorry that the "You
Concerts" come so seldom.

LOUIS

THE MUSICA

NEW YORK, WEDNES

——Otto Floersheim has ton Symphony Society his la which was well interpreted b cert. Mr. Floersheim's work critics as a worthy addition to is written for orchestra and is humor, light, dainty and grac
It belongs, so the Boston critic school, reminding one of Berl tions by Mr. Floersheim belong man influence. The scherzo is suite upon which, it is rep been engaged for some time.—

passages for the pianofore, after which the statement of this unusually prolonged subject ends, still in the key of G major. The master substantially repeats this with a different disposition of the instruments, and then enters upon the peroration of the first part. After a short preamble, the "free fantasia" opens with the first four notes of the principal theme, treated in three-fold imitation and leading to a full close in E flat. Here Beethoven takes away the first note of the four, and then we have a variant, continued to a half close in G, which specially favoured key (that of the second subject) the master now chooses for treatment of another fragment from the leading melody. This he presently uses in a "diminished" form and, by carrying on the "figure" winds up the free fantasia with a brisk example of contrary motion. The fragment now serves as a bridge to the recapitulation, which, as will readily be observed, is not a simple repetition. Recapitulation ended, the movement closes with a coda wherein the leading theme chiefly figures. The leading features of the allegro moderato are, first, an almost complete avoidance of the dominant key, and next, an absence of episodical themes. The two subjects, and the composer's mastery of development, amply suffice for all needful variety.

The principal subject of the scherzo is given out by the strings, the cello and violin amicably sharing its phrases, while the pianoforte remains silent. After the pianoforte has repeated this in full, it goes on into a tributary, the whole being then worked out in a transparent manner. The trio is one of Beethoven's freaks. Mark the peculiar crawling character of the theme, and its uncommon enunciation in fugue form, with statement and answer for four voices all complete. This is followed by a tributary in very marked contrast, which serves, with the fugal subject, for all the subsequent course of an unusually extended trio. The first part of the movement, or scherzo proper, having been duly repeated without material change, the fugal theme of the trio opens a coda, which ends with a brief but characteristic reference to the subject of the scherzo.

Andante cantabile. This wonderfully rich movement is in the variation form, of which Beethoven has given more (and more magnificent) examples than any other composer—Bach and Mozart not excepted. The simple yet divinely beautiful theme is in two sections, each first stated by the pianoforte alone. Five highly ingenious, elaborate, and effective variations follow: the first, made up of arpeggio passages, falling to the pianoforte; the second also is given to the pianoforte, but here, as will be observed, the strings play a much more important part; again the pianoforte is favored, in the third variation, and the strings have little to do; the fourth variation (poco piu adagio) is remarkable for its syncopated treatment of the theme, and for continuous arpeggios in the pianoforte accompaniment; while many think that the last variation (with coda) is the most beautiful of all.

A true rondo subject is at once recognized in the principal theme of the finale. The second theme with its lively play of rhythm at once follows and leads to a recurrence of the principal subject, in harmony with the invariable rule of a rondo. Then follows an episode in E flat, preparatory to the reappearance of the first and second subjects at full length. After the recapitulation comes an elaborate coda (presto, 6-8) opening in A major with a new version of the leading theme. Its further course, one of sustained animation and brilliancy, can be followed with ease. (Second performance at Kneisel Concerts.)

BOSTON HERALD.

TUESDAY, APRIL 1, 1890.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The fifth of the current series of chamber concerts by the Kneisel quartet given at Union Hall last evening was greatly enjoyed by the subscribers to these notable events of the season, the audience well nigh filling every seat in the auditorium. The quartet had the assistance of Miss Gertrude Franklin, soprano, and Mr. Ernst Perabo, pianist, two artists who are always welcome to the concert stage. The instrumental numbers were pleasantly varied by the singing of an unfamiliar group of four Scotch songs by Miss Franklin, who gave these tuneful vocal gems, a most delightful interpretation and quite won the audience by her charmingly artistic vocalization. Mr. Perabo was heard with even more than usual pleasure in Beethovan's trio in B flat, op. 97, for piano, violin and 'cello, the three players, Messrs. Perabo, Kneisel and Hekking, the graceful movements of this composition being given with faultless taste by the performers. The novelty of the evening consisted of the movement for string quartet by Mr. A. Weld, and this proved another most enjoyable example of the genius and skill of the composer, which qualities have already attracted well merited attention to his writings. The quartet by Brahms in B flat completed this excellent programme, all of which was listened to with unabated interest.

Boston Daily Traveller.

TUESDAY, APRIL 1, 1890.

The Kneisel programme was: Quartet in B flat, Brahms; Four "Scotch" Songs by Beethoven, sung by Gertrude Franklin: Adagio for String Quartet in C major, Arthur Weld; Pianoforte trio, Op. 97, in B flat, Beethoven. Mr. Ernst Perabo was the pianist and in the trio his playing was noble; Messrs. Kneisel and Hekking were also at their best in this work. The single movement from Mr. Weld's quartet is such genuinely good music that it excites an interest in the work as a whole, which we hope will soon be heard in public. One more Kneisel concert will be given this season.

Boston Post

WEDNESDAY MORNING, APRIL 2, 1890

Mr. Theodor Reichmann, the eminent baritone of the Metropolitan Opera House of New York, will be heard for the first time in this city at the popular matinee by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this afternoon. The interesting programme which Mr. Nikisch has prepared for this concert is given in full in the advertisement.

BOSTON HERALD.

THURSDAY, APRIL 3, 1890.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Third of the Season's "Young People's Popular" Concerts.

The third and last of the season's "Young People's Populars," at Music Hall yesterday afternoon, by the Boston Symphony orchestra, called out a great audience, and, under Mr. Arthur Nikisch's direction, the following programme was played: Overture, "Mignon," A. Thomas; aria, "Hans Heiling," Marschner; "Danse Macabre," Saint-Saens; "Air Hongrois," Ernst; songs with piano, (a) "Wie bist du meine Koenigin," Brahms; (b) "Wander lied," Schumann; (a) "Menuet des Follets," (b) "Danse des Sylphes," Berlioz; march, "Tannhauser," Wagner. The soloists were Mr. Theodore Reichmann, baritone, of the Metropolitan Opera House company of New York, who made his first appearance in Boston, and Mr. Franz Kneisel, the violinist. The choice of the programme and the manner of its performance both gave unmistakable evidence of the desire of Mr. Nikisch to supply the wants of the patrons of these concerts, and he succeeded most happily in his efforts in this direction. While his readings of the "Mignon" overture and the famous "Danse Macabre" were somewhat at variance with generally accepted interpretations of these numbers, there was a charm in his performances of the two works which quite captivated the nearer, and fully justified the reading given them. The poetic side of the Saint-Saens composition was given prominence rather than the eccentricities, and the work done by the orchestra brought out the manifold beauties of the score with delightful effect, the violin solo being especially well played by Mr. Kneisel. The selections from Berlioz's "Faust" were less successfully read, however, that descriptive of the "Minuet of the Will of the Wisps" suffering from the attempt to give it sharp contrasts which destroyed much of its charms. "The Dance of the Sylphs" was, on the contrary, a gem of orchestral interpretation, as airy and graceful as could be desired. The great "Tannhauser" march was also splendidly played and made a very brilliant ending to the programme. Mr. Reichmann's singing made a notable feature of the concert, and he certainly had a hearty welcome to Boston from his audience on this occasion. He is evidently a singer of experience, and while having the faults common to German vocalists—uncertainty of intonation and incorrect tone production—he sings with so much expression and good taste that it is not surprising that he has gained the good will of the operatic patrons of New York during the season just ended. He sang more surely in the "Hans Heiling" number than in his songs at the piano, but the audience was vastly pleased in these latter numbers, and recalled him so persistently that he added another selection of a sentimental class of composition, a class which appears to find greatest favor with this singer. Mr. Kneisel was heard under the most favorable circumstances in the Ernst number, the piano accompaniment being played by Mr. Nikisch with fine effect, and Mr. Kneisel's playing fairly disarming all criticism. Mr. Nikisch also played the [illegible] with [illegible] of songs con-

Boston Post

THURSDAY MORNING, APRIL 3, 1890

THIRD AND LAST YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULAR.

There was a very large and enthusiastic audience in Music Hall yesterday afternoon for the last young people's popular. There is no doubt as to the success of these concerts this year, and the fact that last year they were by no means so well attended was probably owing to the programmes. In this particular Mr. Nikisch is very successful and he seems thoroughly to understand the requirements of a light afternoon concert. The programme:

Overture, "Mignon" ..... A. Thomas
Aria, from "Hans Heiling" ..... Marschner
Mr. Reichmann.
Symphonic poem, "Danse Macabre" ..... Saint-Saëns
Air Hongrois (for violin) ..... Ernst
Mr. Kneisel.
Songs with piano.
Fruhlingstraum ..... Spicker
"Wie bist du meine Koenigin" ..... Brahms
Wanderlied ..... Schumann
Mr. Reichmann.
(a) "Minuet of the Will-o'-the-Wisps."
(b) Dance of Sylphs, from "The Damnation of Faust" ..... Berlioz
March from "Tannhäuser" ..... Wagner

It is rather difficult to understand the great popularity of the overture to "Mignon." It is a thin, commonplace and rather disjointed composition, and, moreover, it is written in the potpourri form which is more in place with a comic opera overture. Still, it is a pleasure to hear anything so well played and it delighted the public immensely. There are a good many fine singers before the public in our day; there are also a number of people who have fine voices. Yet the fine singer who also has a fine voice is a rara avis of the most unusual description, but there is no doubt that Reichmann is all this and more, for he is an artist "by the grace of God." It is second nature to him to sing beautifully, and he seems to feel, as every true artist should, that the possession of his magnificent organ forces a duty upon him—one of the most relentless duties imaginable—service to art, and, feeling this, he sings like an artist. Both the aria and the songs were warmly received, and in the latter instance he was honored by a most determined encore, in response to which he sang Schumann's "Widmung," and sang it admirably. Mr. Kneisel gave a finished performance of the rather trashy Ernst "Air Hongrois." The technical difficulties of this avowedly "exhibition piece" possessed no terror for him, and his brilliant tour de force was long and loudly applauded. All the orchestral numbers were finely played, but especial praise is due to the keenly artistic reading which Mr. Nikisch gave of Saint-Saëns's grewsome but beautiful Danse Macabre.

ARTHUR WELD.

BOSTON DAILY ADVE
Established 1813
THURSDAY MORNING, APRI

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Young People's Popular Co
terday Afternoon.

A splendid programme, on just level, and a larger audience than the pleasant facts that are to be of the third popular concert give Hall yesterday afternoon. The with Thomas' overture to "Migr its pretty coquettings with "Io nia," the melodious polonaise.
the central figure of the occasi dore Reichmann. To say that h success would be putting it ve
he made the best impression
baritone has ever made in B has all Henschel's intelligence a deal more than Henschel's voi
Staudigl redivivus. He sang from "Haus Heiling" with noble yet with utmost tenderness. Hi
tion was always clear and easily
In the phrases "Ya! lass mich
and in the constantly reappe liebe Dich," the tones were su well shaped for so massive a v his greatest success was gai
Lieder which came later on the p
which Mr. Nikisch accompanied though at first a little too loudl
which the beauty of expressio describable. Those who have gust Kreissmann sing Schuman
cation" in days long gone by,
some idea of the manner
he gave this song, when I state
high standard was fully e
Brahms' "Wie bist du meine
the sharp contrast between t
"Durch öde Wüsten," and the ec reiterated "Wonnevall," was f sented, and Schumann's resolute
noch getrunken" made a good sweetness. What a fine additi rich musical month of April it w
Mr. Reichmann could be induced series of song recitals in some
He has a large repertoire in thi
But another soloist stands wa
Kneisel won his customary ova
and otherwise, in Ernst's "Air
He played with that perfection
have all come to expect from difficult work in harmonics w flawless, the brilliant skips we as surely as if they were simpl in the first position, the mel highest position was most shaded yet without any clapt a la Remenyi, and the final app the theme on the lower strings with constant skips into the hig ter of harmonics, was given in that showed how great a virtuos
sicianly concertmeister is.

The orchestral selections we fectively played. Strange t thought Mr. Nikisch rather co in his reading of the Danse
but it was technically most
What a lot of sensational effects
The beginning with the hour of sounded on the harp (plagiar
Berlioz's "Harold Symphony"
the weird dissonances of the tu violin of death, effected by lowe string to E flat, the knocking t the bones of the dancing skele sented by the xylophone (the onl on which this trashy instrumen tained admission to the real score, but thoroughly in place mysterious pulsations of the h as uncanny as anything in t the clash of cymbals, an the oboe phrase pictur crowing of the cock whi them all into their graves again more of nature in the crowing of in the clock of Strasburg, ho these points go to make up a sa morbid music that would have i
Edgar Allan Poe. Then came m supernatural in Berlioz's "Minu
Will o' the Wisps" and the "Da Sylphs." In the former the m the "Serenade of Mephistoph
very finely brought out, and in the violins, con sordine, did excel
As I had come too late to hear opening number, I made up for Charles Lamb, by going away did not hear the Tannhauser m
have faith to believe that it performed, as certainly was the all the other numbers. The Boston are sorry that the "Youn
Concerts" come so seldom.

LOUIS C

THE MUSICA

NEW YORK, WEDNESD

——Otto Floersheim has ha ton Symphony Society his last which was well interpreted by cert. Mr. Floersheim's work is critics as a worthy addition to M is written for orchestra and is a humor, light, dainty and grace
It belongs, so the Boston critics school, reminding one of Berlio
tions by Mr. Floersheim belong man influence. The scherzo is p suite upon which, it is repo been engaged for some time.—Su

OPENING EDITION.

THURSDAY MORNING, APRIL 3, 1890.

Young People's Popular.

The last "Popular" of the season by the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given Wednesday afternoon to the usual large audience. The programme was a choice and admirably selected one for the orchestra, including as it did the "Mignon" overture, the "Tannhauser" march and some selections from the Damnation of Faust and a symphonic poem by Saint Saens. There was variety sufficient to please all, and the interpretation of these numbers was almost perfection. Mr. Nikisch gives a fine rendition of these popular selections, making the most of the effects, but keeping within the spirit of the composer, and giving to the auditors an object lesson. It is a rare event to hear such a delivery of the "Mignon" overture, every note of which was probably familiar to a large portion of the audience. The soloists were Mr. Kneisel and Theodor Reichmann, one of the baritones of the Metropolitan Opera House Company, which is to appear next week at the Boston Theatre. Mr. Reichmann is a stranger to Boston audiences, and he evidently realized this, for he was a trifle nervous. But the hearty reception he received, both for his delivery of an aria by Marschner and some German songs with the piano, must have assured him that he had gained a warm place in the hearts of the audience. Not since Max Heinrich came to Boston have we had such an artistic, soulful and perfect rendition of German song as was given Wednesday afternoon. The audience was spellbound. Every note was a gem, and his voice, which is pure, even and true, added much to the rendition. The audience recalled him again and again, and it seemed as if it would never tire of his singing. His success here was certain, and his appearances next week will be watched with interest. Mr. Kneisel gave one of his best renditions of a gem of Ernst, and for this, as well as the songs of Mr. Reichmann, Mr. Nikisch played the piano accompaniments in a very tasteful and artistic manner.

Boston Daily Globe.

THURSDAY, APRIL 3.

REICHMANN SANG.

Kneisel Played, and the Symphony Orchestra Gained Honors.

Let Boston have more "Young People's Populars" next season, Mr. Nikisch, for not only the new generation of music-lovers, but the old as well, enjoy greatly such delightful offerings.

For the third and last concert of this agreeable series yesterday there was a delightful programme. Music Hall was filled, and enthusiasm rose to quite an unusual height, considering the fact that it was an afternoon assemblage, in which women predominated.

Reichmann, the distinguished barytone of the German opera troupe which comes to town next week, made his first appearance in Boston at this concert. He has a commanding presence, and sings unaffectedly, smoothly, and, when occasion calls, with much power. The absence of apparent effort makes his singing additionally effective. The air, "I Love Thee," from Marschner's opera, "Hans Heiling," introduced the artist. Later in the afternoon he was heard in Spicker's "Spring Dream," Brahms' "My Queen" and Schumann's "Wanderlied," to all of which Mr. Nikisch was the graceful accompanist on the pianoforte. Being enthusiastically recalled (orchestra and leader applauding as well as audience) Mr. Reichmann supplemented his trio of songs with another very acceptable selection. His debut was certainly very successful, and his appearances in grand opera are to be awaited with most pleasurable anticipations.

Mr. Kneisel, who is always welcomed to the concert platform, contributed to the programme Ernst's familiar "Hungarian air," which he played with consummate skill, Mr. Nikisch accompanying.

The overture to "Mignon," Saint Saens' symphonic poem, "The Dance of Death," with the minuet and the Dance of Sylphs from Berlioz' "Damnation of Faust," and the march from "Tannhauser," gave the orchestra its opportunities. Curiously enough, the Berlioz selections were comparatively speaking, the least successful of these selections. The Thomas overture was interpreted almost faultlessly, and the Wagner selection, as well as the Saint Saens number, gave new proof of the skill and art of the Boston symphony orchestra.

Boston Evening Transcript.

FRIDAY, APRIL 4, 1890.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The programme of the Young People's Popular Concert, given on Wednesday afternoon in the Music Hall, was as follows:

Thomas; Overture to "Mignon."
Marschner: Aria from "Hans Heiling."
Saint-Saëns; Symphonic Poem "Danse Macabre,"
Ernst: Airs hongrois, for violin.
Spicker: Frühlingstraum.
Brahms: "Wie bist du, meine Königin?"
Schumann: Wanderlied.
Berlioz: Minuet of Will-o'-the-wisps, and Dance of Sylphs, from "La damnation de Faust."
Wagner; March from Tannhäuser."

Mr. Theodor Reichmann was the singer, and Mr. Franz Kneisel the violinist.

The orchestra played splendidly throughout the concert; in the overture to "Mignon" one regretted the retard in the initial up-beat of the Polonaise at every recurrence of the theme; it makes a good effect the first time, but, when so often repeated, it breaks up the rhythm too much, and renders all climax impossible. One wondered, too, at the two selections from Berlioz's "Faust" not being followed by the Racoczy March from the same work—as they usually are at concerts in Paris—instead of by Wagner's "Tannhäuser" march. But the selections were beautifully played, and evidently much enjoyed.

This was the first opportunity Boston had of hearing Mr. Reichmann. He has a noble, beautiful low baritone voice, rather sweet and velvety than brilliant in quality; much such a voice for a baritone as Wachtel's was for a tenor. He uses it, too, uncommonly well, saving that he affects too much the extreme shades of loud and soft, and uses the natural mezza voce too little. His phrasing is, at times beautifully pure and musical, at others, however, not so artistic. He enunciates with great distinctness, and sings with immense dramatic expressiveness and power. The impression he produced in the air from "Hans Heiling"—a composition of great dramatic force—was electric. Spicker's song, too, he sang very beautifully indeed. But as soon as he came to the finer songs by Brahms and Schumann, he showed, as most essentially dramatic singers do, that the German Lied, in its best estate, is something of which he has little conception. The way in which he tore these songs to pieces, to the utter annihilation of their lyrical character, did not deserve the rapturous applause it called forth from the audience.

Mr. Kneisel played Ernst's fantasia on Hungarian airs with great brilliancy and finish, and was applauded to the echo.

Boston Daily Traveller.

FRIDAY, APRIL 4, 1890.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Young People's Popular Concert Last Wednesday—Opera and Concert Notes.

The programme of the third Young People's Popular, with Theodor Reichmann, baritone, and Franz Kneisel, violinist, soloists, was:

Overture, "Mignon".....A. Thomas
Aria, from "Hans Heiling".....Marschner
Mr. Reichmann.
Symphonic Poem, "Danse Macabre".....Saint Saëns
Air Hongrois, (for violin).....Ernst
Mr. Kneisel.
Songs with Piano.
a) Fruhlingstraum.....Spicker
b) "Wie bist du meine Koenigin".....Brahms
c) Wanderlied.....Schumann
Mr. Reichmann.
a) Minuet of the Will-o'-the-Wisps } from "The Damnation of Faust." } Berlioz
b) Dance of Sylphs.....
March from "Tannhäuser".....Wagner

One of the best popular programmes we have had here. Mr. Nikisch gave his best efforts to each and every number; the familiar Saint Saëns piece, the fascinating "Faust" music, and the march were all admirably played. With Mr. Reichmann the audience became en rapport immediately he had sung his first phrase. He is a gorgeous singer, his voice is large, sympathetic, and capable of varying timbre. He sang the Marschner air superbly, and the songs with great beauty of sentiment. As we shall hear Mr. Reichmann often during the next two weeks, further comment is deferred. After the air he was thrice recalled, and thrice did he return after the songs had been sung, but the insatiate audience clamored for and got an encore; it was a pleasure to hear Mr. Reichmann sing Schumann's "Widmung," but we object to encores, and are sorry Mr. Nikisch is not of our stern opinion. Mr. Nikisch played the piano accompaniments to the songs very beautifully; he also played Mr. Kneisel's accompaniment with great finish of style and variety of color. Mr. Kneisel was heard at his best. There was a large audience.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, APR. 5, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Mr. Nikisch has made an entire change of programme for tonight from what was promised, laying this, we believe, to the charge of the Popular concert of Wednesday afternoon—although, as that was made up of old material, the reason seems far from valid. It will be a disappointment not to hear the symphony by Mr. Cooper Cliffe, because much well-grounded expectation was awaiting this work, which, when presented unostentatiously in London as the writing of a quiet and reserved young man, was immediately extolled as possessing individuality and beauty and giving good promise of the best farther achievement. Only two concerts remain after tonight, and the probabilities are that their programmes will not admit this anticipated symphony to find a place in them. The arrangement for tonight then stands thus:—Cherubini's "Water Carrier" overture; Cowen's "Scandinavian" symphony; an entr' acte from the Reinecke "King Manfred" music, and Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" overture. This is certainly not a programme which need have cost a great deal of trouble in preparation; the symphony is the only thing which the orchestra might not play well even at sight, and surely not much more labor would have been required to get up Mr. Cliffe's score. But apart from this there is no reason to quarrel with what has been provided for tonight. The symphony is an exquisitely poetic transcript of many sentiments which arise from a knowledge of the strange and fascinating Northland, which Cowen has depicted not according to its mere musical forms, but according to its spiritual impressions. The quaint contrasts of the first movement; the dreamy lake-scenery and the faint songs of the second; the wintry brightness and gayety of the third, and "the ramp and roar of great waves climbing a rocky shore" which surge in the last, are all images instinct with imagination and appeal no less to the fancy than to the ear, and give a double pleasure which it is good to know. The orchestra played it all to perfection yesterday afternoon, and there was only the highest praise for the delicious delicacy of the second movement, with its muted and scarcely audible horns and for the crystalline clearness of the sparkling figures of the third; while the two stronger movements were vigorous in life and definite in phrasing. The rest of the selections were well given too and much applauded by the audience, among whom Mr. Edward Lloyd, who is to sing in the coming oratorio, was a greatly approving listener. The next programme, to be performed a fortnight hence, stands thus:; Goldmark, overture, "Spring" (first time in Boston); Mozart, aria from "Die Entfuehrung aus dem Serail"; Volkmann, Serenade in D-minor; songs with piano; Brahms, symphony No. 1 in C-minor. The soloist will be Mme. Steinbach-Jahns, who has just come from Leipsic, where she is dramatic soprano at the opera. She will make her debut here and will subsequently accompany the orchestra on the tour-weeks tour which they are to make through the South and West on the termination of the Boston season.

THE YOUNG FOLKS' POPULAR.

The Young Folk's Popular concert of Wednesday afternoon had for its first attraction the debut in Boston of Herr Reichmann, leading barytone of the Metropolitan company, who sang an air from the "Hans Heiling" of Marschner, and three lieder by Spinner, Brahms and Schumann. He is a man of fine, large and imposing presence, like Scaria and Fischer; his voice is noble in volume and rich in quality, and his method is frank and free, giving to the low tones almost breadth enough for a basso and delivering the upper ones without the hollow obscurity almost inseparable from the graver German organs. He sang his air with great spirit and force, and in the lighter things gave fine evidence of appreciation, sentiment and proportion of

THE KNEISEL CONCERT.

The fifth concert of the Kneisel Quartette, which took place on Monday evening, at Union Hall, was truly delightful in all respects. The large works were Brahms's string quartette in B flat, opus 67, which has not been given before in these evenings, and Beethoven's pianoforte trio in B flat, opus 97. The latter has longbeen known and loved, and the former is more bright, more genial and more free from laborious and learned writing than its author's other quartettes; the first movement has some odd irregularities of rhythm, and in the last Brahms could not withhold his hand from a set of ingenious variations, but these are not too academic to be interesting, and flow on lightly over a clearly shown theme. Between these were four of Beethoven's Scotch songs, with their full accompaniment of violin, 'cello and pianoforte, and the adagio from Mr. Arthur Weld's string quartette in F-major, a smooth, calm and sweet exposition in unpretending and scholarly form of two well-formed themes, maintaining its right to be heard even beside such other music as we have named. The performance of this programme was at all points worthy and beautiful. Mr. Perabo was at the piano, both for the trio and for the songs; and, as all musical people know, when he plays Beethoven it is with the greatest and strongest spirit, the most devoted care, and the greatest respect. The songs were sung by Miss Franklin with all the finish of style and appreciation in interpretation which characterize her unsurpassed singing of such music.

HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, APRIL 5, 1890.

The Twenty-First Symphony Concert.

Brahms.....Tragic Overture, Op. 81
Vieuxtemps.....Concerto for Violin, No. 5, in A minor, Op. 37.
Dvorak.....Symphony No. 1, in D, Op. 0

The feature of last Saturday's concert was the appearance of Mr. Otto Roth, violinist, as the soloist of the evening. He is to be warmly praised, first, for his selection of the Vieuxtemps concerto. The great violinist was not only a master of his instrument; he knew how to write cunningly for it. He had the gift of melody; he was thoroughly conversant with the laws of composition; and his taste was such that in writing virtuoso-music, he did not descend to triviality. The instrumentation of this concerto is a fine example of his skill and judgment. It is never coarse, and while characteristic and independent, the fact that a soloist is to be heard is never lost sight of. It is indeed a work of thought and beauty. And it was finely, artistically played by Mr. Roth. In these days, technique is taken for granted; a man has no business to appear before the public unless he is able to express his thoughts. Faultless intonation, full tone, an absolute mastery of difficulties, the playing of bravura passages with an ease which resembles indifference—these are expected and demanded; and from a technical standpoint, Mr. Roth's playing was unimpeachable. But the hearer demands more than this; in the case of Mr. Roth it is a pleasure to say that his performance was equally admirable from the musician's point of view. His conception, his phrasing, his use of dynamics,—all these combined to make his appearance an unqualified delight. And the modesty of his bearing lent a charm, and would have extorted applause from the hearers had they not been eager to bestow it.

It is also a pleasure to be able to say that Mr. Nikisch was at his best in the wild and untamed symphony of Dvorak. When he leads the music of the Bohemian or Hungarian or ultra dramatic school, his very faults seem for the moment virtues. The symphony itself is in many respects a fascinating work. It abounds in strange and almost grotesque passages; witness the whole of the maddening scherzo with its curious and effective trio. At times one becomes wearied of the din, and the impetuosity and gorgeous coloring fatigue; for there is but little relief for the excited ear. What a contrast is the frenzied originality of this symphony to the contract labor seen, unhappily, in many of the later works of Dvorak.

The "Tragic Overture" of Brahms is indeed a noble work. Had he always written thus, one might be tempted to join in the cult or homage paid him by the lovers of the obscure and the worshipers of the unintelligible.

The Young Peoples' Popular.—The third and last of the Young Peoples' Popular Concerts given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place Wednesday afternoon at Music Hall. Mr. Theodore Reichmann, baritone, and Mr. Franz Kneisel, violinist, were the soloists. The program was as follows:

Overture, "Mignon".....A. Thomas
Aria, from "Hans Heiling".....Marschner
Mr. Reichmann.
Symphonic Poem, "Danse Macabre".....Saint Saëns
Air Hongrois.....Ernst
Mr. Kneisel.
Songs with Piano
a. Fruhlingstraum.....Spicker
b. "Wie bist du meine Koenigin".....Brahms
c. Wanderlied.....Schumann
Mr. Reichmann.
a. "Minuet of the Will-O'-The Wisps" } .....Berlioz
b. Dance of Sylphs
March from "Tannhæuser".....Wagner

This program was thoroughly enjoyed by the audience which filled Music Hall. While it was "popular," it was not meretricious. Two of the orchestral numbers played are worthy of a hearing at the Symphony concerts; but the present conductor seems to entertain a deep-rooted prejudice against the works of such men as St. Saens, Berlioz and others who were unfortunate enough to have been born upon French soil. This is not a sweeping statement; for the French school has been shamefully neglected this season, though not by the soloists. Perhaps Mr. Nikisch thought he would experiment with French compositions, try his hand, as it were; for Wednesday he saw fit to play three familiar numbers of the French school. The performance of the "Danse Macabre" and the "Dance of Sylphs" shows that however great may be the capabilities of the conductor in other directions, he certainly is not at his ease when French scores lie upon the desk. The French gain overwhelming effects both by extreme attention to detail and by the suddenness of surprising contrasts. To them, defined gradations of tone mean something, and they have other expression-marks than piano and fortissimo. When they mark a passage pianissimo, their conductors respect and regard the wish of the composer; but to Mr. Nikisch pianissimo is merely a curious mark with which some whimsical composer has seen fit to ornament his score.

Mr. Kneisel played the extremely difficult "Air Hongrois" of Ernst, with great accuracy and brilliancy, and the cantabile passages were given with breadth of tone and beauty of phrasing. He was recalled again and again. It is refreshing to occasionally hear a good example of what, in derogation, is often called "fiddle-music;" particularly when it is good in itself and when it is played by such an artist as Mr. Kneisel.

Mr. Reichmann, the leading baritone of the Metropolitan German Opera, made a most favorable impression upon the audience. In response to enthusiastic applause he sang the familiar "Du Meine Seele." As Mr. Reichmann is to

---

The Kneisel Quartet Concert.—The fifth concert of the Kneisel Quartet was, perhaps, by the clock, too long, but the program was so well chosen and so excellently played and sung that it seemed shorter than many concerts of an hour's length. The Brahms quartet with which the concert opened is a peculiarly favorable example of Brahms' better nature. In it he does not morbidly seek to be profound, and he is contented with simple means which give rise to feelings of pleasure rather than awe which approaches despair. Miss Franklin sang four Scotch songs by Beethoven with great taste and skill. The novelty of the evening was a selection from a quartet by Arthur Weld in C major, op. 1. It is a thoughtfully written composition showing no mean skill in this difficult branch of musical art. It perhaps suffers a little from uneasiness shown by excessive modulation. The concert closed with the great trio in B-flat major of Beethoven, in which Mr. Perabo, who was at his best (and that is saying much), was assisted by Messrs. Kneisel and Hekking. The ensemble playing was, as ever, beyond reproach. X. Z.

[100]

Boston Journal.

MORNING EDITION.

THURSDAY MORNING, APRIL 3, 1890.

Young People's Popular.

The last "Popular" of the season by the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given Wednesday afternoon to the usual large audience. The programme was a choice and admirably selected one for the orchestra, including as it did the "Mignon" overture, the "Tannhauser" march and some selections from the Damnation of Faust and a symphonic poem by Saint Saens. There was variety sufficient to please all, and the interpretation of these numbers was almost perfection. Mr. Nikisch gives a fine rendition of these popular selections, making the most of the effects, but keeping within the spirit of the composer, and giving to the auditors an object lesson. It is a rare event to hear such a delivery of the "Mignon" overture, every note of which was probably familiar to a large portion of the audience. The soloists were Mr. Kneisel and Theodor Reichmann, one of the baritones of the Metropolitan Opera House Company, which is to appear next week at the Boston Theatre. Mr. Reichmann is a stranger to Boston audiences, and he evidently realized this, for he was a trifle nervous. But the hearty reception he received, both for his delivery of an aria by Marschner and some German songs with the piano, must have assured him that he had gained a warm place in the hearts of the audience. Not since Max Heinrich came to Boston have we had such an artistic, soulful and perfect rendition of German song as was given Wednesday afternoon. The audience was spellbound. Every note was a gem, and his voice, which is pure, even and true, added much to the rendition. The audience recalled him again and again, and it seemed as if it would never tire of his singing. His success here was certain, and his appearances next week will be watched with interest. Mr. Kneisel gave one of his best renditions of a gem of Ernst, and for this, as well as the songs of Mr. Reichmann, Mr. Nikisch played the piano accompaniments in a very tasteful and artistic manner.

Boston Daily Globe.

THURSDAY, APRIL 3.

REICHMANN SANG,

Kneisel Played, and the Symphony Orchestra Gained Honors.

Let Boston have more "Young People's Populars" next season, Mr. Nikisch, for not only the new generation of music-lovers, but the old as well, enjoy greatly such delightful offerings.

For the third and last concert of this agreeable series yesterday there was a delightful programme. Music Hall was filled, and enthusiasm rose to quite an unusual height, considering the fact that it was an afternoon assemblage, in which women predominated.

Reichmann, the distinguished barytone of the German opera troupe which comes to town next week, made his first appearance in Boston at this concert. He has a commanding presence, and sings unaffectedly, smoothly, and, when occasion calls, with much power. The absence of apparent effort makes his singing additionally effective. The air, "I Love Thee," from Marschner's opera, "Hans Heiling," introduced the artist. Later in the afternoon he was heard in Spicker's "Spring Dream," Brahms' "My Queen" and Schumann's "Wanderlied," to all of which Mr. Nikisch was the graceful accompanist on the pianoforte. Being enthusiastically recalled (orchestra and leader applauding as well as audience) Mr. Reichmann supplemented his trio of songs with another very acceptable selection. His debut was certainly very successful, and his appearances in grand opera are to be awaited with most pleasurable anticipations.

Mr. Kneisel, who is always welcomed to the concert platform, contributed to the programme Ernst's familiar "Hungarian air," which he played with consummate skill, Mr. Nikisch accompanying.

The overture to "Mignon," Saint Saens' symphonic poem, "The Dance of Death," with the minuet and the Dance of Sylphs from Berlioz' "Damnation of Faust," and the march from "Tannhauser," gave the orchestra its opportunities. Curiously enough, the Berlioz selections were comparatively speaking, the least successful of these selections. The Thomas overture was interpreted almost faultlessly, and the Wagner selection, as well as the Saint Saens number, gave new proof of the skill and art of the Boston symphony orchestra.

Boston Evening Transcript.

FRIDAY, APRIL 4, 1890.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The programme of the Young People's Popular Concert, given on Wednesday afternoon in the Music Hall, was as follows:

Thomas; Overture to "Mignon."
Marschner: Aria from "Hans Heiling."
Saint-Saëns; Symphonic Poem "Danse Macabre,"
Ernst: Airs hongrois, for violin.
Spicker; Frühlingstraum.
Brahms: "Wie bist du, meine Königin?"
Schumann: Wanderlied.
Berlioz: Minuet of Will-o'-the-wisps, and Dance of Sylphs, from "La damnation de Faust."
Wagner; March from Tannhäuser."

Mr. Theodor Reichmann was the singer, and Mr. Franz Kneisel the violinist.

The orchestra played splendidly throughout the concert; in the overture to "Mignon" one regretted the retard in the initial up-beat of the Polonaise at every recurrence of the theme; it makes a good effect the first time, but, when so often repeated, it breaks up the rhythm too much, and renders all climax impossible. One wondered, too, at the two selections from Berlioz's "Faust" not being followed by the Racoczy March from the same work—as they usually are at concerts in Paris—instead of by Wagner's "Tannhäuser" march. But the selections were beautifully played, and evidently much enjoyed.

This was the first opportunity Boston had of hearing Mr. Reichmann. He has a noble, beautiful low baritone voice, rather sweet and velvety than brilliant in quality; much such a voice for a baritone as Wachtel's was for a tenor. He uses it, too, uncommonly well, saving that he affects too much the extreme shades of loud and soft, and uses the natural mezza voce too little. His phrasing is, at times beautifully pure and musical, at others, however, not so artistic. He enunciates with great distinctness, and sings with immense dramatic expressiveness and power. The impression he produced in the air from "Hans Heiling"—a composition of great dramatic force—was electric. Spicker's song, too, he sang very beautifully indeed. But as soon as he came to the finer songs by Brahms and Schumann, he showed, as most essentially dramatic singers do, that the German Lied, in its best estate, is something of which he has little conception. The way in which he tore these songs to pieces, to the utter annihilation of their lyrical character, did not deserve the rapturous applause it called forth from the audience.

Mr. Kneisel played Ernst's fantasia on Hungarian airs with great brilliancy and finish, and was applauded to the echo.

Boston Daily Traveller.

FRIDAY, APRIL 4, 1890.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Young People's Popular Concert Last Wednesday—Opera and Concert Notes.

The programme of the third Young People's Popular, with Theodor Reichmann, baritone, and Franz Kneisel, violinist, soloists, was:

Overture, "Mignon".....A. Thomas
Aria, from "Hans Heiling".....Marschner
Mr. Reichmann.
Symphonic Poem, "Danse Macabre".....Saint Saëns
Air Hongrois, (for violin) .....Ernst
Mr. Kneisel.
Songs with Piano.
a) Fruhlingstraum.....Spicker
b) "Wie bist du meine Koenigin".....Brahms
c) Wanderlied.....Schumann
Mr. Reichmann.
a) Minuet of the Will-o'-the-Wisps. } from "The Damnation of Faust." } Berlioz
b) Dance of Sylphs.....
March from "Tannhäuser".....Wagner

One of the best popular programmes we have had here. Mr. Nikisch gave his best efforts to each and every number; the familiar Saint Saëns piece, the fascinating "Faust" music, and the march were all admirably played. With Mr. Reichmann the audience became en rapport immediately he had sung his first phrase. He is a gorgeous singer, his voice is large, sympathetic, and capable of varying timbre. He sang the Marschner air superbly, and the songs with great beauty of sentiment. As we shall hear Mr. Reichmann often during the next two weeks, further comment is deferred. After the air he was thrice recalled, and thrice did he return after the songs had been sung, but the insatiate audience clamored for and got an encore; it was a pleasure to hear Mr. Reichmann sing Schumann's "Widmung," but we object to encores, and are sorry Mr. Nikisch is not of our stern opinion. Mr. Nikisch played the piano accompaniments to the songs very beautifully; he also played Mr. Kneisel's accompaniment with great finish of style and variety of color. Mr. Kneisel was heard at his best. There was a large audience.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, APR. 5, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Mr. Nikisch has made an entire change of programme for tonight from what was promised, laying this, we believe, to the charge of the Popular concert of Wednesday afternoon—although, as that was made up of old material, the reason seems far from valid. It will be a disappointment not to hear the symphony by Mr. Cooper Cliffe, because much well-grounded expectation was awaiting this work, which, when presented unostentatiously in London as the writing of a quiet and reserved young man, was immediately extolled as possessing individuality and beauty and giving good promise of the best farther achievement. Only two concerts remain after tonight, and the probabilities are that their programmes will not admit this anticipated symphony to find a place in them. The arrangement for tonight then stands thus:—Cherubini's "Water Carrier" overture; Cowen's "Scandinavian" symphony; an entr' acte from the Reinecke "King Manfred" music, and Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" overture. This is certainly not a programme which need have cost a great deal of trouble in preparation; the symphony is the only thing which the orchestra might not play well even at sight, and surely not much more labor would have been required to get up Mr. Cliffe's score. But apart from this there is no reason to quarrel with what has been provided for tonight. The symphony is an exquisitely poetic transcript of many sentiments which arise from a knowledge of the strange and fascinating Northland, which Cowen has depicted not according to its mere musical forms, but according to its spiritual impressions. The quaint contrasts of the first movement; the dreamy lake-scenery and the faint songs of the second; the wintry brightness and gayety of the third, and "the ramp and roar of great waves climbing a rocky shore" which surge in the last, are all images instinct with imagination and appeal no less to the fancy than to the ear, and give a double pleasure which it is good to know. The orchestra played it all to perfection yesterday afternoon, and there was only the highest praise for the delicious delicacy of the second movement, with its muted and scarcely audible horns and for the crystalline clearness of the sparkling figures of the third; while the two stronger movements were vigorous in life and definite in phrasing. The rest of the selections were well given too and much applauded by the audience, among whom Mr. Edward Lloyd, who is to sing in the coming oratorio, was a greatly approving listener. The next programme, to be performed a fortnight hence, stands thus:; Goldmark, overture, "Spring" (first time in Boston); Mozart, aria from "Die Entfuehrung aus dem Serail"; Volkmann, Serenade in D-minor; songs with piano; Brahms, symphony No. 1 in C-minor. The soloist will be Mme. Steinbach-Jahns, who has just come from Leipsic, where she is dramatic soprano at the opera. She will make her debut here and will subsequently accompany the orchestra on the tour-weeks tour which they are to make through the South and West on the termination of the Boston season.

THE YOUNG FOLKS' POPULAR.

The Young Folk's Popular concert of Wednesday afternoon had for its first attraction the debut in Boston of Herr Reichmann, leading barytone of the Metropolitan company, who sang an air from the "Hans Heiling" of Marschner, and three lieder by Spinner, Brahms and Schumann. He is a man of fine, large and imposing presence, like Scaria and Fischer; his voice is noble in volume and rich in quality, and his method is frank and free, giving to the low tones almost breadth enough for a basso and delivering the upper ones without the hollow obscurity almost inseparable from the graver German organs. He sang his air with great spirit and force, and in the lighter things gave fine evidence of appreciation, sentiment and proportion of

THE KNEISEL CONCERT.

The fifth concert of the Kneisel Quartette, which took place on Monday evening, at Union Hall, was truly delightful in all respects. The large works were Brahms's string quartette in B flat, opus 67, which has not been given before in these evenings, and Beethoven's pianoforte trio in B flat, opus 97. The latter has longbeen known and loved, and the former is more bright, more genial and more free from laborious and learned writing than its author's other quartettes; the first movement has some odd irregularities of rhythm, and in the last Brahms could not withhold his hand from a set of ingenious variations, but these are not too academic to be interesting, and flow on lightly over a clearly shown theme. Between these were four of Beethoven's Scotch songs, with their full accompaniment of violin, 'cello and pianoforte, and the adagio from Mr. Arthur Weld's string quartette in F-major, a smooth, calm and sweet exposition in unpretending and scholarly form of two well-formed themes, maintaining its right to be heard even beside such other music as we have named. The performance of this programme was at all points worthy and beautiful. Mr. Perabo was at the piano, both for the trio and for the songs; and, as all musical people know, when he plays Beethoven it is with the greatest and strongest spirit, the most devoted care, and the greatest respect. The songs were sung by Miss Franklin with all the finish of style and appreciation in interpretation which characterize her unsurpassed singing of such music.

HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, APRIL 5, 1890

THE TWENTY-FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Brahms.....Tragic Overture, Op. 81
Vieuxtemps.....Concerto for Violin, No. 5, in A minor, Op. 37.
Dvorak.....Symphony No. 1, in D, Op. 0

The feature of last Saturday's concert was the appearance of Mr. Otto Roth, violinist, as the soloist of the evening. He is to be warmly praised, first, for his selection of the Vieuxtemps concerto. The great violinist was not only a master of his instrument; he knew how to write cunningly for it. He had the gift of melody; he was thoroughly conversant with the laws of composition; and his taste was such that in writing virtuoso-music, he did not descend to triviality. The instrumentation of this concerto is a fine example of his skill and judgment. It is never coarse, and while characteristic and independent, the fact that a soloist is to be heard is never lost sight of. It is indeed a work of thought and beauty. And it was finely, artistically played by Mr. Roth. In these days, technique is taken for granted; a man has no business to appear before the public unless he is able to express his thoughts. Faultless intonation, full tone, an absolute mastery of difficulties, the playing of bravura passages with an ease which resembles indifference—these are expected and demanded; and from a technical standpoint, Mr. Roth's playing was unimpeachable. But the hearer demands more than this; in the case of Mr. Roth it is a pleasure to say that his performance was equally admirable from the musician's point of view. His conception, his phrasing, his use of dynamics,—all these combined to make his appearance an unqualified delight. And the modesty of his bearing lent a charm, and would have extorted applause from the hearers had they not been eager to bestow it.

It is also a pleasure to be able to say that Mr. Nikisch was at his best in the wild and untamed symphony of Dvorak. When he leads the music of the Bohemian or Hungarian or ultra dramatic school, his very faults seem for the moment virtues. The symphony itself is in many respects a fascinating work. It abounds in strange and almost grotesque passages; witness the whole of the maddening scherzo with its curious and effective trio. At times one becomes wearied of the din, and the impetuosity and gorgeous coloring fatigue; for there is but little relief for the excited ear. What a contrast is the frenzied originality of this symphony to the contract labor seen, unhappily, in many of the later works of Dvorak.

The "Tragic Overture" of Brahms is indeed a noble work. Had he always written thus, one might be tempted to join in the cult or homage paid him by the lovers of the obscure and the worshipers of the unintelligible.

THE YOUNG PEOPLES' POPULAR.—The third and last of the Young Peoples' Popular Concerts given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place Wednesday afternoon at Music Hall. Mr. Theodore Reichmann, baritone, and Mr. Franz Kneisel, violinist, were the soloists. The program was as follows:

Overture, "Mignon".....A. Thomas
Aria, from "Hans Heiling".....Marschner
Mr. Reichmann.
Symphonic Poem, "Danse Macabre".....Saint Saëns
Air Hongrois.....Ernst
Mr. Kneisel.
Songs with Piano
a. Fruhlingstraum.....Spicker
b. "Wie bist du meine Koenigin".....Brahms
c. Wanderlied.....Schumann
Mr. Reichmann.
a. "Minuet of the Will-O'-The Wisps" } .....Berlioz
b. Dance of Sylphs }
March from "Tannhæuser".....Wagner

This program was thoroughly enjoyed by the audience which filled Music Hall. While it was "popular," it was not meretricious. Two of the orchestral numbers played are worthy of a hearing at the Symphony concerts; but the present conductor seems to entertain a deep-rooted prejudice against the works of such men as St. Saens, Berlioz and others who were unfortunate enough to have been born upon French soil. This is not a sweeping statement; for the French school has been shamefully neglected this season, though not by the soloists. Perhaps Mr. Nikisch thought he would experiment with French compositions, try his hand, as it were; for Wednesday he saw fit to play three familiar numbers of the French school. The performance of the "Danse Macabre" and the "Dance of Sylphs" shows that however great may be the capabilities of the conductor in other directions, he certainly is not at his ease when French scores lie upon the desk. The French gain overwhelming effects both by extreme attention to detail and by the suddenness of surprising contrasts. To them, defined gradations of tone mean something, and they have other expression-marks than piano and fortissimo. When they mark a passage pianissimo, their conductors respect and regard the wish of the composer; but to Mr. Nikisch pianissimo is merely a curious mark with which some whimsical composer has seen fit to ornament his score.

Mr. Kneisel played the extremely difficult "Air Hongrois" of Ernst, with great accuracy and brilliancy, and the cantabile passages were given with breadth of tone and beauty of phrasing. He was recalled again and again. It is refreshing to occasionally hear a good example of what, in derogation, is often called "fiddle-music;" particularly when it is good in itself and when it is played by such an artist as Mr. Kneisel.

Mr. Reichmann, the leading baritone of the Metropolitan German Opera, made a most favorable impression upon the audience. In response to enthusiastic applause he sang the familiar "Du Meine Seele." As Mr. Reichmann is to

THE KNEISEL QUARTET CONCERT.—The fifth concert of the Kneisel Quartet was, perhaps, by the clock, too long, but the program was so well chosen and so excellently played and sung that it seemed shorter than many concerts of an hour's length. The Brahms quartet with which the concert opened is a peculiarly favorable example of Brahms' better nature. In it he does not morbidly seek to be profound, and he is contented with simple means which give rise to feelings of pleasure rather than awe which approaches despair. Miss Franklin sang four Scotch songs by Beethoven with great taste and skill. The novelty of the evening was a selection from a quartet by Arthur Weld in C major, op. 1. It is a thoughtfully written composition showing no mean skill in this difficult branch of musical art. It perhaps suffers a little from uneasiness shown by excessive modulation. The concert closed with the great trio in B-flat major of Beethoven, in which Mr. Perabo, who was at his best (and that is saying much), was assisted by Messrs. Kneisel and Hekking. The ensemble playing was, as ever, beyond reproach. X. Z.

[100]

[101]

THE BOSTON TIMES

TWENTY-SIXTH YEAR.

BOSTON, SUNDAY, APRIL 6, 1890.

THE SYMPHONIES.

TWENTY-SECOND CONCERT.

There was no soloist at the symphony concert last evening and the programme consisted of: Churnbim, Overture, Water Carrier; Cowen, Symphony in C minor, "Scandinaviar"; Reinecke, Entr' act "Manfred;" Wagner, Overture, "The Flying Dutchman."

Both overtures were magnificently played. The Reinicke "Manfred" Entr' act is not worth playing. It is a rapid, meaningless piece of music, that is as characteristic of its composer as it is effeminate. Reinecke, however, is a master of orchestration. More's the pity. If he had never known the difierence between a kettle-drum and a first fiddle the musical world would indeed have been fortunate. He may favorably be compared to some of the graduates of the Vienna conservatory of music, to whom the ex-conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra was so partial.

THIRD YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULAR.

Mr. Nikisch could have desired no better testimony as to the merit of his programme for the third Young People's Popular in Music hall Wednesday afternoon than was noticeable in the complete silence and earnest attention that prevailed in the house, and which doubtless were not without their effect upon both orchestra and soloists. The concert opened with the overture to "Mignon," which has seldom been played here although it abounds in delightful contrasts of melody, harmony and sentiment and presents the development of a lyrically well-defined, yet varied content rather than any more mechanical and ornamental auxiliaries. Following the overture the programme continued with:

Aria, from "Hans Heiling".....Marschner
Mr. Reichmann.
Symphonic poem, "Danse Macabre".....Saint-Saëns
Air Hongrois (for violin).....Ernst
Mr. Kneisel.
Songs with piano.
Fruhlingstraum.....Spicker
"Wie bist du meine Koenigin".....Brahms
Wanderlied.....Schumann
Mr. Reichmann.
(a) "Minuet of the Will-o'-the Wisps."
(b) Dance of Sylphs, from "The Damnation of Faust".....Berlioz
March from "Tannhäuser".....Wagner

The weird and grotesque effects of the "Danse Macabre" as usual interested the audience immensely, and a similar recognition is due the manner of its performance, there being the same sonorousness on the part of the strings and harmonic fullness of the ensemble, the good healthy pitch also and just intonation that are the well known characteristics of the Boston Symphony orchestra's reputation. In the "Tannhäuser" overture, however, the artistic sympathy prevailing between Mr. Nikisch and his performing musicians was more than ever noticeable and it resulted in some of the most admirable orchestral playing that has yet been heard here—luxuriant and refined in tonal effect and as prompt and clear in attack as one could wish.

Mr. Reichmann's singing of the aria from "Hans Heiling" was conceptively a most finished and artistic performance, and was mainly characterized by his self-forgetting devotion to his music; so that, notwithstanding his intonation appeared at a pardonable disadvantage, he was in all other respects superbly successful, especially in his conformance to the highest demands of his art. Mr. Kneisel's violin playing was endowed with all his wonted mastery and refinement, so that each artist received a liberal share of the plaudits that frequently enlivened the all-absorbing interest with which the concert was received.

FIFTH KNEISEL CONCERT.

In Union hall on Monday evening the Kneisel quartette gave their fifth concert of the season. That the programme was eminently worthy of being reproduced will be inferred from what follows:

Brahms. Quartette for String in B flat, op. 67.
Beethoven. Four Scotch songs with accompaniment of pianoforte, violin and violoncello.
a) "Again my Lyre."
b) "The Sweetest Lad."
c) "Faithful Johnie."
d) "O, thou art the Lad of my Heart, Willy."
Arthur Weld. Adagio Molto Sostenuto, from quartette for strings in F major.
Beethoven. Trio for pianoforte, violin and violoncello in B flat major, op. 97.

Miss Gertrude Franklin was the singer, and Mr. Perabo played the pianoforte part in the Beethoven trio.

The Brahms quartette in B flat is not a recent composition of its composer, and yet it was written just before his first symphony; the suggestion therefore being that of recent years he has really written no chamber music in this form. One can hardly recognize the composer's best known traits either in his conception or development of this quartette. As for the development, it is abundantly ingenious without being profoundly characteristic in this respect, while throughout the quartette is in a much more happy vein than are either quartettes in C major or A minor.

The four Scotch songs that Miss Franklin sang have none of the local coloring that their title implies, neither are they formed in any Scotch scale, but they are none the less delightful in sentiment and will easily rank among the rarest gems of classic song. Miss Franklin's singing was full of charm; her perfectly artistic phrasing and refined delivery being at their very best. The adagio has a refined spirituality of sentiment, gentleness and repose that [illegible] characterize it as a "gem of purest ray [illegible] its modulating changes are very beautiful, and the whole expression of the music is that of the innermost feeling of a genuine artist. The Beethoven trio was splendidly played by Messrs. Kneisel, Hekking and Perabo, and thusiended one of the most delightful concerts of the season.

BOSTON HERALD.

MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 7, 1890.

THE FESTIVAL WEEK.

Handel and Haydn Anniversary Commemorated.

First of the Performances a Grand Success—The "Elijah" Splendidly Sung to An Immense Audience—The Tenor Lloyd's Reception—A Triumph for William Ludwig—Other Concerts.

The festival to commemorate the 75th anniversary of the Handel and Haydn Society has been looked forward to for many years by all interested in the prosperity of this old choral society, and the opening performance of last evening marked the realization of many hopes of those who have been identified with this organization during the last quarter of a century. The history of the Handel and Haydn Society fitly represents the history of music in America, and the rapid strides made in the love of and demand for all that is highest and best in this art in this country is most conclusively shown in the position the Handel and Haydn Society of Boston has gained among the great choral organizations of the world. The active movers in the organization of the Handel and Haydn Society were undoubtedly far in advance of the general public of the old town of Boston in the year 1815, and those upon whom the duty has devolved of sustaining the society through all the exigencies of the three-quarters of a century now ended have shown the same wise foresight as that which characterized its original members. A spirit of conservatism has, with but rare exceptions, characterized the control of the affairs of the Handel and Haydn Society, and if its advance has been sometimes slow, as measured by the development of other musical enterprises, it has always progressed, and in a well considered direction. It possesses today a safely invested fund of about $30,000, with a library of standard oratorios, valued roughly at $10,000 more, and is possibly the best equipped organization now in existence, here or abroad, for the class of musical endeavor for which it was formed.

THE "ELIJAH."

Mendelssohn's Oratorio Given a Grand Performance.

The choice of Mendelssohn's "Elijah" for the first of the four performances constituting the festival was an eminently fitting one, as the oratorio has always been a popular one with Boston audiences, and it also affords a fine opportunity for both chorus and soloists to display their abilities. Well nigh a half-hundred performances of the oratorio have been given by the society since its organization, the first of these dating as far back as 1848. It has not been heard here for four years, and the interest felt in its revival was shown by the attendance of an audience limited only by the legal restrictions as to the use of Music Hall. The general air of expectancy which seemed to pervade the hall upon entering told plainly of the pleasant anticipations of the society's patrons, and it is seldom that such expectations are so fully realized as they were on this occasion. The great chorus rallied under Mr. Carl Zerrahn for the festival season filled every available seat on the newly arranged stage, the members of the Boston Symphony orchestra occupied all the vacant space back of the soloists' line, and up in the out of the way organ loft Mr. B. J. Lang was in his accustomed place, ready to do his duty with whatever success he could under the circumstances and over the obstacles separating the organ from the hall. The soloists consisted of Mme. Lilli Lehmann-Kalisch, Miss Clara Poole, Mr. Edward Lloyd and Mr. William Ludwig as the leading quartet, assisted by Mrs. Jenny Patrick Walker, Mrs. Walter C. Wyman, Mr. Herbert O. Johnson and Dr. George E. Clark. In the audience there was a representation of musical New England that has seldom been equalled of late years, about every prominent choral society having its delegate present, and all the social and artistic circles of the city having prominence in the attendance. It was an audience well calculated to inspire the artists and chorus and the quick response given to all the good work of the evening proved the eminently critical character of those present. First mention in any comment upon the performance is due the chorus, for Mr. Zerrahn has never led a better crowd of Boston singers than that representing the Handel and Haydn in this concert. The high standard established in the reorganization of the chorus a year or more ago has evidently been strictly adhered to in recruiting the festival chorus, and "dead wood" is now an unknown quantity in the present organization. The weak points familiar in former years have been well strengthened, and the parts are now admirably balanced, both the male and female voices having a full, rich round volume of tone well in control and equal to all the demands of the most difficult chorus work. The singing in the great "Thanks Be to God," the "Baal" choruses and the "Be Not Afraid" was especially noticeable, and in all the chorus work there was a promptness, steadiness and clear enunciation that gave evidence of thoroughly conscientious preparation by the singers. The audience was fully alive to the merits of the work done by the singers of the society, and applauded the leading numbers with hearty enthusiasm. Mme. Lilli Lehmann, in taking the familiar leading soprano role, put herself to a severe test, for it has in former years been sung here by the queens of the oratorio stage, and if her success on this occasion was not of the most complete kind, she certainly gave a large degree of satisfaction to the audience. Her style is hardly suited to realize all the beauties of the leading numbers of this role, yet she sung at all times with fine intelligence and good taste. The recitative of the widow, "What Have I to Do with Thee?" failed of its usual success, because of the lack of sufficient expression and feeling in its delivery, but the more dramatic "Hear Ye Israel" displayed the singer's abilities to better advantage, and won her a fine round of applause. The appearance of Mr. Edward Lloyd, the tenor of the evening, was of great general interest, as this representative English oratorio singer made his first appearance here on this occasion. Although his voice has lost something of the freshness and vitality of youth, Mr. Lloyd is still a singer who will command the sympathies of all lovers of oratorio music by reason of the pre-eminent intelligence, good taste and feeling which characterize all his work in this class of compositions. His delivery of the "If with All Your Hearts" and "Oh, Man of God" were fine examples of oratorio singing, and all his less important numbers were delivered with admirable success. His [illegible] was [illegible] and his numbers were received with great appreciation. Mr. William Ludwig's "Elijah" is a performance for the lover of oratorio music to revel in, for his interpretation of this role is a realization of its fullest possibilities, and is calculated to give the highest satisfaction to the most critical. His singing of the "Lord God of Abraham" and "Is Not His Word" were grand dramatic efforts, and his delivery of the recitatives of the title role were declamatory utterances which commanded the most attentive hearing. He won a great ovation after each of his leading numbers, which he well deserved. Miss Clara Poole again proved her eminent fitness for the oratorio stage, and gave especial pleasure in her interpretation of the "Woe Unto Them," and the "O, Rest in the Lord." The assisting quartet proved admirably well chosen, and the concerted music has seldom been better sung. The double quartet, "For He Shall Give," was an exquisite gem of vocal work, and the quartet, "Cast Thy Burden," sung by Mrs. Walker, Miss Poole, and Messrs. Johnson and Clark, made a notable success of the evening. The trio, "Lift Thine Eyes," sung by Mme. Lehmann, Mrs. Walker and Miss Poole, called out a demonstration which well nigh necessitated a repetition of the number. The work of the orchestra was exceedingly satisfactory throughout the evening, and the performance, as a whole, reflected the highest credit upon the faithful and ever reliable director, Carl Zerrahn, who had a rousing welcome upon his entrance, and received a laurel wreath as a token of appreciation of his services. The stage, as arranged for the festival, has never before looked so well, a screen-like arrangement back of the Beethoven statue showing off this elegant adornment of the hall with striking success. The second concert of the festival will be given tomorrow evening, with Mr. J. C. D. Parker's cantata of "St. John" and parts 1 and 2 of Bach's "Christmas Oratorio" as the works. Mme. Nordica, the soprano soloist, will also sing the aria, "On Mighty Pens," and Mr. Lloyd, the tenor, will sing, "In Native Worth." On Thursday evening "The Redemption" is announced, and the festival closes next Sunday evening with a performance of Handel's "Israel in Egypt."

Gazette

SUNDAY MORNING EDITION

MUSICAL.

The concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on the evening of March 29, opened with Brahms's noble "Tragic" overture, one of the few orchestral works by this master that is steadily interesting in the hearing, and which, on this occasion, was splendidly read and played. The symphony was Dvorak's No. 1, in D, which had been heard twice before at these concerts. This fine work steadily grows upon acquaintance, despite its prolixity, especially in the opening movement. Its beautiful melodies, rich and impressive orchestration, originality and strength, together with a well sustained dignity which is not always a characteristic of Dvorak's larger works, impart to it an exceptional interest, and entitle it to a high rank among contemporary works in its kind. It was magnificently played, Mr. Nikisch entering wholly into its spirit, and endowing it with a beauty of tone coloring it had never before received here. The work and its rendering excited unusual enthusiasm. The soloist was Mr. Otto Roth, who played Vieuxtemps's Concerto for violin No. 5, in A-minor. The performance was a remarkably successful one for the young artist, whose intonation was exquisitely pure and true, even under the most trying exactions made upon it. The great technical difficulties of the work were fully met with delightful clearness, precision and brilliancy in the results. Mr. Roth's style is chaste and broad, and in the cantabile movements of the concerto was characterized by fine warmth and grace. The effort throughout was of a high order of excellence, and stamped Mr. Roth as an artist of the most brilliant promise. The loud and long-continued applause and the three hearty recalls he obtained were wholly and worthily won.

On Wednesday afternoon a "Young People's Popular" concert was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall. Mr. Nikisch provided an admirable programme, and the attendance was large. Thomas's rather flimsy overture to "Mignon" was so brilliantly and perfectly played that it really, for the time being, seemed to be less frivolous than it is radically. An exceptionally effective rendering of Saint-Saens's "Danse Macabre" was among the successes of the concert, and the "Will o' the Wisp" minuet and the "Dance of Sylphs," from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust," were given in a style of rare grace and finish. Mr. Franz Kneisel played Ernst's "Air Hongrois" in a masterly way, making nothing of its difficulties, which were overcome with easy skill, and giving a fine illustration of his gifts in the direction of virtuosity. He was rewarded with prolonged and stormy applause. Mr. Reichmann sang a fine aria from Marschner's "Hans Heiling," and a group of songs by Spicker, Brahms and Schumann. He has a noble voice, and sings like a perfect master of the art. In point of style, expression, taste and finish it would be difficult to conceive of anything more artistic than are these qualities in Mr. Reichmann. His success was immediate and complete, his efforts meeting with the most demonstrative approval, and after the group of songs he was recalled so persistently that he responded with a song by Schumann. It will be a genuine pleasure to hear this thorough artist again.

The Kneisel Quartet, assisted by Mr. Ernst Perabo and Miss Gertrude Franklin, gave its fifth concert of the season in Union Hall, on Monday evening, before a fine audience. The opening selection was a string quartet by Brahms, in B-flat, op. 67, a really beautiful work, clear, flexible in style, flowing in its melodies, and wholly free from that dryness and perplexing pedantry that characterize so much of Brahms's music. It is easily understood upon a first hearing, and is delightful from beginning to end. It was exquisitely played and heartily and appreciatively applauded. An adagio from a string quartet in F, by Mr. Arthur Weld, was an interesting feature of the concert. Its themes are chaste and gracefully melodious, and their treatment is full of quiet charm. There are some delightful bits of polyphony in the movement, in which the skill and knowledge of the composer are shown with fine effect. The work made a very favorable impression, and was warmly applauded. The concert ended with a wonderfully fine performance of Beethoven's great Trio in B-flat. As an example of ensemble playing at its very best, and of Beethoven interpreting at its very truest, it was memorable. Mr. Perabo's share in the work cannot be lauded too heartily. It was large and noble in point of style, scrupulously faithful to the character of the trio even down to the smallest details, and musicianly in the loftiest sense of the word. The piano never overpowered the strings, and an exquisite balance was maintained between the three instruments, with the result that not a note was indistinct. Nothing more beautiful or more satisfying in the way of Beethoven reading and playing can be conceived than was this really remarkable interpretation. Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Hekking also excelled themselves, playing throughout with exceptional skill and sentiment. The rapturous applause that rewarded the effort was richly deserved;—it could not be applauded too much. Miss Franklin sang four Scotch songs, with accompaniments by Beethoven for piano, violin and 'cello. The artist was in fine voice, and sang with a purity of tone and style, a depth of sentiment and a musicianly sympathy with the spirit of the music that she has not surpassed in any of her many artistic successes on the concert stage here. The audience applauded her warmly and recalled her. Mr. Perabo and his brother artists were also recalled after the trio with much enthusiasm. By a mistake the piano used at this concert was announced as a Steinway. It was, however, a Chickering. The next concert will take place April 14.

Boston Sunday Globe.

TWENTY-FOUR PAGES.

SUNDAY, APRIL 6, 1890.

Last but Two of the Boston Symphony Concerts.

For some reason (not unconnected, perhaps, with lack of opportunity to give the novelty the thorough rehearsals), the new symphony by Frederic Cliffe was not presented under Mr. Nikisch's direction yesterday. However, the programme was remarkably enjoyable, despite this omission. Cherubini's overture to "The Water Carrier" did not make a decided impression, but the orchestra acquitted itself superbly in Cowen's "Scandinavian" symphony—surely one of the strongest and finest works of this day and generation. Nothing could surpass the reading of the lovely adagio movement in delicacy of effect and poetic feeling. Reinecke's entracte from "Manfred" and the overture to "The Flying Dutchman" were both played very well indeed. This week there is no concert. The last of the present series save one will take place on the 19th. Goldmark's "Spring" overture has its first hearing in Boston on this occasion. Brahms' symphony, No 1, in C minor and Volkmann's serenade in D minor are included among the appointments, and Mme. Steinbach-Jahns is to sing an air from Mozart's "Flight from the Seraglio," and a group of songs to pianoforte accompaniment.

THE EASTER FESTIVAL.

"Elijah" to Open the Handel and Haydn Week, Tonight, in Music Hall.

Everything indicates brilliant success for the anniversary festival of the Handel and Haydn. The sale of season tickets was far in excess of any previous sale in the history of the society, and the demand for tickets for single performances showed due appreciation of the worth of these concerts. Every seat for "Elijah" was sold before 2 o'clock on the opening day and big houses were assured for the succeeding performances. The performance of "Elijah" tonight will be a memorable one. The solos will be given by Mmes. Lili Lehmann-Kalisch, Walter C. Wyman and Jennie Patrick Walker, Miss Clara Poole, and Messrs. George E. Clark, Herbert O. Johnson, Edward Lloyd (his first appearance in Boston) and William Ludwig. Bach's "Christmas" oratorio and a new cantata, "St. John," written for the festival by J. C. D. Parker, will be given a hearing on Tuesday. Haydn is to be represented in two songs from "The Creation," namely, "On Mighty Pens," which Mme. Nordica will sing, and "In Native Worth," assigned to Mr. Lloyd. Miss Winant and Mr. Whitney are also among the soloists. Gounod's "Redemption" follows on Thursday, and the festival will end a week from tonight with "Israel in Egypt." Seats for these last three performances are still obtainable at Music Hall.

Boston Post

MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 7, 1890

TWENTY-SECOND SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Nikisch presented the following programme to a large and enthusiastic audience Saturday evening:

Overture—"Water Carrier,".....Cherubini
Symphony No. 3, in C minor—"Scandinavian".....Cowen
Allegro moderato, ma con moto.—Adagio con moto—"A summer evening on the Fjord." Scherzo—Finale.
Entr'acte from "Manfred".....Reinecke
Overture—"The Flying Dutchman"..Wagner

It was a matter of deep and universal regret that the beautiful and long-expected symphony by Mr. Frederic Cliffe, which was announced for this concert, was not played, but it is understood that Mr. Nikisch has been obliged to postpone its performance until next year. The Cowen Scandinavian symphony is familiar here; although better than his later effort, the so-called "Welsh" symphony, it is a light work, chiefly pleasing through its simplicity and unpretentiousness. It was delightfully played, as was also the whole programme, but the chief interest of the concert was centred in the gorgeous reading of the "Flying Dutchman" prelude. The wild storminess of this wonderful conception, with its realistic imitation of dashing breakers and furious winds howling through torn sails and rigging, was interpreted with marked effect, and the delicious, soft and tender passages where the theme of Senta's ballade is introduced were played with great purity and tenderness. The concert was of agreeable length, as it but slightly exceeded the hour-and-a-half limit which is rapidly becoming conventional here, Dieu merci. At the next concert a delightful Leipsic singer, Mme. Steinbach-Jahns, is announced as soloist. She will probably accompany the orchestra on the long Western tournée.

ARTHUR WELD.

Clipping from Herald Boston Mass 4/6

Date

—Dr. Mitchell will sing "Mee[illegible] Coon Toni[illegible]" at Music Hall Wednesday.

—The announcement of the concert by the Symphony Orchestra will be found in our advertising column. The manager will vouch for the appearance af the great conductor, Mr. Nikisch at this concert. Miss Adele Aus Der Ohe will be the soloist. At the concert given in Boston some time ago at which Aus Der Ohe was the soloist several hundred people were turned from the doors. For this concert no admission tickets will be sold except to the gallery, and these with the reserved seats will be on sale at Barkers Thursday morning April 3rd. at 8 o'clock. Two rows in front and one row on the sides of the gallery will be reserved at $1.00 The admission tickets will entitle the holder to any other seat in the gallery. The doors will be open at 7 o'clock and the first ones in will get the best seats.

[101]

THE BOSTON TIMES

TWENTY-SIXTH YEAR.

BOSTON, SUNDAY, APRIL 6, 1890.

THE SYMPHONIES.

TWENTY-SECOND CONCERT.

There was no soloist at the symphony concert last evening and the programme consisted of: Churnbim, Overture, Water Carrier; Cowen, Symphony in C minor, "Scandinaviar"; Reinecke, Entr' act "Manfred;" Wagner, Overture, "The Flying Dutchman."

Both overtures were magnificently played. The Reinicke "Manfred" Entr' act is not worth playing. It is a rapid, meaningless piece of music, that is as characteristic of its composer as it is effeminate. Reinecke, however, is a master of orchestration. More's the pity. If he had never known the difierence between a kettle-drum and a first fiddle the musical world would indeed have been fortunate. He may favorably be compared to some of the graduates of the Vienna conservatory of music, to whom the ex-conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra was so partial.

THIRD YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULAR.

Mr. Nikisch could have desired no better testimony as to the merit of his programme for the third Young People's Popular in Music hall Wednesday afternoon than was noticeable in the complete silence and earnest attention that prevailed in the house, and which doubtless were not without their effect upon both orchestra and soloists. The concert opened with the overture to "Mignon," which has seldom been played here although it abounds in delightful contrasts of melody, harmony and sentiment and presents the development of a lyrically well-defined, yet varied content rather than any more mechanical and ornamental auxiliaries. Following the overture the programme continued with:

Aria, from "Hans Heiling".....Marschner
Mr. Reichmann.
Symphonic poem, "Danse Macabre".....
.....Saint-Saëns
Air Hongrois (for violin).....Ernst
Mr. Kneisel.
Songs with piano.
Fruhlingstraum.....Spicker
"Wie bist du meine Koenigin".....Brahms
Wanderlied.....Schumann
Mr. Reichmann.
(a) "Minuet of the Will-o'-the Wisps."
(b) Dance of Sylphs, from "The Damnation of Faust".....Berlioz
March from "Tannhäuser".....Wagner

The weird and grotesque effects of the "Danse Macabre" as usual interested the audience immensely, and a similar recognition is due the manner of its performance, there being the same sonorousness on the part of the strings and harmonic fullness of the ensemble, the good healthy pitch also and just intonation that are the well known characteristics of the Boston Symphony orchestra's reputation. In the "Tannhäuser" overture, however, the artistic sympathy prevailing between Mr. Nikisch and his performing musicians was more than ever noticeable and it resulted in some of the most admirable orchestral playing that has yet been heard here—luxuriant and refined in tonal effect and as prompt and clear in attack as one could wish.

Mr. Reichmann's singing of the aria from "Hans Heiling" was conceptively a most finished and artistic performance, and was mainly characterized by his self-forgetting devotion to his music; so that, notwithstanding his intonation appeared at a pardonable disadvantage, he was in all other respects superbly successful, especially in his conformance to the highest demands of his art. Mr. Kneisel's violin playing was endowed with all his wonted mastery and refinement, so that each artist received a liberal share of the plaudits that frequently enlivened the all-absorbing interest with which the concert was received.

FIFTH KNEISEL CONCERT.

In Union hall on Monday evening the Kneisel quartette gave their fifth concert of the season. That the programme was eminently worthy of being reproduced will be inferred from what follows:

Brahms. Quartette for String in B flat, op. 67.
Beethoven. Four Scotch songs with accompaniment of pianoforte, violin and violoncello.
a) "Again my Lyre."
b) "The Sweetest Lad."
c) "Faithful Johnie."
d) "O, thou art the Lad of my Heart, Willy."
Arthur Weld. Adagio Molto Sostenuto, from quartette for strings in F major.
Beethoven. Trio for pianoforte, violin and violoncello in B flat major, op. 97.

Miss Gertrude Franklin was the singer, and Mr. Perabo played the pianoforte part in the Beethoven trio.

The Brahms quartette in B flat is not a recent composition of its composer, and yet it was written just before his first symphony; the suggestion therefore being that of recent years he has really written no chamber music in this form. One can hardly recognize the composer's best known traits either in his conception or development of this quartette. As for the development, it is abundantly ingenious without being profoundly characteristic in this respect, while throughout the quartette is in a much more happy vein than are either quartettes in C major or A minor.

The four Scotch songs that Miss Franklin sang have none of the local coloring that their title implies, neither are they formed in any Scotch scale, but they are none the less delightful in sentiment and will easily rank among the rarest gems of classic song. Miss Franklin's singing was full of charm; her perfectly artistic phrasing and refined delivery being at their very best. The adagio has a refined spirituality of sentiment, gentleness and repose that simply characterize it as a "gem of purest ray serene." Its modulating changes are very beautiful, and the whole expression of the music is that of the innermost feeling of a genuine artist. The Beethoven trio was splendidly played by Messrs. Kneisel, Hekking and Perabo, and thusended one of the most delightful concerts of the season.

BOSTON HERALD.

MONDAY, APRIL 7, 1890.

THE FESTIVAL WEEK.

Handel and Haydn Anniversary Commemorated.

First of the Performances a Grand Success—The "Elijah" Splendidly Sung to An Immense Audience—The Tenor Lloyd's Reception—A Triumph for William Ludwig—Other Concerts.

The festival to commemorate the 75th anniversary of the Handel and Haydn Society has been looked forward to for many years by all interested in the prosperity of this old choral society, and the opening performance of last evening marked the realization of many hopes of those who have been identified with this organization during the last quarter of a century. The history of the Handel and Haydn Society fitly represents the history of music in America, and the rapid strides made in the love of and demand for all that is highest and best in this art in this country is most conclusively shown in the position the Handel and Haydn Society of Boston has gained among the great choral organizations of the world. The active movers in the organization of the Handel and Haydn Society were undoubtedly far in advance of the general public of the old town of Boston in the year 1815, and those upon whom the duty has devolved of sustaining the society through all the exigencies of the three-quarters of a century now ended have shown the same wise foresight as that which characterized its original members. A spirit of conservatism has, with but rare exceptions, characterized the control of the affairs of the Handel and Haydn Society, and if its advance has been sometimes slow, as measured by the development of other musical enterprises, it has always progressed, and in a well considered direction. It possesses today a safely invested fund of about $30,000, with a library of standard oratorios, valued roughly at $10,000 more, and is possibly the best equipped organization now in existence, here or abroad, for the class of musical endeavor for which it was formed.

THE "ELIJAH."

Mendelssohn's Oratorio Given a Grand Performance.

The choice of Mendelsshon's "Eliiah" for the first of the four performances constituting the festival was an eminently fitting one, as the oratorio has always been a popular one with Boston audiences, and it also affords a fine opportunity for both chorus and soloists to display their abilities. Well nigh a half-hundred performances of the oratorio have been given by the society since its organization, the first of these dating as far back as 1848. It has not been heard here for four years, and the interest felt in its revival was shown by the attendance of an audience limited only by the legal restrictions as to the use of Music Hall. The general air of expectancy which seemed to pervade the hall upon entering told plainly of the pleasant anticipations of the society's patrons, and it is seldom that such expectations are so fully realized as they were on this occasion. The great chorus rallied under Mr. Carl Zerrahn for the festival season filled every available seat on the newly arranged stage, the members of the Boston Symphony orchestra occupied all the vacant space back of the soloists' line, and up in the out of the way organ loft Mr. B. J. Lang was in his accustomed place, ready to do his duty with whatever success he could under the circumstances and over the obstacles separating the organ from the hall. The soloists consisted of Mme. Lilli Lehmann-Kalisch, Miss Clara Poole, Mr. Edward Lloyd and Mr. William Ludwig as the leading quartet, assisted by Mrs. Jenny Patrick Walker, Mrs. Walter C. Wyman, Mr. Herbert O. Johnson and Dr. George R. Clark. In the audience there was a representation of musical New England that has seldom been equalled of late years, about every prominent choral society having its delegate present, and all the social and artistic circles of the city having prominence in the attendance. It was an audience well calculated to inspire the artists and chorus and the quick response given to all the good work of the evening proved the eminently critical character of those present. First mention in any comment upon the performance is due the chorus, for Mr. Zerrahn has never led a better crowd of Boston singers than that representing the Handel and Haydn in this concert. The high standard established in the reorganization of the chorus a year or more ago has evidently been strictly adhered to in recruiting the festival chorus, and "dead wood" is now an unknown quantity in the present organization. The weak points familiar in former years have been well strengthened, and the parts are now admirably balanced, both the male and female voices having a full, rich round volume of tone well in control and equal to all the demands of the most difficult chorus work. The singing in the great "Thanks Be to God," the "Baal" choruses and the "Be Not Afraid" was especially noticeable, and in all the chorus work there was a promptness, steadiness and clear enunciation that gave evidence of thoroughly conscientious preparation by the singers. The audience was fully alive to the merits of the work done by the singers of the society, and applauded the leading numbers with hearty enthusiasm. Mme. Lilli Lehmann, in taking the familiar leading soprano role, put herself to a severe test, for it has in former years been sung here by the queens of the oratorio stage, and if her success on this occasion was not of the most complete kind, she certainly gave a large degree of satisfaction to the audience. Her style is hardly suited to realize all the beauties of the leading numbers of this role, yet she sung at all times with fine intelligence and good taste. The recitative of the widow, "What Have I to Do with Thee?" failed of its usual success, because of the lack of sufficient expression and feeling in its delivery, but the more dramatic "Hear Ye Israel" displayed the singer's abilities to better advantage, and won her a fine round of applause. The appearance of Mr. Edward Lloyd, the tenor of the evening, was of great general interest, as this representative English oratorio singer made his first appearance here on this occasion. Although his voice has lost something of the freshness and vitality of youth, Mr. Lloyd is still a singer who will command the sympathies of all lovers of oratorio music by reason of the pre-eminent intelligence, good taste and feeling which characterize all his work in this class of compositions. His delivery of the "If with All Your Hearts" and "Oh, Man of God" were fine examples of oratorio singing, and all his less important numbers were delivered with admirable success. His [illegible] con-
[illegible] and he shows the results of a long intelligent study of oratorio music. He had a most hearty reception, and all his numbers were received with marked appreciation. Mr. William Ludwig's "Elijah" is a performance for the lover of oratorio music to revel in, for his interpretation of this role is a realization of its fullest possibilities, and is calculated to give the highest satisfaction to the most critical. His singing of the "Lord God of Abraham" and "Is Not His Word" were grand dramatic efforts, and his delivery of the recitatives of the title role were declamatory utterances which commanded the most attentive hearing. He won a great ovation after each of his leading numbers, which he well deserved. Miss Clara Poole again proved her eminent fitness for the oratorio stage, and gave especial pleasure in her interpretation of the "Woe Unto Them," and the "O, Rest in the Lord." The assisting quartet proved admirably well chosen, and the concerted music has seldom been better sung. The double quartet, "For He Shall Give," was an exquisite gem of vocal work, and the quartet, "Cast Thy Burden," sung by Mrs. Walker, Miss Poole, and Messrs. Johnson and Clark, made a notable success of the evening. The trio, "Lift Thine Eyes," sung by Mme. Lehmann, Mrs. Walker and Miss Poole, called out a demonstration which well nigh necessitated a repetition of the number. The work of the orchestra was exceedingly satisfactory throughout the evening, and the performance, as a whole, reflected the highest credit upon the faithful and ever reliable director, Carl Zerrahn, who had a rousing welcome upon his entrance, and received a laurel wreath as a token of appreciation of his services. The stage, as arranged for the festival, has never before looked so well, a screen-like arrangement back of the Beethoven statue showing off this elegant adornment of the hall with striking success. The second concert of the festival will be given tomorrow evening, with Mr. J. C. D. Parker's cantata of "St. John" and parts 1 and 2 of Bach's "Christmas Oratorio" as the works. Mme. Nordica, the soprano soloist, will also sing the aria, "On Mighty Fens," and Mr. Lloyd, the tenor, will sing, "In Native Worth." On Thursday evening "The Redemption" is announced, and the festival closes next Sunday evening with a performance of Handel's "Israel in Egypt."

Gazette

SUNDAY MORNING EDITION

MUSICAL.

The concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on the evening of March 29, opened with Brahms's noble "Tragic" overture, one of the few orchestral works by this master that is steadily interesting in the hearing, and which, on this occasion, was splendidly read and played. The symphony was Dvorak's No. 1, in D, which had been heard twice before at these concerts. This fine work steadily grows upon acquaintance, despite its prolixity, especially in the opening movement. Its beautiful melodies, rich and impressive orchestration, originality and strength, together with a well sustained dignity which is not always a characteristic of Dvorak's larger works, impart to it an exceptional interest, and entitle it to a high rank among contemporary works in its kind. It was magnificently played, Mr. Nikisch entering wholly into its spirit, and endowing it with a beauty of tone coloring it had never before received here. The work and its rendering excited unusual enthusiasm. The soloist was Mr. Otto Roth, who played Vieuxtemps's Concerto for violin No. 5, in A minor. The performance was a remarkably successful one for the young artist, whose intonation was exquisitely pure and true, even under the most trying exactions made upon it. The great technical difficulties of he work were fully met with delightful clearness, precision and brilliancy in the results. Mr. Roth's style is chaste and broad, and in the cantabile movements of the concerto was characterized by fine warmth and grace. The effort throughout was of a high order of excellence, and stamped Mr. Roth as an artist of the most brilliant promise. The loud and long-continued applause and the three hearty recalls he obtained were wholly and worthily won.

On Wednesday afternoon a "Young People's Popular" concert was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall. Mr. Nikisch provided an admirable programme, and the attendance was large. Thomas's rather flimsy overture to "Mignon" was so brilliantly and perfectly played that it really, for the time being, seemed to be less frivolous than it is radically. An exceptionally effective rendering of Saint-Saens's "Danse Macabre" was among the successes of the concert, and the "Will o' the Wisp" minuet and the "Dance of Sylphs," from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust," were given in a style of rare grace and finish. Mr. Franz Kneisel played Ernst's "Air Hongrois" in a masterly way, making nothing of its difficulties, which were overcome with easy skill, and giving a fine illustration of his gifts in the direction of virtuosity. He was rewarded with prolonged and stormy applause. Mr. Reichmann sang a fine aria from Marschner's "Hans Heiling," and a group of songs by Spicker, Brahms and Schumann. He has a noble voice, and sings like a perfect master of the art. In point of style, expression, taste and finish it would be difficult to conceive of anything more artistic than are these qualities in Mr. Reichmann. His success was immediate and complete, his efforts meeting with the most demonstrative approval, and after the group of songs he was recalled so persistently that he responded with a song by Schumann. It will be a genuine pleasure to hear this thorough artist again.

The Kneisel Quartet, assisted by Mr. Ernst Perabo and Miss Gertrude Franklin, gave its fifth concert of the season in Union Hall, on Monday evening, before a fine audience. The opening selection was a string quartet by Brahms, in B flat, op. 67, a really beautiful work, clear, flexible in style, flowing in its melodies, and wholly free from that dryness and perplexing pedantry that characterize so much of Brahms's music. It is easily understood upon a first hearing, and is delightful from beginning to end. It was exquisitely played and heartily and appreciatively applauded. An adagio from a string quartet in F, by Mr. Arthur Weld, was an interesting feature of the concert. Its themes are chaste and gracefully melodious, and their treatment is full of quiet charm. There are some delightful bits of polyphony in the movement, in which the skill and knowledge of the composer are shown with fine effect. The work made a very favorable impression, and was warmly applauded. The concert ended with a wonderfully fine performance of Beethoven's great Trio in B-flat. As an example of ensemble playing at its very best, and of Beethoven interpreting at its very truest, it was memorable. Mr. Perabo's share in the work cannot be lauded too heartily. It was large and noble in point of style, scrupulously faithful to the character of the trio even down to the smallest details, and musicianly in the loftiest sense of the word. The piano never overpowered the strings, and an exquisite balance was maintained between the three instruments, with the result that not a note was indistinct. Nothing more beautiful or more satisfying in the way of Beethoven reading and playing can be conceived than was this really remarkable interpretation. Mr Kneisel and Mr. Hekking also excelled themselves, playing throughout with exceptional skill and sentiment. The rapturous applause that rewarded the effort was richly deserved;—it could not be applauded too much. Miss Franklin sang four Scotch songs, with accompaniments by Beethoven for piano, violin and 'cello. The artist was in fine voice, and sang with a purity of tone and style, a depth of sentiment and a musicianly sympathy with the spirit of the music that she has not surpassed in any of her many artistic successes on the concert stage here. The audience applauded her warmly and recalled her. Mr. Perabo and his brother artists were also recalled after the trio with much enthusiasm. By a mistake the piano used at this concert was announced as a Steinway. It was, however, a Chickering. The next concert will take place April 14.

Boston Sunday Globe.

TWENTY-FOUR PAGES.

SUNDAY, APRIL 6, 1890.

Last but Two of the Boston Symphony Concerts.

For some reason (not unconnected, perhaps, with lack of opportunity to give the novelty the thorough rehearsals), the new symphony by Frederic Cliffe was not presented under Mr. Nikisch's direction yesterday. However, the programme was remarkably enjoyable, despite this omission. Cherubini's overture to "The Water Carrier" did not make a decided impression, but the orchestra acquitted itself superbly in Cowen's "Scandinavian" symphony—surely one of the strongest and finest works of this day and generation. Nothing could surpass the reading of the lovely adagio movement in delicacy of effect and poetic feeling. Reinecke's entracte from "Manfred" and the overture to "The Flying Dutchman" were both played very well indeed. This week there is no concert. The last of the present series save one will take place on the 19th. Goldmark's "Spring" overture has its first hearing in Boston on this occasion. Brahms' symphony, No 1, in C minor and Volkmann's serenade in D minor are included among the appointments, and Mme. Steinbach-Jahns is to sing an air from Mozart's "Flight from the Seraglio," and a group of songs to pianoforte accompaniment.

THE EASTER FESTIVAL.

"Elijah" to Open the Handel and Haydn Week, Tonight, in Music Hall.

Everything indicates brilliant success for the anniversary festival of the Handel and Haydn. The sale of season tickets was far in excess of any previous sale in the history of the society, and the demand for tickets for single performances showed due appreciation of the worth of these concerts. Every seat for "Elijah" was sold before 2 o'clock on the opening day and big houses were assured for the succeeding performances. The performance of "Elijah" tonight will be a memorable one. The solos will be given by Mmes. Lili Lehmann-Kalisch, Walter C. Wyman and Jennie Patrick Walker, Miss Clara Poole, and Messrs. George R. Clark, Herbert O. Johnson, Edward Lloyd (his first appearance in Boston) and William Ludwig. Bach's "Christmas" oratorio and a new cantata, "St. John," written for the festival by J. C. D. Parker, will be given a hearing on Tuesday. Haydn is to be represented in two songs from "The Creation," namely, "On Mighty Pens," which Mme. Nordica will sing, and "In Native Worth," assigned to Mr. Lloyd. Miss Winant and Mr. Whitney are also among the soloists. Gounod's "Redemption" follows on Thursday, and the festival will end a week from tonight with "Israel in Egypt." Seats for these last three performances are still obtainable at Music Hall.

Boston Post

MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 7, 1890

TWENTY-SECOND SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Nikisch presented the following programme to a large and enthusiastic audience Saturday evening:

Overture—"Water Carrier,".....Cherubini
Symphony No. 3, in C minor—"Scandinavian".....Cowen
Allegro moderato, ma con moto.—Adagio con moto—"A summer evening on the Fjord." Scherzo—Finale.
Entr'acte from "Manfred".....Reinecke
Overture—"The Flying Dutchman"..Wagner

It was a matter of deep and universal regret that the beautiful and long-expected symphony by Mr. Frederic Cliffe, which was announced for this concert, was not played, but it is understood that Mr. Nikisch has been obliged to postpone its performance until next year. The Cowen Scandinavian symphony is familiar here; although better than his later effort, the so-called "Welsh" symphony, it is a light work, chiefly pleasing through its simplicity and unpretentiousness. It was delightfully played, as was also the whole programme, but the chief interest of the concert was centred in the gorgeous reading of the "Flying Dutchman" prelude. The wild storminess of this wonderful conception, with its realistic imitation of dashing breakers and furious winds howling through torn sails and rigging, was interpreted with marked effect, and the delicious, soft and tender passages where the theme of Senta's ballade is introduced were played with great purity and tenderness. The concert was of agreeable length, as it but slightly exceeded the hour-and-a-half limit which is rapidly becoming conventional here, Dieu merci. At the next concert a delightful Leipsic singer, Mme. Steinbach-Jahns, is announced as soloist. She will probably accompany the orchestra on the long Western tournée.

ARTHUR WELD.

Clipping from Herald
Taunton, Mass
4/6
Date

—Dr. Mitchell will sing "Meet Me by the Coon Tonight" at Music Hall Wednesday.

—The announcement of the concert by the Symphony Orchestra will be found in our advertising column. The manager will vouch for the appearance af the great conductor, Mr. Nikisch at this concert. Miss Adele Aus Der Ohe will be the soloist. At the concert given in Boston some time ago at which Aus Der Ohe was the soloist several hundred people were turned from the doors. For this concert no admission tickets will be sold except to the gallery, and these with the reserved seats will be on sale at Barkers Thursday morning April 3rd. at 8 o'clock. Two rows in front and one row on the sides of the gallery will be reserved at $1.00 The admission tickets will entitle the holder to any other seat in the gallery. The doors will be open at 7 o'clock and the first ones in will get the best seats.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.
MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 7, 1890.

The Symphony Concert of Saturday—The Last Bulow Recital.

Those who have hitherto supposed that Cherubini was a rather conservative composer must have been terribly mistaken, for the overture to the "Water Carrier" at Saturday's symphony was given with a bombastic force and a sensational power that proved the old Italian to have been a musical wolf in sheep's clothing, a Berlioz in disguise. Mr. Nikisch has, however, detected him and has shown him up in his true tone-colors. The andante, molto sostenuto, of the introduction was evidently intended by the composer for a grave movement, and Cherubini undoubtedly intended the brasses to smother the strings. These changes were made by the conductor, and I believe that the old composer would scarcely enjoy the manner in which he has been unmasked.

But the Cowen symphony which followed, the beautiful "Scandinavian," was more in accordance with preconceived ideas, and was read by Mr. Nikisch, and played by the orchestra, with the most praiseworthy effect. The work is the greatest symphony that England has ever given forth, and even here Germany is entitled to some of the credit, for Cowen's long studies in that country gave to him something of the Teutonic love of development which is characteristic of the larger compositions he has given forth thus far. Yet this work is a gradual diminuendo of power. It begins with a movement that is absolutely great both in the beauty of its themes and in their musicianly development, then comes a slow movement which is just a trifle theatrical, then a scherzo which has no very important ideas to communicate, but contents itself with presenting a catchy rhythm and some delicate tone coloring on muted strings such as Berloiz uses in his elfin music, and then comes a finale which hides paucity of thoughts under the mantle of exciting orchestration. The return of the second theme of the first movement in this finale but accentuates the fact that the first movement far outweighs it in actual merit. The scherzo represents a sleigh ride (so Mr. Wilson's useful programme informs us) but it would have been far more in line with the subject had there been a Halling or a Spring-Tanz in its stead for the folk-dances are the most characteristic representatives of the music and life of "far Nroway." On the other hand however. the scale forms used in the themes of the first movement, are quite in Scandinavian character and also resemble those used by Brahms in some of his Hungarian music and in the andante of his fourth symphony, for geographical extremes come together strangely sometimes in this matter of folk-music. The symphony gives great opportunities to the woodwind instruments to emerge from obscurity, and right well were these opportunities used; the flute, clarinet, and English horn were exquisitely displayed in the second movement, in which the French horns also did most artistic work, their shading being beyond anything they have ever done. Mr. Nikisch did not follow the plan of placing them in an anteroom, but allowed them to play from their seats on the platform, which made their pianissimo effects all the more difficult. The strings did some excellent work, con sordine, and the cellos played superbly in the last movement.

Reinecke's King Manfred is altogether a different party from Schumann's, or rather Byron's, gentleman of the same name, and the entr'acte given, was by no means on a Schumann level, yet full of melodic grace and very well played by the strings. It would not be well to find fault with the introduction of such a sweetmeat now and then, for it lightens up the programme immensely.

The "Flying Dutchman" overture may be renounced by Wagner and condemned as not representing his theories, but the world in general will not reecho the dictum to any alarming extent, and it is one of the most delightful signs of the catholicity of our art that the public accepts the renounced works with as much avidity as the chosen ones. Even Wagner cannot bind down so emotional an art as music to one mode of expression only, and his own earlier works are the best refutation of the thought that his later theories are to abolish all other styles. The work was played with enormous spirit, and the energy which I thought misplaced in the opening number, was eminently fitting here. The entrance of the great figure which represents the Flying Dutchman (Beethoven began his ninth symphony on just such an empty fifth) was magnificently broad, and the theme of the sailor's chorus, which bubbles up brightly through the dissonance and gloom was given in good contrast. It was a performance that made one's blood tingle, and proved that when Mr. Nikisch is grand he is very grand indeed. The symphony by Cliffe, announced last week, was not given; possibly it was too precipitous.

ORATORIO "ELIJAH."

THE HANDEL AND HAYDN FESTIVAL BEGUN.

An Immense Audience at Music Hall To Hear Mendelssohn's Masterwork—First Appearance of Mr. Lloyd—The Last Bulow Recital.

The beginning of the triennial festival, the 75th anniversary of our great oratorio society, at Music Hall last night with "Elijah" was worthy of the fame of the chorus, and was so well appreciated by the public that there was not a vacant seat and not even standing room in the hall. How different it all was from the recent musical occasions of the Italian school which we have had in Boston! There a vast concourse assembled with the one thought of [illegible] Patti; here an audience, limited only by the size of the hall, came to listen to a great masterwork thoroughly rendered. There it was "Home Sweet Home"; here it was "If with all all your hearts" and "Hear ye, Israel." There are those among the more austere critics who declaim against Mendelssohn as having made the oratorio too dramatic, yet they accept Haydn's "Creation" without a murmur. It is undoubtedly true that the earlier work of the composer—"St. Paul"—is built on a more stately plan, but it must not be forgotten that the unemotional style of the older school would have ill assorted with the dramatic scenes which Rev. Dr. Schubring selected for his friend Mendelssohn as conveying a succinct story of Elijah's work, as well as giving a view of his character. That character impressed Mendelssohn more strongly than any other in the Old Testament; he thought of the prophet as standing out masculine, dark, and strong, against the background of an effeminate age and vacillating people. The very Bible becomes colloquial in describing certain points of this hero, and the satirical remarks to the priests of Baal, "Call him louder for he is a god!" are as stinging as any modern lampoon. Such passages demand homophonic and dramatic treatment as a right and the composer did well not to hug oratorial dignity too closely in setting them. There are times for all things, and the thrilling description of the rise of the storm beginning with the monotonous yet graphic words of the youth, and culminating in the awe-inspiring "Thanks be to God!" are good art, while the coarse "March to Calvary" in "The Redemption" is wrong, for music may not picture ugliness or vulgarity save passingly and by contrast, and this Mendelssohn clearly understood and adhered to in "Elijah."

The enormous audience last night emphatically showed that they were not in sympathy with the superciliousness and narrowness of modern musical radicalism, which argues that because Wagner was right Mendelssohn must have been wrong. So long as musical form means anything, so long as beauty of expression means anything, Mendelssohn's name will hold its rank, and it would not be essaying the role of prophet too presumptuously to predict a revulsion from the harsh judgment of the composer by the modern fanatics, which will give to his compositions even increased prestige. The successful composers of oratorio can be counted on the fingers of one hand, and Mendelssohn is assured of a place in the short list. It was pleasant to all Catholic-minded auditors that the Handel and Haydn Society had chosen to begin this great festival with the work in question, and if judged by even the low standard of drawing power and expediency, the choice was still justified in the result. The overture is the most impressive beginning of any of the large sacred works, for while even the "Messiah" in its overture shows the influence of Lully on the form of the introduction, this casts loose from all precedent, and begins with the impressive announcement, vocally, of the curse of the deity. The subsequent instrumental passages are big with impending doom. It is interesting to notice how the composer uses the clarinette in the deep register (chalumeau) to express gloom and wierdness. Not Beethoven, nor Mozart, had ever a suspicion of this tone-color (which Mendelssohn employs in the same way in the first part of his Scotch symphony), only Weber had any true idea of the spectral effects of the chalumeau, and although he was the first to use it thus, the present dark phases are by no means plagiarisms. The orchestra did full justice to the number, although the above-mentioned instrument could have been louder, and then came the melodious imitations of the first chorus, "Help, Lord," in which the balance was admirable, an auspicious opening of the important week. The tenors of the chorus were remarkable in their force and clearness in this number, as in all their subsequent work. The sopranos, however, were at times thin and comparatively weak in their tone, and did not always counterbalance the other parts. The singing was, if anything, too forcible at first, and the muttered phrase, "Lord bow down thine ear to our prayer," which should merely serve as a background for the solo duet, "Zion spreadeth her laurels for aid," became too prominent for its dramatic effect; but at least this force was not misplaced in "Yet doth the Lord see it not," which went grandly.

The Bass choruses were entirely excellent, but of course the climax of grandeur was attained in "Thanks be to God," which is in fact the climax of the work, and after the power of the first part the entire second part of the work seems an anti-climax. There are great numbers in the second part, but the first part is sustainedly and increasingly effective, which cannot be said of the remainder of the oratorio. The orchestra deserve a large part of the praise in "Thanks be to God" (their work was uniformly excellent), for seldom has the rushing of the waters had a more effective portrayal. The dry tone of the sopranos militated against the success of "Be not afraid," but at the reprise of the chief theme all sang well. The beautiful chorus, "Behold, God the Lord passed by," was exquisite in every detail, but especially in "And in that still voice, onward came the Lord," which was charmingly shaded. It may be of interest to know that this passage probably inspired the entire work, for in 1839 (seven years before the production of "Elijah") Mendelssohn read the noble 11th verse of the 19th chapter of the First Book of Kings to Hiller, and exclaimed, "What a grand oratorio could be formed from this!" Conductor and organist must share in the praise throughout. Mr. Zerrahn was appropriately given a laurel wreath—no intimation that he should as yet rest upon his laurels, and Mr. Lang did all that the fates would allow with the rather primitive organ.

As to the solo work, a few facts may well be lost sight of in the general excellence. It was not so fine a gathering as when, in 1872, Santley, Cummings, Mme. Patey and Edith Wynne sang the solos, but it was probably the best since that time.

Mme. Lilli Lehmann-Kalisch carried off the chief honors. In the broad declamatory effects she was irreproachable, and the lofty style of "Hear Ye! Israel," with the gloriously emphatic "I! I! am He that comforteth" was as Parepa-Rosa used to sing in the olden days. The episode of the Widow's son, was finely given, and here too, Mme. Kalisch was all that could have been desired; but in the phrases of the youth (how much better a boy's treble would be in this) the mezza-uoce was less successful.

Miss Clara Poole in the alto solos sang rather coldly, although always clear and exact in intonation. The most expressive solo Mendelssohn ever composed—"Oh, Rest in the Lord"—was therefore unimpressive, and as coldly received as it was sung. It is not generally known that we owe this aria to Scottish influence. Mendelssohn had heard "Auld Robin Gray" sung in Scotland, (not the older, but the present tune—by Rev. Dr. Leeves is it?) and was much impressed by it. When he composed "Oh Rest in the Lord" he unconsciously plagiarized the tune; a friend pointed out the mistake and the composer altered the song, but the flavor of "Auld Robin Gray" is in the melody still.

Mr. Edward Lloyd, the great English tenor, has yet his spurs to win in Boston. His singing last night was a disappointment. His voice was at first a little hoarse, his tones very throaty, his portamento fearfully prominent, and his enunciation by no means as clear as we expect from English singers, who always pronounce more distinctly than their American brethren. Against these faults I can set a rather sweet quality of upper register and a surety as regards pitch. "If With All Your Hearts" was not successful, but "Then Shall the Righteous" was so much better that it is possible that a second appearance may reveal a great singer; as yet only a reasonably good one is discernible.

It is difficult to accurately describe or criticise Mr. Ludwig's work as "Elijah." That he is very dramatic was self-evident, and indeed needed no proof to those who have seen his "Flying Dutchman," but he gave such an assortment of qualities of tone that I am at a loss to know which one represents his real and natural voice. Sometimes a most disagreeable guttural quality would appear, as if he were adopting bovine principles and were chewing the cud of his tones, and then, immediately, his voice would emerge as if from behind a cloud, and the most earnest, expressive and solid tones would ensue. His intonation was never offensively false, yet often it was untrue, and more often still, a parlando style abolished tone altogether. The audience were delighted with his dramatic touches, and they were often very well pleased, especially in the scene at Mt. Carmel, and he received more applause than anybody else. Of course the vehemence of the rather tawdry, "Is not his word like a fire," was allowable, but it became too spasmodic toward the close. "I go on my way," was much better sung than "It is enough," yet it received less applause.

The assistance in the concerted numbers was very nearly up to the rank of the soloists. When such artists as Mrs. Jennie P. Walker and Mrs. Walter C. Wyman consent to take secondary parts the artistic result may be imagined. Messrs. Johnson and Clark also did fine work. As a consequence the duet, "Zion spreadeth her hands," the glorious double quartette, the single quartette, "Cast thy burden upon the Lord," were all better done than they have been in a generation, but the crowning perfection of it all was the angels trio, "Lift thine eyes," sung by Mmes. Kalisch and Walker and Miss Poole, in a manner that has never been excelled in Boston. The contrapuntal choruses and quartette at the end of the oratorio were well sung, and altogether the festival is launched in a manner that ought to give great satisfaction to every one who is interested in our hardworking, disinterested, art-advancing Handel and Haydn

Boston Journal.
MORNING EDITION.
MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 7, 1890.

The Symphony concert last Saturday night was considerable of a change from the programme originally announced, and included Cowen's Scandinavian Symphony, Cherubini's overture the "Water Carrier" and Wagner's overture to the "Flying Dutchman." There was no soloist, and there was nothing calling for anything but praise of the orchestra and the readings of Mr. Nikisch. At the next concert, which takes place Saturday, April 19, the famous soprano, Mme. Steinbach-Jahns, who has been sent for by Mr. Nikisch from Leipsic, will be the soloist, and her appearance will be an event in musical circles.

The Handel and Haydn Anniversary.

When Carl Zerrahn, the veteran oratorio conductor, the leader of the Handel and Haydn Society for so many years, ascended the platform of Music Hall last night to begin the performance of "Elijah" he beheld a sight that would inspire any leader and any chorus. Far along the sides of the hall and in the rear were rows of men, and women as well who were obliged to stand through the entire performance, and they patiently submitted, scarcely a person leaving the hall until compelled by the necessity of reaching their homes.

It was a very successful opening, for the society, of this seventy-fifth anniversary festival, for which preparations had been made on so extensive a scale. The patronage amply justified the liberality of the management, for it would have been impossible to have crowded any more people into the hall. The rear of the stage was handsomely decorated, the conductor's stand was adorned with wreaths and flowers, and Mr. Zerrahn was given a glorious reception, both from audience and chorus, as he took up the baton. The audience was a distinctively musical one. All the old patrons of the society were there, reinforced by those newer habitues who were attracted by the work itself and the grand ensemble of solo artists.

As a whole, it was a great performance, and probably no greater solo quartette ever stood before a Music Hall audience than Lehmann, Clara Poole, Edward Lloyd and William Ludwig. The audience had a right to expect great things, and in this there was little disappointment. The choir of the Handel and Haydn showed the effort which had been made to insure a well-balanced and perfect ensemble, and the familiar choruses were all given with a power, a submission to the baton of the conductor, a surety of tone and attack that equaled any work ever given by this famous society. The sopranos and tenors were particularly true and sure of their high notes. They never wavered for a moment, and the large body was managed by Mr. Zerrahn with an ease that showed a familiarity with the work gained by long practice, that was a pleasure to the audience, and must have been so to the conductor. Particularly fine was the rendering of the "Thanks be to God," the "Hear us, Baal" and "He Watching over Israel." But all were worthy of praise.

There was much interest manifested in the work of the soloists, and Mr. Ludwig was eagerly welcomed as he opened the evening's work with that grand recitative, "As God the Lord of Israel Liveth." On the part of "Elijah" devolves a large share of the solo work, and from the beginning to the end the honors of the evening undoubtedly belonged to Mr. Ludwig. This was partially anticipated, for his magnetism, the feeling with which he invests every line of a work like this, could not fail to make him such an interpreter as has scarcely been seen here. His recitations were marvels of dramatic power, and when the closing portion of the work was reached and that great aria, "It is enough," was reached, followed closely by these words, "O that I now might die," a hush fell upon the assembly which was more expressive than any applause that could have been given.

Mr. Lloyd was heartily greeted, and it was felt that in him we have a representative of the grandest oratorio singing the world has known. He stands confessedly the leading oratorio tenor in London, where he has been singing for nearly twenty years—and London is the home of oratorio—and has that pure, legato, simple style of delivery which is the work of a true artist. His voice seemed a little husky at the opening, but as he reached the "If with all your hearts," the beautiful mellow quality, the admirable phrasing was clearly manifest, and his "Then shall the righteous stand forth" was the signal for prolonged applause. His modest appearance was very grateful, and as the week goes by there will be opportunity to learn more fully of his methods and work.

The dramatic power and superb voice of Mme. Lehmann stood out in bold relief, yet it cannot be said that her rendition was an ideal one or entirely satisfactory. The recitatives were beautifully delivered, being in line with the work in the Wagner operas with which she is so familiar. It cannot be denied that she is an artist in everything she does, and this must apply to all her solo work. Yet there is a lack of that legato style of oratorio singing in the "Hear Ye, Israel" which we are accustomed to look for, and which is always found in the singing of Mr. Lloyd. Her voice was excellent in the concerted solo work, this being particularly so in the Angel's trio—the pure and true legato singing of Mrs. Walker, with the rich tones of Mme. Poole, fitting admirably with the powerful notes of Mme. Lehmann, and making one of the finest renditions of the number it is the pleasure of any audience to hear. Mme. Poole was conscientious and careful, and while her best work was not the well known "O, Rest in the Lord," nothing but praise can be given to her.

Mrs. Walker, Mrs. Wyman, Messrs. Johnson and Clark made a welcome addition in the double quartette, and this quartette gave "Cast Thy Burden" finely. The orchestra was excellent, and Mr. Lang rendered efficient aid with the organ. Tuesday evening will be given portions of Bach's Christmas Oratorio and J. C. D. Parker's St. John, and the soloists will be Mme. Nordica, Miss Winant, Messrs. Lloyd and Whitney. Mr. Lloyd will also sing "In Native Worth," and Madame Nordica "On Mighty Pens," from the Creation.

[102]

Clipping No. 4
Clipping from News Taunton Mass
Date 4/6

—The tickets for the Symphony concerts brought from $90 to $115, each at the Boston concerts. And after the first of the opening sale none were to be had at any price.

Clipping from News Taunton Mass
Date 4/6

[illegible] Reynolds and enjoy its unrivaled comfort and elegance.

—At the Symphony concert April 16th the doors will be open to those who hold admission tickets at 7 o'clock. No admissions will be sold at the box office on the evening of the concert till 7.15. The best seats in the gallery will be left for the holders of admission tickets and those who buy them in advance will be sure of a good seat if they go early. Admission and reserved seat tickets will be on sale at Barker's Thursday (Fast Day) at 8 o'clock in the morning.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.
MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 7, 1890.

The Symphony Concert of Saturday—The Last Bulow Recital.

Those who have hitherto supposed that Cherubini was a rather conservative composer must have been terribly mistaken, for the overture to the "Water Carrier" at Saturday's symphony was given with a bombastic force and a sensational power that proved the old Italian to have been a musical wolf in sheep's clothing, a Berlioz in disguise. Mr. Nikisch has, however, detected him and has shown him up in his true tone-colors. The andante, molto sostenuto, of the introduction was evidently intended by the composer for a grave movement, and Cherubini undoubtedly intended the brasses to smother the strings. These changes were made by the conductor, and I believe that the old composer would scarcely enjoy the manner in which he has been unmasked.

But the Cowen symphony which followed, the beautiful "Scandinavian," was more in accordance with preconceived ideas, and was read by Mr. Nikisch, and played by the orchestra, with the most praiseworthy effect. The work is the greatest symphony that England has ever given forth, and even here Germany is entitled to some of the credit, for Cowen's long studies in that country gave to him something of the Teutonic love of development which is characteristic of the larger compositions he has given forth thus far. Yet this work is a gradual diminuendo of power. It begins with a movement that is absolutely great both in the beauty of its themes and in their musicianly development, then comes a slow movement which is just a trifle theatrical, then a scherzo which has no very important ideas to communicate, but contents itself with presenting a catchy rhythm and some delicate tone coloring on muted strings such as Berloiz uses in his elfin music, and then comes a finale which hides paucity of thoughts under the mantle of exciting orchestration. The return of the second theme of the first movement in this finale but accentuates the fact that the first movement far outweighs it in actual merit. The scherzo represents a sleigh ride (so Mr. Wilson's useful programme informs us) but it would have been far more in line with the subject had there been a Halling or a Spring-Tanz in its stead for the folk-dances are the most characteristic representatives of the music and life of "far Nroway." On the other hand however. the scale forms used in the themes of the first movement, are quite in Scandinavian character and also resemble those used by Brahms in some of his Hungarian music and in the andante of his fourth symphony, for geographical extremes come together strangely sometimes in this matter of folk-music. The symphony gives great opportunities to the woodwind instruments to emerge from obscurity, and right well were these opportunities used; the flute, clarinet, and English horn were exquisitely displayed in the second movement, in which the French horns also did most artistic work, their shading being beyond anything they have ever done. Mr. Nikisch did not follow the plan of placing them in an anteroom, but allowed them to play from their seats on the platform, which made their pianissimo effects all the more difficult. The strings did some excellent work, con sordine, and the cellos played superbly in the last movement.

Reinecke's King Manfred is altogether a different party from Schumann's, or rather Byron's, gentleman of the same name, and the entr'acte given, was by no means on a Schumann level, yet full of melodic grace and very well played by the strings. It would not be well to find fault with the introduction of such a sweetmeat now and then, for it lightens up the programme immensely.

The "Flying Dutchman" overture may be renounced by Wagner and condemned as not representing his theories, but the world in general will not reecho the dictum to any alarming extent, and it is one of the most delightful signs of the catholicity of our art that the public accepts the renounced works with as much avidity as the chosen ones. Even Wagner cannot bind down so emotional an art as music to one mode of expression only, and his own earlier works are the best refutation of the thought that his later theories are to abolish all other styles. The work was played with enormous spirit, and the energy which I thought misplaced in the opening number, was eminently fitting here. The entrance of the great figure which represents the Flying Dutchman (Beethoven began his ninth symphony on just such an empty fifth) was magnificently broad, and the theme of the sailor's chorus, which bubbles up brightly through the dissonance and gloom was given in good contrast. It was a performance that made one's blood tingle, and proved that when Mr. Nikisch is grand he is very grand indeed. The symphony by Cliffe, announced last week, was not given; possibly it was too precipitous.

ORATORIO "ELIJAH."

THE HANDEL AND HAYDN FESTIVAL BEGUN.

An Immense Audience at Music Hall To Hear Mendelssohn's Masterwork—First Appearance of Mr. Lloyd—The Last Bulow Recital.

The beginning of the triennial festival, the 75th anniversary of our great oratorio society, at Music Hall last night with "Elijah" was worthy of the fame of the chorus, and was so well appreciated by the public that there was not a vacant seat and not even standing room in the hall. How different it all was from the recent musical occasions of the Italian school which we have had in Boston! There a vast concourse assembled with the one thought of hearing Patti; here an audience, limited only by the size of the hall, came to listen to a great masterwork thoroughly rendered. There it was "Home Sweet Home"; here it was "If with all all your hearts" and "Hear ye, Israel." There are those among the more austere critics who declaim against Mendelssohn as having made the oratorio too dramatic, yet they accept Haydn's "Creation" without a murmur. It is undoubtedly true that the earlier work of the composer—"St. Paul"—is built on a more stately plan, but it must not be forgotten that the unemotional style of the older school would have ill assorted with the dramatic scenes which Rev. Dr. Schubring selected for his friend Mendelssohn as conveying a succinct story of Elijah's work, as well as giving a view of his character. That character impressed Mendelssohn more strongly than any other in the Old Testament; he thought of the prophet as standing out masculine, dark, and strong, against the background of an effeminate age and vacillating people. The very Bible becomes colloquial in describing certain points of this hero, and the satirical remarks to the priests of Baal, "Call him louder for he is a god!" are as stinging as any modern lampoon. Such passages demand homophonic and dramatic treatment as a right and the composer did well not to hug oratorial dignity too closely in setting them. There are times for all things, and the thrilling description of the rise of the storm beginning with the monotonous yet graphic words of the youth, and culminating in the awe-inspiring "Thanks be to God!" are good art, while the coarse "March to Calvary" in "The Redemption" is wrong, for music may not picture ugliness or vulgarity save passingly and by contrast, and this Mendelssohn clearly understood and adhered to in "Elijah."

The enormous audience last night emphatically showed that they were not in sympathy with the superciliousness and narrowness of modern musical radicalism, which argues that because Wagner was right Mendelssohn must have been wrong. So long as musical form means anything, so long as beauty of expression means anything, Mendelssohn's name will hold its rank, and it would not be essaying the role of prophet too presumptuously to predict a revulsion from the harsh judgment of the composer by the modern fanatics, which will give to his compositions even increased prestige. The successful composers of oratorio can be counted on the fingers of one hand, and Mendelssohn is assured of a place in the short list. It was pleasant to all Catholic-minded auditors that the Handel and Haydn Society had chosen to begin this great festival with the work in question, and if judged by even the low standard of drawing power and expediency, the choice was still justified in the result. The overture is the most impressive beginning of any of the large sacred works, for while even the "Messiah" in its overture shows the influence of Lully on the form of the introduction, this casts loose from all precedent, and begins with the impressive announcement, vocally, of the curse of the deity. The subsequent instrumental passages are big with impending doom. It is interesting to notice how the composer uses the clarinette in the deep register (chalumeau) to express gloom and wierdness. Not Beethoven, nor Mozart, had ever a suspicion of this tone-color (which Mendelssohn employs in the same way in the first part of his Scotch symphony), only Weber had any true idea of the spectral effects of the chalumeau, and although he was the first to use it thus, the present dark phases are by no means plagiarisms. The orchestra did full justice to the number, although the above-mentioned instrument could have been louder, and then came the melodious imitations of the first chorus, "Help, Lord," in which the balance was admirable, an auspicious opening of the important week. The tenors of the chorus were remarkable in their force and clearness in this number, as in all their subsequent work. The sopranos, however, were at times thin and comparatively weak in their tone, and did not always counterbalance the other parts. The singing was, if anything, too forcible at first, and the muttered phrase, "Lord bow down thine ear to our prayer," which should merely serve as a background for the solo duet, "Zion spreadeth her laurels for aid," became too prominent for its dramatic effect; but at least this force was not misplaced in "Yet doth the Lord see it not," which went grandly.

The Baal choruses were entirely excellent, but of course the climax of grandeur was attained in "Thanks be to God," which is in fact the climax of the work, and after the power of the first part the entire second part of the work seems an anti-climax. There are great numbers in the second part, but the first part is sustainedly and increasingly effective, which cannot be said of the remainder of the oratorio. The orchestra deserve a large part of the praise in "Thanks be to God" (their work was uniformly excellent), for seldom has the rushing of the waters had a more effective portrayal. The dry tone of the sopranos militated against the success of "Be not afraid," but at the reprise of the chief theme all sang well. The beautiful chorus, "Behold, God the Lord passed by," was exquisite in every detail, but especially in "And in that still voice, onward came the Lord," which was charmingly shaded. It may be of interest to know that this passage probably inspired the entire work, for in 1839 (seven years before the production of "Elijah") Mendelssohn read the noble 11th verse of the 19th chapter of the First Book of Kings to Hiller, and exclaimed, "What a grand oratorio could be formed from this!" Conductor and organist must share in the praise throughout. Mr. Zerrahn was appropriately given a laurel wreath—no intimation that he should as yet rest upon his laurels, and Mr. Lang did all that the fates would allow with the rather primitive organ.

As to the solo work, a few faults may well be lost sight of in the general excellence. It was not so fine a gathering as when, in 1872, Santley, Cummings, Mme. Patey and Edith Wynne sang the solos, but it was probably the best since that time.

Mme. Lilli Lehmann-Kalisch carried off the chief honors. In the broad declamatory effects she was irreproachable, and the lofty style of "Hear Ye! Israel," with the gloriously emphatic "I! I! am He that comforteth" was as Parepa-Rosa used to sing in the olden days. The episode of the Widow's son, was finely given, and here too, Mme. Kalisch was all that could have been desired; but in the phrases of the youth (how much better a boy's treble would be in this) the mezza-uoce was less successful.

Miss Clara Poole in the alto solos sang rather coldly, although always clear and exact in intonation. The most expressive solo Mendelssohn ever composed—"Oh, Rest in the Lord"—was therefore unimpressive, and as coldly received as it was sung. It is not generally known that we owe this aria to Scottish influence. Mendelssohn had heard "Auld Robin Gray" sung in Scotland, (not the older, but the present tune—by Rev. Dr. Leeves is it?) and was much impressed by it. When he composed "Oh Rest in the Lord" he unconsciously plagiarized the tune; a friend pointed out the mistake and the composer altered the song, but the flavor of "Auld Robin Gray" is in the melody still.

Mr. Edward Lloyd, the great English tenor, has yet his spurs to win in Boston. His singing last night was a disappointment. His voice was at first a little hoarse, his tones very throaty, his portamento fearfully prominent, and his enunciation by no means as clear as we expect from English singers, who always pronounce more distinctly than their American brethren. Against these faults I can set a rather sweet quality of upper register and a surety as regards pitch. "If With All Your Hearts" was not successful, but "Then Shall the Righteous" was so much better that it is possible that a second appearance may reveal a great singer; as yet only a reasonably good one is discernible.

It is difficult to accurately describe or criticise Mr. Ludwig's work as "Elijah." That he is very dramatic was self-evident, and indeed needed no proof to those who have seen his "Flying Dutchman," but he gave such an assortment of qualities of tone that I am at a loss to know which one represents his real and natural voice. Sometimes a most disagreeable guttural quality would appear, as if he were adopting bovine principles and were chewing the cud of his tones, and then, immediately, his voice would emerge as if from behind a cloud, and the most earnest, expressive and solid tones would ensue. His intonation was never offensively false, yet often it was untrue, and more often still, a parlando style abolished tone altogether. The audience were delighted with his dramatic touches, and they were often very well pleased, especially in the scene at Mt. Carmel, and he received more applause than anybody else. Of course the vehemence of the rather tawdry, "Is not his word like a fire," was allowable, but it became too spasmodic toward the close. "I go on my way," was much better sung than "It is enough," yet it received less applause.

The assistance in the concerted numbers was very nearly up to the rank of the soloists. When such artists as Mrs. Jennie P. Walker and Mrs. Walter C. Wyman consent to take secondary parts the artistic result may be imagined. Messrs. Johnson and Clark also did fine work. As a consequence the duet, "Zion spreadeth her hands," the glorious double quartette, the single quartette, "Cast thy burden upon the Lord," were all better done than they have been in a generation, but the crowning perfection of it all was the angels trio, "Lift thine eyes," sung by Mmes. Kalisch and Walker and Miss Poole, in a manner that has never been excelled in Boston. The contrapuntal choruses and quartette at the end of the oratorio were well sung, and altogether the festival is launched in a manner that ought to give great satisfaction to every one who is interested in our hardworking, disinterested, art-advancing Handel and Haydn

Boston Journal.
MORNING EDITION.
MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 7, 1890.

The Symphony concert last Saturday night was considerable of a change from the programme originally announced, and included Cowen's Scandinavian Symphony, Cherubini's overture the "Water Carrier" and Wagner's overture to the "Flying Dutchman." There was no soloist, and there was nothing calling for anything but praise of the orchestra and the readings of Mr. Nikisch. At the next concert, which takes place Saturday, April 19, the famous soprano, Mme. Steinbach-Jahns, who has been sent for by Mr. Nikisch from Leipsic, will be the soloist, and her appearance will be an event in musical circles.

The Handel and Haydn Anniversary.

When Carl Zerrahn, the veteran oratorio conductor, the leader of the Handel and Haydn Society for so many years, ascended the platform of Music Hall last night to begin the performance of "Elijah" he beheld a sight that would inspire any leader and any chorus. Far along the sides of the hall and in the rear were rows of men, and women as well who were obliged to stand through the entire performance, and they patiently submitted, scarcely a person leaving the hall until compelled by the necessity of reaching their homes.

It was a very successful opening, for the society, of this seventy-fifth anniversary festival, for which preparations had been made on so extensive a scale. The patronage amply justified the liberality of the management, for it would have been impossible to have crowded any more people into the hall. The rear of the stage was handsomely decorated, the conductor's stand was adorned with wreaths and flowers, and Mr. Zerrahn was given a glorious reception, both from audience and chorus, as he took up the baton. The audience was a distinctively musical one. All the old patrons of the society were there, reinforced by those newer habitues who were attracted by the work itself and the grand quartette of solo artists.

[102]

Clipping No. 4
Clipping from News Taunton Mass
Date 4/6

—The tickets for the Symphony concerts brought from $90 to $115, each at the Boston concerts. And after the first of the opening sale none were to be had at any price.

Clipping from News Taunton Mass
Date 4/4

Reynolds and enjoy its unrivaled comfort and elegance.

—At the Symphony concert April 16th the doors will be open to those who hold admission tickets at 7 o'clock. No admissions will be sold at the box office on the evening of the concert till 7.15. The best seats in the gallery will be left for the holders of admission tickets and those who buy them in advance will be sure of a good seat if they go early. Admission and reserved seat tickets will be on sale at Barker's Thursday (Fast Day) at 8 o'clock in the morning.

[103]

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

[illegible] the programme at last evening's [illegible] by the Boston symphony orchestra, [illegible] Nikisch conductor, contained no [illegible] number, the selections made for the occasion proved so well chosen and so admirably contrasted that the event was a most enjoyable one. The overture to Cherubini's "Water Carrier" began the programme, and that to Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" ended it, with another "Manfred" entr'acte and Cowen's "Scandinavian" symphony to complete the list. Nikisch was particularly happy in the reading of Cowen's fascinating symphony, all of its poetic ideas being brought out with a grace and skill that quite captivated all who heard. The second movement [illegible] of a summer evening on the fjord was a tone poem of ideal beauty, and held the audience spell-bound during its performance. In strong contrast with the work done in the symphony was that which gave the "Flying Dutchman" overture a performance that will be long remembered as a realization of all its possibilities to charm and delight even the stanchest opponent of the Wagnerian school. The performance of Reinecke's "Manfred," entr'acte, was another most successful effort by the orchestra under Mr. Nikisch's baton, and, although the familiar "Water Carrier" overture lost some of its charm by the exaggerated contrasts given in its reading, the concert, as a whole, was a pronounced success. Next Saturday the usual concert will be omitted, but the series will be resumed on the 18th inst., when the programme will include: Goldmark's overture, "Spring" (first time in Boston); Mozart's aria from "Die Entfuehrung aus dem Serail"; Volkmann's serenade, in D minor; some songs with piano, and Brahms' symphony No. 1, in C minor. The soloist will be Mme. Steinbach-Jahns.

The Handel and Haydn Festival an Assured Success.

The most sanguine expectations concerning the festival of the Handel and Haydn Society, given in commemoration of the 75th anniversary of the society's organization, promise to be realized, and the enterprise shown in planning this notable musical event will undoubtedly result most satisfactorily to all who have had to carry it to its completion. The festival consists of four performances, the first, Mendelssohn's "Elijah," being given this evening, followed by selections from Bach's "Christmas Oratorio," and the "St. John," by J. C. D. Parker, on Tuesday evening; "The Redemption" on Thursday evening, and "Israel" to close on Sunday evening next. The chorus of the society has been recruited up to its full strength, and will be supported by an orchestra of large proportions, with Mr. Carl Zerrahn as conductor, Mr. Franz Kneisel as leader, and Mr. B. J. Lang as organist. The soloists are as follows: Sopranos, Mrs. Lilli Lehmann-Kalisch, Mrs. Lillian Nordica, Miss Clementine de Vere, Mrs. Jennie Patrick Walker; tenors, Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr. Herbert O. Johnson; altos, Mrs. Walter C. Wyman, Miss Emily Winant, Miss Clara Poole; basses, Mr. Myron W. Whitney, Mr. William Ludwig, Dr. George R. Clark. Of the works chosen for performance during this festival, only one is unfamiliar to Boston audiences, the "St. John" having been composed for the festival by Mr. J. C. D. Parker at the request of the society. Mr. Parker, it will be remembered, did a similar service for the society in giving his "Redemption Hymn" to add to the interest of the fourth triennial festival in 1877, and his "St. John" will be heard with great interest by all who realize the sterling worth of Mr. Parker's abilities as a composer. The form of the "St. John" is that of a short cantata in six detached numbers illustrative of a few recorded incidents in the life of the apostle, and of his writings. There is too little material thus afforded to give a subject suited for treatment in oratorio form or for any strongly dramatic writing, and so these six numbers are merely of a suggestive character. With the exception of the last number, each portion of the work is preceded by a short chanting phrase, with rhythmical orchestral accompaniment, having always the same melody and sung by the male chorus in unison. The prelude to the sixth number, however, differs in that it is written for female voices only. The significance of the several portions of the work may be summarized as follows: The first number illustrates the description of the calling of the apostles, the second being given to the scene at the Lord's supper. In the third number the composer has found his subject in the scene at the crucifixion, and the fourth number is descriptive of an incident following the death on the cross; which concludes with a text from one of the Epistles. The last two numbers of the cantata serve to illustrate subjects taken from the Revelations, the fifth being built upon the text "And he showed me that great city, the Holy Jerusalem, descending out of Heaven," etc., and the final number upon the words "Behold I come quickly and my reward is with me," [illegible] and "They that be wise shall shine as the brightness," etc. The performance of Tuesday evening will have also other attractive features in the introduction of two solo selections from "The Redemption," by Mr. Lloyd and Mme. Nordica. The great aria, "On Mighty Pens," will be sung by Mme. Nordica, and "In Native Worth" by Mr. Lloyd. There is one fact which should be borne in mind by all who are to attend these festival performances, and that is that the doors will positively be closed at sharp 7:30, and kept closed until the end of the first number, or until a pause can be made without detriment to the interest of the performance. In the performance of "The Elijah" this pause cannot be made until after the "Zion Spreadeth Her Hands," so that those comers will miss some very interesting numbers. The speed (?) of the rapid transit electric cars should be carefully estimated from all suburbans beforehand, if a prompt arrival at the hall is contemplated.

Boston Evening Transcript.

MONDAY, APRIL 7, 1890.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The programme of the twenty-second symphony concert was as follows:

Cherubini: Overture to "Les deux Journées."
Cowen; Symphony No. 3, in C minor, "Scandinavian."
Reinecke: Entr'acte from "König Manfred."
Wagner: Overture to "Der fliegende Holländer."

Almost the entire programme had been changed since the announcement on the Saturday before, and it was a pleasant surprise to find the concert, beginning with Cherubini's "Les deux Journées.' The same composition does not make the same impression at all times; last Saturday evening we were, more than ever, impressed by a certain quality Cherubini shows in this overture, a quality which one does not find to such a degree in any of the composers who write nowadays, no matter what else may be found in them. This is a certain fine mastery in musical construction. Take two instances of it: the wonderful way in which he makes the transition from his first theme in E major (in the Allegro) to his second theme in G major, and the equally admirable manner in which he manages the return to the first theme, later on in the movement. This power of passing from one theme to another, from one mood to a wholly different one, without the slightest disruption of musical continuity is one of the finest results of that training to which almost all the great classic composers were subjected; but, sad to say, it seems almost a lost art today. And, whatever one's sympathies may be with certain tendencies and developments in more modern music, one still cannot but regret the almost disappearance of just this sort of mastery; for, as Heine well says, "The material only acquires its value from artistic shaping." The overture was splendidly played, the violins making their little accent in the second theme with just the right stress, and was heartily enjoyed.

Cowen's "Scandinavian" symphony made a finer impression than ever before. The last movement we still think a failure; in spite of all the strenuous work the composer has put into it, there is no real development, the music does not move onward and get anywhere, but keeps on violently marking time, and ends where it started. But the other movements, especially the Allegro and the Scherzo, show real invention, and are exceedingly interesting. This symphony, too, was admirably played.

The entre'acte from Reinecke's "König Manfred" is pleasant music to listen to, rather sentimental at times, if you will, and devoid of any especial nobility of inspiration, but unassuming and smoothly written.

In the overture to "Der Fliegende Holländer" Mr. Nikisch had one of his finest triumphs. When one thinks of how very horrible and disjointed, not to say vulgar, this work may be made to appear by an unintelligent and unsympathetic rendering, one's admiration for the superb results Mr. Nikisch achieved in it is only increased. With all the strenuousness of the playing, with all the immense volume and brilliancy of tone the orchestra gave forth, it never sounded merely noisy, and with all the frequent and unrestricted modifications of tempo, and contrasts of dynamic force Mr. Nikisch permitted himself, the music sounded more coherent than ever before. One felt its whole poetry and vigor; in a word, it was magnificent.

The next programme (to be given on April 19) is: Goldmark, overture, "Spring;" Mozart, aria from "Die Entführung aus dem Serail"; Volkmann, serenade in D minor; songs with piano. forte; Brahms, symphony No. 1, in C minor, Mme. Steinbach-Jahns will be the singer.

Boston Daily Advertiser.

MONDAY, APRIL 7, 1890.

The Twenty-Second Symphony Concert.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme of the twenty-second symphony concert was:

Cherubini. Overture. "Water Carrier."
Cowen. Symphony No. 3, in C minor, "Scandinavian."
Reinecke. Entr'acte from "Manfred."
Wagner. Overture. "The Flying Dutchman."

There was no soloist, It was Mr. Nikisch's intention to play Frederick Cliffe's symphony last Saturday, and it is only temporarily that the younger Englishman gives place to the older—Mr. Cliffe's work will be heard next season. It is several years since Mr. Cowen's "Scandinavian" symphony has been heard here. It is decidedly his best orchestral work. It shows greater power, concentration of idea, and it has imaginative qualities that rank it higher than the "Welsh," the last symphony by this composer heard here. It is intended to be a "tone picture" of the rugged, melancholy North, and while the sentiment of the Englishman is not so deep or so earnestly vital as that of a true Norseman like Grieg, his "local color" comes very near being the real thing. The first movement is an admirable example of instrumental color; the themes are "worked" considerably, perhaps, on the whole, with too great elaboration. The adagio is a charming fancy; a Norse idyl. The scherzo is intended to give the idea of a sleighride; the contrasting trio is all too brief considering the exhilarating character of the ride. The finale has moments of emotional force; it has a certain frown on its surface; maybe it bears the spirit of Odin and the heroes of the Volsunga Sagas. The symphony is a fine work, and barring some inexact entrances of the woodwind was played in superb fashion.

The overture to one of Cherubini's operas was resolutely played, and that to Wagner's "The Flying Dutchman," received such a reading as to make one yearn for permanent opera under Mr. Nikisch with the Higginson orchestra as the cornerstone; it will come in due time. Why was it not one of the audience stirred from their seats after the symphony? We are such a curfew-respecting people that usually when nine o'clock arrives a percentage of the symphony audience wraps its mantle about itself and silently, sometimes with ostentation, steals away. Why is it no one stirred after the symphony, and only two or three aged persons after the treacly Reinecke piece? Why, because there remained to be heard something by Wagner! The name is one to conjure with! Wagner enchains us all; the "motif" crank and he who is only musically susceptible, Wagner holds absolutely. The next concert, last but one, will present as soloist Mme. Steinbach-Jahns of Leipzig, a soprano who is a great favorite there. This singer will accompany the orchestra upon its May tour of the central and Western States. The full programme for April 19, two weeks away, is: Goldmark, overture, "Spring" (first time in Boston); Mozart, aria from "Die Entfuehrung aus dem Serail;" Volkmann, serenade in D minor, songs with piano; Brahms, Symphony No. 1, in C minor.

BOSTON POST, MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 7, 189

MUSIC.

HANDEL AND HAYDN FESTIVAL—"ELIJAH."

That noble veteran musical society, the Händel and Haydn, has begun the festival of its seventy-fifth anniversary in right royal style, and there was no lack of enthusiasm and appreciation to prove that it has indeed the good will of the public. If Music Hall was ever "filled to the roof" it certainly was last night. There was not an inch of room anywhere, and the enthusiasts who stood up were packed together like sardines; still they seemed to have room enough to clap their hands, and they availed themselves of this possibility very often. All things considered, "Elijah" is the most popular of Mendelssohn's two oratorios, "St. Paul" is perhaps more grateful in some ways for the soloists, but the choruses in "Elijah" are on the whole much the finest. Everyone is familiar with the work and has heard it a number of times, and probably under all sorts of circumstances, but it is unlikely that a finer performance than last night's has ever been given in this vicinity. An examination of the following list of artists who took part in it will justify this statement:

Mrs. Lilli Lehmann-Kalisch, soprano; Mrs. Jennie Patrick Walker, soprano; Miss Clara Poole, alto; Mrs. Walter C. Wyman, alto; Mr. Edward Lloyd, tenor; Mr. Herbert O. Johnson, tenor; Mr. William Ludwig, bass; Dr. George R. Clark, bass. Mr. Carl Zerrahn, conductor. Mr. B. J. Lang, organist. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Franz Kneisel, principal.

Mme. Lehmann-Kalisch was fine in the soprano role, and her pronunciation was almost wholly free from any accent. She was especially good in the duet between The Widow and Elijah, "What have I to do with thee, O man of God," as her great dramatic ability was brought to play in this number. In the quartettes, she was more effective, and the great soprano solo, "Hear ye, Israel," was magnificently sung. She was not so successful in the sentences assigned to The Youth, as the peculiar thin — almost falsetto — tone she adopted seemed out of place. Whatever her theory was—and so true a musician as she is must have thought it out—the effect was disappointing. Miss Clara Poole has been so seriously ill during nearly the whole winter that all allowance was due to her, but she did not need to make any especial apologies. It is true that the celebrated number, "Oh, Rest in the Lord," did not, under her treatment, make the effect which might have been justly expected of this popular favorite; but her indisposition more than excused this. On the contrary, all the sentences assigned to The Angel were admirably sung and with keen dramatic appreciation of the necessities of recitative declamation, and in the quartettes she was excellent. Mrs. Walker was very good in the quartettes, and these three ladies sang the beautiful "Lift thine eyes" exquisitely. A finer example of unaccompanied singing of the most highly artistic kind could hardly be conceived, and the pitch was held with mathematic accuracy. Mrs. Wyman sang her quartette parts with the greatest care and musical understanding, as the true artist is bound to do even in the smallest parts, and the little duet with Mrs. Walker, "Zion spreadeth her hands for aid," was delightfully sung by these two ladies.

The leading tenor part of "Elijah" is not very long nor very grateful, therefore the public did not have much opportunity to learn more of Mr. Lloyd than that he has a beautiful voice and that he is one of the most artistic singers who has ever been heard in this country. His rendering of the "Then shall the righteous shine forth" was very fine, and that exquisite phrase, "See now he sleepeth beneath a juniper tree," was sung faultlessly. Mr. Johnson and Dr. Clark were both very good in the quartettes. And now let us say at last that Mr. Ludwig's Elijah was simply a masterpiece. He was most enthusiastically received, but on one or two occasions one could hardly help wondering why even our cold Boston audience did not forget itself and rise to its feet shouting "Bravo, bravissimo." His voice is splendid, and, above all, full and manly, and his phrasing is simply a study. For example, where in the second part the phrase appears, "Tarry here, my servant, the Lord be with thee; I journey hence to the wilderness," a climax of perfect singing was reached which was almost a revelation. Many celebrated baritones have scored great and deserved successes in this part, but no one has ever surpassed Mr. Ludwig in the artistic, intuitive and yet in many instances wholly original reading which he gives to the part. His Elijah is not a dress-coated vocalist, singing on the stage of a concert hall. It is a living, breathing man, it is an evident and human dramatic personage. He carries you with him to the desert. And you stand at his side quivering with excitement as he challenges the priests of Baal to the trial which results in the overthrow of their false gods and the victory of the God of Israel. His singing simply dissolves his surroundings and makes oratorio real; and if there were more singers who had this priceless gift the great oratorios could be presented to the public like wholly new works. It is unnecessary to speak in detail, for it was all magnificent, but it may at least be said that his rendering of "It is enough" will not soon be forgotten by any true music lover who heard last night's concert.

The chorus was on the whole very good. On one or two occasions the attack was a little unsteady, which was rather surprising in so well known a work, and there was no real pianissimo during the evening, and thus several effects were lost. But on the whole it was remarkably fine chorus work, and all praise is due to Mr. Zerrahn, not only for his excellent training of the singers, but for the competent and spirited manner in which he conducted the whole performance. The orchestra played finely, although on one or two occasions the trombones were somewhat aggressive, and Mr. Lang presided over the organ in his well-known artistic manner. The second performance of the festival will be given tomorrow night, on which occasion will be presented the first and second parts of Bach's Christmas oratorio, certain solos from Haydn's Creation, and Mr. J. C. D. Parker's cantata "St. John," dedicated to the society, the soloists being Mme. Nordica, Miss [illegible] Winant, Mr. Edward Lloyd and Mr. Myron W. Whitney.

ARTHUR WELD.

Boston Evening Transcript.

MONDAY, APRIL 7, 1890.

THE HANDEL AND HAYDN FESTIVAL.

The Handel and Haydn Society began the Festival celebrating its seventy-fifth anniversary in the Music Hall last evening with a performance of Mendelssohn's "Elijah." The solo singers were: Mrs. Lilli Lehmann-Kalisch (soprano), Mrs. Jennie Patrick Walker (soprano), Miss Clara Poole (alto), Mrs. Walter C. Wyman (alto), Mr. Edward Lloyd (tenor), Mr. Herbert O. Johnson (tenor), Mr. William Ludwig (bass) and Dr. George R. Clark (bass). Mr. Carl Zerrahn conducted and Mr. B. J. Lang was at the organ.

So generally fine a performance of the "Elijah" has not been given here for some time. The chorus sang with great steadiness and vigor, and, now and then, with more care for light and shade and for the bringing out of special accents than we remember yet to have heard them. Naturally the more favorite choruses went best, such as the "Baal" choruses, "Thanks be to God" and "Behold, God the Lord passed by." "Blessed are the men who fear Him" suffered a little from a too rapid tempo; it was far better than dragging, but still a little too fast, to our thinking. "He, watching our Israel," on the other hand, went beautifully, and made a deep impression. The orchestra, with Mr. Franz Kneisel as leader, played, in general, very well indeed; a choral festival is not the occasion on which an orchestra shows itself to the best advantage—the surrounding mass of singers deadens its tone too much; but, taking this inevitable drawback into account, the orchestra produced a fine and satisfying effect. What has been done to that half-exiled something that calls itself an organ we do not know; but it seemed to us, now and then, that we could detect its voice in the choruses; which argues that something must have been done to it.

But, good as chorus and orchestra were, what especially distinguished the occasion as a festival performance was the general excellence of the solos. Chorus and orchestra we have always with us, but such an array of competent solo singers comes only with a musical high tide. Of the four principal singers, chief honors are due to Mr. Ludwig, who sang the part of the Prophet. Exception can be taken only to one item in his singing: his constant swelling his tone on almost every note that is long enough to be swelled at all, and the curious and by no means beautiful change in quality that his voice undergoes in the process. One can surmise that his aim is something like that "opening of the voice" which some Italian singers possess in perfection; but he does not do it well, his voice loses all its fine quality as soon as he swells his tone and becomes thin and dry, and he brings in this effect far too often in any case. But, apart from this trick, his singing was admirable indeed. His whole conception of the part showed rare insight. He sang with great dignity, with immense dramatic force when it was required, yet wholly without undue ranting. His pathos, too, was to the full as fine as his dramatic fire, and in the recitatives he was simply superb. Throughout, you felt the presence of a strong intelligence, a true artistic instinct and great personal magnetism. There have been few so good Elijahs here, and none more inspiring.

Mr. Lloyd impresses one rather as a satisfying than as an inspiring singer. His voice is beautiful, and he uses it like a master; moreover, he gives you the comforting sense that he is thoroughly and absolutely at home in his work, that he is implicitly to be relied on. His style is well-nigh impeccable, and he sings both with warmth and grace. Still, we have heard other tenors make somewhat more out of "If with all your hearts" and "Then shall the righteous" than he does, although we have possibly never heard these airs sung in better taste, nor with firmer artistic finish.

Mrs. Lehmann-Kalisch sang the soprano solos very beautifully indeed. Her grand voice was in perfect condition, and her singing full of nobility, dignity and beauty. One felt, to be sure, that she was working in an unaccustomed field, and was constantly mindful of doing nothing that should be out of keeping with the dignity of oratorio. The result was an occasional falling short of that thorough effectiveness that is so overmastering in her Brunnhilde or Sieglinde. There is something more in "Hear ye, Israel" and in the soprano part in "Holy, holy, holy," than she brings out. Yet her singing was wonderfully fine and artistic, and it is generally better to do too little in a work like "Elijah" than too much.

Miss Poole's voice has never sounded more beautiful than it did last evening; and her use of it was artistic in the extreme. Her singing of "Woe unto them" was very fine; in "Oh rest in the Lord," however, she was less satisfying. We suspect that her failure in this air was the result of her consenting to sing it a faster tempo than she herself felt to be proper, for she sang it almost mechanically and without expressiveness. We are led to this opinion by remembering that, of all the contraltos we have ever met, only one or two really wanted to sing this air fast enough; almost all of them have persisted in dragging it out miserably—as they do "He shall feed his flock," in the "Messiah"—and we cannot but think that Miss Poole felt in her heart of heart that it ought to go slower, and found herself unable to throw any expression into her singing at the tempo at which she took it. Still, the tempo in which she sang it was right, and we think that, with further study, she cannot fail to find a way to make it expressive.

The other artists sang admirably in the min[illegible] solos and the concerted pieces. Indeed, we have seldom heard these numbers go so well. The audience was a true "Elijah" audience, and literally thronged the hall; the Handel and Haydn could not have asked for a more propitious send-off.

The remainder of the festival is laid out as follows:

Second concert, tomorrow night, Bach's "Christmas Oratorio" and J. C. D. Parker's "Saint John," written for this festival; solos by Mme. Lillian Nordica, Miss Emily Winant and Messrs. Edward Lloyd and Myron W. Whitney. Between the two works, Mme. Nordica will sing "With Verdure Clad," and Mr. Lloyd "In Native Worth" from Haydn's "The Creation."

Third concert, Thursday night, Gounod's "The Redemption;" solos by Mrs. Jennie Patrick Walker, Misses Clementine De Vere and Emily Winant, and Messrs. Edward Lloyd, William Ludwig and Myron W. Whitney.

Fourth concert, next Sunday night, Handel's "Israel in Egypt"; solos by Misses Clementine De Vere and Clara Poole, and Messrs. Edward Lloyd, William Ludwig and Myron W. Whitney.

SUNDAY HER

BOSTON, APRIL 6, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Although the programme at last evening's concert by the Boston symphony orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch conductor, contained no solo number, the selections made for the occasion proved so well chosen and so admirably contrasted that the event was a most enjoyable one. The overture to Cherubini's "Water Carrier" began the programme, and that to Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" ended it, with the familiar "Manfred" entr'acte and Cowen's "Scandinavian" symphony to complete the list. Mr. Nikisch was particularly happy in his reading of Cowen's fascinating symphony, all of its poetic ideas being brought out with a grace and skill that quite captivated all who heard. The second movement descriptive of a summer evening on the fjord was a tone poem of ideal beauty, and held the audience spell-bound during its performance. In sharp contrast with the work done in the symphony was that which gave the "Flying Dutchman" overture a performance that will be long remembered as a realization of all its possibilities to charm and delight even the stanchest opponent of the Wagnerian school. The performance of Reinecke's "Manfred," entr'acte, was another most successful effort by the orchestra under Mr. Nikisch's baton, and, although the familiar "Water Carrier" overture lost some of its charm by the exaggerated contrasts given in its reading, the concert, as a whole, was a pronounced success. Next Saturday the usual concert will be omitted, but the series will be resumed on the 18th inst., when the programme will include: Goldmark's overture, "Spring" (first time in Boston); Mozart's aria from "Die Entfuehrung aus dem Serail"; Volkmann's serenade, in D minor; some songs with piano, and Brahms' symphony No. 1, in C minor. The soloist will be Mme. Steinbach-Jahns.

The Handel and Haydn Festival an Assured Success.

The most sanguine expectations concerning the festival of the Handel and Haydn Society, given in commemoration of the 75th anniversary of the society's organization, promise to be realized, and the enterprise shown in planning this notable musical event will undoubtedly result most satisfactorily to all who have had to carry it to its completion. The festival consists of four performances, the first, Mendelssohn's "Elijah," being given this evening, followed by selections from Bach's "Christmas Oratorio," and the "St. John," by J. C. D. Parker, on Tuesday evening; "The Redemption" on Thursday evening, and "Israel" to close on Sunday evening next. The chorus of the society has been recruited up to its full strength, and will be supported by an orchestra of large proportions, with Mr. Carl Zerrahn as conductor, Mr. Franz Kneisel as leader, and Mr. B. J. Lang as organist. The soloists are as follows: Sopranos, Mrs. Lilli Lehmann-Kalisch, Mrs. Lillian Nordica, Miss Clementine de Vere, Mrs. Jennie Patrick Walker; tenors, Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr. Herbert O. Johnson; altos, Mrs. Walter C. Wyman, Miss Emily Winant, Miss Clara Poole; basses, Mr. Myron W. Whitney, Mr. William Ludwig, Dr. George R. Clark. Of the works chosen for performance during this festival, only one is unfamiliar to Boston audiences, the "St. John" having been composed for the festival by Mr. J. C. D. Parker at the request of the society. Mr. Parker it will be remembered, did a similar service for the society in giving his "Redemption Hymn" to add to the interest of the fourth triennial festival in 1877, and his "St. John" will be heard with great interest by all who realize the sterling worth of Mr. Parker's abilities as a composer. The form of the "St. John" is that of a short cantata in six detached numbers illustrative of a few recorded incidents in the life of the apostle, and of his writings. There is too little material thus afforded to give a subject suited for treatment in oratorio form or for any strongly dramatic writing, and so these six numbers are merely of a suggestive character. With the exception of the last number, each portion of the work is preceded by a short chanting phrase, with rhythmical orchestral accompaniment, having always the same melody and sung by the male chorus in unison. The prelude to the sixth number, however, differs in that it is written for female voices only. The significance of the several portions of the work may be summarized as follows: The first number illustrates the description of the calling of the apostles, the second being given to the scene at the Lord's supper. In the third number the composer has found his subject in the scene of the crucifixion, and the fourth number is descriptive of an incident following the death on the cross; which concludes with a text from one of the Epistles. The last two numbers of the cantata serve to illustrate subjects taken from the Revelations, the fifth being built upon the text "And he showed me that great city, the Holy Jerusalem, descending out of Heaven," etc., and the final number upon the words "Behold I come quickly and my reward is with me," etc., and "They that be wise shall shine as the brightness," etc. The performance of Tuesday evening will have also other attractive features in the introduction of two solo selections from "The Creation," by Mr. Lloyd and Mme. Nordica. The great aria, "On Mighty Pens," will be sung by Mme. Nordica, and "In Native Worth" by Mr. Lloyd. There is one fact which should be borne in mind by all who are to attend these festival performances, and that is that the doors will positively be closed at sharp 7:30, and kept closed until the end of the first number, or until a pause can be made without detriment to the interest of the performance. In the performance of "The Elijah" this pause cannot be made until after the "Zion Spreadeth Her Hands," so that late comers will miss some very interesting numbers. The speed (?) of the rapid transit electric cars should be carefully estimated by all suburbans beforehand, if a prompt arrival at the hall is contemplated.

Boston Evening Transcript.

MONDAY, APRIL 7, 1890.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The programme of the twenty-second symphony concert was as follows:

Cherubini: Overture to "Les deux Journées."
Cowen: Symphony No. 3, in C minor, "Scandinavian."
Reinecke: Entr'acte from "König Manfred."
Wagner: Overture to "Der fliegende Holländer."

Almost the entire programme had been changed since the announcement on the Saturday before, and it was a pleasant surprise to find the concert beginning with Cherubini's "Les deux Journées." The same composition does not make the same impression at all times; last Saturday evening we were, more than ever, impressed by a certain quality Cherubini shows in this overture, a quality which one does not find to such a degree in any of the composers who write nowadays, no matter what else may be found in them. This is a certain fine mastery in musical construction. Take two instances of it: the wonderful way in which he makes the transition from his first theme in E major (in the Allegro) to his second theme in G major, and the equally admirable manner in which he manages the return to the first theme, later on in the movement. This power of passing from one theme to another, from one mood to a wholly different one, without the slightest disruption of musical continuity is one of the finest results of that training to which almost all the great classic composers were subjected; but, sad to say, it seems almost a lost art today. And, whatever one's sympathies may be with certain tendencies and developments in more modern music, one still cannot but regret the almost disappearance of just this sort of mastery; for, as Heine well says, "The material only acquires its value from artistic shaping." The overture was splendidly played, the violins making their little accent in the second theme with just the right stress, and was heartily enjoyed.

Cowen's "Scandinavian" symphony made a finer impression than ever before. The last movement we still think a failure; in spite of all the strenuous work the composer has put into it, there is no real development, the music does not move onward and get anywhere, but keeps on violently marking time, and ends where it started. But the other movements, especially the Allegro and the Scherzo, show real invention, and are exceedingly interesting. This symphony, too, was admirably played.

The entre'acte from Reinecke's "König Manfred" is pleasant music to listen to, rather sentimental at times, if you will, and devoid of any especial nobility of inspiration, but unassuming and smoothly written.

In the overture to "Der Fliegende Holländer" Mr. Nikisch had one of his finest triumphs. When one thinks of how very horrible and disjointed, not to say vulgar, this work may be made to appear by an unintelligent and unsympathetic rendering, one's admiration for the superb results Mr. Nikisch achieved in it is only increased. With all the strenuousness of the playing, with all the immense volume and brilliancy of tone the orchestra gave forth, it never sounded merely noisy, and with all the frequent and unrestricted modifications of tempo, and contrasts of dynamic force Mr. Nikisch permitted himself, the music sounded more coherent than ever before. One felt its whole poetry and vigor; in a word, it was magnificent.

The next programme (to be given on April 19) is: Goldmark, overture, "Spring;" Mozart, aria from "Die Entführung aus dem Serail"; Volkmann, serenade in D minor; songs with piano. forte; Brahms, symphony No. 1, in C minor, Mme. Steinbach-Jahns will be the singer.

Boston Daily Traveller.

MONDAY, APRIL 7, 1890.

The Twenty-Second Symphony Concert.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme of the twenty-second symphony concert was:

Cherubini. Overture. "Water Carrier."
Cowen. Symphony No. 3, in C minor, "Scandinavian."
Reinecke. Entr'acte from "Manfred."
Wagner. Overture. "The Flying Dutchman."

There was no soloist. It was Mr. Nikisch's intention to play Frederick Cliffe's symphony last Saturday, and it is only temporarily that the younger Englishman gives place to the older—Mr. Cliffe's work will be heard next season. It is several years since Mr. Cowen's "Scandinavian" symphony has been heard here. It is decidedly his best orchestral work. It shows greater power, concentration of idea, and it has imaginative qualities that rank it higher than the "Welsh," the last symphony by this composer heard here. It is intended to be a "tone picture" of the rugged, melancholy North, and while the sentiment of the Englishman is not so deep or so earnestly vital as that of a true Norseman like Grieg, his "local color" comes very near being the real thing. The first movement is an admirable example of instrumental color; the themes are "worked" considerably, perhaps, on the whole, with too great elaboration. The adagio is a charming fancy; a Norse idyl. The scherzo is intended to give the idea of a sleighride; the contrasting trio is all too brief considering the exhilarating character of the ride. The finale has moments of emotional force; it has a certain frown on its surface; maybe it bears the spirit of Odin and the heroes of the Volsunga Sagas. The symphony is a fine work, and barring some inexact entrances of the woodwind was played in superb fashion.

The overture to one of Cherubini's operas was resolutely played, and that to Wagner's "The Flying Dutchman," received such a reading as to make one yearn for permanent opera under Mr. Nikisch with the Higginson orchestra as the cornerstone; it will come in due time. Why was it not one of the audience stirred from their seats after the symphony? We are such a curfew-respecting people that usually when nine o'clock arrives a percentage of the symphony audience wraps its mantle about itself and silently, sometimes with ostentation, steals away. Why is it no one stirred after the symphony, and only two or three aged persons after the treacly Reinecke piece? Why, because there remained to be heard something by Wagner! The name is one to conjure with! Wagner enchains us all; the "motif" crank and he who is only musically susceptible, Wagner holds absolutely. The next concert, last but one, will present as soloist Mme. Steinbach-Jahns of Leipzig, a soprano who is a great favorite there. This singer will accompany the orchestra upon its May tour of the central and Western States. The full programme for April 19, two weeks away, is: Goldmark, overture, "Spring" (first time in Boston); Mozart, aria from "Die Entfuehrung aus dem Serail;" Volkmann, serenade in D minor, songs with piano; Brahms, Symphony No. 1, in C minor.

BOSTON POST, MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 7, 189

MUSIC.

HANDEL AND HAYDN FESTIVAL—"ELIJAH."

That noble veteran musical society, the Händel and Haydn, has begun the festival of its seventy-fifth anniversary in right royal style, and there was no lack of enthusiasm and appreciation to prove that it has indeed the good will of the public. If Music Hall was ever "filled to the roof" it certainly was last night. There was not an inch of room anywhere, and the enthusiasts who stood up were packed together like sardines; still they seemed to have room enough to clap their hands, and they availed themselves of this possibility very often. All things considered, "Elijah" is the most popular of Mendelssohn's two oratorios, "St. Paul" is perhaps more grateful in some ways for the soloists, but the choruses in "Elijah" are on the whole much the finest. Everyone is familiar with the work and has heard it a number of times, and probably under all sorts of circumstances, but it is unlikely that a finer performance than last night's has ever been given in this vicinity. An examination of the following list of artists who took part in it will justify this statement:

Mrs. Lilli Lehmann-Kalisch, soprano; Mrs. Jennie Patrick Walker, soprano; Miss Clara Poole, alto; Mrs. Walter C. Wyman, alto; Mr. Edward Lloyd, tenor; Mr. Herbert O. Johnson, tenor; Mr. William Ludwig, bass; Dr. George R. Clark, bass. Mr. Carl Zerrahn, conductor. Mr. B. J. Lang, organist. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Franz Kneisel, principal.

Mme. Lehmann-Kalisch was fine in the soprano role, and her pronunciation was almost wholly free from any accent. She was especially good in the duet between The Widow and Elijah, "What have I to do with thee, O man of God," as her great dramatic ability was brought to play in this number. In the quartettes she was more effective, and the great soprano solo, "Hear ye, Israel," was magnificently sung. She was not so successful in the sentences assigned to The Youth, as the peculiar thin—almost falsetto—tone she adopted seemed out of place. Whatever her theory was—and so true a musician as she is must have thought it out—the effect was disappointing. Miss Clara Poole has been so seriously ill during nearly the whole winter that all allowance was due to her, but she did not need to make any especial apologies. It is true that the celebrated number, "Oh, Rest in the Lord," did not, under her treatment, make the effect which might have been justly expected of this popular favorite; but her indisposition more than excused this. On the contrary, all the sentences assigned to The Angel were admirably sung and with keen dramatic appreciation of the necessities of recitative declamation, and in the quartettes she was excellent. Mrs. Walker was very good in the quartettes, and these three ladies sang the beautiful "Lift thine eyes" exquisitely. A finer example of unaccompanied singing of the most highly artistic kind could hardly be conceived, and the pitch was held with mathematic accuracy. Mrs. Wyman sang her quartette parts with the greatest care and musical understanding, as the true artist is bound to do even in the smallest parts, and the little duet with Mrs. Walker, "Zion spreadeth her hands for aid," was delightfully sung by these two ladies.

The leading tenor part of "Elijah" is not very long nor very grateful, therefore the public did not have much opportunity to learn more of Mr. Lloyd than that he has a beautiful voice and that he is one of the most artistic singers who has ever been heard in this country. His rendering of the "Then shall the righteous shine forth" was very fine, and that exquisite phrase, "See now he sleepeth beneath a juniper tree," was sung faultlessly. Mr. Johnson and Dr. Clark were both very good in the quartettes. And now let us say at last that Mr. Ludwig's Elijah was simply a masterpiece. He was most enthusiastically received, but on one or two occasions one could hardly help wondering why even our cold Boston audience did not forget itself and rise to its feet shouting "Bravo, bravissimo." His voice is splendid, and, above all, full and manly, and his phrasing is simply a study. For example, where in the second part the phrase appears, "Tarry here, my servant, the Lord be with thee; I journey hence to the wilderness," a climax of perfect singing was reached which was almost a revelation. Many celebrated baritones have scored great and deserved successes in this part, but no one has ever surpassed Mr. Ludwig in the artistic, intuitive and yet in many instances wholly original reading which he gives to the part. His Elijah is not a dress-coated vocalist, singing on the stage of a concert hall. It is a living, breathing man, it is an evident and human dramatic personage. He carries you with him to the desert. And you stand at his side quivering with excitement as he challenges the priests of Baal to the trial which results in the overthrow of their false gods and the victory of the God of Israel. His singing simply dissolves his surroundings and makes oratorio real; and if there were more singers who had this priceless gift the great oratorios could be presented to the public like wholly new works. It is unnecessary to speak in detail, for it was all magnificent, but it may at least be said that his rendering of "It is enough" will not soon be forgotten by any true music lover who heard last night's concert.

The chorus was on the whole very good. On one or two occasions the attack was a little unsteady, which was rather surprising in so well known a work, and there was no real pianissimo during the evening, and thus several effects were lost. But on the whole it was remarkably fine chorus work, and all praise is due to Mr. Zerrahn, not only for his excellent training of the singers, but for the competent and spirited manner in which he conducted the whole performance. The orchestra played finely, although on one or two occasions the trombones were somewhat aggressive, and Mr. Lang presided over the organ in his well-known artistic manner. The second performance of the festival will be given tomorrow night, on which occasion will be presented the first and second parts of Bach's Christmas oratorio, certain solos from Haydn's Creation, and Mr. J. C. D. Parker's cantata "St. John," dedicated to the society, the soloists being Mme. Nordica, Miss Emily Winant, Mr. Edward Lloyd and Mr. Myron W. Whitney.

ARTHUR WELD.

Boston Evening Transcript.

MONDAY, APRIL 7, 1890.

THE HANDEL AND HAYDN FESTIVAL.

The Handel and Haydn Society began the Festival celebrating its seventy-fifth anniversary in the Music Hall last evening with a performance of Mendelssohn's "Elijah." The solo singers were: Mrs. Lilli Lehmann-Kalisch (soprano), Mrs. Jennie Patrick Walker (soprano), Miss Clara Poole (alto), Mrs. Walter C. Wyman (alto), Mr. Edward Lloyd (tenor), Mr. Herbert O. Johnson (tenor), Mr. William Ludwig (bass) and Dr. George R. Clark (bass). Mr. Carl Zerrahn conducted and Mr. B. J. Lang was at the organ.

So generally fine a performance of the "Elijah" has not been given here for some time. The chorus sang with great steadiness and vigor, and, now and then, with more care for light and shade and for the bringing out of special accents than we remember yet to have heard them. Naturally the more favorite choruses went best, such as the "Baal" choruses, "Thanks be to God" and "Behold, God the Lord passed by." "Blessed are the men who fear Him" suffered a little from a too rapid tempo; it was far better than dragging, but still a little too fast, to our thinking. "He, watching our Israel," on the other hand, went beautifully, and made a deep impression. The orchestra, with Mr. Franz Kneisel as leader, played, in general, very well indeed; a choral festival is not the occasion on which an orchestra shows itself to the best advantage—the surrounding mass of singers deadens its tone too much; but, taking this inevitable drawback into account, the orchestra produced a fine and satisfying effect. What has been done to that half-exiled something that calls itself an organ we do not know; but it seemed to us, now and then, that we could detect its voice in the choruses; which argues that something must have been done to it.

But, good as chorus and orchestra were, what especially distinguished the occasion as a festival performance was the general excellence of the solos. Chorus and orchestra we have always with us, but such an array of competent solo singers comes only with a musical high tide. Of the four principal singers, chief honors are due to Mr. Ludwig, who sang the part of the Prophet. Exception can be taken only to one item in his singing: his constant swelling his tone on almost every note that is long enough to be swelled at all, and the curious and by no means beautiful change in quality that his voice undergoes in the process. One can surmise that his aim is something like that "opening of the voice" which some Italian singers possess in perfection; but he does not do it well, his voice loses all its fine quality as soon as he swells his tone and becomes thin and dry, and he brings in this effect far too often in any case. But, apart from this trick, his singing was admirable indeed. His whole conception of the part showed rare insight. He sang with great dignity, with immense dramatic force when it was required, yet wholly without undue ranting. His pathos, too, was to the full as fine as his dramatic fire, and in the recitatives he was simply superb. Throughout, you felt the presence of a strong intelligence, a true artistic instinct and great personal magnetism. There have been few so good Elijahs here, and none more inspiring.

Mr. Lloyd impresses one rather as a satisfying than as an inspiring singer. His voice is beautiful, and he uses it like a master; moreover, he gives you the comforting sense that he is thoroughly and absolutely at home in his work, that he is implicitly to be relied on. His style is well-nigh impeccable, and he sings both with warmth and grace. Still, we have heard other tenors make somewhat more out of "If with all your hearts" and "Then shall the righteous" than he does, although we have possibly never heard these airs sung in better taste, nor with firmer artistic finish.

Mrs. Lehmann-Kalisch sang the soprano solos very beautifully indeed. Her grand voice was in perfect condition, and her singing full of nobility, dignity and beauty. One felt, to be sure, that she was working in an unaccustomed field, and was constantly mindful of doing nothing that should be out of keeping with the dignity of oratorio. The result was an occasional falling short of that thorough effectiveness that is so overmastering in her Brunnhilde or Sieglinde. There is something more in "Hear ye, Israel" and in the soprano part in "Holy, holy, holy," than she brings out. Yet her singing was wonderfully fine and artistic, and it is generally better to do too little in a work like "Elijah" than too much.

Miss Poole's voice has never sounded more beautiful than it did last evening; and her use of it was artistic in the extreme. Her singing of "Woe unto them" was very fine; in "Oh rest in the Lord," however, she was less satisfying. We suspect that her failure in this air was the result of her consenting to sing it a faster tempo than she herself felt to be proper, for she sang it almost mechanically and without expressiveness. We are led to this opinion by remembering that, of all the contraltos we have ever met, only one or two really wanted to sing this air fast enough; almost all of them have persisted in dragging it out miserably—as they do "He shall feed his flock," in the "Messiah"—and we cannot but think that Miss Poole felt in her heart of heart that it ought to go slower, and found herself unable to throw any expression into her singing at the tempo at which she took it. Still, the tempo in which she sang it was right, and we think that, with further study, she cannot fail to find a way to make it expressive.

The other artists sang admirably in the min[illegible] solos and the concerted pieces. Indeed, we have seldom heard these numbers go so well. The audience was a true "Elijah" audience, and literally thronged the hall; the Handel and Haydn could not have asked for a more propitious send-off.

The remainder of the festival is laid out as follows:

Second concert, tomorrow night, Bach's "Christmas Oratorio" and J. C. D. Parker's "Saint John," written for this festival; solos by Mme. Lillian Nordica, Miss Emily Winant and Messrs. Edward Lloyd and Myron W. Whitney. Between the two works, Mme. Nordica will sing "With Verdure Clad," and Mr. Lloyd "In Native Worth" from Haydn's "The Creation."

Third concert, Thursday night, Gounod's "The Redemption;" solos by Mrs. Jennie Patrick Walker, Misses Clementine De Vere and Emily Winant, and Messrs. Edward Lloyd, William Ludwig and Myron W. Whitney.

Fourth concert, next Sunday night, Handel's "Israel in Egypt"; solos by Misses Clementine De Vere and Clara Poole, and Messrs. Edward Lloyd, William Ludwig and Myron W. Whitney.

[103]

SUNDAY HER[illegible].

BOSTON, APRIL 6, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Although the programme at last evening's concert by the Boston symphony orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch conductor, contained no solo number, the selections made for the occasion proved so well chosen and so admirably contrasted that the event was a most enjoyable one. The overture to Cherubini's "Water Carrier" began the programme, and that to Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" ended it, with the familiar "Manfred" entr'acte and Cowen's "Scandinavian" symphony to complete the list. Mr. Nikisch was particularly happy in his reading of Cowen's fascinating symphony, all of its poetic ideas being brought out with a grace and skill that quite captivated all who heard. The second movement descriptive of a summer evening on the fjord was a tone poem of ideal beauty, and held the audience spell-bound during its performance. In sharp contrast with the work done in the symphony was that which gave the "Flying Dutchman" overture a performance that will be long remembered as a realization of all its possibilities to charm and delight even the stanchest opponent of the Wagnerian school. The performance of Reinecke's "Manfred," entr'acte, was another most successful effort by the orchestra under Mr. Nikisch's baton, and, although the familiar "Water Carrier" overture lost some of its charm by the exaggerated contrasts given in its reading, the concert, as a whole, was a pronounced success. Next Saturday the usual concert will be omitted, but the series will be resumed on the 18th inst., when the programme will include: Goldmark's overture, "Spring" (first time in Boston); Mozart's aria from "Die Entfuehrung aus dem Serail"; Volkmann's serenade, in D minor; some songs with piano, and Brahms' symphony No. 1, in C minor. The soloist will be Mme. Steinbach-Jahns.

The Handel and Haydn Festival an Assured Success.

The most sanguine expectations concerning the festival of the Handel and Haydn Society, given in commemoration of the 75th anniversary of the society's organization, promise to be realized, and the enterprise shown in planning this notable musical event will undoubtedly result most satisfactorily to all who have had to carry it to its completion. The festival consists of four performances, the first, Mendelssohn's "Elijah," being given this evening, followed by selections from Bach's "Christmas Oratorio," and the "St. John," by J. C. D. Parker, on Tuesday evening; "The Redemption" on Thursday evening, and "Israel" to close on Sunday evening next. The chorus of the society has been recruited up to its full strength, and will be supported by an orchestra of large proportions, with Mr. Carl Zerrahn as conductor, Mr. Franz Kneisel as leader, and Mr. B. J. Lang as organist. The soloists are as follows: Sopranos, Mrs. Lilli Lehmann-Kalisch, Mrs. Lillian Nordica, Miss Clementine de Vere, Mrs. Jennie Patrick Walker; tenors, Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr. Herbert O. Johnson; altos, Mrs. Walter C. Wyman, Miss Emily Winant, Miss Clara Poole; basses, Mr. Myron W. Whitney, Mr. William Ludwig, Dr. George R. Clark. Of the works chosen for performance during this festival, only one is unfamiliar to Boston audiences, the "St. John" having been composed for the festival by Mr. J. C. D. Parker at the request of the society. Mr. Parker, it will be remembered, did a similar service for the society in giving his "Redemption Hymn" to add to the interest of the fourth triennial festival in 1877, and his "St. John" will be heard with great interest by all who realize the sterling worth of Mr. Parker's abilities as a composer. The form of the "St. John" is that of a short cantata in six detached numbers illustrative of a few recorded incidents in the life of the apostle, and of his writings. There is too little material thus afforded to give a subject suited for treatment in oratorio form or for any strongly dramatic writing, and so these six numbers are merely of a suggestive character. With the exception of the last number, each portion of the work is preceded by a short chanting phrase, with rhythmical orchestral accompaniment, having always the same melody and sung by the male chorus in unison. The prelude to the sixth number, however, differs in that it is written for female voices only. The significance of the several portions of the work may be summarized as follows: The first number illustrates the description of the calling of the apostles, the second being given to the scene at the Lord's supper. In the third number the composer has found his subject in the scene of the crucifixion, and the fourth number is descriptive of an incident following the death on the cross; which concludes with a text from one of the Epistles. The last two numbers of the cantata serve to illustrate subjects taken from the Revelations, the fifth being built upon the text "And he showed me that great city, the Holy Jerusalem, descending out of Heaven," etc., and the final number upon the words "Behold I come quickly and my reward is with me," etc., and "They that be wise shall shine as the brightness," etc. The performance of Tuesday evening will have also other attractive features in the introduction of two solo selections from "The Creation," by Mr. Lloyd and Mme. Nordica. The great aria, "On Mighty Pens," will be sung by Mme. Nordica, and "In Native Worth" by Mr. Lloyd. There is one fact which should be borne in mind by all who are to attend these festival performances, and that is that the doors will positively be closed at sharp 7:30, and kept closed until the end of the first number, or until a pause can be made without detriment to the interest of the performance. In the performance of "The Elijah" this pause cannot be made until after the "Zion Spreadeth Her Hands," so that late comers will miss some very interesting numbers. The speed (?) of the rapid transit electric cars should be carefully estimated by all suburbans beforehand, if a prompt arrival at the hall is contemplated.

Boston Evening Transcript.

MONDAY, APRIL 7, 1890.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The programme of the twenty-second symphony concert was as follows:

Cherubini: Overture to "Les deux Journées."
Cowen; Symphony No. 3, in C minor, "Scandinavian."
Reinecke: Entr'acte from "König Manfred."
Wagner: Overture to "Der fliegende Holländer."

Almost the entire programme had been changed since the announcement on the Saturday before, and it was a pleasant surprise to find the concert beginning with Cherubini's "Les deux Journées.' The same composition does not make the same impression at all times; last Saturday evening we were, more than ever, impressed by a certain quality Cherubini shows in this overture, a quality which one does not find to such a degree in any of the composers who write nowadays, no matter what else may be found in them. This is a certain fine mastery in musical construction. Take two instances of it: the wonderful way in which he makes the transition from his first theme in E major (in the Allegro) to his second theme in G major, and the equally admirable manner in which he manages the return to the first theme, later on in the movement. This power of passing from one theme to another, from one mood to a wholly different one, without the slightest disruption of musical continuity is one of the finest results of that training to which almost all the great classic composers were subjected; but, sad to say, it seems almost a lost art today. And, whatever one's sympathies may be with certain tendencies and developments in more modern music, one still cannot but regret the almost disappearance of just this sort of mastery; for, as Heine well says, "The material only acquires its value from artistic shaping." The overture was splendidly played, the violins making their little accent in the second theme with just the right stress, and was heartily enjoyed.

Cowen's "Scandinavian" symphony made a finer impression than ever before. The last movement we still think a failure; in spite of all the strenuous work the composer has put into it, there is no real development, the music does not move onward and get anywhere, but keeps on violently marking time, and ends where it started. But the other movements, especially the Allegro and the Scherzo, show real invention, and are exceedingly interesting. This symphony, too, was admirably played.

The entre'acte from Reinecke's "König Manfred" is pleasant music to listen to, rather sentimental at times, if you will, and devoid of any especial nobility of inspiration, but unassuming and smoothly written.

In the overture to "Der Fliegende Holländer" Mr. Nikisch had one of his finest triumphs. When one thinks of how very horrible and disjointed, not to say vulgar, this work may be made to appear by an unintelligent and unsympathetic rendering, one's admiration for the superb results Mr. Nikisch achieved in it is only increased. With all the strenuousness of the playing, with all the immense volume and brilliancy of tone the orchestra gave forth, it never sounded merely noisy, and with all the frequent and unrestricted modifications of tempo, and contrasts of dynamic force Mr. Nikisch permitted himself, the music sounded more coherent than ever before. One felt its whole poetry and vigor; in a word, it was magnificent.

The next programme (to be given on April 19) is: Goldmark, overture, "Spring;" Mozart, aria from "Die Entführung aus dem Serail"; Volkmann, serenade in D minor; songs with piano. forte; Brahms, symphony No. 1, in C minor, Mme. Steinbach-Jahns will be the singer.

Boston Daily Traveller.

MONDAY, APRIL 7, 1890.

The Twenty-Second Symphony Concert.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme of the twenty-second symphony concert was:

Cherubini. Overture. "Water Carrier."
Cowen. Symphony No. 3, n C minor, "Scandinavian."
Reinecke. Entr'acte from "Manfred."
Wagner. Overture. "The Flying Dutchman."

There was no soloist. It was Mr. Nikisch's intention to play Frederick Cliffe's symphony last Saturday, and it is only temporarily that the younger Englishman gives place to the older—Mr. Cliffe's work will be heard next season. It is several years since Mr. Cowen's "Scandinavian" symphony has been heard here. It is decidedly his best orchestral work. It shows greater power, concentration of idea, and it has imaginative qualities that rank it higher than the "Welsh," the last symphony by this composer heard here. It is intended to be a "tone picture" of the rugged, melancholy North, and while the sentiment of the Englishman is not so deep or so earnestly vital as that of a true Norseman like Grieg, his "local color" comes very near being the real thing. The first movement is an admirable example of instrumental color; the themes are "worked" considerably, perhaps, on the whole, with too great elaboration. The adagio is a charming fancy; a Norse idyl. The scherzo is intended to give the idea of a sleighride; the contrasting trio is all too brief considering the exhilarating character of the ride. The finale has moments of emotional force; it has a certain frown on its surface; maybe it bears the spirit of Odin and the heroes of the Volsunga Sagas. The symphony is a fine work, and barring some inexact entrances of the woodwind was played in superb fashion.

The overture to one of Cherubini's operas was resolutely played, and that to Wagner's "The Flying Dutchman," received such a reading as to make one yearn for permanent opera under Mr. Nikisch with the Higginson orchestra as the cornerstone; it will come in due time. Why was it not one of the audience stirred from their seats after the symphony? We are such a curfew-respecting people that usually when nine o'clock arrives a percentage of the symphony audience wraps its mantle about itself and silently, sometimes with ostentation, steals away. Why is it no one stirred after the symphony, and only two or three aged persons after the treacly Reinecke piece? Why, because there remained to be heard something by Wagner! The name is one to conjure with! Wagner enchains us all; the "motif" crank and he who is only musically susceptible, Wagner holds absolutely. The next concert, last but one, will present as soloist Mme. Steinbach-Jahns of Leipzig, a soprano who is a great favorite there. This singer will accompany the orchestra upon its May tour of the central and Western States. The full programme for April 19, two weeks away, is: Goldmark, overture, "Spring" (first time in Boston); Mozart, aria from "Die Entfuehrung aus dem Serail;" Volkmann, serenade in D minor, songs with piano; Brahms, Symphony No. 1, in C minor.

BOSTON POST, MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 7, 189

MUSIC.

HANDEL AND HAYDN FESTIVAL—"ELIJAH."

That noble veteran musical society, the Händel and Haydn, has begun the festival of its seventy-fifth anniversary in right royal style, and there was no lack of enthusiasm and appreciation to prove that it has indeed the good will of the public. If Music Hall was ever "filled to the roof" it certainly was last night. There was not an inch of room anywhere, and the enthusiasts who stood up were packed together like sardines; still they seemed to have room enough to clap their hands, and they availed themselves of this possibility very often. All things considered, "Elijah" is the most popular of Mendelssohn's two oratorios. "St. Paul" is perhaps more grateful in some ways for the soloists, but the choruses in "Elijah" are on the whole much the finest. Everyone is familiar with the work and has heard it a number of times, and probably under all sorts of circumstances, but it is unlikely that a finer performance than last night's has ever been given in this vicinity. An examination of the following list of artists who took part in it will justify this statement:

Mrs. Lilli Lehmann-Kalisch, soprano; Mrs. Jennie Patrick Walker, soprano; Miss Clara Poole, alto; Mrs. Walter C. Wyman, alto; Mr. Edward Lloyd, tenor; Mr. Herbert O. Johnson, tenor; Mr. William Ludwig, bass; Dr. George R. Clark, bass. Mr. Carl Zerrahn, conductor. Mr. B. J. Lang, organist. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Franz Kneisel, principal.

Mme. Lehmann-Kalisch was fine in the soprano role, and her pronunciation was almost wholly free from any accent. She was especially good in the duet between The Widow and Elijah, "What have I to do with thee, O man of God," as her great dramatic ability was brought to play in this number. In the quartettes she was more effective, and the great soprano solo, "Hear ye, Israel," was magnificently sung. She was not so successful in the sentences assigned to The Youth, as the peculiar thin — almost falsetto — tone she adopted seemed out of place. Whatever her theory was—and so true a musician as she is must have thought it out—the effect was disappointing. Miss Clara Poole has been so seriously ill during nearly the whole winter that all allowance was due to her, but she did not need to make any especial apologies. It is true that the celebrated number, "Oh, Rest in the Lord," did not, under her treatment, make the effect which might have been justly expected of this popular favorite; but her indisposition more than excused this. On the contrary, all the sentences assigned to The Angel were admirably sung and with keen dramatic appreciation of the necessities of recitative declamation, and in the quartettes she was excellent. Mrs. Walker was very good in the quartettes, and these three ladies sang the beautiful "Lift thine eyes" exquisitely. A finer example of unaccompanied singing of the most highly artistic kind could hardly be conceived, and the pitch was held with mathematic accuracy. Mrs. Wyman sang her quartette parts with the greatest care and musical understanding, as the true artist is bound to do even in the smallest parts, and the little duet with Mrs. Walker, "Zion spreadeth her hands for aid," was delightfully sung by these two ladies.

The leading tenor part of "Elijah" is not very long nor very grateful, therefore the public did not have much opportunity to learn more of Mr. Lloyd than that he has a beautiful voice and that he is one of the most artistic singers who has ever been heard in this country. His rendering of the "Then shall the righteous shine forth" was very fine, and that exquisite phrase, "See now he sleepeth beneath a juniper tree," was sung faultlessly. Mr. Johnson and Dr. Clark were both very good in the quartettes. And now let us say at last that Mr. Ludwig's Elijah was simply a masterpiece. He was most enthusiastically received, but on one or two occasions one could hardly help wondering why even our cold Boston audience did not forget itself and rise to its feet shouting "Bravo, bravissimo." His voice is splendid, and, above all, full and manly, and his phrasing is simply a study. For example, where in the second part the phrase appears, "Tarry here, my servant, the Lord be with thee; I journey hence to the wilderness," a climax of perfect singing was reached which was almost a revelation. Many celebrated baritones have scored great and deserved successes in this part, but no one has ever surpassed Mr. Ludwig in the artistic, intuitive and yet in many instances wholly original reading which he gives to the part. His Elijah is not a dress-coated vocalist, singing on the stage of a concert hall. It is a living, breathing man, it is an evident and human dramatic personage. He carries you with him to the desert. And you stand at his side quivering with excitement as he challenges the priests of Baal to the trial which results in the overthrow of their false gods and the victory of the God of Israel. His singing simply dissolves his surroundings and makes oratorio real; and if there were more singers who had this priceless gift the great oratorios could be presented to the public like wholly new works. It is unnecessary to speak in detail, for it was all magnificent, but it may at least be said that his rendering of "It is enough" will not soon be forgotten by any true music lover who heard last night's concert.

The chorus was on the whole very good. On one or two occasions the attack was a little unsteady, which was rather surprising in so well known a work, and there was no real pianissimo during the evening, and thus several effects were lost. But on the whole it was remarkably fine chorus work, and all praise is due to Mr. Zerrahn, not only for his excellent training of the singers, but for the competent and spirited manner in which he conducted the whole performance. The orchestra played finely, although on one or two occasions the trombones were somewhat aggressive, and Mr. Lang presided over the organ in his well-known artistic manner. The second performance of the festival will be given tomorrow night, on which occasion will be presented the first and second parts of Bach's Christmas oratorio, certain solos from Haydn's Creation, and Mr. J. C. D. Parker's cantata "St. John," dedicated to the society, the soloists being Mme. Nordica, Miss Emily Winant, Mr. Edward Lloyd and Mr. Myron W. Whitney.

ARTHUR WELD.

Boston Evening Transcript.

MONDAY, APRIL 7, 1890.

THE HANDEL AND HAYDN FESTIVAL.

The Handel and Haydn Society began the Festival celebrating its seventy-fifth anniversary in the Music Hall last evening with a performance of Mendelssohn's "Elijah." The solo singers were: Mrs. Lilli Lehmann-Kalisch (soprano), Mrs. Jennie Patrick Walker (soprano), Miss Clara Poole (alto), Mrs. Walter C. Wyman (alto), Mr. Edward Lloyd (tenor), Mr. Herbert O. Johnson (tenor), Mr. William Ludwig (bass) and Dr. George R. Clark (bass). Mr. Carl Zerrahn conducted and Mr. B. J. Lang was at the organ.

So generally fine a performance of the "Elijah" has not been given here for some time. The chorus sang with great steadiness and vigor, and, now and then, with more care for light and shade and for the bringing out of special accents than we remember yet to have heard them. Naturally the more favorite choruses went best, such as the "Baal" choruses, "Thanks be to God" and "Behold, God the Lord passed by." "Blessed are the men who fear Him" suffered a little from a too rapid tempo; it was far better than dragging, but still a little too fast, to our thinking. "He, watching our Israel," on the other hand, went beautifully, and made a deep impression. The orchestra, with Mr. Franz Kneisel as leader, played, in general, very well indeed; a choral festival is not the occasion on which an orchestra shows itself to the best advantage—the surrounding mass of singers deadens its tone too much; but, taking this inevitable drawback into account, the orchestra produced a fine and satisfying effect. What has been done to that half-exiled something that calls itself an organ we do not know; but it seemed to us, now and then, that we could detect its voice in the choruses; which argues that something must have been done to it.

But, good as chorus and orchestra were, what especially distinguished the occasion as a festival performance was the general excellence of the solos. Chorus and orchestra we have always with us, but such an array of competent solo singers comes only with a musical high tide. Of the four principal singers, chief honors are due to Mr. Ludwig, who sang the part of the Prophet. Exception can be taken only to one item in his singing: his constant swelling his tone on almost every note that is long enough to be swelled at all, and the curious and by no means beautiful change in quality that his voice undergoes in the process. One can surmise that his aim is something like that "opening of the voice" which some Italian singers possess in perfection; but he does not do it well, his voice loses all its fine quality as soon as he swells his tone and becomes thin and dry, and he brings in this effect far too often in any case. But, apart from this trick, his singing was admirable indeed. His whole conception of the part showed rare insight. He sang with great dignity, with immense dramatic force when it was required, yet wholly without undue ranting. His pathos, too, was to the full as fine as his dramatic fire, and in the recitatives he was simply superb. Throughout, you felt the presence of a strong intelligence, a true artistic instinct and great personal magnetism. There have been few so good Elijahs here, and none more inspiring.

Mr. Lloyd impresses one rather as a satisfying than as an inspiring singer. His voice is beautiful, and he uses it like a master; moreover, he gives you the comforting sense that he is thoroughly and absolutely at home in his work, that he is implicitly to be relied on. His style is well-nigh impeccable, and he sings both with warmth and grace. Still, we have heard other tenors make somewhat more out of "If with all your hearts" and "Then shall the righteous" than he does, although we have possibly never heard these airs sung in better taste, nor with firmer artistic finish.

Mrs. Lehmann-Kalisch sang the soprano solos very beautifully indeed. Her grand voice was in perfect condition, and her singing full of nobility, dignity and beauty. One felt, to be sure, that she was working in an unaccustomed field, and was constantly mindful of doing nothing that should be out of keeping with the dignity of oratorio. The result was an occasional falling short of that thorough effectiveness that is so overmastering in her Brunnhilde or Sieglinde. There is something more in "Hear ye, Israel" and in the soprano part in "Holy, holy, holy," than she brings out. Yet her singing was wonderfully fine and artistic, and it is generally better to do too little in a work like "Elijah" than too much.

Miss Poole's voice has never sounded more beautiful than it did last evening; and her use of it was artistic in the extreme. Her singing of "Woe unto them" was very fine; in "Oh rest in the Lord," however, she was less satisfying. We suspect that her failure in this air was the result of her consenting to sing it a faster tempo than she herself felt to be proper, for she sang it almost mechanically and without expressiveness. We are led to this opinion by remembering that, of all the contraltos we have ever met, only one or two really wanted to sing this air fast enough; almost all of them have persisted in dragging it out miserably—as they do "He shall feed his flock," in the "Messiah"—and we cannot but think that Miss Poole felt in her heart of heart that it ought to go slower, and found herself unable to throw any expression into her singing at the tempo at which she took it. Still, the tempo in which she sang it was right, and we think that, with further study, she cannot fail to find a way to make it expressive.

The other artists sang admirably in the minor solos and the concerted pieces. Indeed, we have seldom heard these numbers go so well. The audience was a true "Elijah" audience, and literally thronged the hall; the Handel and Haydn could not have asked for a more propitious send-off.

The remainder of the festival is laid out as follows:

Second concert, tomorrow night, Bach's "Christmas Oratorio" and J. C. D. Parker's "Saint John," written for this festival; solos by Mme. Lillian Nordica, Miss Emily Winant and Messrs. Edward Lloyd and Myron W. Whitney. Between the two works, Mme. Nordica will sing "With Verdure Clad," and Mr. Lloyd "In Native Worth" from Haydn's "The Creation."

Third concert, Thursday night, Gounod's "The Redemption;" solos by Mrs. Jennie Patrick Walker, Misses Clementine De Vere and Emily Winant, and Messrs. Edward Lloyd, William Ludwig and Myron W. Whitney.

Fourth concert, next Sunday night, Handel's "Israel in Egypt"; solos by Misses Clementine De Vere and Clara Poole, and Messrs. Edward Lloyd, William Ludwig and Myron W. Whitney.

[103]

MONDAY, APRIL 7.

The Oratorio.

The Handel and Haydn Society must take for granted our congratulations on their seventy-fifth birthday, as we have hardly space enough in wh ch duly to credit the features of the initial concert of the festival with which it commemorates its advanced and mature age. It has a record such as no other existing choral organizat on of the country has, it has steadily and intelligently fought the good fight for the perpetuation of only the best music, and today deserves the encomiums which are everywhere showered upon it. Public interest in the anniversary has been very great, so it was no surprise last night to find Music Hall packed to its utmost limit, and by an audience the counterpart of which in musical intelligence it is not possible to duplicate in the country. The seating arrangement of the chorus is somewhat changed from former years; the tiers do not reach so high in air, while almost all the singers are brought to face the conductor and audience. The only attempt at decoration in the hall was a symbollic pad back of the statue of Beethoven, upon which were several shields showing the society's name, date of organization and age. As Mr. Zerrahn and the several leading soloists appeared on the platform before the performance, each was greeted by the chorus with applause, indicative of their individual popularity. The list of artists and participants is: Mrs. Lilli Lehmann Kalisch, Mrs. Jennie Patrick Walker, sopranos; Miss Clara Poole, Mrs. Walter C. Wyman, alto's; Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr. Herbert O. Johnson, tenors; Mr. William Ludwig, Dr. George R. Clark, basses; Mr. Carl Zerrahn, conductor; Mr. B. J. Lang, organist; about 60 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra (Mr. Franz Kneisel, leader.)

It almost takes one's breath away to read the list of principals, which, gauged by the public esteem in which each is held, has never been equalled in this country, at least for a performance of Mendelssohn's most popular oratorio. Our attention is first claimed by the chorus, which must have comprised over five hundred voices. It sang, all in all, with surprising sureness and effect, and with a rich tone quality, especially the tenors and sopranos. The esprit of the situation, the enthusiasm begotten by the occasion, seemed to possess each chorister. There were no false entrances. The "attack" was excellent, in some cases superb, and there was shown a greater regard for expression than we have ever heard from the society. The possibilities of expression are by no means exhausted, but for reasons which can be imagined by constant readers of this column we do not care to discuss them on so joyful an occasion. We must remark one fault, which in the "Thanks be to God" chorus was very evident; that is the lessened volume of tone that arises in forceful passages because the singers do not breathe often enough and irregularly; in the first passage of semitones in the chorus named, by the time the altos had reached their entrance the basses were pretty nearly out of breath, and instead of a fine foundation tone there was very little that was audible; on the repeat the effect was better, but it only happened so. Mr. Zerrahn should not permit 100 basses to breathe together in such a place. This is a point of importance which we shall continue to reiterate. The least good work of the chorus was in "The Fire Descends." There is no need to particularize, for, as we have said, the chorus sang nobly, and fully realized the expectations of the public For the first time in the history of the society the basses are what they ought to be, while the tenors, Heav'n bless them! were fine at all points, even excelling in promptness that little Balaclava group of 27 that saved the last Cincinnati festival from dire disaster. The sopranos were good and the altos. It should be said that the oratorio was given in its entirety.

Of the soloists we take a sort of selfish pleasure in saying that the attributes of the two leading men singers who appeared for the first time in this city in oratorio, Mr. Lloyd and Mr. Ludwig, have been fully discussed in this paper and over our signature. We wrote of Mr. Lloyd from Cincinnati in 1888, and of Mr. Ludwig's Prophet when he sang the part for Mr. Jordan's Arion Club in Providence two years ago. Mr. Lloyd's voice has lost little if any in quality since we last heard him. Compared with an organ like Ravelli's, his is less clear; throaty, to be blunt; but compared with any oratorio singer now before the public, the quality of his voice is superior, as is his style and whole oratorio manner. As Mr. Lloyd will sing thrice more during the Festival, we will reserve further comment, suffice it to say that his singing of the two arias amply satisfied the audience, which lavished great applause upon him. Mr. Ludwig's singing of the part of Elijah has many vocal faults, which it would be folly to deny; but he brings to bear upon it so fine a comprehension, he is so noble, so thrilling, so pathetic, and so splendid, that the artist towers above the vocalist. Ludwig's singing is so sincere; we do not know its like in this respect. The effect of his work in the Baal scenes and in the two principal arias was electrical, and the applause was mighty. Of Lehmann we scarce ever can speak without superlatives. She belongs in "Tristan," and in "Siegfried;" she is the child of a kingly race, a noble artist. We insist that on the concert stage she is as a chained creature, but how superb her work was in "Hear, ye, Israel," and in the scenes with Elijah! We shall have Lehmann with us for two weeks; Heaven be praised! Miss Poole did all the alto solo work, and although her phras-

[illegible] to measure for [illegible] and fervent manner were telling and effective. The second quartet had more prominence than is often the case, Mrs. Walker and Mrs. Wyman singing the duet, Mr. Johnson in "Cast thy Burden" and the part of Ahab; Dr. Clark in "O come every one that thirsteth," etc. The concerted solo music was never so well sung in this city; the double quartet, "Lift thine eyes," "Holy, Holy," were expressive and artistic. The orchestra played finely at all points. Mr. Zerrahn was at his best, and Mr. Lang did all that was possible with the organ in the pigeon hole. Mr. Zerrahn received a laurel wreath. It was an auspicious beginning.

The remainder of the Festival concert scheme is: Tuesday evening, April 8, Bach's Christmas Oratorio, I. II., solos by Mme. Nordica and Mr. Lloyd, from Haydn's "The Creation," and J. C. D. Parker's "Saint John" (composed for this occasion); soloists, Mrs. Lillian Nordica, Miss Emily Winant, Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr. Myron W. Whitney. Thursday evening, April 10, Gounod's "The Redemption;" soloists, Miss Clementine de Vere, Mrs. Jennie Patrick Walker, Miss Emily Winant, Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr. William Ludwig, Mr. Myron W. Whitney. Sunday evening, April 13, Handel's "Israel in Egypt"; soloists, Miss Clementine de Vere, Miss Clara Poole, Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr. William Ludwig, Mr. Myron W. Whitney.

G. H. WILSON.

Clipping from News Taunton, Mass

Date 4/5

—The Boston Symphony Orchestra is the greatest orchestra in the world, and there is no conductor who has received the salary which Herr Nikitch gets. He has astonished all who have ever seen him. He conducts an entire program entirely without notes.

—Every piano pupil in the city should hear Aus Der Ohe the great pianist at the Symphony concert. It will be worth nearly as much as a quarter's lessons.

Clipping from Gazette Taunton Mass

Date 4/5

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is acknowledged to be the finest in the world, and there is no conductor in the world who receives anywhere near so large a salary as does Herr Nikisch, the popular conductor of the Symphony Orchestra.

M. E. Leathe, the manager of the [illegible]

Journal, Minneapolis, MINN

Date 4/5

SEVENTY STRONG

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Coming—A Souvenir Program.

Headquarters in the interest of the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is to give a grand concert at the University Coliseum, May 12, have been opened at 409 Nicollet av. The orchestra numbers 70 members, and under the direction of the great Herr Nikisch, renders some of the finest music it is ever the good fortune of mortals to listen to. For soloist the management offers the leading dramatic prima donna of Germany, Madame Steinbach-Jahns, of the Leipzig opera house, who comes to America especially for this tour.

Louis Miller, the local manager, is now at work upon a handsome souvenir program. Besides pictures of Herr Nikisch and Madame Steinbach, it will contain a sketch of their careers, a history of the organization, its personnel, a review of the Boston season, including every program played by the orchestra at Music Hall, and the program to be played at the Coliseum, with historical and analytical notes, prepared by G. H. Wilson, the Boston critic.

BOSTON HERALD.

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 9, 1890.

The H. and H. Festival---"St. John" Greatly Enjoyed.

The Triumphs of Mme. Nordica and Edward Lloyd at Music Hall.

The second of the four performances making up the festival scheme of the Handel and Haydn Society, on the occasion of the 75th anniversary of its organization, was given at Music Hall last evening. The works chosen for this occasion were a cantata, "St. John," written for the festival by Mr. J. C. D. Parker, organist and director of music at Trinity Church in this city, and the first and second part of Bach's Christmas oratorio. As an additional attraction, two solo selections were added, these being "On Mighty Pens," from "The Creation," sung by Mme. Lillian Nordica, and "In Native Worth," from the same oratorio, sung by Mr. Edward Lloyd. The other soloists making the quartet of the evening were Miss Emily Winant and Mr. M. W. Whitney, with Mr. B. J. Lang at the organ and Mr. Carl Zerrahn as conductor. The mysterious laws governing the patronage of the Boston public in the line of musical enterprises have always puzzled the most expert managers, and the results attending this performance, from the "box office" point of view, afford another puzzle for experts to explain. The board of government, by its committee, felt that a place should be given some Boston composer in such a festival, and solicited Mr. Parker to supply some composition to make a part of the festival offering. His acceptance and the nature of this offering have been given widespread publicity as a chief element of interest in the week's performances. The high standing of Mr. Parker in every way justified his choice, and it was naturally expected that local interest in this event would make the second concert a very strong attraction. Many who "write for the papers" and many others who wish they could constantly assert that what the Boston public demands is novelty, something that has not been "done to death." Well, last evening this dear public had a novelty offered for its hearing, and a most attractive novelty, by a native musician, and it simply neglected its opportunities. There was an audience of goodly numbers, but the cash receipts fell far below those of the 48th performance here in 40 years of "Elijah," and both the other performances later in the week will give far better financial returns.

The selection made from Bach's "Christmas oratorio" made the first part of the programme, the work having been heard here on two former occasions. The many beauties of this oratorio need not be told of again. It abounds in the simple, direct musical utterances of its famed composer, and makes an appeal to the heart of the listener by its inspired melodies. The chorales are a study for all time, and the pastoral symphony, a gem of orchestration which will always be regarded as an example of the pure classics in music. The soloists chosen for the work were well suited to the severe, though limited, demands put upon them. Mme. Nordica had but the single solo of the Angel, but this was delivered with excellent effect. Miss Winant is peculiarly suited to the alto solos of the oratorio, her rich sympathetic voice and faultless phrasing giving these numbers a marked prominence in the performance. Mr. Lloyd was, apparently, much more at ease than upon the occasion of his first appearance here, and his voice was certainly in much better form. His reading of the trying recitatives and the delivery of the air "Haste Ye Shepherds" were examples of oratorio singing which have seldom been equalled by any singer heard here. The great difficulties of the bass solo, "Mighty Lord and King" were met with remarkable ease by the veteran M. W. Whitney, who has no equal in such a class of work at the present day. The chorus, despite certain evidences of fatigue shown by the sopranos early in the evening and also in the choral, "For Us to Earth," did remarkably good work in all the difficult chorals. The symphony was played with a faultlessness which compelled a round of applause despite the proprieties.

In the "On Mighty Pens," Mme. Nordica gave a fine exhibition of her strength as an oratorio singer, and her interpretation of this familiar number gave great enjoyment to all. The tenor solo "In Native Worth" equally displayed the gifts of Mr. Lloyd as an oratorio artist of the most pronounced abilities. Both singers gained an immense ovation after these numbers, and the recalls were attended with what were literally "thunders of applause," the men of the chorus using their boot heels, apparently, with deafening effect to add to the demonstration.

The performance was ended with Mr. Parker's "St. John," which has been given the form of a short cantata by the composer, the work being made in six parts, illustrative of a few recorded incidents in the life of the apostle and of his writings. There is too little material thus afforded to give a subject suited for treatment in oratorio form or for any strongly dramatic writing, and so these six numbers are merely of a suggestive character. With the exception of the last number, each portion of the work is preceded by a short chanting phrase, with rhythmical orchestral accompaniment, having always the same melody and sung by the male chorus in unison. The prelude to the sixth number, however, differs in that it is written for female voices only. The significance of the several portions of the work may be summarized as follows: The first number illustrates the description of the calling of the apostles, the second being given to the scene at the Lord's supper. In the third number the composer has found his subject in the scene of the crucifixion, and the fourth number is descriptive of an incident following the death on the cross; which concludes with a text from one of the Epistles. The last two numbers of the cantata serve to illustrate subjects taken from the Revelation, the fifth being built upon the text "And he showed me that great city, the Holy Jerusalem, descending out of Heaven," etc., and the final number upon the words. "Behold I come quickly and my reward is with me," etc., and "They that be wise shall shine as the brightness," etc. Mr. Parker conducted his work personally, and gained a most hearty greeting upon taking his position at the director's desk. The cantata is the work of a thoroughly conservative musician, who uses the simple direct forms of the old school, and utilizes with rare skill modern ideas in their treatment. A thorough knowledge is shown of the use of both voice and orchestra to gain desired results, and, in a word, the work is one that gives solid satisfaction upon even a first hearing. The beautiful solo for contralto was sung with charming taste and expression by Miss Winant, and the final solo for soprano gave Mme. Nordica a grand dramatic opportunity, her voice rising true and clear above the chorus and orchestra. The quartet, "Now Are We the Sons of God," is one of the chief beauties of the work, and the duet for tenor and soprano, "And There Shall Be No More Curse," was equally enjoyable. The orchestral writing in the cantata is full of originality, and adds a most important element to the beauties of the work. Every number was applauded with marked enthusiasm, and the composer, who has certainly honored his native city in this production, has every reason for pride in the [illegible] work. The remaining [illegible] Tuesday night, April 15, Gounod's

Boston Daily Globe.

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 9.

ORATORIO AND OPERA.

A New Cantata by a Boston Composer.

"St. John" Supplements Bach's Classic in Music Hall.

A new work by a Boston composer is not so often offered to the attention of a Boston audience that its performance can be ranked among the ordinary events of a musical season. In presenting J. C. D. Parker's cantata, "St. John," therefore, the Handel and Haydn Society invested the second of its anniversary festival concerts with peculiar interest and significance.

In its flow of smooth, "melodious measures" this new work gives evidence throughout of rare musicianly skill. Mr. Parker has not, indeed, cut loose from tradition and convention. But he has used the old forms effectively and well. It is true that he might have given more contrast of character in the music—even a cantata like this need not always be on the same plane. As a whole, however, the "St. John" will certainly take rank as a valuable addition to the not-too-numerous works of this order that possess undoubted merit.

The prelude, a slow movement in which the string orchestra finds constant opportunity for the presentation of harmony and breadth of tone, suddenly gives place to the opening chorus. A lovely accompaniment sets off this number, "How beautiful upon the mountains," as each part in turn takes up the melodious theme. Mr. Parker uses the orchestra with admirable effect throughout the cantata. It is not, however, until the soprano solo, "He that is mighty," that the strings are supplemented by the brass; and the composer yields at no point to the temptation to overuse orchestral effects. Bach's method is followed in several of the choruses, notably in that beginning, "For the Lord God giveth them light." But here, as in the inspiring finale, the composer has risen above what is merely scholastic and academic. A quartet, partly unaccompanied, partly accompanied, and a charming duet for soprano and tenor should be noted as among the best features of the cantata.

Mr. Parker conducted his own work with much energy. The singers of the Handel and Haydn followed his baton very well, for the most part. Particularly fine was the performance of "For the Lord God" and "They that be wise." All the intricacies and involutions of the score offered no difficulties that were not courageously surmounted.

Mme. Lillian Nordica, who sang with great purity and clearness of tone, gained warmest applause after her solo. Her part in the finale was admirably sustained, also. Miss Winant was not, unfortunately, in her best voice early in the evening, but the "Eye hath not seen" found at her hands a sympathetic and artistic interpretation. Mr. Lloyd's voice blended happily with Mme. Nordica's in the lovely duet, which evoked a great deal of applause. If the quartet—including Mr. Whitney—was not quite so fortunate, there was attained, nevertheless, a very decided success with the audience.

Bach's Christmas oratorio, Parts I. and II., were chosen to open the programme. It may be heresy to the ears of some to say that the work seemed dull. But certainly, excepting the grand chorals, there was very little to inspire enthusiasm in the "classic" as performed yesterday evening. The distinguished soloists could not here appear to advantage. Mme. Nordica's opportunity was limited to the brief song of the angel. Miss Winant was by no means at her best, and Mr. Whitney has often been heard to more effect. Even Mr. Lloyd's singing seemed lacking in power, though it was as admirable in quality as ever. The chorus, however, acquitted itself with decided honor, the "Glory to God," being perhaps its best achievement in the oratorio.

It was a very apt thought of the management that introduced, midway in the programme, two solos from "The Creation." Mme. Nordica contributed with great brilliancy and delicacy of execution the air, "On mighty fens." In the familiar "Native worth," Mr. Lloyd justified all that has been said in commendation of the expressiveness, smoothness and sympathetic quality of his singing. Both artists were recalled with real enthusiasm by the audience, which was large despite the storm.

Gounod's "Redemption" is chosen for the next festival concert tomorrow night. The solo parts are entrusted to Miss Clementine DeVere, Mrs. Jennie Patrick Walker, Miss Emily Winant, Mr. Lloyd, Mr. Ludwig and Mr. Whitney. "Israel in Egypt" will close the series on Sunday evening.

[104]

[104]

DAILY TRAVELLER,

MONDAY, APRIL 7.

The Oratorio.

The Handel and Haydn Society must take for granted our congratulations on their seventy-fifth birthday, as we have hardly space enough in which duly to credit the features of the initial concert of the festival with which it commemorates its advanced and mature age. It has a record such as no other existing choral organization of the country has, it has steadily and intelligently fought the good fight for the perpetuation of only the best music, and today deserves the encomiums which are everywhere showered upon it. Public interest in the anniversary has been very great, so it was no surprise last night to find Music Hall packed to its utmost limit, and by an audience the counterpart of which in musical intelligence it is not possible to duplicate in the country. The seating arrangement of the chorus is somewhat changed from former years; the tiers do not reach so high in air, while almost all the singers are brought to face the conductor and audience. The only attempt at decoration in the hall was a symbollic pad back of the statue of Beethoven, upon which were several shields showing the society's name, date of organization and age. As Mr. Zerrahn and the several leading soloists appeared on the platform before the performance, each was greeted by the chorus with applause, indicative of their individual popularity. The list of artists and participants is: Mrs. Lilli Lehmann Kalisch, Mrs. Jennie Patrick Walker, sopranos; Miss Clara Poole, Mrs. Walter C. Wyman, alto's; Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr. Herbert O. Johnson, tenors; Mr. William Ludwig, Dr. George R. Clark, basses; Mr. Carl Zerrahn, conductor; Mr. B. J. Lang, organist; about 60 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra (Mr. Franz Kneisel, leader.)

It almost takes one's breath away to read the list of principals, which, gauged by the public esteem in which each is held, has never been equalled in this country, at least for a performance of Mendelssohn's most popular oratorio. Our attention is first claimed by the chorus, which must have comprised over five hundred voices. It sang, all in all, with surprising sureness and effect, and with a rich tone quality, especially the tenors and sopranos. The esprit of the situation, the enthusiasm begotten by the occasion, seemed to possess each chorister. There were no false entrances. The "attack" was excellent, in some cases superb, and there was shown a greater regard for expression than we have ever heard from the society. The possibilities of expression are by no means exhausted, but for reasons which can be imagined by constant readers of this column we do not care to discuss them on so joyful an occasion. We must remark one fault, which in the "Thanks be to God" chorus was very evident; that is the lessened volume of tone that arises in forceful passages because the singers do not breathe often enough and irregularly; in the first passage of semitones in the chorus named, by the time the altos had reached their entrance the basses were pretty nearly out of breath, and instead of a fine foundation tone there was very little that was audible; on the repeat the effect was better, but it only happened so. Mr. Zerrahn should not permit 100 basses to breathe together in such a place. This is a point of importance which we shall continue to reiterate. The least good work of the chorus was in "The Fire Descends." There is no need to particularize, for, as we have said, the chorus sang nobly, and fully realized the expectations of the public For the first time in the history of the society the basses are what they ought to be, while the tenors, Heav'n bless them! were fine at all points, even excelling in promptness that little Balaclava group of 27 that saved the last Cincinnati festival from dire disaster. The sopranos were good and the altos. It should be said that the oratorio was given in its entirety.

Of the soloists we take a sort of selfish pleasure in saying that the attributes of the two leading men singers who appeared for the first time in this city in oratorio, Mr. Lloyd and Mr. Ludwig, have been fully discussed in this paper and over our signature. We wrote of Mr. Lloyd from Cincinnati in 1888, and of Mr. Ludwig's Prophet when he sang the part for Mr. Jordan's Arion Club in Providence two years ago. Mr. Lloyd's voice has lost little if any in quality since we last heard him. Compared with an organ like Ravelli's, his is less clear; throaty, to be blunt; but compared with any oratorio singer now before the public, the quality of his voice is superior, as is his style and whole oratorio manner. As Mr. Lloyd will sing thrice more during the Festival, we will reserve further comment, suffice it to say that his singing of the two arias amply satisfied the audience, which lavished great applause upon him. Mr. Ludwig's singing of the part of Elijah has many vocal faults, which it would be folly to deny; but he brings to bear upon it so fine a comprehension, he is so noble, so thrilling, so pathetic, and so splendid, that the artist towers above the vocalist. Ludwig's singing is so sincere; we do not know its like in this respect. The effect of his work in the Baal scenes and in the two principal arias was electrical, and the applause was mighty. Of Lehmann we scarce ever can speak without superlatives. She belongs in "Tristan," and in "Siegfried;" she is the child of a kingly race, a noble artist. We insist that on the concert stage she is as a chained creature, but how superb her work was in "Hear, ye, Israel," and in the scenes with Elijah! We shall have Lehmann with us for two weeks; Heaven be praised! Miss Poole did all the alto solo work, and although her phrasing was open to censure her beautiful voice and fervent manner were telling and effective. The second quartet had more prominence than is often the case, Mrs. Walker and Mrs. Wyman singing the duet, Mr. Johnson in "Cast thy Burden" and the part of Ahab; Dr. Clark in "O come every one that thirsteth," etc. The concerted solo music was never so well sung in this city; the double quartet, "Lift thine eyes," "Holy, Holy," were expressive and artistic. The orchestra played finely at all points. Mr. Zerrahn was at his best, and Mr. Lang did all that was possible with the organ in the pigeon hole. Mr. Zerrahn received a laurel wreath. It was an auspicious beginning.

The remainder of the Festival concert scheme is: Tuesday evening, April 8, Bach's Christmas Oratorio, I. II., solos by Mme. Nordica and Mr. Lloyd, from Haydn's "The Creation," and J. C. D. Parker's "Saint John" (composed for this occasion); soloists, Mrs. Lillian Nordica, Miss Emily Winant, Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr. Myron W. Whitney. Thursday evening, April 10, Gounod's "The Redemption;" soloists, Miss Clementine de Vere, Mrs. Jennie Patrick Walker, Miss Emily Winant, Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr. William Ludwig, Mr. Myron W. Whitney. Sunday evening, April 13, Handel's "Israel in Egypt"; soloists, Miss Clementine de Vere, Miss Clara Poole, Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr. William Ludwig, Mr. Myron W. Whitney.

G. H. WILSON.

Clipping from Herald
Taunton Mass
Date 4/5

—The Boston Symphony Orchestra is the greatest orchestra in the world, and there is no conductor who has received the salary which Herr Nikitch gets. He has astonished all who have ever seen him. He conducts an entire program entirely without notes.

—Every piano pupil in the city should hear Aus Der Ohe the great pianist at the Symphony concert. It will be worth nearly as much as a quarter's lessons.

Clipping from Gazette
Taunton Mass
Date 4/5

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is acknowledged to be the finest in the world, and there is no conductor in the world who receives anywhere near so large a salary as does Herr Nikisch, the popular conductor of the Symphony Orchestra.

M. E. Leathe, the manager of t

Journal Minneapolis, MINN

Date 4/5

SEVENTY STRONG

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Coming—A Souvenir Program.

Headquarters in the interest of the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is to give a grand concert at the University Coliseum, May 12, have been opened at 409 Nicollet av. The orchestra numbers 70 members, and under the direction of the great Herr Nikisch, renders some of the finest music it is ever the good fortune of mortals to listen to. For soloist the management offers the leading dramatic prima donna of Germany, Madame Steinbach-Jahns, of the Leipzig opera house, who comes to America especially for this tour.

Louis Miller, the local manager, is now at work upon a handsome souvenir program. Besides pictures of Herr Nikisch and Madame Steinbach, it will contain a sketch of their careers, a history of the organization, its personnel, a review of the Boston season, including every program played by the orchestra at Music Hall, and the program to be played at the Coliseum, with historical and analytical notes, prepared by G. H. Wilson, the Boston critic.

BOSTON HERALD.

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 9, 1890.

The H. and H. Festival---"St. John" Greatly Enjoyed.

The Triumphs of Mme. Nordica and Edward Lloyd at Music Hall.

The second of the four performances making up the festival scheme of the Handel and Haydn Society, on the occasion of the 75th anniversary of its organization, was given at Music Hall last evening. The works chosen for this occasion were a cantata, "St. John," written for the festival by Mr. J. C. D. Parker, organist and director of music at Trinity Church in this city, and the first and second part of Bach's Christmas oratorio. As an additional attraction, two solo selections were added, these being "On Mighty Pens," from "The Creation," sung by Mme. Lillian Nordica, and "In Native Worth," from the same oratorio, sung by Mr. Edward Lloyd. The other soloists making the quartet of the evening were Miss Emily Winant and Mr. M. W. Whitney, with Mr. B. J. Lang at the organ and Mr. Carl Zerrahn as conductor. The mysterious laws governing the patronage of the Boston public in the line of musical enterprises have always puzzled the most expert managers, and the results attending this performance, from the "box office" point of view, afford another puzzle for experts to explain. The board of government, by its committee, felt that a place should be given come Boston composer in such a festival, and solicited Mr. Parker to supply some composition to make a part of the festival offering. His acceptance and the nature of this offering have been given widespread publicity as a chief element of interest in the week's performances. The high standing of Mr. Parker in every way justified his choice, and it was naturally expected that local interest in this event would make the second concert a very strong attraction. Many who "write for the papers" and many others who wish they could constantly assert that what the Boston public demands is novelty, something that has not been "done to death." Well, last evening this dear public had a novelty offered for its hearing, and a most attractive novelty, by a native musician, and it simply neglected its opportunities. There was an audience of goodly numbers, but the cash receipts fell far below those of the 48th performance here in 40 years of "Elijah," and both the other performances later in the week will give far better financial returns.

The selection made from Bach's "Christmas oratorio" made the first part of the programme, the work having been heard here on two former occasions. The many beauties of this oratorio need not be told of again. It abounds in the simple, direct musical utterances of its famed composer, and makes an appeal to the heart of the listener by its inspired melodies. The chorales are a study for all time, and the pastoral symphony, a gem of orchestration which will always be regarded as an example of the pure classics in music. The soloists chosen for the work were well suited to the severe, though limited, demands put upon them. Mme. Nordica had but the single solo of the Angel, but this was delivered with excellent effect. Miss Winant is peculiarly suited to the alto solos of the oratorio, her rich sympathetic voice and faultless phrasing giving these numbers a marked prominence in the performance. Mr. Lloyd was, apparently, much more at ease than upon the occasion of his first appearance here, and his voice was certainly in much better form. His reading of the trying recitatives and the delivery of the air "Haste Ye Shepherds" were examples of oratorio singing which have seldom been equalled by any singer heard here. The great difficulties of the bass solo, "Mighty Lord and King" were met with remarkable ease by the veteran M. W. Whitney, who has no equal in such a class of work at the present day. The chorus, despite certain evidences of fatigue shown by the sopranos early in the evening and also in the choral, "For Us to Earth," did remarkably good work in all the difficult chorals. The symphony was played with a faultlessness which compelled a round of applause despite the proprieties.

In the "On Mighty Pens," Mme. Nordica gave a fine exhibition of her strength as an oratorio singer, and her interpretation of this familiar number gave great enjoyment to all. The tenor solo "In Native Worth" equally displayed the gifts of Mr. Lloyd as an oratorio artist of the most pronounced abilities. Both singers gained an immense ovation after these numbers, and the recalls were attended with what were literally "thunders of applause," the men of the chorus using their boot heels, apparently, with deafening effect to add to the demonstration.

The performance was ended with Mr. Parker's "St. John," which has been given the form of a short cantata by the composer, the work being made in six parts, illustrative of a few recorded incidents in the life of the apostle and of his writings. There is too little material thus afforded to give a subject suited for treatment in oratorio form or for any strongly dramatic writing, and so these six numbers are merely of a suggestive character. With the exception of the last number, each portion of the work is preceded by a short chanting phrase, with rhythmical orchestral accompaniment, having always the same melody and sung by the male chorus in unison. The prelude to the sixth number, however, differs in that it is written for female voices only. The significance of the several portions of the work may be summarized as follows: The first number illustrates the description of the calling of the apostles, the second being given to the scene at the Lord's supper. In the third number the composer has found his subject in the scene of the crucifixion, and the fourth number is descriptive of an incident following the death on the cross; which concludes with a text from one of the Epistles. The last two numbers of the cantata serve to illustrate subjects taken from the Revelation, the fifth being built upon the text "And he showed me that great city, the Holy Jerusalem, descending out of Heaven," etc., and the final number upon the words, "Behold I come quickly and my reward is with me," etc., and "They that be wise shall shine as the brightness," etc. Mr. Parker conducted his work personally, and gained a most hearty greeting upon taking his position at the director's desk. The cantata is the work of a thoroughly conservative musician, who uses the simple direct forms of the old school, and utilizes with rare skill modern ideas in their treatment. A thorough knowledge is shown of the use of both voice and orchestra to gain desired results, and, in a word, the work is one that gives solid satisfaction upon even a first hearing. The beautiful solo for contralto was sung with charming taste and expression by Miss Winant, and the final solo for soprano gave Mme. Nordica a grand dramatic opportunity, her voice rising true and clear above the chorus and orchestra. The quartet, "Now Are We the Sons of God," is one of the chief beauties of the work, and the duet for tenor and soprano, "And There Shall Be No More Curse," was equally enjoyable. The orchestral writing in the cantata is full of originality, and adds a most important element in the beauties of the work. Every number was applauded with marked enthusiasm, and the composer, who has certainly honored his native city in this production, has every reason for pride in the reception accorded his work. The remaining performances of the festival are as follows: Thursday night, April 10, Gounod's [illegible] Redemption"; solos by Miss Clementine De Vere, Miss Clara Poole, Mrs. Jennie Patrick Walker, Miss Emily Winant, and Messrs. Edward Lloyd, William Ludwig and Myron W. Whitney. Sunday night, April 13, Handel's "Israel in Egypt"; solos by Misses Clementine De Vere and Clara Poole, and Messrs. Edward Lloyd, William Ludwig and Myron W. Whitney.

Boston Daily Globe.

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 9.

ORATORIO AND OPERA.

A New Cantata by a Boston Composer.

"St. John" Supplements Bach's Classic in Music Hall.

A new work by a Boston composer is not so often offered to the attention of a Boston audience that its performance can be ranked among the ordinary events of a musical season. In presenting J. C. D. Parker's cantata, "St. John," therefore, the Handel and Haydn Society invested the second of its anniversary festival concerts with peculiar interest and significance.

In its flow of smooth, "melodious measures" this new work gives evidence throughout of rare musicianly skill. Mr. Parker has not, indeed, cut loose from tradition and convention. But he has used the old forms effectively and well. It is true that he might have given more contrast of character in the music—even a cantata like this need not always be on the same plane. As a whole, however, the "St. John" will certainly take rank as a valuable addition to the not-too-numerous works of this order that possess undoubted merit.

The prelude, a slow movement in which the string orchestra finds constant opportunity for the presentation of harmony and breadth of tone, suddenly gives place to the opening chorus. A lovely accompaniment sets off this number, "How beautiful upon the mountains," as each part in turn takes up the melodious theme. Mr. Parker uses the orchestra with admirable effect throughout the cantata. It is not, however, until the soprano solo, "He that is mighty," that the strings are supplemented by the brass; and the composer yields at no point to the temptation to overuse orchestral effects. Bach's method is followed in several of the choruses, notably in that beginning, "For the Lord God giveth them light." But here, as in the inspiring finale, the composer has risen above what is merely scholastic and academic. A quartet, partly unaccompanied, partly accompanied, and a charming duet for soprano and tenor should be noted as among the best features of the cantata.

Mr. Parker conducted his own work with much energy. The singers of the Handel and Haydn followed his baton very well, for the most part. Particularly fine was the performance of "For the Lord God" and "They that be wise." All the intricacies and involutions of the score offered no difficulties that were not courageously surmounted.

Mme. Lillian Nordica, who sang with great purity and clearness of tone, gained warmest applause after her solo. Her part in the finale was admirably sustained, also. Miss Winant was not, unfortunately, in her best voice early in the evening, but the "Eye hath not seen" found at her hands a sympathetic and artistic interpretation. Mr. Lloyd's voice blended happily with Mme. Nordica's in the lovely duet, which evoked a great deal of applause. If the quartet—including Mr. Whitney—was not quite so fortunate, there was attained, nevertheless, a very decided success with the audience.

Bach's Christmas oratorio, Parts I. and II., were chosen to open the programme. It may be heresy to the ears of some to say that the work seemed dull. But certainly, excepting the grand chorals, there was very little to inspire enthusiasm in the "classic" as performed yesterday evening. The distinguished soloists could not here appear to advantage. Mme. Nordica's opportunity was limited to the brief song of the angel. Miss Winant was by no means at her best, and Mr. Whitney has often been heard to more effect. Even Mr. Lloyd's singing seemed lacking in power, though it was as admirable in quality as ever. The chorus, however, acquitted itself with decided honor, the "Glory to God," being perhaps its best achievement in the oratorio.

It was a very apt thought of the management that introduced, midway in the programme, two solos from "The Creation." Mme. Nordica contributed with great brilliancy and delicacy of execution the air, "On mighty fens." In the familiar "Native worth," Mr. Lloyd justified all that has been said in commendation of the expressiveness, smoothness and sympathetic quality of his singing. Both artists were recalled with real enthusiasm by the audience, which was large despite the storm.

Gounod's "Redemption" is chosen for the next festival concert tomorrow night. The solo parts are entrusted to Miss Clementine DeVere, Mrs. Jennie Patrick Walker, Miss Emily Winant, Mr. Lloyd, Mr. Ludwig and Mr. Whitney. "Israel in Egypt" will close the series on Sunday evening.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.
WEDNESDAY MORNING, APRIL 9, 1890.

HANDEL AND HAYDN FESTIVAL.

The Second Concert Last Night—"William Tell" at the Boston.

A vast audience constantly bubbling over with enthusiasm, and a varied programme well rendered, were the features of the Handel and Haydn concert at Music Hall last night. The concert began with Bach's Christmas oratorio, parts 1 and 2, the same with which Mr. Gericke celebrated the 200th anniversary of the composer's birth, five years ago. These two parts have a certain completeness in themselves, and even this is not essentially necessary in a work intended to be spread out over about two weeks. Yet Bach himself felt the necessity of symmetry and there is no more marked devotion to form extant than his returning to the key of D major a fortnight after he had begun in it. The first chorus was rather thin in its soprano part, but after this all went very finely, the chorales being most majestic, and the very difficult "Glory to God" being given in a manner to reflect credit on all concerned. The soloists, too, did excellently, Miss Winant giving sympathetic expression to the beautiful "Slumber Beloved," and Mr. Myron W. Whitney's noble bass voice being perfectly under control in shading and intonation. The real surprise of the concert was Mr. Edward Lloyd, who for the first time showed the greatness that was in him. He has the British throatiness in a large degree, a result of the high pitch used in England, but last night he taught us what good phrasing is, for not a roulade but was delivered in a single breath, and his tone was, even in the most florid work, ineffably sweet. His singing of "In Native Worth" was a triumph and a deserved one. Mme. Nordica created a furore also, and anything finer than her fioriture in "On Mighty Pens" has not been heard in the festival. In the cantata by Mr. Parker the soloists were equally thorough. The "Pastoral Symphony" of the oratorio was very finely played, the two English horns making a splendid effect, both in this and in the final chorale. It would be well if this were called simply "pastorale," as in the symphony programmes. The old, pre-Haydnite use of the word "symphony" is confusing to all but those versed in musical history. To oboe and trumpet, also, some praise must be given, for in this old scoring they had important parts, and gave them finely. It is one of the especial merits of the triennial of our great oratorio society that it generally presents some new work of native origin in its festival programmes. I am not of those who believe in coddling the American muse; at present it seems to be the fashion to seek out our native composers and present entire programmes made up of their compositions, good, bad, or indifferent. This is to the detriment of American art, for while it is unjust to deny performance to native compositions of merit, it is equally unjust to give them indiscriminately, to place the composer of merit on an equality with the dabbler who has managed to put together a few themes and give them a high-sounding title. The Handel and Haydn Society does not err in this direction. Only those who have thoroughly won their spurs are admitted to their well-selected programmes. In past seasons they have given to us the best works of the greatest American composer—J. K. Paine—and now they again introduce to us the work of another writer in the sacred forms, Mr. J. C. D. Parker, who has already shown his ability in the higher walks of composition. The name of J. C. D. Parker is an important one in the history of American music. He was the first gentleman who maintained the dignity of the art on this side of the Atlantic, by deserting a professional career of law and taking up that of music. A student in Leipsic, he came back to a country where at that time (1852) our art was not held in high esteem, and proved that it was an avocation of which anyone might be proud. The foundation of the Parker Club was the first real impetus to that musical club life which has done so much for our city. The "Redemption Hymn" and the "Blind King" have proved what this art warrior has achieved in the battle.

In the present work, "St. John," a new path has been entered upon; there is more of melody than we have been accustomed to hear in the school of the sacred cantata, and there is more of dramatic effect than we have hitherto found in the works of this composer. That he has approached his task with the utmost earnestness is everywhere apparent. There is one strikingly new effect in the work, in the shorter choruses; here the composer has discarded the customary solo recitatives and given an impressive chant in the Gregorian style to the chorus, generally in unison, with melodious sub-themes in the accompaniment. The effect is impressive and quite in keeping with the dignified subject. The orchestral scoring presents little out of the common; Mr. Parker does not follow Berlioz and the ultra radicals in orchestration, but contents himself with the ordinary orchestra with trombones and organ added to the customary instruments. The work is not entirely a polyphonic one, but is not without its proper touches of counterpoint, and the fugato effects which are used show that the composer in entering the sacred cantata field is not like Saul among the prophets, but can rise to the dignity of his subject. He conducted the work himself, and was most cordially greeted as he came to the platform. "St. John" is probably his magnum opus, and reveals a tuneful vein that shows that the composer is not losing his romance and poetry. At times, even, these qualities are in excess.

The important point in the work was in the fugato "That saith unto Zion," which presented a good "exposition," and was interesting. The alto solo, "Eye hath not seen"—admirably sung by Miss Winant, was rather too Mendelssohnian in character, but evoked great applause. The Soprano solo was another triumph for Mme. Nordica, whose clear, vibrant tones rang out above the brasses with ease. The duet for soprano and tenor was rather too mellifluous in its progressions of sixths, and one involuntarily thought of Campana and his saccharine school. The quartette, "Now are we the sons of God," was very much finer, and showed an easy and graceful leading of the voices, without at any time losing the dignity of its subject.

This with the fugue "And they shall reign" (a piece of work of which Mr. Parker may be proud) are the two best numbers of the work, I cannot say that I find the cantata an entirely even one, but its best portions show that the musician who has labored so faithfully and in so many ways to advance our art in Boston is still capable of giving pleasure in a lofty manner to the thousands whom he has educated in past years.

LOUIS C. ELSON

Boston Journal.
WITH SUPPLEMENT.
MORNING EDITION.
WEDNESDAY MORNING, APRIL 9, 1890.

The Handel and Haydn Festival.

The interest in the festival of this society continues, for, in spite of all the other attractions, the audience last night was sufficient to fill the vast auditorium of Music Hall. There was not the large crowd of "standees" occupying every inch of room that signalized the Sunday night performance, but it was a large house—much larger, we have reason to believe, than was anticipated by the management early in the preparations for the festival.

Parts I. and II. of Bach's Christmas oratorio, the cantata "St. John," composed for the festival by J. C. D. Parker, with a couple of solos from the "Creation," comprised the programme. The soloists were Mme. Nordica (Lillian Norton), Miss Emily Winant, Messrs. Lloyd and M. W. Whitney. It was the intent of the management that some of the old favorites of the society, soloists who had made a reputation by appearances in the earlier days of the society, should be engaged at this festival. Very appropriate, therefore, were the engagements of Miss Winant and Mr. Whitney. What would a festival—especially an anniversary festival—be without these sterling artists? Both have sung for the society times almost without number, and it is not too much to say that some of the greatest successes that have come to both have come in appearances before a Boston public through the medium of this society. There were others whom the management would have been glad to have engaged for old acquaintance sake, for, after all, old time reminiscences will come back on such occasions, and the remembrance of artists who have honored themselves and the society in years gone by will crowd upon the mind.

The chorus work was equal in every respect to that of Sunday night. The grand choruses of Bach were rendered with a sublimity which has never been excelled. The chorus in the second part of the Christmas oratorio, "Glory to God in the Highest," was very clearly delivered, and it is by no means an easy chorus to sing. The choir was also very effective in Mr. Parker's work, which was conducted by the veteran composer and friend of this organization. This work was very beautiful in its conception and development, and was worthy of the composer, who is not unknown to the friends of the society. The orchestration was fine, and beautifully played, and the same will apply to the Bach oratorio. The pastoral symphony was delivered by Mr. Zerrahn with a clearness that was very pleasing, and found hearty appreciation from the audience.

Mr. Whitney had an ungrateful part in the Christmas oratorio, but it was all done conscientiously, and this can be truthfully said of Miss Winant. But her greatest success was in the solo, "Eye hath not seen," in Mr. Parker's work. This she invested with a reverence which is so characteristic of all the oratorio work of this artist, and her delivery of the closing passage, "Which God hath prepared for them that love Him," was a revelation. Mr. Lloyd had a larger opportunity in the work of Bach than was given in "Elijah," and there was abundant opportunity last night to judge of his admirable delivery, perfect phrasing and expressive as well as clear technique. The aria "Haste ye Shepherds" was given as no tenor in this country can give it. It is an exceedingly hard solo to sing well, but all the difficulties were mastered, and, what is better, without any intimation on his part that any difficulty in the rendition existed. The small solo assigned to Mme. Nordica was well sung, and her clear and powerful voice, which is well adapted to such work, made a favorable impression. This is also true of her work in "St. John."

Between the larger numbers were given two familiar solos from Haydn's "Creation," "On Mighty Pens," by Mme. Nordica, and "In Native Worth," by Mr. Lloyd. Both have been heard so many times by the audience that every note was familiar, and the audience held its breath and listened. Mme. Nordica's delivery was faultless, as far as execution was concerned, and in the pianissimo passages she showed a command over her voice which was very commendable. The audience was impressed with the singing, but there was not a particle of feeling in the voice or the delivery. Still her voice is majestic and true, but the little bits of coloring which make this solo the most effective in the "Creation" were lacking. Mr. Lloyd's rendering of "In Native Worth" was an object lesson. Not only the mellow voice, full of feeling and expression, but the phrasing, the meaning which was conveyed in every tone, made it the most artistic delivery of this solo which it is possible to hear. There was no attempt at effect, and as the closing words, so clearly uttered, so full of that meaning which none but a true artist can convey, fell upon the audience he was given an ovation such as is rarely seen in Music Hall. It was like the singing of Patti in "Home, Sweet Home." He was recalled three times amid the greatest enthusiasm, and he bore his honors with a modesty which is all the more commendable because of such a lack of it on the part of many artists of much inferior reputation. Thursday evening Gounod's "Redemption" is to be given, with Clementina De Vere as the soprano soloist and Messrs. Lloyd, Ludwig and Whitney as assisting artists.

Boston Post.
WEDNESDAY MORNING, 1890.

HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY'S FESTIVAL.

Although there was not such an enormous crowd at the second performance of the Handel and Haydn Society as on Sunday last, still there was a remarkable house in spite of the bad weather. The concert began with the first and second parts of Bach's Christmas oratorio, the soloists being Mme. Nordica, Miss Emily Winant, Mr. Edward Lloyd and Mr. Myron W. Whitney. The chorals were finely sung by the chorus, but this cannot truthfully be said of the polyphonic numbers. Bach's works were written for a chorus which averaged ten to twelve voices to the part and probably never exceeded fifty in all, and these were all trained vocalists. It follows that a performance of the most florid contrapuntal passages would still be clear and beautiful. But with a ponderous chorus of 600, not the twentieth part of whom have even the least vocal technique, this beautiful music is certain to sound thick, confused and muddy. It is not the fault of the conductor, nor the chorus itself, but the circumstances are to blame. Mme. Nordica's part consisted of one short declamatory passage assigned to The Angel, and it was beautifully and artistically sung. Miss Winant sang finely, and was especially effective in the beautiful air, "Slumber, beloved, and take thy repose." Mr. Whitney, who was warmly received, sang throughout in the straightforward, noble, artistic manner which characterizes all his work, and the air, "Mighty Lord and King all glorious," easily deserved the applause with which it was greeted. And now to speak of Mr. Lloyd. This is at once an easy and a difficult task. Easy, because nothing but praise can be awarded to his exquisite singing; difficult, because it is almost impossible to avoid extravagant enthusiasm. The peculiarly pure and chaste character of Bach's music is like second nature to him. His singing is refined without losing strength, dramatic but never theatrical, and his phrasing is a study. It is intuitive, and therefore faultless. He exhibits the vocal art at its best by his highly finished technique, but more than this he shows in every note that he is not only a singer but a musician. The splendid old Haydn aria, "In native worth and honor clad," as sung by him was an exemplification of the highest form of vocalism, and it was worth a dozen lessons to every student of singing who was so fortunate as to hear it. Mme. Nordica's beautiful interpretation of Haydn's "On Mighty Pens" was another masterpiece of singing. Her voice seems to become more beautiful every day, and she also sings with that inborn artistic understanding, that intuitive perception of what is artistically right and beautiful, without which the most beautiful voice availeth naught. Her technique is as smooth and polished as possible, and she has a most delicious staccato and an unusually rich and telling pianissimo. To this must be added the fact that the lower register of her voice (and she has an unusual compass) does not perceptibly differ in quality from her upper tones, as is so often the case. This gives a remarkably even and well-balanced quality of tone to the whole compass of the voice, which is especially effective in cantabile passages. Her townspeople appreciated every note she sang and applauded with genuine enthusiasm.

Mr. J. C. D. Parker's cantata, "St. John," which was especially composed for this festival, was the closing event of the concert, and was given a fine performance under the composer's baton. It is a scholarly and finished work, and, although it cannot be maintained that it is brilliantly original, it is by no means lacking in new ideas, and the fine manner in which it is all made is deserving of the highest praise. It contains, for example, two fugues, both of which, but more especially the latter, show a keen artistic sense for this style of writing, and a mastery of counterpoint and a diversity of polyphonic resource which only the most thoroughly and classically trained musician possesses. There is one novelty of this work which is peculiarly effective. Instead of solo recitatives, there is a species of rhythmic and accompanied recitative sung by all the basses and tenors as a prelude or introduction to each important number. This idea turns out to be very successful and is well worthy of imitation. The quartette, "Now we are sons of God," is one of the most beautiful numbers, but it was sung in rather an unbalanced fashion, the tenor and bass parts being far too prominent. The duet between soprano and tenor begins in rather a sentimental manner, but speedily becomes stronger. It was beautifully sung by Mme. Nordica and Mr. Lloyd. The final soprano solo and chorus is perhaps the best number of the work and made an effective ending to the whole. The work is very well instrumented, with an ear for orchestral color and variety, and Mr. Parker conducted with dignity and precision, the chorus singing with great earnestness and enthusiasm. The next feature of the festival will be Thursday evening: Gounod's "The Redemption," with the following soloists: Miss Clementine De Vere, Mrs. Jennie Patrick Walker, Miss Emily Winant, Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr. William Ludwig, Mr. Myron W. Whitney.

ARTHUR WELD.

Boston Evening Transcript.
WEDNESDAY, APRIL 9, 1890.

THE HANDEL AND HAYDN FESTIVAL.

The second concert of this Festival was given in the Music Hall last evening, the programme being:

Bach: Parts I. and II. of the "Christmas Oratorio."
Haydn: "On mighty pens," from "The Creation."
Haydn: "In native worth," from "The Creation."
J. C. D. Parker: "Saint John."

The solos were sung by Mrs. Lillian Nordica (soprano), Miss Emily Winant (alto), Mr. Edward Lloyd (tenor), and Mr. Myron W. Whitney (bass). Mr. Carl Zerrahn, conducted, and Mr. B. J. Lang was the organist.

One can only be thankful to the Handel and Hayden Society for including the first two cantatas of the "Christmas Oratorio" in their festival programme. It shows a recognition of the fact that no festival of the society can be what it should be without Bach, just as it was recognized long ago that a festival without Handel was no festival at all. And it was wise to choose a work that was in perfect condition to be performed. These two cantatas are the only ones in the "Christmas Oratorio" the continuo of which has been filled out with additional accompaniments by Robert Franz, and are thus ready for performance. By the way, we wish that the term "additional instrumentation by Franz" had not been used on the programmes; it is misleading, and does not give a correct idea of the character and scope of Franz's work on the score. But, passing over this little inaccuracy, we can say heartily that a happier choice could hardly have been made than these two cantatas. Bach is not yet so thoroughly acclimated to our concert rooms that we can afford to dispense with any pains or care, not only as regards the manner in which his works are presented, but also in the matter of selecting those of his works which are fittest for performance. To make the choice a wise one, the work must fulfill three conditions—it should be characteristic and representative of Bach at his best, its score must be complete, and it should be in a vein that is likely to impress the public favorably. These conditions are amply fulfilled by the cantatas in question.

The performance, in spite of some short-comings, upon which the pressure on our columns this evening does not leave us space to expatiate, was, in the main, far more satisfying than might have been expected—from the difficulty of the work, and its unaccustomed style. For one thing, the "Pastoral Symphony" was better played than we have yet heard it here; if not with greater nicety in detail, certainly with more security and repose, with greater clearness in the larger outlines, and with an effect better reflecting the true spirit of the composition. At last we have heard this beautiful pastoral movement (which must be exceedingly difficult, judging from the many failures that have been in it) so played that one was not beset by a constant terror that everything would go to pieces the next moment.

The chorus sang exceptionally well in the opening, "Christians, be joyful," and still better in the chorals, which latter were given not only with firmness and a noble volume of tone, but with a clearness, with an independence of accent in the several voices which made Bach's gloriously free and vigorous part-writing fully appreciable to the ear. The chorus, "Glory to God in the highest," in the second part, went less well, and sounded rather blurred.

The solos were well, at times excellently, sung by the four artists of the evening. If the effect was often marred by a lack of proper balance between the singer's voice and the orchestra, and between the several constituent parts of the orchestra itself, this defect must be recognized as one which has been noticeable from the very beginning of Bach performances here, and which has not been conquered yet. To consider it more closely here would lead us too far.

Mrs. Nordica was in glorious voice, and sang the air from Haydn's "Creation" with immense effect, and in admirable style. One might take exception to a somewhat over-elaborate toying with pretty details toward the end of the song; but, in this matter, Mrs. Nordica follows a pretty firmly established tradition, if a bad one. She is, however, a finer singer than when she last sang here—which is saying not a little—and there is far more to praise highly in her work than there is to criticize.

Mr. Lloyd showed for the first time in the air, "In native worth," what there is really in him. Except for a few lapses from perfect good taste, such as we have just criticised in Mrs. Nordica, his singing was superb at every point; one seldom hears anything so fine, both in technique and feeling. The unbounded enthusiasm it called forth was thoroughly earned.

"Saint John," the new cantata, written for this festival by Mr. Parker, is a work which inspires at once respect and liking. The composer has made one innovation, suggested perhaps by some things modern French composers have done, in giving such passages as would have been sung by "The Evangelist" to the male chorus (and, later on, to the female chorus) in unison. These passages of choral quasi recitativo come in, apparently almost at random, in the midst of beautifully melodious and poetically suggestive bits of orchestral writing, and with admirable effect, the chorus being supported by full harmony on the organ, while the orchestra goes its own way. The choruses proper are notable for purity of style, and for the just proportion in them between homophonic and contrapuntal writing; they are, too, especially and highly remarkable for a masterly treatment of the voices, for what might be called their "vocal orchestration." The quality of tone produced is invariably of the finest. This beauty is also noticeable to a high degree in the quartet, "Now are we the sons of God." If the solos are somewhat less inspiring than the choruses, they still impress one by their beauty of sentiment.

And here we come to what strikes us as the most salient point in the whole cantata; this is, throughout, the genuine depth, fervor and purity of religious feeling it expresses. With all the excellence and skill shown in the writing, with all the invariably musical quality of the whole, this element still predominates. This "Saint John" is one of the exceedingly few modern sacred works we know of that sound as if the composer thoroughly meant what he wrote. It impresses one distinctly as a free, spontaneous expression of individual religious feeling, profound, fervent and thoroughly sincere. It sounds as if the composer had written it on his knees. The performance, conducted by Mr. Parker himself, was very fine indeed, chorus and orchestra doing admirably, and Mrs. Nordica, Miss Wynant and Mr. Lloyd vieing with one another in doing full justice to the solos. Be it said, too, that Mr. Parker showed himself to be an excellent conductor, and held all his forces at the tip of his baton. We congratulate him heartily upon his new work and its success.

The remainder of the festival is laid out as follows:

Third concert, tomorrow night, Gounod's "The Redemption;" solos by Mrs. Jennie Patrick Walker, Misses Clementine De Vere and Emily Winant, and Messrs. Edward Lloyd, William Ludwig and Myron W. Whitney.

Fourth concert, next Sunday night, Handel's "Israel in Egypt"; solos by Misses Clementine De Vere and Clara Poole, and Messrs. Edward Lloyd, William Ludwig and Myron W. Whitney.

[105]

[105]

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.
WEDNESDAY MORNING, APRIL 9, 1890.

HANDEL AND HAYDN FESTIVAL.

The Second Concert Last Night—"William Tell" at the Boston.

A vast audience constantly bubbling over with enthusiasm, and a varied programme well rendered, were the features of the Handel and Haydn concert at Music Hall last night. The concert began with Bach's Christmas oratorio, parts 1 and 2, the same with which Mr. Gericke celebrated the 200th anniversary of the composer's birth, five years ago. These two parts have a certain completeness in themselves, and even this is not essentially necessary in a work intended to be spread out over about two weeks. Yet Bach himself felt the necessity of symmetry and there is no more marked devotion to form extant than his returning to the key of D major a fortnight after he had begun in it. The first chorus was rather thin in its soprano part, but after this all went very finely, the chorales being most majestic, and the very difficult "Glory to God" being given in a manner to reflect credit on all concerned. The soloists, too, did excellently, Miss Winant giving sympathetic expression to the beautiful "Slumber Beloved," and Mr. Myron W. Whitney's noble bass voice being perfectly under control in shading and intonation. The real surprise of the concert was Mr. Edward Lloyd, who for the first time showed the greatness that was in him. He has the British throatiness in a large degree, a result of the high pitch used in England, but last night he taught us what good phrasing is, for not a roulade but was delivered in a single breath, and his tone was, even in the most florid work, ineffably sweet. His singing of "In Native Worth" was a triumph and a deserved one. Mme. Nordica created a furore also, and anything finer than her fioriture in "On Mighty Pens" has not been heard in the festival. In the cantata by Mr. Parker the soloists were equally thorough. The "Pastoral Symphony" of the oratorio was very finely played, the two English horns making a splendid effect, both in this and in the final chorale. It would be well if this were called simply "pastorale," as in the symphony programmes. The old, pre-Haydnite use of the word "symphony" is confusing to all but those versed in musical history. To oboe and trumpet, also, some praise must be given, for in this old scoring they had important parts, and gave them finely. It is one of the especial merits of the triennial of our great oratorio society that it generally presents some new work of native origin in its festival programmes. I am not of those who believe in coddling the American muse; at present it seems to be the fashion to seek out our native composers and present entire programmes made up of their compositions, good, bad, or indifferent. This is to the detriment of American art, for while it is unjust to deny performance to native compositions of merit, it is equally unjust to give them indiscriminately, to place the composer of merit on an equality with the dabbler who has managed to put together a few themes and give them a high-sounding title. The Handel and Haydn Society does not err in this direction. Only those who have thoroughly won their spurs are admitted to their well-selected programmes. In past seasons they have given to us the best works of the greatest American composer—J. K. Paine—and now they again introduce to us the work of another writer in the sacred forms, Mr. J. C. D. Parker, who has already shown his ability in the higher walks of composition. The name of J. C. D. Parker is an important one in the history of American music. He was the first gentleman who maintained the dignity of the art on this side of the Atlantic, by deserting a professional career of law and taking up that of music. A student in Leipsic, he came back to a country where at that time (1852) our art was not held in high esteem, and proved that it was an avocation of which anyone might be proud. The foundation of the Parker Club was the first real impetus to that musical club life which has done so much for our city. The "Redemption Hymn" and the "Blind King" have proved what this art warrior has achieved in the battle.

In the present work, "St. John," a new path has been entered upon; there is more of melody than we have been accustomed to hear in the school of the sacred cantata, and there is more of dramatic effect than we have hitherto found in the works of this composer. That he has approached his task with the utmost earnestness is everywhere apparent. There is one strikingly new effect in the work, in the shorter choruses; here the composer has discarded the customary solo recitatives and given an impressive chant in the Gregorian style to the chorus, generally in unison, with melodious sub-themes in the accompaniment. The effect is impressive and quite in keeping with the dignified subject. The orchestral scoring presents little out of the common; Mr. Parker does not follow Berlioz and the ultra radicals in orchestration, but contents himself with the ordinary orchestra with trombones and organ added to the customary instruments. The work is not entirely a polyphonic one, but is not without its proper touches of counterpoint, and the fugato effects which are used show that the composer in entering the sacred cantata field is not like Saul among the prophets, but can rise to the dignity of his subject. He conducted the work himself, and was most cordially greeted as he came to the platform. "St. John" is probably his magnum opus, and reveals a tuneful vein that shows that the composer is not losing his romance and poetry. At times, even, these qualities are in excess.

The first important point in the work was in the fugato "That saith unto Zion," which presented a good "exposition," and was interesting. The alto solo, "Eye hath not seen"—admirably sung by Miss Winant, was rather too Mendelssohnian in character, but evoked great applause. The Soprano solo was another triumph for Mme. Nordica, whose clear, vibrant tones rang out above the brasses with ease. The duet for soprano and tenor was rather too mellifluous in its progressions of sixths, and one involuntarily thought of Campana and his saccharine school. The quartette, "Now are we the sons of God," was very much finer, and showed an easy and graceful leading of the voices, without at any time losing the dignity of its subject.

This with the fugue "And they shall reign" (a piece of work of which Mr. Parker may be proud) are the two best numbers of the work, I cannot say that I find the cantata an entirely even one, but its best portions show that the musician who has labored so faithfully and in so many ways to advance our art in Boston is still capable of giving pleasure in a lofty manner to the thousands whom he has educated in past years.

LOUIS C. ELSON

Boston Journal.
WITH SUPPLEMENT.
MORNING EDITION.
WEDNESDAY MORNING, APRIL 9, 1890.

The Handel and Haydn Festival.

The interest in the festival of this society continues, for, in spite of all the other attractions, the audience last night was sufficient to fill the vast auditorium of Music Hall. There was not the large crowd of "standees" occupying every inch of room that signalized the Sunday night performance, but it was a large house—much larger, we have reason to believe, than was anticipated by the management early in the preparations for the festival.

Parts I. and II. of Bach's Christmas oratorio, the cantata "St. John," composed for the festival by J. C. D. Parker, with a couple of solos from the "Creation," comprised the programme. The soloists were Mme. Nordica (Lillian Norton), Miss Emily Winant, Messrs. Lloyd and M. W. Whitney. It was the intent of the management that some of the old favorites of the society, soloists who had made a reputation by appearances in the earlier days of the society, should be engaged at this festival. Very appropriate, therefore, were the engagements of Miss Winant and Mr. Whitney. What would a festival—especially an anniversary festival—be without these sterling artists? Both have sung for the society times almost without number, and it is not too much to say that some of the greatest successes that have come to both have come in appearances before a Boston public through the medium of this society. There were others whom the management would have been glad to have engaged for old acquaintance sake, for, after all, old time reminiscences will come back on such occasions, and the remembrance of artists who have honored themselves and the society in years gone by will crowd upon the mind.

The chorus work was equal in every respect to that of Sunday night. The grand choruses of Bach were rendered with a sublimity which has never been excelled. The chorus in the second part of the Christmas oratorio, "Glory to God in the Highest," was very clearly delivered, and it is by no means an easy chorus to sing. The choir was also very effective in Mr. Parker's work, which was conducted by the veteran composer and friend of this organization. This work was very beautiful in its conception and development, and was worthy of the composer, who is not unknown to the friends of the society. The orchestration was fine, and beautifully played, and the same will apply to the Bach oratorio. The pastoral symphony was delivered by Mr. Zerrahn with a clearness that was very pleasing, and found hearty appreciation from the audience.

Mr. Whitney had an ungrateful part in the Christmas oratorio, but it was all done conscientiously, and this can be truthfully said of Miss Winant. But her greatest success was in the solo, "Eye hath not seen," in Mr. Parker's work. This she invested with a reverence which is so characteristic of all the oratorio work of this artist, and her delivery of the closing passage, "Which God hath prepared for them that love Him," was a revelation. Mr. Lloyd had a larger opportunity in the work of Bach than was given in "Elijah," and there was abundant opportunity last night to judge of his admirable delivery, perfect phrasing and expressive as well as clear technique. The aria "Haste ye Shepherds" was given as no tenor in this country can give it. It is an exceedingly hard solo to sing well, but all the difficulties were mastered, and, what is better, without any intimation on his part that any difficulty in the rendition existed. The small solo assigned to Mme. Nordica was well sung, and her clear and powerful voice, which is well adapted to such work, made a favorable impression. This is also true of her work in "St. John."

Between the larger numbers were given two familiar solos from Haydn's "Creation," "On Mighty Pens," by Mme. Nordica, and "In Native Worth," by Mr. Lloyd. Both have been heard so many times by the audience that every note was familiar, and the audience held its breath and listened. Mme. Nordica's delivery was faultless, as far as execution was concerned, and in the pianissimo passages she showed a command over her voice which was very commendable. The audience was impressed with the singing, but there was not a particle of feeling in the voice or the delivery. Still her voice is majestic and true, but the little bits of coloring which make this solo the most effective in the "Creation" were lacking. Mr. Lloyd's rendering of "In Native Worth" was an object lesson. Not only the mellow voice, full of feeling and expression, but the phrasing, the meaning which was conveyed in every tone, made it the most artistic delivery of this solo which it is possible to hear. There was no attempt at effect, and as the closing words, so clearly uttered, so full of that meaning which none but a true artist can convey, fell upon the audience he was given an ovation such as is rarely seen in Music Hall. It was like the singing of Patti in "Home, Sweet Home." He was recalled three times amid the greatest enthusiasm, and he bore his honors with a modesty which is all the more commendable because of such a lack of it on the part of many artists of much inferior reputation. Thursday evening Gounod's "Redemption" is to be given, with Clementina De Vere as the soprano soloist and Messrs. Lloyd, Ludwig and Whitney as assisting artists.

Boston Post
WEDNESDAY MORNING, APRIL 9, 1890.

HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY'S FESTIVAL.

Although there was not such an enormous crowd at the second performance of the Handel and Haydn Society as on Sunday last, still there was a remarkable house in spite of the bad weather. The concert began with the first and second parts of Bach's Christmas oratorio, the soloists being Mme. Nordica, Miss Emily Winant, Mr. Edward Lloyd and Mr. Myron W. Whitney. The chorals were finely sung by the chorus, but this cannot truthfully be said of the polyphonic numbers. Bach's works were written for a chorus which averaged ten to twelve voices to the part and probably never exceeded fifty in all, and these were all trained vocalists. It follows that a performance of the most florid contrapuntal passages would still be clear and beautiful. But with a ponderous chorus of 600, not the twentieth part of whom have even the least vocal technique, this beautiful music is certain to sound thick, confused and muddy. It is not the fault of the conductor, nor the chorus itself, but the circumstances are to blame. Mme. Nordica's part consisted of one short declamatory passage assigned to The Angel, and it was beautifully and artistically sung. Miss Winant sang finely, and was especially effective in the beautiful air, "Slumber, beloved, and take thy repose." Mr. Whitney, who was warmly received, sang throughout in the straightforward, noble, artistic manner which characterizes all his work, and the air, "Mighty Lord and King all glorious," easily deserved the applause with which it was greeted. And now to speak of Mr. Lloyd. This is at once an easy and a difficult task. Easy, because nothing but praise can be awarded to his exquisite singing; difficult, because it is almost impossible to avoid extravagant enthusiasm. The peculiarly pure and chaste character of Bach's music is like second nature to him. His singing is refined without losing strength, dramatic but never theatrical, and his phrasing is a study. It is intuitive, and therefore faultless. He exhibits the vocal art at its best by his highly finished technique, but more than this he shows in every note that he is not only a singer but a musician. The splendid old Haydn aria, "In native worth and honor clad," as sung by him was an exemplification of the highest form of vocalism, and it was worth a dozen lessons to every student of singing who was so fortunate as to hear it. Mme. Nordica's beautiful interpretation of Haydn's "On Mighty Pens" was another masterpiece of singing. Her voice seems to become more beautiful every day, and she also sings with that inborn artistic understanding, that intuitive perception of what is artistically right and beautiful, without which the most beautiful voice availeth naught. Her technique is as smooth and polished as possible, and she has a most delicious staccato and an unusually rich and telling pianissimo. To this must be added the fact that the lower register of her voice (and she has an unusual compass) does not perceptibly differ in quality from her upper tones, as is so often the case. This gives a remarkably even and well-balanced quality of tone to the whole compass of the voice, which is especially effective in cantabile passages. Her townspeople appreciated every note she sang and applauded with genuine enthusiasm.

Mr. J. C. D. Parker's cantata, "St. John," which was especially composed for this festival, was the closing event of the concert, and was given a fine performance under the composer's baton. It is a scholarly and finished work, and, although it cannot be maintained that it is brilliantly original, it is by no means lacking in new ideas, and the fine manner in which it is all made is deserving of the highest praise. It contains, for example, two fugues, both of which, but more especially the latter, show a keen artistic sense for this style of writing, and a mastery of counterpoint and a diversity of polyphonic resource which only the most thoroughly and classically trained musician possesses. There is one novelty of this work which is peculiarly effective. Instead of solo recitatives, there is a species of rhythmic and accompanied recitative sung by all the basses and tenors as a prelude or introduction to each important number. This idea turns out to be very successful and is well worthy of imitation. The quartette, "Now we are sons of God," is one of the most beautiful numbers, but it was sung in rather an unbalanced fashion, the tenor and bass parts being far too prominent. The duet between soprano and tenor begins in rather a sentimental manner, but speedily becomes stronger. It was beautifully sung by Mme. Nordica and Mr. Lloyd. The final soprano solo and chorus is perhaps the best number of the work and made an effective ending to the whole. The work is very well instrumented, with an ear for orchestral color and variety, and Mr. Parker conducted with dignity and precision, the chorus singing with great earnestness and enthusiasm. The next feature of the festival will be Thursday evening; Gounod's "The Redemption," with the following soloists: Miss Clementine De Vere, Mrs. Jennie Patrick Walker, Miss Emily Winant, Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr. William Ludwig, Mr. Myron W. Whitney.

ARTHUR WELD.

Boston Evening Transcript.
WEDNESDAY, APRIL 9, 1890.

THE HANDEL AND HAYDN FESTIVAL.

The second concert of this Festival was given in the Music Hall last evening, the programme being:

Bach: Parts I. and II. of the "Christmas Oratorio."
Haydn: "On mighty pens," from "The Creation."
Haydn: "In native worth," from "The Creation."
J. C. D. Parker: "Saint John."

The solos were sung by Mrs. Lillian Nordica (soprano), Miss Emily Winant (alto), Mr. Edward Lloyd (tenor), and Mr. Myron W. Whitney (bass). Mr. Carl Zerrahn conducted, and Mr. B. J. Lang was the organist.

One can only be thankful to the Handel and Hayden Society for including the first two cantatas of the "Christmas Oratorio" in their festival programme. It shows a recognition of the fact that no festival of the society can be what it should be without Bach, just as it was recognized long ago that a festival without Handel was no festival at all. And it was wise to choose a work that was in perfect condition to be performed. These two cantatas are the only ones in the "Christmas Oratorio" the continuo of which has been filled out with additional accompaniments by Robert Franz, and are thus ready for performance. By the way, we wish that the term "additional instrumentation by Franz" had not been used on the programmes; it is misleading, and does not give a correct idea of the character and scope of Franz's work on the score. But, passing over this little inaccuracy, we can say heartily that a happier choice could hardly have been made than these two cantatas. Bach is not yet so thoroughly acclimated to our concert rooms that we can afford to dispense with any pains or care, not only as regards the manner in which his works are presented, but also in the matter of selecting those of his works which are fittest for performance. To make the choice a wise one, the work must fulfill three conditions—it should be characteristic and representative of Bach at his best, its score must be complete, and it should be in a vein that is likely to impress the public favorably. These conditions are amply fulfilled by the cantatas in question.

The performance, in spite of some short-comings, upon which the pressure on our columns this evening does not leave us space to expatiate, was, in the main, far more satisfying than might have been expected—from the difficulty of the work, and its unaccustomed style. For one thing, the "Pastoral Symphony" was better played than we have yet heard it here; if not with greater nicety in detail, certainly with more security and repose, with greater clearness in the larger outlines, and with an effect better reflecting the true spirit of the composition. At last we have heard this beautiful pastoral movement (which must be exceedingly difficult, judging from the many failures that have been in it) so played that one was not beset by a constant terror that everything would go to pieces the next moment.

The chorus sang exceptionally well in the opening, "Christians, be joyful," and still better in the chorals, which latter were given not only with firmness and a noble volume of tone, but with a clearness, with an independence of accent in the several voices which made Bach's gloriously free and vigorous part-writing fully appreciable to the ear. The chorus, "Glory to God in the highest," in the second part, went less well, and sounded rather blurred.

The solos were well, at times excellently, sung by the four artists of the evening. If the effect was often marred by a lack of proper balance between the singer's voice and the orchestra, and between the several constituent parts of the orchestra itself, this defect must be recognized as one which has been noticeable from the very beginning of Bach performances here, and which has not been conquered yet. To consider it more closely here would lead us too far.

Mrs. Nordica was in glorious voice, and sang the air from Haydn's "Creation" with immense effect, and in admirable style. One might take exception to a somewhat over-elaborate toying with pretty details toward the end of the song; but, in this matter, Mrs. Nordica follows a pretty firmly established tradition, if a bad one. She is, however, a finer singer than when she last sang here—which is saying not a little—and there is far more to praise highly in her work than there is to criticize.

Mr. Lloyd showed for the first time in the air, "In native worth," what there is really in him. Except for a few lapses from perfect good taste, such as we have just criticised in Mrs. Nordica, his singing was superb at every point; one seldom hears anything so fine, both in technique and feeling. The unbounded enthusiasm it called forth was thoroughly earned.

"Saint John," the new cantata, written for this festival by Mr. Parker, is a work which inspires at once respect and liking. The composer has made one innovation, suggested perhaps by some things modern French composers have done, in giving such passages as would have been sung by "The Evangelist" to the male chorus (and, later on, to the female chorus) in unison. These passages of choral quasi recitativo come in, apparently almost at random, in the midst of beautifully melodious and poetically suggestive bits of orchestral writing, and with admirable effect, the chorus being supported by full harmony on the organ, while the orchestra goes its own way. The choruses proper are notable for purity of style, and for the just proportion in them between homophonic and contrapuntal writing; they are, too, especially and highly remarkable for a masterly treatment of the voices, for what might be called their "vocal orchestration." The quality of tone produced is invariably of the finest. This beauty is also noticeable to a high degree in the quartet, "Now are we the sons of God." If the solos are somewhat less inspiring than the choruses, they still impress one by their beauty of sentiment.

And here we come to what strikes us as the most salient point in the whole cantata; this is, throughout, the genuine depth, fervor and purity of religious feeling it expresses. With all the excellence and skill shown in the writing, with all the invariably musical quality of the whole, this element still predominates. This "Saint John" is one of the exceedingly few modern sacred works we know of that sound as if the composer thoroughly meant what he wrote. It impresses one distinctly as a free, spontaneous expression of individual religious feeling, profound, fervent and thoroughly sincere. It sounds as if the composer had written it on his knees. The performance, conducted by Mr. Parker himself, was very fine indeed, chorus and orchestra doing admirably, and Mrs. Nordica, Miss Wynant and Mr. Lloyd vieing with one another in doing full justice to the solos. Be it said, too, that Mr. Parker showed himself to be an excellent conductor, and held all his forces at the tip of his baton. We congratulate him heartily upon his new work and its success.

The remainder of the festival is laid out as follows:

Third concert, tomorrow night, Gounod's "The Redemption;" solos by Mrs. Jennie Patrick Walker, Misses Clementine De Vere and Emily Winant, and Messrs. Edward Lloyd, William Ludwig and Myron W. Whitney.

Fourth concert, next Sunday night, Handel's "Israel in Egypt"; solos by Misses Clementine De Vere and Clara Poole, and Messrs. Edward Lloyd, William Ludwig and Myron W. Whitney.

[105]

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

WEDNESDAY MORNING, APRIL 9, 1890.

HANDEL AND HAYDN FESTIVAL.

The Second Concert Last Night—"William Tell" at the Boston.

A vast audience constantly bubbling over with enthusiasm, and a varied programme well rendered, were the features of the Handel and Haydn concert at Music Hall last night. The concert began with Bach's Christmas oratorio, parts 1 and 2, the same with which Mr. Gericke celebrated the 200th anniversary of the composer's birth, five years ago. These two parts have a certain completeness in themselves, and even this is not essentially necessary in a work intended to be spread out over about two weeks. Yet Bach himself felt the necessity of symmetry and there is no more marked devotion to form extant than his returning to the key of D major a fortnight after he had begun in it. The first chorus was rather thin in its soprano part, but after this all went very finely, the chorales being most majestic, and the very difficult "Glory to God" being given in a manner to reflect credit on all concerned. The soloists, too, did excellently, Miss Winant giving sympathetic expression to the beautiful "Slumber Beloved," and Mr. Myron W. Whitney's noble bass voice being perfectly under control in shading and intonation. The real surprise of the concert was Mr. Edward Lloyd, who for the first time showed the greatness that was in him. He has the British throatiness in a large degree, a result of the high pitch used in England, but last night he taught us what good phrasing is, for not a roulade but was delivered in a single breath, and his tone was, even in the most florid work, ineffably sweet. His singing of "In Native Worth" was a triumph and a deserved one. Mme. Nordica created a furore also, and anything finer than her fioriture in "On Mighty Pens" has not been heard in the festival. In the cantata by Mr. Parker the soloists were equally thorough. The "Pastoral Symphony" of the oratorio was very finely played, the two English horns making a splendid effect, both in this and in the final chorale. It would be well if this were called simply "pastorale," as in the symphony programmes. The old, pre-Haydnite use of the word "symphony" is confusing to all but those versed in musical history. To oboe and trumpet, also, some praise must be given, for in this old scoring they had important parts, and gave them finely. It is one of the especial merits of the triennial of our great oratorio society that it generally presents some new work of native origin in its festival programmes. I am not of those who believe in coddling the American muse; at present it seems to be the fashion to seek out our native composers and present entire programmes made up of their compositions, good, bad, or indifferent. This is to the detriment of American art, for while it is unjust to deny performance to native compositions of merit, it is equally unjust to give them indiscriminately, to place the composer of merit on an equality with the dabbler who has managed to put together a few themes and give them a high-sounding title. The Handel and Haydn Society does not err in this direction. Only those who have thoroughly won their spurs are admitted to their well-selected programmes. In past seasons they have given to us the best works of the greatest American composer—J. K. Paine—and now they again introduce to us the work of another writer in the sacred forms, Mr. J. C. D. Parker, who has already shown his ability in the higher walks of composition. The name of J. C. D. Parker is an important one in the history of American music. He was the first gentleman who maintained the dignity of the art on this side of the Atlantic, by deserting a professional career of law and taking up that of music. A student in Leipsic, he came back to a country where at that time (1852) our art was not held in high esteem, and proved that it was an avocation of which anyone might be proud. The foundation of the Parker Club was the first real impetus to that musical club life which has done so much for our city. The "Redemption Hymn" and the "Blind King" have proved what this art warrior has achieved in the battle.

In the present work, "St. John," a new path has been entered upon; there is more of melody than we have been accustomed to hear in the school of the sacred cantata, and there is more of dramatic effect than we have hitherto found in the works of this composer. That he has approached his task with the utmost earnestness is everywhere apparent. There is one strikingly new effect in the work, in the shorter choruses; here the composer has discarded the customary solo recitatives and given an impressive chant in the Gregorian style to the chorus, generally in unison, with melodious sub-themes in the accompaniment. The effect is impressive and quite in keeping with the dignified subject. The orchestral scoring presents little out of the common; Mr. Parker does not follow Berlioz and the ultra radicals in orchestration, but contents himself with the ordinary orchestra with trombones and organ added to the customary instruments. The work is not entirely a polyphonic one, but is not without its proper touches of counterpoint, and the fugato effects which are used show that the composer in entering the sacred cantata field is not like Saul among the prophets, but can rise to the dignity of his subject. He conducted the work himself, and was most cordially greeted as he came to the platform. "St. John" is probably his magnum opus, and reveals a tuneful vein that shows that the composer is not losing his romance and poetry. At times, even, these qualities are in excess.

The first important point in the work was in the fugato "That saith unto Zion," which presented a good "exposition," and was interesting. The alto solo, "Eye hath not seen"—admirably sung by Miss Winant, was rather too Mendelssohnian in character, but evoked great applause. The Soprano solo was another triumph for Mme. Nordica, whose clear, vibrant tones rang out above the brasses with ease. The duet for soprano and tenor was rather too mellifluous in its progressions of sixths, and one involuntarily thought of Campana and his saccharine school. The quartette, "Now are we the sons of God," was very much finer, and showed an easy and graceful leading of the voices, without at any time losing the dignity of its subject. This with the fugue "And they shall reign" (a piece of work of which Mr. Parker may be proud) are the two best numbers of the work, I cannot say that I find the cantata an entirely even one, but its best portions show that the musician who has labored so faithfully and in so many ways to advance our art in Boston is still capable of giving pleasure in a lofty manner to the thousands whom he has educated in past years.

LOUIS C. ELSON

Boston Journal.

WITH SUPPLEMENT.

MORNING EDITION.

WEDNESDAY MORNING, APRIL 9, 1890.

The Handel and Haydn Festival.

The interest in the festival of this society continues, for, in spite of all the other attractions, the audience last night was sufficient to fill the vast auditorium of Music Hall. There was not the large crowd of "standees" occupying every inch of room that signalized the Sunday night performance, but it was a large house—much larger, we have reason to believe, than was anticipated by the management early in the preparations for the festival.

Parts I. and II. of Bach's Christmas oratorio, the cantata "St. John," composed for the festival by J. C. D. Parker, with a couple of solos from the "Creation," comprised the programme. The soloists were Mme. Nordica (Lillian Norton), Miss Emily Winant, Messrs. Lloyd and M. W. Whitney. It was the intent of the management that some of the old favorites of the society, soloists who had made a reputation by appearances in the earlier days of the society, should be engaged at this festival. Very appropriate, therefore, were the engagements of Miss Winant and Mr. Whitney. What would a festival—especially an anniversary festival—be without these sterling artists? Both have sung for the society times almost without number, and it is not too much to say that some of the greatest successes that have come to both have come in appearances before a Boston public through the medium of this society. There were others whom the management would have been glad to have engaged for old acquaintance sake, for, after all, old time reminiscences will come back on such occasions, and the remembrance of artists who have honored themselves and the society in years gone by will crowd upon the mind.

The chorus work was equal in every respect to that of Sunday night. The grand choruses of Bach were rendered with a sublimity which has never been excelled. The chorus in the second part of the Christmas oratorio, "Glory to God in the Highest," was very clearly delivered, and it is by no means an easy chorus to sing. The choir was also very effective in Mr. Parker's work, which was conducted by the veteran composer and friend of this organization. This work was very beautiful in its conception and development, and was worthy of the composer, who is not unknown to the friends of the society. The orchestration was fine, and beautifully played, and the same will apply to the Bach oratorio. The pastoral symphony was delivered by Mr. Zerrahn with a clearness that was very pleasing, and found hearty appreciation from the audience.

Mr. Whitney had an ungrateful part in the Christmas oratorio, but it was all done conscientiously, and this can be truthfully said of Miss Winant. But her greatest success was in the solo, "Eye hath not seen," in Mr. Parker's work. This she invested with a reverence which is so characteristic of all the oratorio work of this artist, and her delivery of the closing passage, "Which God hath prepared for them that love Him," was a revelation. Mr. Lloyd had a larger opportunity in the work of Bach than was given in "Elijah," and there was abundant opportunity last night to judge of his admirable delivery, perfect phrasing and expressive as well as clear technique. The aria "Haste ye Shepherds" was given as no tenor in this country can give it. It is an exceedingly hard solo to sing well, but all the difficulties were mastered, and, what is better, without any intimation on his part that any difficulty in the rendition existed. The small solo assigned to Mme. Nordica was well sung, and her clear and powerful voice, which is well adapted to such work, made a favorable impression. This is also true of her work in "St. John."

Between the larger numbers were given two familiar solos from Haydn's "Creation," "On Mighty Pens," by Mme. Nordica, and "In Native Worth," by Mr. Lloyd. Both have been heard so many times by the audience that every note was familiar, and the audience held its breath and listened. Mme. Nordica's delivery was faultless, as far as execution was concerned, and in the pianissimo passages she showed a command over her voice which was very commendable. The audience was impressed with the singing, but there was not a particle of feeling in the voice or the delivery. Still her voice is majestic and true, but the little bits of coloring which make this solo the most effective in the "Creation" were lacking. Mr. Lloyd's rendering of "In Native Worth" was an object lesson. Not only the mellow voice, full of feeling and expression, but the phrasing, the meaning which was conveyed in every tone, made it the most artistic delivery of this solo which it is possible to hear. There was no attempt at effect, and as the closing words, so clearly uttered, so full of that meaning which none but a true artist can convey, fell upon the audience he was given an ovation such as is rarely seen in Music Hall. It was like the singing of Patti in "Home, Sweet Home." He was recalled three times amid the greatest enthusiasm, and he bore his honors with a modesty which is all the more commendable because of such a lack of it on the part of many artists of much inferior reputation. Thursday evening Gounod's "Redemption" is to be given, with Clementina De Vere as the soprano soloist and Messrs. Lloyd, Ludwig and Whitney as assisting artists.

Boston Post

WEDNESDAY MORNING, APRIL 9, 1890.

HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY'S FESTIVAL.

Although there was not such an enormous crowd at the second performance of the Handel and Haydn Society as on Sunday last, still there was a remarkable house in spite of the bad weather. The concert began with the first and second parts of Bach's Christmas oratorio, the soloists being Mme. Nordica, Miss Emily Winant, Mr. Edward Lloyd and Mr. Myron W. Whitney. The chorals were finely sung by the chorus, but this cannot truthfully be said of the polyphonic numbers. Bach's works were written for a chorus which averaged ten to twelve voices to the part and probably never exceeded fifty in all, and these were all trained vocalists. It follows that a performance of the most florid contrapuntal passages would still be clear and beautiful. But with a ponderous chorus of 600, not the twentieth part of whom have even the least vocal technique, this beautiful music is certain to sound thick, confused and muddy. It is not the fault of the conductor, nor the chorus itself, but the circumstances are to blame. Mme. Nordica's part consisted of one short declamatory passage assigned to The Angel, and it was beautifully and artistically sung. Miss Winant sang finely, and was especially effective in the beautiful air, "Slumber, beloved, and take thy repose." Mr. Whitney, who was warmly received, sang throughout in the straightforward, noble, artistic manner which characterizes all his work, and the air, "Mighty Lord and King all glorious," easily deserved the applause with which it was greeted. And now to speak of Mr. Lloyd. This is at once an easy and a difficult task. Easy, because nothing but praise can be awarded to his exquisite singing; difficult, because it is almost impossible to avoid extravagant enthusiasm. The peculiarly pure and chaste character of Bach's music is like second nature to him. His singing is refined without losing strength, dramatic but never theatrical, and his phrasing is a study. It is intuitive, and therefore faultless. He exhibits the vocal art at its best by his highly finished technique, but more than this he shows in every note that he is not only a singer but a musician. The splendid old Haydn aria, "In native worth and honor clad," as sung by him was an exemplification of the highest form of vocalism, and it was worth a dozen lessons to every student of singing who was so fortunate as to hear it. Mme. Nordica's beautiful interpretation of Haydn's "On Mighty Pens" was another masterpiece of singing. Her voice seems to become more beautiful every day, and she also sings with that inborn artistic understanding, that intuitive perception of what is artistically right and beautiful, without which the most beautiful voice availeth naught. Her technique is as smooth and polished as possible, and she has a most delicious staccato and an unusually rich and telling pianissimo. To this must be added the fact that the lower register of her voice (and she has an unusual compass) does not perceptibly differ in quality from her upper tones, as is so often the case. This gives a remarkably even and well-balanced quality of tone to the whole compass of the voice, which is especially effective in cantabile passages. Her townspeople appreciated every note she sang and applauded with genuine enthusiasm.

Mr. J. C. D. Parker's cantata, "St. John," which was especially composed for this festival, was the closing event of the concert, and was given a fine performance under the composer's baton. It is a scholarly and finished work, and, although it cannot be maintained that it is brilliantly original, it is by no means lacking in new ideas, and the fine manner in which it is all made is deserving of the highest praise. It contains, for example, two fugues, both of which, but more especially the latter, show a keen artistic sense for this style of writing, and a mastery of counterpoint and a diversity of polyphonic resource which only the most thoroughly and classically trained musician possesses. There is one novelty of this work which is peculiarly effective. Instead of solo recitatives, there is a species of rhythmic and accompanied recitative sung by all the basses and tenors as a prelude or introduction to each important number. This idea turns out to be very successful and is well worthy of imitation. The quartette, "Now we are sons of God," is one of the most beautiful numbers, but it was sung in rather an unbalanced fashion, the tenor and bass parts being far too prominent. The duet between soprano and tenor begins in rather a sentimental manner, but speedily becomes stronger. It was beautifully sung by Mme. Nordica and Mr. Lloyd. The final soprano solo and chorus is perhaps the best number of the work and made an effective ending to the whole. The work is very well instrumented, with an ear for orchestral color and variety, and Mr. Parker conducted with dignity and precision, the chorus singing with great earnestness and enthusiasm. The next feature of the festival will be Thursday evening: Gounod's "The Redemption," with the following soloists: Miss Clementine De Vere, Mrs. Jennie Patrick Walker, Miss Emily Winant, Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr. William Ludwig, Mr. Myron W. Whitney.

ARTHUR WELD.

Boston Evening Transcript.

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 9, 1890.

THE HANDEL AND HAYDN FESTIVAL.

The second concert of this Festival was given in the Music Hall last evening, the programme being:

Bach: Parts I. and II. of the "Christmas Oratorio."
Haydn: "On mighty pens," from "The Creation."
Haydn: "In native worth," from "The Creation."
J. C. D. Parker: "Saint John."

The solos were sung by Mrs. Lillian Nordica (soprano), Miss Emily Winant (alto), Mr. Edward Lloyd (tenor), and Mr. Myron W. Whitney (bass). Mr. Carl Zerrahn, conducted, and Mr. B. J. Lang was the organist.

One can only be thankful to the Handel and Hayden Society for including the first two cantatas of the "Christmas Oratorio" in their festival programme. It shows a recognition of the fact that no festival of the society can be what it should be without Bach, just as it was recognized long ago that a festival without Handel was no festival at all. And it was wise to choose a work that was in perfect condition to be performed. These two cantatas are the only ones in the "Christmas Oratorio" the continuo of which has been filled out with additional accompaniments by Robert Franz, and are thus ready for performance. By the way, we wish that the term "additional instrumentation by Franz" had not been used on the programmes; it is misleading, and does not give a correct idea of the character and scope of Franz's work on the score. But, passing over this little inaccuracy, we can say heartily that a happier choice could hardly have been made than these two cantatas. Bach is not yet so thoroughly acclimated to our concert rooms that we can afford to dispense with any pains or care, not only as regards the manner in which his works are presented, but also in the matter of selecting those of his works which are fittest for performance. To make the choice a wise one, the work must fulfill three conditions—it should be characteristic and representative of Bach at his best, its score must be complete, and it should be in a vein that is likely to impress the public favorably. These conditions are amply fulfilled by the cantatas in question.

The performance, in spite of some short-comings, upon which the pressure on our columns this evening does not leave us space to expatiate, was, in the main, far more satisfying than might have been expected—from the difficulty of the work, and its unaccustomed style. For one thing, the "Pastoral Symphony" was better played than we have yet heard it here; if not with greater nicety in detail, certainly with more security and repose, with greater clearness in the larger outlines, and with an effect better reflecting the true spirit of the composition. At last we have heard this beautiful pastoral movement (which must be exceedingly difficult, judging from the many failures that have been in it) so played that one was not beset by a constant terror that everything would go to pieces the next moment.

The chorus sang exceptionally well in the opening, "Christians, be joyful," and still better in the chorals, which latter were given not only with firmness and a noble volume of tone, but with a clearness, with an independence of accent in the several voices which made Bach's gloriously free and vigorous part-writing fully appreciable to the ear. The chorus, "Glory to God in the highest," in the second part, went less well, and sounded rather blurred.

The solos were well, at times excellently, sung by the four artists of the evening. If the effect was often marred by a lack of proper balance between the singer's voice and the orchestra, and between the several constituent parts of the orchestra itself, this defect must be recognized as one which has been noticeable from the very beginning of Bach performances here, and which has not been conquered yet. To consider it more closely here would lead us too far.

Mrs. Nordica was in glorious voice, and sang the air from Haydn's "Creation" with immense effect, and in admirable style. One might take exception to a somewhat over-elaborate toying with pretty details toward the end of the song; but, in this matter, Mrs. Nordica follows a pretty firmly established tradition, if a bad one. She is, however, a finer singer than when she last sang here—which is saying not a little—and there is far more to praise highly in her work than there is to criticize.

Mr. Lloyd showed for the first time in the air, "In native worth," what there is really in him. Except for a few lapses from perfect good taste, such as we have just criticised in Mrs. Nordica, his singing was superb at every point; one seldom hears anything so fine, both in technique and feeling. The unbounded enthusiasm it called forth was thoroughly earned.

"Saint John," the new cantata, written for this festival by Mr. Parker, is a work which inspires at once respect and liking. The composer has made one innovation, suggested perhaps by some things modern French composers have done, in giving such passages as would have been sung by "The Evangelist" to the male chorus (and, later on, to the female chorus) in unison. These passages of choral quasi recitativo come in, apparently almost at random, in the midst of beautifully melodious and poetically suggestive bits of orchestral writing, and with admirable effect, the chorus being supported by full harmony on the organ, while the orchestra goes its own way. The choruses proper are notable for purity of style, and for the just proportion in them between homophonic and contrapuntal writing; they are, too, especially and highly remarkable for a masterly treatment of the voices, for what might be called their "vocal orchestration." The quality of tone produced is invariably of the finest. This beauty is also noticeable to a high degree in the quartet, "Now are we the sons of God." If the solos are somewhat less inspiring than the choruses, they still impress one by their beauty of sentiment.

And here we come to what strikes us as the most salient point in the whole cantata; this is, throughout, the genuine depth, fervor and purity of religious feeling it expresses. With all the excellence and skill shown in the writing, with all the invariably musical quality of the whole, this element still predominates. This "Saint John" is one of the exceedingly few modern sacred works we know of that sound as if the composer thoroughly meant what he wrote. It impresses one distinctly as a free, spontaneous expression of individual religious feeling, profound, fervent and thoroughly sincere. It sounds as if the composer had written it on his knees. The performance, conducted by Mr. Parker himself, was very fine indeed, chorus and orchestra doing admirably, and Mrs. Nordica, Miss Wynant and Mr. Lloyd vieing with one another in doing full justice to the solos. Be it said, too, that Mr. Parker showed himself to be an excellent conductor, and held all his forces at the tip of his baton. We congratulate him heartily upon his new work and its success.

The remainder of the festival is laid out as follows:

Third concert, tomorrow night, Gounod's "The Redemption;" solos by Mrs. Jennie Patrick Walker, Misses Clementine De Vere and Emily Winant, and Messrs. Edward Lloyd, William Ludwig and Myron W. Whitney.

Fourth concert, next Sunday night, Handel's "Israel in Egypt"; solos by Misses Clementine De Vere and Clara Poole, and Messrs. Edward Lloyd, William Ludwig and Myron W. Whitney.

[106]

Boston Daily Traveller.

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 9, 1890.

Second Night of the Handel and Haydn Society Festival.

Bach's Christmas Oratorio and Parker's Cantata of "St. John."

The second of the performances in celebration of the seventy-fifth anniversary of the Handel and Haydn Society presented two works, namely, Bach's Christmas Oratorio and the new cantata, "St. John," written for the society by Mr. J. C. D. Parker, and heard for the first time last night. The programme was otherwise interestingly lengthened by the addition of two airs from "The Creation," namely, "On Mighty Pens," sung by Mme. Nordica; "In Native Worth," sung by Mr. Lloyd.

Bach's Christmas Oratorio.

This work, as now published, is in reality the combination of six cantatas, of which the first two were given last evening. It was the third performance by the society of these selections. Bach probably never intended that the respective parts should follow each other in an uninterrupted manner and be presented as a concert piece. The various numbers were written expressly for the church festival of Christmas, each cantata or "Part," as now termed, being heard upon its respective day, beginning with Christmas day and following in succession upon the day after Christmas, the day after that, then New Year's day, the Sunday following New Year's day, and then the festival of the Epiphany. The work dates back about a century and a half, and is particularly interesting at this time as a specimen of music pure and simple, exhibiting to the listener the true model in choral work, the fundamental principle upon which all vocal concerted compositions should be based.

It is within the limit of this four-part form that the greatest vocal effects can be obtained, be the composition sacred or secular, oratorio or cantata, or a work of the most liberal character, lyric or dramatic. More modern composers have sought to improve upon the model by piling part upon part, thereby succeeding in diffusing the effort until often all real power is lost, and vocal cacophony comes in to supplant that definite and pungent delineation that lies only within the concentration of a four-part score. It must be remembered that concentration is the element of power in every effort of life. The real chorus opportunities in the Parts 1 and 2 given last evening are quite meagre, embracing only two, one in each part. There are numerous chorals, however, but by them we are led at once into the church and reminded of the incongruity existing in presenting this work as a concert piece, for the value of the choral exists in the fact that the congregation joins in the effort, and thus assists in the intended worship. However, if in the presentation of these excerpts of Bach a lesson can be drawn pointing to the possibilities in the hands of a master employing vocal forces in the more simple forms, and wholly and purely upon a vocal basis, the effort may not have been in vain. Otherwise the time devoted to its preparation and performance could have been better employed.

As regards the performance, it cannot truthfully be said that either the chorus or the orchestra distinguished itself. They pulled one against the other very often, the orchestra being at variance with itself even, the conductor failing to hold his forces together with a firm grip. Bach does not seem to be within the grasp of singers nowadays; a more accurately trained chorus than the Handel & Haydn Society is necessary to definitely present the contrapuntal intricacies of his works. Of the solo parts Miss Emily Winant, Mr. Edward Lloyd and Mr. Myron W. Whitney had the principal work to do, the latter being the most successful of the three, his noble voice and fine rendering meriting high praise. Mr. Lloyd was less happy in his single air, "Haste ye shepherds," than in the more frequent recitatives. The elements of the ripe artist were evident in his efforts, although the constraint he places upon his voice in constricting the muscles of the throat is a blemish to be regretted. Miss Winant was not in her best estate with the Bach aria, for it lacked freedom and flow. For a perfect performance of a Bach aria the singer must be a correct vocalist, and such an one is rare to find. Mrs. Nordica had but a simple recitative to sing, a task most difficult to perform at the beginning of an evening's work, unless the singer has a better fundamental training in voice production than Mrs. Nordica presents in her singing. The consequence was that much of the effort was flat of the pitch. Following the Bach piece came the delightful recitative and air from the "Creation" of Haydn. In this Mrs. Nordica appeared to better advantage and gained the applause of the audience. Following this came Mr. Lloyd, who sang with a purity of sentiment the air, "In native worth," from the same oratorio. He was enthusiastically recalled three times.

M. J. C. D. Parker's "St. John."

At too infrequent intervals in its history, the Handel and Haydn Society has commissioned new works from native composers; in 1877 the "Redemption Hymn," a short choral piece with alto solo, by J. C. D. Parker; in 1883, "The Nativity," cantata by Prof. J. K. Paine. Now, in 1890, the society turns again to Mr. Parker, and the result is "St. John," a short cantata of six numbers for solo voices, chorus and orchestra illustrating isolated scenes in the life of the apostle. Mr. Parker has borne his share of the activities of the town, though never in an assertive fashion. For a period of years dating from 1862, he conducted the Parker Club, whose mission it was to perform the sacred and secular cantata; its record is a progressive one, its standard of performance was very high, and the privileges of membership was much esteemed. As church organist, pianoforte and harmony teacher, Mr. Parker is now exclusively employed.

His style in composition is that of a fluent harmonist and good contrapuntist. He is no innovator either in choral forms or instrumental combinations, a sort of American Hiller one might call him, yet his art is not so strong as that of the German composer. In "St. John," which appears in pianoforte score from the press of Arthur P. Schmidt, Boston and Leipzig, there is no musical or dramatic continuity, though the composer gives his work a certain unity by prefacing each number with a short unison phrase, indicating the sentiment of that number, as for instance at the outset the male voices recite: "And He said unto them, follow me," they forsook all and followed him," this being succeeded by a chorus "How beautiful upon the mountain are the feet of him that bringeth good tidings, that publisheth peace," with a second part on "that saith unto Zion Thy God reigneth." In every instance but one the recited or chanted phrase is given to the male voices, the exception being the prelude to the sixth chorus, where the female voices have some twenty measures of part writing. The first number illustrates the calling together of the apostles. After the initial sentence the chorus has a unison phrase, allegro ma poco maestoso, which is soon after harmonized, the parts moving in imitation; this is followed by an allegro movement of a fugal character, solid and effectively written; the movement closes with a return to the original tempo and subject. Number two is the scene of the Lord's supper. The recited phrase, adagio, is somewhat extended, the instrumentation of the accompaniment, which has an independent melody, is made an important feature by the composer. The scene proper is an alto solo, andantino. Mr. Parker has here written an expressive melody. The subject of the third number is from the crucifixion. The accompaniment of the recited phrase is reminiful of Bach, both in its harmonies and combinations of instruments. The main section is a soprano solo, allegro con moto. In the melody of this the composer has fallen below a dignified level. The fourth number, descriptive of an incident following the death on the cross, is a well harmonized, mixed quartet, accompanied with taste. The most truly lyric portion of the work is the first part of the fifth number, a duet for soprano and tenor, allegretto moderato; continuing without break is a strong chorus, allegro. Number six, like the preceding, is based on a subject taken from the Revelations. After the introduction is a short soprano solo, andante mosso, which is followed without break by a chorus of a descriptive character, and in a contrasting key; for his concluding section the composer returns to the soprano solo, joining to it some simply harmonized passages. For ourselves, we ask for greater spontaneity and a more individual style than Mr. Parker has shown in his "St. John." His good musicianship, orthodox harmonies, and unemotional use of the instruments combined form a work of which at this period of the world's musical progress there is some doubt that a great society should be satisfied to receive. Mr. Parker conducted his work, and upon his appearance was welcomed warmly by the audience and the singers. Being of an easy, graceful character, it went smoothly and effectively, No. 4, the quartet, and No. 5, the duet for soprano and tenor, gaining recognition upon the part of the audience. The solo parts were given by Mrs. Nordica, Miss Winant, and Messrs. Lloyd and Whitney, each contributing happily to the generally excellent performance.

On Thursday evening Gounod's "Redemption" will be given, and the festival will close on Sunday evening following, with a performance of Handel's "Israel in Egypt."

W. D.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, APRIL 6, 1890.

THE SYMPHONIES.

TWENTY-SECOND CONCERT.

There was no soloist at the symphony concert last evening and the programme consisted of: Churnbim, Overture, Water Carrier; Cowen, Symphony in C minor, "Scandinaviar"; Reinecke, Entr' act "Manfred;" Wagner, Overture, "The Flying Dutchman."

Both overtures were magnificently played, The Reinicke "Manfred" Entr' act is not worth playing. It is a rapid, meaningless piece of music, that is as characteristic of its composer as it is effeminate. Reinecke, however, is a master of orchestration. More's the pity. If he had never known the difierence between a kettle-drum and a first fiddle the musical world would indeed have becn fortunate. He may favorably be compared to some of the graduates of the Vienna conservatory of music, to whom the ex-conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra was so partial.

THIRD YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULAR,

Mr. Nikisch could have desired no better testimony as to the merit of his programme for the third Young People's Popular in Music hall Wednesday afternoon than was noticeable in the complete silence and earnest attention that prevailed in the house, and which doubtless were not without their effect upon both orchestra and soloists. The concert opened with the overture to "Mignon," which has seldom been played here although it abounds in delightful contrasts of melody, harmony and sentiment and presents the development of a lyrically well-defined, yet varied content rather than any more mechanical and ornamental auxiliaries. Following the overture the programme continued with:

Aria, from "Hans Heiling".....Marschner
Mr. Reichmann.

Symphonic poem, "Danse Macabre".....
.....Saint-Saëns

Air Hongrois (for violin).....Ernst
Mr. Kneisel.

Songs with piano.
Fruhlingstraum.....Spicker
"Wie bist du meine Koenigin".....Brahms
Wanderlied.....Schumann
Mr. Reichmann.

(a) "Minuet of the Will-o'-the Wisps."
(b) Dance of Sylphs, from "The Damnation of Faust".....Berlioz
March from "Tannhäuser".....Wagner

The weird and grotesque effects of the "Danse Macabre" as usual interested the audience immensely, and a similar recognition is due the manner of its performance, there being the same sonorousness on the part of the strings and harmonic fullness of the ensemble, the good healthy pitch also and just intonation that are the well known characteristics of the Boston Symphony orchestra's reputation. In the "Tannhäuser" overture, however, the artistic sympathy prevailing between Mr. Nikisch and his performing musicians was more than ever noticeable and it resulted in some of the most admirable orchestral playing that has yet been heard here—luxuriant and refined in tonal effect and as prompt and clear in attack as one could wish.

Mr. Reichmann's singing of the aria from "Hans Heiling" was conceptively a most finished and artistic performance, and was mainly characterized by his self-forgetting devotion to his music; so that, notwithstanding his intonation appeared at a pardonable disadvantage, he was in all other respects superbly successful, especially in his conformance to the highest demands of his art. Mr. Kneisel's violin playing was endowed with all his wonted mastery and refinement, so that each artist received a liberal share of the plaudits that frequently enlivened the all-absorbing interest with which the concert was received.

FIFTH KNEISEL CONCERT.

In Union hall on Monday evening the Kneisel quartette gave their fifth concert of the season. That the programme was eminently worthy of being reproduced will be inferred from what follows:

Brahms. Quartette for String in B flat, op. 67.
Beethoven. Four Scotch songs with accompaniment of pianoforte, violin and violoncello.
a) "Again my Lyre."
b) "The Sweetest Lad."
c) "Faithful Johnie."
d) "O, thou art the Lad of my Heart, Willy."
Arthur Weld. Adagio Molto Sostenuto, from quartette for strings in F major.
Beethoven. Trio for pianoforte, violin and violoncello in B flat major, op. 97.

Miss Gertrude Franklin was the singer, and Mr. Perabo played the pianoforte part in the Beethoven trio.

The Brahms quartette in B flat is not a recent composition of its composer, and yet it was written just before his first symphony; the suggestion therefore being that of recent years he has really written no chamber music in this form. One can hardly recognize the composer's best known traits either in his conception or development of this quartette. As for the development, it is abundantly ingenious without being profoundly characteristic in this respect, while throughout the quartette is in a much more happy vein than are either quartettes in C major or A minor.

The four Scotch songs that Miss Franklin sang have none of the local coloring that their title implies, neither are they formed in any Scotch scale, but they are none the less delightful in sentiment and will easily rank among the rarest gems of classic song. Miss Franklin's singing was full of charm; her perfectly artistic phrasing and refined delivery being at their very best. The adagio has a refined spirituality of sentiment, gentleness and repose that amply characterize it as a "gem of purest ray serene." Its modulating changes are very beautiful, and the whole expression of the music is that of the innermost feeling of a genuine artist. The Beethoven trio was splendidly played by Messrs. Kneisel, Hekking and Perabo, and thus ended one of the most delightful concerts of the season.

Boston Post

FRIDAY MORNING, APRIL 11, 1890

HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY'S FESTIVAL.

The third evening of the Handel and Haydn festival was devoted to the somewhat well-known "Redemption" of Charles Gounod, and its popularity is so secure that there was an audience gathered ranking only second in point of numbers to that of Sunday evening, and in point of musical as well as social distinction fully equalling it. It is fair to assume that, of all the later works presented by the many choral societies that are giving festivals within a large radius of Boston, the "Redemption" is one of the most popular of the more modern oratorios, even if in musical circles the "Requiem" of Verdi outranks it. Last night the performance was of such a character that, while it gave great pleasure in the general work, it left the impression on the mind of the critical hearer of a distinct effort by the composer to make the dramatic side of his story rather too intense, while the narrative portion is so diffuse that there is a longing for the cuts that are seemingly impossible. In fact, rather than hurt, in any sense, the continuity of the story, it was not till the last chorus but one that the pruning knife was used, and that only to bring the concert within the requisite time to allow the out-of-towners a possible chance to catch their last trains.

The characters include Jesus, Mary, The Penitent Thief, The Impenitent Thief, The Holy Women, An Angel, and the narrators; and the soloists intrusted with the work were Miss Clementine DeVere, Mrs. Jennie Patrick Walker, Miss Emily Winant, Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr. William Ludwig and Mr. Myron W. Whitney. Mr. Edward Lloyd again showed his extreme artistic intelligence throughout, and if he failed to draw the audience to a fine state of enthusiasm, it was only that he had no opportunity to appeal to the popular taste in any way. The few bars which were given to him as the penitent were sung as artistically as anything that he has done here. He is an artist who shows an artistic feeling and touch which always give pleasure. Mr. William Ludwig sang the role of Jesus with a fervor and a beautiful simplicity of spirit that carried its largeness and devotional emphasis to the heart of his hearers. Miss Clementine De Vere rather held herself for the solo with the high C of the "From Thy Love as a Father"; but her work was more than conscientious all through. The other singers intrusted with solo work were adequate, and the chorus was in the main exceedingly pleasing. If the tenors and basses were at times a trifle away from the key, it was possibly the fault of the composer, who will insist on writing such a work based on the chromatic scale—difficult enough for solo singers, and impossible for so large a chorus to sing with absolute accuracy. The orchestra, under Mr. Carl Zerrahn, played with better effect than before, perhaps, but some of the tempi were decidedly at variance with the metronomic marks, while the first clarinet was at times untuneful and some inaccuracies were noticeable in the playing of one of the quartette of horns. As a whole the concert was a remarkably good performance of extremely even quality, except for the wonderfully artistic singing of Mr. Lloyd.

Boston

THURSDAY, A[illegible]

EDWARD LLOYD.

The History and Habits of the Famous English Tenor.

Edward Lloyd, the famous English tenor, who arrived in this country recently, is a homebird much more than most of the choral tribe.

His charming cottage is at Tulse Hill a southern suburb of Londen, some miles from Piccadilly circus, but quite close to Surrey country. Here in the bosom of his family, for 10 months of the year, he spends all the time that is left him by constant engagements in different parts of the country. The remaining two months—August and September—constitute Mr. Lloyd's vacation, which is invariably passed with wife and children at his house in Brighton.

In his distaste for society Sims Reeves's successor has one feature in marked contrast to most of his fellow artists. He abhors the club and avoids the salon. The delights of Belgravia attract him no more than the diverstions of Bohemia. "I live by rule," he tells his friends, and a very simple rule it is, comprising breakfast at 8 and dinner at 2 P.M., and 5 o'clock tea. The morning is spent in practice and correspondence, the afternoon, when the weather is agreeable, in walking or tennis playing, of which latter exercise the singer is very fond. Excepting as an aid to digestion at dinner—when he usually drinks port wine—Mr. Lloyd rarely takes alcohol and never as a stimulant to his voice. It is this sound regimen which enables him to bear the fatigues of his great position.

Mr. Lloyd's father was a bandmaster and his mother a pianist. As a boy he sang in the choir at Westminster Abbey. Among his fellow choristers were Sir Arthur Sullivan and Cellier, the composer of "Dorothy." When Lloyd was about 18 years old his father died, leaving the family in poor circumstances. His mother obtained the position of music-teacher at the newly-established Cheltenham College for girls, to which young Edward accompanied her. While there, the youug man discovered that he had the germs of a tenor voice, and in a few months he went to Cambridge as chorister at Trinity College. The position was open to public competition, and 20 competitors came from all parts of the country, but Lloyd won the day—won it with his singing of "Angels Ever Bright and Fair."

The young singer spent 12 months at Cambridge, and it was amid church spires and turretted towers of the picturesque town on the Cam that he first met the young lady who is now his wife. His ambition could not be gratified in Cambridge's comparatively small sphere, and his eyes turned Londonward. He came back to London as the first tenor in the well-known church, St. Andrew's, Wells street, seeking to fill his leisure by concert engagements. In a short time the young singer gained the much more important position of principal soloist at the Chapel Royal. It was while fulfilling his duties at the Chapel Royal that Mr. Lloyd made a hit by his singing in Bach's "Passion" at the Gloucester festival. He was then only 23, but so widely was the success noised abroad that he was at once flooded with offers of engagements from all parts of the country.

So thick and fast did they come, indeed, that the young man was compelled to resign his Chapel Royal appointment. The next five years were those in which Mr. Lloyd did the hardest work of his life.

He distrusts all intoxicants as stimulants to the voice, and thinks that they are much less resorted to in this way than some people suppose. "There is certainly no profuse passion," he points out, "of liquor at the big concert halls. At St. James's Hall, for instance, all that is placed on the table of an artist's room is a decanter of port, a small bottle of sherry and a bottle of claret with some Apollinaris water. Strange to say, in all these years the only person whom I have seen take any drinks has been the accompanist, whose labors at a concert are, I consider, always the most arduous."

Mr. Lloyd adds that the only thing he has found to be of any real use in nourishing the voice is an egg beaten up in milk, and this he sometimes takes just before starting out for a concert.

Boston Journal.

MORNING EDITION.

FRIDAY MORNING, APRIL 11, 1890.

The Handel and Haydn Festival.

The third performance of this society consisted of Gounod's "Redemption," and there was a very large audience. It was the most even and satisfactory performance of any thus far. The grand chorals of the work were finely sung, and the entire work of the chorus was admirable. Of course, the enthusiasm was great at the rendition of "Unfold, ye portals," but no more than was warranted. The orchestration of the "Redemption" is a remarkable piece of work, and it was very fortunate for the society that it has such a body of musicians as the Symphony Orchestra to interpret it. There cannot be too much praise bestowed upon this body for last night's performance.

The soloists were Misses De Vere and Winant, Messrs. Lloyd and Whitney, with the assistance of Mr. Ludwig and Mrs. Walker. As Miss De Vere was the only soloist who has not appeared at the festival, it needs only to be said of the rest that they more than confirmed the reputation which they have already achieved. Mr. Lloyd's narratives were a study; his enunciation was so perfect that his pianissimo passages could be distinctly understood in every part of the hall, and Mr. Whitney was in superb voice, insuring an almost perfect rendition. Miss De Vere was a stranger to Boston in oratorio music, and there was considerable interest attached to her rendition. It became clear at the outset that the management had made no error of judgment in engaging her for this work, and after the "From Thy Love as a Father" she was given an ovation. Her notes are particularly clear and pure, and this was made specially manifest in the C in alt with the chorus, which stood out in bold relief against the choir, producing an electrical effect. It was a very artistic, sympathetic and delightful rendition. The closing performance of the festival Sunday night will consist of "Israel in Egypt."

Boston Daily Traveller.
WEDNESDAY, APRIL 9, 1890.

Second Night of the Handel and Haydn Society Festival.

Bach's Christmas Oratorio and Parker's Cantata of "St. John."

The second of the performances in celebration of the seventy-fifth anniversary of the Handel and Haydn Society presented two works, namely, Bach's Christmas Oratorio and the new cantata, "St. John," written for the society by Mr. J. C. D. Parker, and heard for the first time last night. The programme was otherwise interestingly lengthened by the addition of two airs from "The Creation," namely, "On Mighty Pens," sung by Mme. Nordica; "In Native Worth," sung by Mr. Lloyd.

Bach's Christmas Oratorio.

This work, as now published, is in reality the combination of six cantatas, of which the first two were given last evening. It was the third performance by the society of these selections. Bach probably never intended that the respective parts should follow each other in an uninterrupted manner and be presented as a concert piece. The various numbers were written expressly for the church festival of Christmas, each cantata or "Part," as now termed, being heard upon its respective day, beginning with Christmas day and following in succession upon the day after Christmas, the day after that, then New Year's day, the Sunday following New Year's day, and then the festival of the Epiphany. The work dates back about a century and a half, and is particularly interesting at this time as a specimen of music pure and simple, exhibiting to the listener the true model in choral work, the fundamental principle upon which all vocal concerted compositions should be based.

It is within the limit of this four-part form that the greatest vocal effects can be obtained, be the composition sacred or secular, oratorio or cantata, or a work of the most liberal character, lyric or dramatic. More modern composers have sought to improve upon the model by piling part upon part, thereby succeeding in diffusing the effort, until often all real power is lost, and vocal cacophony comes in to supplant that definite and pungent delineation that lies only within the concentration of a four-part score. It must be remembered that concentration is the element of power in every effort of life. The real chorus opportunities in the Parts 1 and 2 given last evening are quite meagre, embracing only two, one in each part. There are numerous chorals, however, but by them we are led at once into the church and reminded of the incongruity existing in presenting this work as a concert piece, for the value of the choral exists in the fact that the congregation joins in the effort, and thus assists in the intended worship. However, if in the presentation of these excerpts of Bach a lesson can be drawn pointing to the possibilities in the hands of a master employing vocal forces in the more simple forms, and wholly and purely upon a vocal basis, the effort may not have been in vain. Otherwise the time devoted to its preparation and performance could have been better employed.

As regards the performance, it cannot truthfully be said that either the chorus or the orchestra distinguished itself. They pulled one against the other very often, the orchestra being at variance with itself even, the conductor failing to hold his forces together with a firm grip. Bach does not seem to be within the grasp of singers nowadays; a more accurately trained chorus than the Handel & Haydn Society is necessary to definitely present the contrapuntal intricacies of his works. Of the solo parts Miss Emily Winant, Mr. Edward Lloyd and Mr. Myron W. Whitney had the principal work to do, the latter being the most successful of the three, his noble voice and fine rendering meriting high praise. Mr. Lloyd was less happy in his single air, "Haste ye shepherds," than in the more frequent recitatives. The elements of the ripe artist were evident in his efforts, although the constraint he places upon his voice in constricting the muscles of the throat is a blemish to be regretted. Miss Winant was not in her best estate with the Bach aria, for it lacked freedom and flow. For a perfect performance of a Bach aria the singer must be a correct vocalist, and such an one is rare to find. Mrs. Nordica had but a simple recitative to sing, a task most difficult to perform at the beginning of an evening's work, unless the singer has a better fundamental training in voice production than Mrs. Nordica presents in her singing. The consequence was that much of the effort was flat of the pitch. Following the Bach piece came the delightful recitative and air from the "Creation" of Haydn. In this Mrs. Nordica appeared to better advantage and gained the applause of the audience. Following this came Mr. Lloyd, who sang with a purity of sentiment the air, "In native worth," from the same oratorio. He was enthusiastically recalled three times.

M. J. C. D. Parker's "St. John."

At too infrequent intervals in its history, the Handel and Haydn Society has commissioned new works from native composers; in 1877 the "Redemption Hymn," a short choral piece with alto solo, by J. C. D. Parker; in 1883, "The Nativity," cantata by Prof. J. K. Paine. Now, in 1890, the society turns again to Mr. Parker, and the result is "St. John," a short cantata of six numbers for solo voices, chorus and orchestra illustrating isolated scenes in the life of the apostle. Mr. Parker has borne his share of the activities of the town, though never in an assertive fashion. For a period of years dating from 1862, he conducted the Parker Club, whose mission it was to perform the sacred and secular cantata; its record is a progressive one, its standard of performance was very high, and the privileges of membership was much esteemed. As church organist, pianoforte and harmony teacher, Mr. Parker is now exclusively employed.

His style in composition is that of a fluent harmonist and good contrapuntist. He is no innovator either in choral forms or instrumental combinations, a sort of American Hiller one might call him, yet his art is not so strong as that of the German composer. In "St. John," which appears in pianoforte score from the press of Arthur P. Schmidt, Boston and Leipzig, there is no musical or dramatic continuity, though the composer gives his work a certain unity by prefacing each number with a short unison phrase, indicating the sentiment of that number, as for instance at the outset the male voices recite: "And He said unto them, follow me, and they forsook all and followed Him," this being succeeded by a chorus "How beautiful upon the mountain are the feet of him that bringeth good tidings, that publisheth peace," with a second part on "that saith unto Zion Thy God reigneth." In every instance but one the recited or chanted phrase is given to the male voices, the exception being the prelude to the sixth chorus, where the female voices have some twenty measures of part writing. The first number illustrates the calling together of the apostles. After the initial sentence the chorus has a unison phrase, allegro un poco maestoso, which is soon after harmonized, the parts moving in imitation; this is followed by an allegro movement of a fugal character, solid and effectively written; the movement closes with a return to the original tempo and subject. Number two is the scene of the Lord's supper. The recited phrase, adagio, is somewhat extended, the instrumentation of the accompaniment, which has an independent melody, is made an important feature by the composer. The scene proper is an alto solo, andantino. Mr. Parker has here written an expressive melody. The subject of the third number is from the crucifixion. The accompaniment of the recited phrase is reminiful of Bach, both in its harmonies and combinations of instruments. The main section is a soprano solo, allegro con moto. In the melody of this the composer has fallen below a dignified level. The fourth number, descriptive of an incident following the death on the cross, is a well harmonized, mixed quartet, accompanied with taste. The most truly lyric portion of the work is the first part of the fifth number, a duet for soprano and tenor, allegretto moderato; continuing without break is a strong chorus, allegro. Number six, like the preceding, is based on a subject taken from the Revelations. After the introduction is a short soprano solo, andante mosso, which is followed without break by a chorus of a descriptive character, and in a contrasting key; for his concluding section the composer returns to the soprano solo, joining to it some simply harmonized passages. For ourselves, we ask for greater spontaneity and a more individual style than Mr. Parker has shown in his "St. John." His good musicianship, orthodox harmonies, and unemotional use of the instruments combined form a work of which at this period of the world's musical progress there is some doubt that a great society should be satisfied to receive. Mr. Parker conducted his work, and upon his appearance was welcomed warmly by the audience and the singers. Being of an easy, graceful character, it went smoothly and effectively, No. 4, the quartet, and No. 5, the duet for soprano and tenor, gaining recognition upon the part of the audience. The solo parts were given by Mrs. Nordica, Miss Winant, and Messrs. Lloyd and Whitney, each contributing happily to the generally excellent performance.

On Thursday evening Gounod's "Redemption" will be given, and the festival will close on Sunday evening following, with a performance of Handel's "Israel in Egypt."

W. D.

THE BOSTON TIMES
BOSTON, SUNDAY, APRIL 6, 1890.

THE SYMPHONIES.

TWENTY-SECOND CONCERT.

There was no soloist at the symphony concert last evening and the programme consisted of: Churnbim, Overture, Water Carrier; Cowen, Symphony in C minor, "Scandinaviar"; Reinecke, Entr' act "Manfred;" Wagner, Overture, "The Flying Dutchman."

Both overtures were magnificently played. The Reinicke "Manfred" Entr' act is not worth playing. It is a rapid, meaningless piece of music, that is as characteristic of its composer as it is effeminate. Reinecke, however, is a master of orchestration. More's the pity. If he had never known the difierence between a kettle-drum and a first fiddle the musical world would indeed have been fortunate. He may favorably be compared to some of the graduates of the Vienna conservatory of music, to whom the ex-conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra was so partial.

THIRD YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULAR,

Mr. Nikisch could have desired no better testimony as to the merit of his programme for the third Young People's Popular in Music hall Wednesday afternoon than was noticeable in the complete silence and earnest attention that prevailed in the house, and which doubtless were not without their effect upon both orchestra and soloists. The concert opened with the overture to "Mignon," which has seldom been played here although it abounds in delightful contrasts of melody, harmony and sentiment and presents the development of a lyrically well-defined, yet varied content rather than any more mechanical and ornamental auxiliaries. Following the overture the programme continued with:

Aria, from "Hans Heiling".....Marschner
Mr. Reichmann.
Symphonic poem, "Danse Macabre".....
.....Saint-Saëns
Air Hongrois (for violin).....Ernst
Mr. Kneisel.
Songs with piano.
Fruhlingstraum.....Spicker
"Wie bist du meine Koenigin".....Brahms
Wanderlied.....Schumann
Mr. Reichmann.
(a) "Minuet of the Will-o'-the Wisps."
(b) Dance of Sylphs, from "The Damnation of Faust".....Berlioz
March from "Tannhäuser".....Wagner

The weird and grotesque effects of the "Danse Macabre" as usual interested the audience immensely, and a similar recognition is due the manner of its performance, there being the same sonorousness on the part of the strings and harmonic fullness of the ensemble, the good healthy pitch also and just intonation that are the well known characteristics of the Boston Symphony orchestra's reputation. In the "Tannhäuser" overture, however, the artistic sympathy prevailing between Mr. Nikisch and his performing musicians was more than ever noticeable and it resulted in some of the most admirable orchestral playing that has yet been heard here—luxuriant and refined in tonal effect and as prompt and clear in attack as one could wish.

Mr. Reichmann's singing of the aria from "Hans Heiling" was conceptively a most finished and artistic performance, and was mainly characterized by his self-forgetting devotion to his music; so that, notwithstanding his intonation appeared at a pardonable disadvantage, he was in all other respects superbly successful, especially in his conformance to the highest demands of his art. Mr. Kneisel's violin playing was endowed with all his wonted mastery and refinement, so that each artist received a liberal share of the plaudits that frequently enlivened the all-absorbing interest with which the concert was received.

FIFTH KNEISEL CONCERT.

In Union hall on Monday evening the Kneisel quartette gave their fifth concert of the season. That the programme was eminently worthy of being reproduced will be inferred from what follows:

Brahms. Quartette for String in B flat, op. 67.
Beethoven. Four Scotch songs with accompaniment of pianoforte, violin and violoncello.
a) "Again my Lyre."
b) "The Sweetest Lad."
c) "Faithful Johnie."
d) "O, thou art the Lad of my Heart, Willy."
Arthur Weld. Adagio Molto Sostenuto, from quartette for strings in F major.
Beethoven. Trio for pianoforte, violin and violoncello in B flat major, op. 97.

Miss Gertrude Franklin was the singer, and Mr. Perabo played the pianoforte part in the Beethoven trio.

The Brahms quartette in B flat is not a recent composition of its composer, and yet it was written just before his first symphony; the suggestion therefore being that of recent years he has really written no chamber music in this form. One can hardly recognize the composer's best known traits either in his conception or development of this quartette. As for the development, it is abundantly ingenious without being profoundly characteristic in this respect, while throughout the quartette is in a much more happy vein than are either quartettes in C major or A minor.

The four Scotch songs that Miss Franklin sang have none of the local coloring that their title implies, neither are they formed in any Scotch scale, but they are none the less delightful in sentiment and will easily rank among the rarest gems of classic song. Miss Franklin's singing was full of charm; her perfectly artistic phrasing and refined delivery being at their very best. The adagio has a refined spirituality of sentiment, gentleness and repose that amply characterize it as a "gem of purest ray serene." Its modulating changes are very beautiful, and the whole expression of the music is that of the innermost feeling of a genuine artist. The Beethoven trio was splendidly played by Messrs. Kneisel, Hekking and Perabo, and thus ended one of the most delightful concerts of the season.

Boston Post
FRIDAY MORNING, APRIL 11, 1890

HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY'S FESTIVAL.

The third evening of the Handel and Haydn festival was devoted to the somewhat well-known "Redemption" of Charles Gounod, and its popularity is so secure that there was an audience gathered ranking only second in point of numbers to that of Sunday evening, and in point of musical as well as social distinction fully equalling it. It is fair to assume that, of all the later works presented by the many choral societies that are giving festivals within a large radius of Boston, the "Redemption" is one of the most popular of the more modern oratorios, even if in musical circles the "Requiem" of Verdi outranks it. Last night the performance was of such a character that, while it gave great pleasure in the general work, it left the impression on the mind of the critical hearer of a distinct effort by the composer to make the dramatic side of his story rather too intense, while the narrative portion is so diffuse that there is a longing for the cuts that are seemingly impossible. In fact, rather than hurt, in any sense, the continuity of the story, it was not till the last chorus but one that the pruning knife was used, and that only to bring the concert within the requisite time to allow the out-of-towners a possible chance to catch their last trains.

The characters include Jesus, Mary, The Penitent Thief, The Impenitent Thief, The Holy Women, An Angel, and the narrators; and the soloists intrusted with the work were Miss Clementine DeVere, Mrs. Jennie Patrick Walker, Miss Emily Winant, Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr. William Ludwig and Mr. Myron W. Whitney. Mr. Edward Lloyd again showed his extreme artistic intelligence throughout, and if he failed to draw the audience to a fine state of enthusiasm, it was only that he had no opportunity to appeal to the popular taste in any way. The few bars which were given to him as the penitent were sung as artistically as anything that he has done here. He is an artist who shows an artistic feeling and touch which always give pleasure. Mr. William Ludwig sang the role of Jesus with a fervor and a beautiful simplicity of spirit that carried its largeness and devotional emphasis to the heart of his hearers. Miss Clementine De Vere rather held herself for the solo with the high C of the "From Thy Love as a Father"; but her work was more than conscientious all through. The other singers intrusted with solo work were adequate, and the chorus was in the main exceedingly pleasing. If the tenors and basses were at times a trifle away from the key, it was possibly the fault of the composer, who will insist on writing such a work based on the chromatic scale—difficult enough for solo singers, and impossible for so large a chorus to sing with absolute accuracy. The orchestra, under Mr. Carl Zerrahn, played with better effect than before, perhaps, but some of the tempi were decidedly at variance with the metronomic marks, while the first clarinet was at times untuneful and some inaccuracies were noticeable in the playing of one of the quartette of horns. As a whole the concert was a remarkably good performance of extremely even quality, except for the wonderfully artistic singing of Mr. Lloyd.

Boston Daily Traveller.
THURSDAY, APRIL 10, 1890.

[106]

EDWARD LLOYD.

The History and Habits of the Famous English Tenor.

Edward Lloyd, the famous English tenor, who arrived in this country recently, is a homebird much more than most of the choral tribe.

His charming cottage is at Tulse Hill a southern suburb of Londen, some miles from Piccadilly circus, but quite close to Surrey country. Here in the bosom of his family, for 10 months of the year, he spends all the time that is left him by constant engagements in different parts of the country. The remaining two months—August and September—constitute Mr. Lloyd's vacation, which is invariably passed with wife and children at his house in Brighton.

In his distaste for society Sims Reeves's successor has one feature in marked contrast to most of his fellow artists. He abhors the club and avoids the salon. The delights of Belgravia attract him no more than the diverstions of Bohemia. "I live by rule," he tells his friends, and a very simple rule it is, comprising breakfast at 8 and dinner at 2 P.M., and 5 o'clock tea. The morning is spent in practice and correspondence, the afternoon, when the weather is agreeable, in walking or tennis playing, of which latter exercise the singer is very fond. Excepting as an aid to digestion at dinner—when he usually drinks port wine—Mr. Lloyd rarely takes alcohol and never as a stimulant to his voice. It is this sound regimen which enables him to bear the fatigues of his great position.

Mr. Lloyd's father was a bandmaster and his mother a pianist. As a boy he sang in the choir at Westminster Abbey. Among his fellow choristers were Sir Arthur Sullivan and Cellier, the composer of "Dorothy." When Lloyd was about 18 years old his father died, leaving the family in poor circumstances. His mother obtained the position of music-teacher at the newly-established Cheltenham College for girls, to which young Edward accompanied her. While there, the youug man discovered that he had the germs of a tenor voice, and in a few months he went to Cambridge as chorister at Trinity College. The position was open to public competition, and 20 competitors came from all parts of the country, but Lloyd won the day—won it with his singing of "Angels Ever Bright and Fair."

The young singer spent 12 months at Cambridge, and it was amid church spires and turretted towers of the picturesque town on the Cam that he first met the young lady who is now his wife. His ambition could not be gratified in Cambridge's comparatively small sphere, and his eyes turned Londonward. He came back to London as the first tenor in the well-known church, St. Andrew's, Wells street, seeking to fill his leisure by concert engagements. In a short time the young singer gained the much more important position of principal soloist at the Chapel Royal. It was while fulfilling his duties at the Chapel Royal that Mr. Lloyd made a hit by his singing in Bach's "Passion" at the Gloucester festival. He was then only 23, but so widely was the success noised abroad that he was at once flooded with offers of engagements from all parts of the country.

So stnick and fast did they come, indeed, that the young man was compelled to resign his Chapel Royal appointment. The next five years were those in which Mr. Lloyd did the hardest work of his life.

He distrusts all intoxicants as stimulants to the voice, and thinks that they are much less resorted to in this way than some people suppose. "There is certainly no profuse passion," he points out, "of liquor at the big concert halls. At St. James's Hall, for instance, all that is placed on the table of an artist's room is a decanter of port, a small bottle of sherry and a bottle of claret with some Apollinaris water. Strange to say, in all these years the only person whom I have seen take any drinks has been the accompanist, whose labors at a concert are, I consider, always the most arduous."

Mr. Lloyd adds that the only thing he has found to be of any real use in nourishing the voice is an egg beaten up in milk, and this he sometimes takes just before starting out for a concert.

Boston Journal.
MORNING EDITION.
FRIDAY MORNING, APRIL 11, 1890.

The Handel and Haydn Festival.

The third performance of this society consisted of Gounod's "Redemption," and there was a very large audience. It was the most even and satisfactory performance of any thus far. The grand chorals of the work were finely sung, and the entire work of the chorus was admirable. Of course, the enthusiasm was great at the rendition of "Unfold, ye portals," but no more than was warranted. The orchestration of the "Redemption" is a remarkable piece of work, and it was very fortunate for the society that it has such a body of musicians as the Symphony Orchestra to interpret it. There cannot be too much praise bestowed upon this body for last night's performance.

The soloists were Misses De Vere and Winant, Messrs. Lloyd and Whitney, with the assistance of Mr. Ludwig and Mrs. Walker. As Miss De Vere was the only soloist who has not appeared at the festival, it needs only to be said of the rest that they more than confirmed the reputation which they have already achieved. Mr. Lloyd's narratives were a study; his enunciation was so perfect that his pianissimo passages could be distinctly understood in every part of the hall, and Mr. Whitney was in superb voice, insuring an almost perfect rendition. Miss De Vere was a stranger to Boston in oratorio music, and there was considerable interest attached to her rendition. It became clear at the outset that the management had made no error of judgment in engaging her for this work, and after the "From Thy Love as a Father" she was given an ovation. Her notes are particularly clear and pure, and this was made specially manifest in the C in alt with the chorus, which stood out in bold relief against the choir, producing an electrical effect. It was a very artistic, sympathetic and delightful rendition. The closing performance of the festival Sunday night will consist of "Israel in Egypt."

[107]

[illegible] and H. Festival Concerts---"The Redemption."

Gounod's Sacred Trilogy Given a Grand Performance—The German Opera Season Continued with "Lohengrin"—Perotti and Reichmann Share the Evening's Honors.

The series of performances included in the festival scheme of the Handel and Haydn Society, in commemoration of the 75th anniversary of its organization, was continued last evening by the presentation of Gounod's sacred trilogy, "The Redemption," the work having its fifth hearing here by this society on this occasion. The popularity of this typical modern composition with the local public has been steadily maintained since its original production here seven years ago, and the size of last evening's audience again proved the favor with which the patrons of this society hold this number of its repertoire. The great festival chorus had the assistance in this performance of:

Miss Clementine DeVere	Soprano
Mrs. Jennie Patrick Walker	Soprano
Miss Emily Winant	Alto
Mr. Edward Lloyd	Tenor
Mr. William Ludwig	Bass
Mr. Myron W. Whitney	Bass
Mr. Carl Zerrahn	Conductor
Mr. B. J. Lang	Organist

and the Boston Symphony orchestra, with Mr. Franz Kneisel as principal.

A more competent list of soloists has not been had in any of the previous performances of the trilogy here, and the enjoyment of the performance was not marred by a single serious fault, either on the part of the principals or chorus, while the wonderful beauties of the orchestral score were given with a degree of even excellence that rounded out the production with delightful results. It is impossible, in listening to such a performance as that given on this occasion, to avoid a feeling of personal obligation to Mr. Carl Zerrahn for his conscientious labors in this class of performances during well nigh an entire generation; and the only real estimate that can be put upon his services in the cause of all that is best in music can only be made by a retrospective glance over the field of local musical endeavor during the period of his service in his present position. His direction of the performance last evening again proved his complete mastery of choral and orchestral forces, and his entire success in identifying himself with the composer's intent in all classes of compositions. The chorus again acquitted themselves with great credit, singing their tuneful numbers with excellent effect throughout the evening, and rising to the highest level in choral work in the great dramatic number, "Unfold, Ye Portals." The appearance of Mlle. DeVere proved a gratifying success, and her entire fitness for the trying soprano role of the work was fully proven. Her voice is peculiarly suited to the music assigned this role, and she displayed the faultless purity of her tones, the rarely sympathetic character of her voice, and her admirable skill and intelligence as a singer in all her numbers. Miss Emily Winant was similarly successful in the alto role, repeating her former interpretation of its music in earlier appearances here in the work with entire success. Mr. Lloyd, who gains steadily in favor with repeated hearings, sung the difficult tenor role with a degree of artistic finish in its delivery that charmed all hearers. There are times when exceptions may be taken to his phrasing, not because of any lack of elegance, but on account of his departure from the traditions associated with earlier performance, and there are times, also, when he gives evidence of not having entirely freed his throat from his native fogs; but against these characteristics he preserves such a thorough mastery of the oratorio style, sings with so much intelligence and expression, and shows so full an appreciation of the art of clean cut enunciation that the foremost rank he holds among English singers of oratorio music must be conceded as justly due him by all fair-minded hearers. No one has sung the music of the role of Jesus more acceptably than Mr. Ludwig did last evening, and he created as marked an impression in its delivery as he did in his performance in "Elijah" last Sunday evening. The music of the bass narrator was admirably well sung by Mr. Whitney, and the single number, assigned to Mrs. Walker, served to display her voice at its best. The performance was heartily appreciated by the great audience in attendance. The final performance of the festival will be given on Sunday evening, when Handel's "Israel in Egypt" will be given.

Boston Daily Globe.

FRIDAY, APRIL 11.

"THE REDEMPTION."

Gounod's Famous Trilogy Sung by the Handel and Haydn.

No work could be more appropriate for an Eastertide musical festival than Gounod's "Redemption." It is one of the noblest offerings in all the school of sacred music.

Music Hall was crowded by an attentive assemblage, and the performance of the trilogy proved altogether worthy. Upon Mr. Lloyd, as first narrator, devolved a task of a good deal of difficulty, which he admirably fulfilled. Mr. Ludwig sang the music of Jesus with admirable judgment and reserve. He made the appeal, "Why hast thou forsaken me?" singularly affecting. Miss De Vere gave the soprano solos beautifully. Her clear, sweet voice is easily the equal to every requirement of the part. Mrs. Walker, Miss Winant and Mr. Whitney added to the general good effect of the performance. The quartet in the first part did not make a particularly good impression, however. The chorus covered itself with honor, not only in "Unfold Ye Portals," but in the finale, given with superb confidence and power.

"Israel in Egypt" is to close the Handel and Haydn anniversary festival on Sunday evening.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813

FRIDAY MORNING, APRIL 11, 1890.

"The Redemption."

With the third concert of the Handel and Haydn Society's 75th anniversary festival in Music Hall last evening, came "The Redemption," by Charles Gounod. First, let the acknowledgment be made in the heartiest manner that in their performance of the work the venerable society and the indefatigable conductor, Mr. Zerrahn, attained a genuine triumph. To the extent of their thorough, brilliant and painstaking service, at least, the performance might well impel the voice of criticism to remain silent and only that of praise be heard. Even had the great composer himself conducted it is difficult of belief that the spirit of his music would have breathed through every measure of the chorus more truly than it did. Let all slight faults of intonation be forgotten in memory of the sympathetic feeling in the utterance of words: The psychical observance of the various gradations of tone which were most sincerely and no less reverentially observed. The mocking chorus of the crucifixion, the chorus of the prophetic choir; and that grandest of all oratorio choruses—always excepting Handel's "Hallelujah"—the "Unfold Ye Portals," were magnificently sung.

The trilogy itself must have decisively gained in many a musician's estimate by this performance. Yet what a strange conglomeration of qualities the oft-discussed trilogy presents. True, it is far from being any such dull and lugubrious monotony long spun out, as an initial experience with it may have implied. It is nevertheless hard to become reconciled to certain portions of it. In the March to Calvary we surely have a pre-historic Pagan music. What else can it be? It was indeed a Pagan crowd, with scoffing yells and hissing dissonance that thirsted for the Saviour's blood; and as Gounod illustrates it, the yells and scoffs are now orchestrated with all of the composer having gone music mad, in his subserviency to the mere chaos of his theme. Most beautiful and effective, however, is the sobbing and sighing of the orchestra as it accompanies the immortal hymn, "Vexilla Regis Prodeunt," as it is first given out by soprani and then unisonally by the entire choir.

Perhaps the trilogy as a whole may best be described as a somewhat desultory epitome set to music, of the history of the musician's art from the early days of the church to the present time. Any student of history might naturally derive such an impression in noticing how strangely the old hymns alternate with the instrumental effects and monochromatic harmonies of the orchestral accompaniment. Contrasting with all this the vocal parts are studiously simple, and it is here alone that the devout aims of the composer appear to be adequately expressed. One can not fail to admire the liturgical character of most of the recitations, as well as the characteristically church-like strains of the hymn, "Forth the royal banners go," and finally let it be said, as the result of an adequate assessment of the work, that the composer is at least entitled to the credit of having imbibed the spirit of the religious artists of olden times, such, for example, as Fra Angelico in painting and Palestrina in his music.

"To return to our mutton" regarding the performance, an admirable effect was gained by placing the trumpets actually close to the orchestra in the opening chorus of the second part. Doubtless this may have been done at previous performances of the work, but if so it has escaped our memory.

In most respects the solo singing was a worthy complement to that of the chorus. The participating artists being selected as follows: Miss Clementine DeVere, soprano; Mrs. Jennie Patrick Walker, soprano; Miss Emily Winant, alto; Mr. Edward Lloyd, tenor; Mr. William Ludwig, bass; Mr. Myron W. Whitney, bass; Mr. Carl Zerrahn, conductor and Mr. B. J. Lang, organist. Each artist evidently made it a point of honor to place the French composer's music before the public in as devout a manner as possible, and all were successful, the most artistic honors of the evening, however, being with Messrs. Whitney and Lloyd, Mlle. De Vere, with her charming voice, was frequently at fault as regards phrasing; Mr. Ludwig's performance, while somewhat phlegmatic as regards his delivery, was otherwise excellent, and Miss Winant, also Mrs. Walker, were each heard with artistic effect in interpreting the holy women. Miss Winant's solo singing was also uncommonly good. As a whole, as has been pointed out, it was a remarkably interesting, artistic and effective performance.

C. L. CAPEN.

Boston Evening Transcript.

FRIDAY, APRIL 11, 1890.

THE HANDEL AND HAYDN FESTIVAL.

At the third concert of the festival held to celebrate the seventy-fifth anniversary of the Handel and Haydn Society, given in the Music Hall last evening, Gounod's "The Redemption" was performed. The solo parts were assigned as follows: Mrs. Jennie Patrick Walker and Miss Clementine de Vere, sopranos; Miss Emily Winant, contralto; Mr. Edmund Lloyd, tenor; Messrs. William Ludwig and Myron W. Whitney, bassos; This is the fifth time that Gounod's sacred trilogy has been presented by the society. Its first performance here, within five months after its original production in Birmingham, was highly creditable to the society as an evidence of its purpose to keep abreast of the times; and to include it in the scheme of the festival was also wise, in order that the several phases of oratorio writing might be fairly represented. Considered on purely musical grounds, however, "The Redemption" does not wear well. The company, more or less glorious, of opera writers who have also written for the church or have produced concert-works founded on scriptural or religious subjects gains no greater glory by the addition of Gounod. The great Mr. Handel, first in the list, may stand by himself. Later came Rossini with his "Stabat Mater," and Verdi with his "Manzoni Requiem," and neither work suffers in any respect by comparison with "The Redemption." Either Italian is to be credited with an honesty of purpose which led him to express himself freely and in his own manner,—to let himself go, so to speak. Gounod, on the other hand, either held himself back or endeavored to clothe himself in a new skin. The usual result followed. "The Redemption" is not first-class theatrical work, as one may call Rossini's sensuous setting of the famous hymn, or Verdi's lurid pictures in his Requiem, and is immeasurably behind the great work on which it is apparently modelled, the "Saint Matthew Passion Music." Occasionally, there is an enlivening moment in "The Redemption," the spirited chorus at the end of part two, "Unfold, ye portals," for instance. One is also pleasantly soothed by the two movements for soprano solo and chorus, "From thy love as a Father" and "Lovely appear over the mountains," and with reasonable frequency are found other passages that are well worth the hearing, while the orchestral work is always interesting and often highly effective. Against all its beauties set the tedious recitatives with their constant chromatics, and the unison choruses and the humdrum chorales, and much of the hearer's satisfaction is neutralized by the lifeless character of these portions.

The performance was very good, so far as the solo singers were concerned. Miss de Vere's bright voice and straightforward manner were displayed to fine advantage in the few opportunities offered. The others showed the good vocal characteristics that are severally theirs, and with which the patrons of the society's concerts are more or less familiar. As the composer, however, gives no one of the solo voices a chance for the exhibition of a power of expression, the solo work of the evening was generally dull in effect, as it has been at all previous performances of the trilogy. The chorus and orchestra were almost unvaryingly accurate in their movement, but were not always true to pitch.

An audience nearly as large as was gathered on Sunday night gave the closest attention throughout the evening.

The festival will be ended with the fourth concert on Sunday night, when Handel's "Israel in Egypt" will be performed, with Misses Clementine De Vere and Clara Poole, and Messrs. Edward Lloyd, William Ludwig and Myron W. Whitney for solo artists.

Boston Daily Graphic.

FRIDAY, APRIL 11, 1890.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Gounod's "Redemption" by the Handel and Haydn Society.

The third evening of this the festival week of the Handel and Haydn Society was devoted to a performance of Gounod's "Redemption." The soloists were Miss Clementine DeVere, Miss Emily Winant, Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr. M. W. Whitney, and Mr. William Ludwig. Mrs. Jennie Patrick Walker assisted in the concerted solo music for female voices. There was a very large audience, every seat being occupied, and nearly as many stood as at the "Elijah." Last night's performance of the "Redemption" was the fifth in seven years by the Handel and Haydn Society, so the public needs no new description of the characteristics of the work that created a veritable sensation when it was first brought out at the Birmingham Festival of 1882. It is such a setting of the story of the death and resurrection of Christ as might come out of France, possibly Italy, but certainly nowhere else. The sentiment of the "Redemption" is superficial, and its style is theatric. The sum of the composer's effort does not leave the hearer impressed by the solemnity of the theme. The march to Calvary might fitly accompany the burial of some jolly French officer whose life was sacrificed in a melee at some fashionable cafe, but does such a melody as Gounod uses here illustrate the awful nearness of the crucifixion? Again: In the scene at Christ's tomb, as the soldiers of the watch stand with terror before the miracle of the resurrection, is the snarly oboe obligato introduced an aid in depicting the intensity of the moment? These quotations will suffice to indicate our opinion on the value of the musical means used by Gounod to illustrate the most profound theme that poet or composer could accept. Considered only as music, the succession of airs, quartets, choruses and instrumental episodes Gounod has provided are interesting, and often beautiful. The French master has the most subtle and thorough knowledge of the human voice, and writes more understandingly and sympathetically for it than any of his confreres of the French school. Chorally the "Redemption" is not noteworthy. The part writing is easy and melodious and one or two of the new numbers are pompous and effective, but Gounod avoids vocal counterpoint and his polyphony is confined to a couple of pages in the final chorus. The several scenes are treated with very much variety, both vocal and instrumental, and Gounod deserves credit for one or two innovations. There is in the instrumental score a use of representative themes which is artistic and tends to give the work coherency. At this late day Gounod's charming qualities as a writer for instruments need no new acknowledgment; although the "Redemption" is marred by the composer's penchant for progression of semitone, the orchestration is very lovely and supports the voices admirably.

Of the performance as a whole, the heartiest praise may be spoken; we perhaps should say hearty praise, for the orchestra, always fine in tonality and fairly up to its own best level in matters of expression (it must be remembered it was in the hands of another than its own conductor), failed often in a prompt attack, the basses falling perceptibly behind in a number of places. The performance of the chorus was good, though in the "Redemption," more than any work thus far given, this week is there opportunity for expressive singing, which was not availed of. "Unfold ye portals" made a stupendous effect; the chorals were sung tunefully, and were well supported by Mr. Lang at the organ, and the separate and smaller choruses were in excellent hands. The "chorus" of "The reproaches" was sung by the solo quartet. The first place among the soloists belongs to Mr. Lloyd. The part of the tenor narrator is full of lyric beauty, and has moments of great tenderness. Mr. Lloyd's exquisite art, his perfectly controlled voice, and the fervor of his singing have had no better expression than in this part; moreover, the music lies well for a high tenor. The beauty of Mr. Lloyd's voice was last night seen at its best, and the emission of tone was clearer than at any time before this week. The society might have complimented some of the younger singers of the city by entrusting to other voices than those of the narrators, the music assigned the two thieves, written respectively for tenor and bass. Oratorio singers are "discovered" in just this way, and the opportunities for giving a promising voice a trial are never very numerous. Mr. Lloyd's "technique" ought to set every tenor in this part of the country at work; then the race of pretty parlor and church singers might develop into artists. Mr. Whitney sang the music of the bass narrator with vocal freedom; his tones were free and full, and in style he was admirable. Mr. Whitney's voice seems in better condition than last year. Mr. Ludwig sang the music of Jesus with great tenderness. Miss DeVere proved herself most satisfying in the soprano part, singing with real feeling, and in the air "Lovely appear" with great charm of sentiment. There was no need of her forcing the voice in the earlier concerted music of the work; the organ itself is so beautifully pure and carries so well that harsh measures are not only unnecessary but tend to injure its delicate texture. Miss Winant sang with pathos her one solo and was enjoyed in all her work. Mrs. Walker was satisfactory in the trio. The festival will close on Sunday, with a performance of Handel's "Israel in Egypt." The soloists will be Miss DeVere, Miss Pool, Mr. Lloyd, Mr. Ludwig and Mr. Whitney.

[107]

BOSTON HERALD.

APRIL 11, 1890.

The H. and H. Festival Concerts---"The Redemption."

Gounod's Sacred Trilogy Given a Grand Performance--The German Opera Season Continued with "Lohengrin"--Perotti and Reichmann Share the Evening's Honors.

The series of performances included in the festival scheme of the Handel and Haydn Society, in commemoration of the 75th anniversary of its organization, was continued last evening by the presentation of Gounod's sacred trilogy, "The Redemption," the work having its fifth hearing here by this society on this occasion. The popularity of this typical modern composition with the local public has been steadily maintained since its original production here seven years ago, and the size of last evening's audience again proved the favor with which the patrons of this society hold this number of its repertoire. The great festival chorus had the assistance in this performance of:

Miss Clementine DeVere	Soprano
Mrs. Jennie Patrick Walker	Soprano
Miss Emily Winant	Alto
Mr. Edward Lloyd	Tenor
Mr. William Ludwig	Bass
Mr. Myron W. Whitney	Bass
Mr. Carl Zerrahn	Conductor
Mr. B. J. Lang	Organist

And the Boston Symphony orchestra, with Mr. Franz Kneisel as principal.

A more competent list of soloists has not been had in any of the previous performances of the trilogy here, and the enjoyment of the performance was not marred by a single serious fault, either on the part of the principals or chorus, while the wonderful beauties of the orchestral score were given with a degree of even excellence that rounded out the production with delightful results. It is impossible, in listening to such a performance as that given on this occasion, to avoid a feeling of personal obligation to Mr. Carl Zerrahn for his conscientious labors in this class of performances during well nigh an entire generation; and the only real estimate that can be put upon his services in the cause of all that is best in music can only be made by a retrospective glance over the field of local musical endeavor during the period of his service in his present position. His direction of the performance last evening again proved his complete mastery of choral and orchestral forces, and his entire success in identifying himself with the composer's intent in all classes of compositions. The chorus again acquitted themselves with great credit, singing their tuneful numbers with excellent effect throughout the evening, and rising to the highest level in choral work in the great dramatic number, "Unfold, Ye Portals." The appearance of Mlle. DeVere proved a gratifying success, and her entire fitness for the trying soprano role of the work was fully proven. Her voice is peculiarly suited to the music assigned this role, and she displayed the faultless purity of her tones, the rarely sympathetic character of her voice, and her admirable skill and intelligence as a singer in all her numbers. Miss Emily Winant was similarly successful in the alto role, repeating her former interpretation of its music in earlier appearances here in the work with entire success. Mr. Lloyd, who gains steadily in favor with repeated hearings, sung the difficult tenor role with a degree of artistic finish in its delivery that charmed all hearers. There are times when exceptions may be taken to his phrasing, not because of any lack of elegance, but on account of his departure from the traditions associated with earlier performance, and there are times, also, when he gives evidence of not having entirely freed his throat from his native fogs; but against these characteristics he preserves such a thorough mastery of the oratorio style, sings with so much intelligence and expression, and shows so full an appreciation of the art of clean cut enunciation that the foremost rank he holds among English singers of oratorio music must be conceded as justly due him by all fair-minded hearers. No one has sung the music of the role of Jesus more acceptably than Mr. Ludwig did last evening, and he created as marked an impression in its delivery as he did in his performance in "Elijah" last Sunday evening. The music of the bass narrator was admirably well sung by Mr. Whitney, and the single number, assigned to Mrs. Walker, served to display her voice at its best. The performance was heartily appreciated by the great audience in attendance. The final performance of the festival will be given on Sunday evening, when Handel's "Israel in Egypt" will be given.

Boston Daily Globe.

FRIDAY, APRIL 11.

"THE REDEMPTION."

Gounod's Famous Trilogy Sung by the Handel and Haydn.

No work could be more appropriate for an Eastertide musical festival than Gounod's "Redemption." It is one of the noblest offerings in all the school of sacred music.

Music Hall was crowded by an attentive assemblage, and the performance of the trilogy proved altogether worthy. Upon Mr. Lloyd, as first narrator, devolved a task of a good deal of difficulty, which he admirably fulfilled. Mr. Ludwig sang the music of Jesus with admirable judgment and reserve. He made the appeal, "Why hast thou forsaken me?" singularly affecting. Miss De Vere gave the soprano solos beautifully. Her clear, sweet voice is easily the equal to every requirement of the part. Mrs. Walker, Miss Winant and Mr. Whitney added to the general good effect of the performance. The quartet in the first part did not make a particularly good impression, however. The chorus covered itself with honor, not only in "Unfold Ye Portals," but in the finale given with superb confidence and power.

"Israel in Egypt" is to close the Handel and Haydn anniversary festival on Sunday evening.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813

FRIDAY MORNING, APRIL 11, 1890.

"The Redemption."

With the third concert of the Handel and Haydn Society's 75th anniversary festival in Music Hall last evening, came "The Redemption," by Charles Gounod. First, let the acknowledgment be made in the heartiest manner that in their performance of the work the venerable society and the indefatigable conductor, Mr. Zerrahn, attained a genuine triumph. To the extent of their thorough, brilliant and painstaking service, at least, the performance might well impel the voice of criticism to remain silent and only that of praise be heard. Even had the great composer himself conducted it is difficult of belief that the spirit of his music would have breathed through every measure of the chorus more truly than it did. Let all slight faults of intonation be forgotten in memory of the sympathetic feeling in the utterance of words: The psychical observance of the various gradations of tone which were most sincerely and no less reverentially observed. The mocking chorus of the crucifixion, the chorus of the prophetic choir; and that grandest of all oratorio choruses—always excepting Handel's "Hallelujah"—the "Unfold Ye Portals," were magnificently sung.

The trilogy itself must have decisively gained in many a musician's estimate by this performance. Yet what a strange conglomeration of qualities the oft-discussed trilogy presents. True, it is far from being any such dull and lugubrious monotony long spun out, as an initial experience with it may have implied. It is nevertheless hard to become reconciled to certain portions of it. In the March to Calvary we surely have a pre-historic Pagan music. What else can it be? It was indeed a Pagan crowd, with scoffing yells and hissing dissonance that thirsted for the Saviour's blood; and as Gounod illustrates it, the yells and scoffs are now orchestrated with all of the composer having gone music mad, in his subserviency to the mere chaos of his theme. Most beautiful and effective, however, is the sobbing and sighing of the orchestra as it accompanies the immortal hymn, "Vexilla Regis Prodeunt," as it is first given out by soprani and then unisonally by the entire choir.

Perhaps the trilogy as a whole may best be described as a somewhat desultory epitome set to music, of the history of the musician's art from the early days of the church to the present time. Any student of history might naturally derive such an impression in noticing how strangely the old hymns alternate with the instrumental effects and monochromatic harmonies of the orchestral accompaniment. Contrasting with all this the vocal parts are studiously simple, and it is here alone that the devout aims of the composer appear to be adequately expressed. One cannot fail to admire the liturgical character of most of the recitations, as well as the characteristically church-like strains of the hymn, "Forth the royal banners go," and finally let it be said, as the result of an adequate assessment of the work, that the composer is at least entitled to the credit of having imbibed the spirit of the religious artists of olden times, such, for example, as Fra Angelico in painting and Palestrina in his music.

"To return to our mutton" regarding the performance, an admirable effect was gained by placing the trumpets actually close to the orchestra in the opening chorus of the second part. Doubtless this may have been done at previous performances of the work, but if so it has escaped our memory.

In most respects the solo singing was a worthy complement to that of the chorus. The participating artists being selected as follows: Miss Clementine DeVere, soprano; Mrs. Jennie Patrick Walker, soprano; Miss Emily Winant, alto; Mr. Edward Lloyd, tenor; Mr. William Ludwig, bass; Mr. Myron W. Whitney, bass; Mr. Carl Zerrahn, conductor and Mr. B. J. Lang, organist. Each artist evidently made it a point of honor to place the French composer's music before the public in as devout a manner as possible, and all were successful, the most artistic honors of the evening, however, being with Messrs. Whitney and Lloyd. Mlle. De Vere, with her charming voice, was frequently at fault as regards phrasing; Mr. Ludwig's performance, while somewhat phlegmatic as regards his delivery, was otherwise excellent, and Miss Winant, also Mrs. Walker, were each heard with artistic effect in interpreting the holy women. Miss Winant's solo singing was also uncommonly good. As a whole, as has been pointed out, it was a remarkably interesting, artistic and effective performance.

C. L. CAPEN.

Boston Evening Transcript.

FRIDAY, APRIL 11, 1890.

THE HANDEL AND HAYDN FESTIVAL.

At the third concert of the festival held to celebrate the seventy-fifth anniversary of the Handel and Haydn Society, given in the Music Hall last evening, Gounod's "The Redemption" was performed. The solo parts were assigned as follows: Mrs. Jennie Patrick Walker and Miss Clementine de Vere, sopranos; Miss Emily Winant, contralto; Mr. Edmund Lloyd, tenor; Messrs. William Ludwig and Myron W. Whitney, bassos; This is the fifth time that Gounod's sacred trilogy has been presented by the society. Its first performance here, within five months after its original production in Birmingham, was highly creditable to the society as an evidence of its purpose to keep abreast of the times; and to include it in the scheme of the festival was also wise, in order that the several phases of oratorio writing might be fairly represented. Considered on purely musical grounds, however, "The Redemption" does not wear well. The company, more or less glorious, of opera writers who have also written for the church or have produced concert-works founded on scriptural or religious subjects gains no greater gloryby the addition of Gounod. The great Mr. Handel, first in the list, may stand by himself. Later came Rossini with his "Stabat Mater," and Verdi with his "Manzoni Requiem," and neither work suffers in any respect by comparison with "The Redemption." Either Italian is to be credited with an honesty of purpose which led him to express himself freely and in his own manner,—to let himself go, so to speak. Gounod, on the other hand, either held himself back or endeavored to clothe himself in a new skin. The usual result followed. "The Redemption" is not first-class theatrical work, as one may call Rossini's sensuous setting of the famous hymn, or Verdi's lurid pictures in his Requiem, and is immeasurably behind the great work on which it is apparently modelled, the "Saint Matthew Passion Music." Occasionally, there is an enlivening moment in "The Redemption," the spirited chorus at the end of part two, "Unfold, ye portals," for instance. One is also pleasantly soothed by the two movements for soprano solo and chorus, "From thy love as a Father" and "Lovely appear over the mountains," and with reasonable frequency are found other passages that are well worth the hearing, while the orchestral work is always interesting and often highly effective. Against all its beauties set the tedious recitatives with their constant chromatics, and the unison choruses and the humdrum chorales, and much of the hearer's satisfaction is neutralized by the lifeless character of these portions.

The performance was very good, so far as the solo singers were concerned. Miss de Vere's bright voice and straightforward manner were displayed to fine advantage in the few opportunities offered. The others showed the good vocal characteristics thatjare severally theirs, and with which the patrons of the society's concerts are more or less familiar. As the composer, however, gives no one of the solo voices a chance for the exhibition of a power of expression, the solo work of the evening was generally dull in effect, as it has been at all previous performances of the trilogy. The chorus and orchestra were almost unvaryingly accurate in their movement, but were not always true to pitch.

An audience nearly as large as was gathered on Sunday night gave the closest attention throughout the evening.

The festival will be ended with the fourth concert on Sunday night, when Handel's "Israel in Egypt" will be performed, with Misses Clementine De Vere and Clara Poole, and Messrs. Edward Lloyd, William Ludwig and Myron W. Whitney for solo artists.

Boston Daily Traveller.

FRIDAY, APRIL 11, 1890.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Gounod's "Redemption" by the Handel and Haydn Society.

The third evening of this the festival week of the Handel and Haydn Society was devoted to a performance of Gounod's "Redemption." The soloists were Miss Clementine DeVere, Miss Emily Winant, Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr. M. W. Whitney, and Mr. William Ludwig. Mrs. Jennie Patrick Walker assisted in the concerted solo music for female voices. There was a very large audience, every seat being occupied, and nearly as many stood as at the "Elijah." Last night's performance of the "Redemption" was the fifth in seven years by the Handel and Haydn Society, so the public needs no new description of the characteristics of the work that created a veritable sensation when it was first brought out at the Birmingham Festival of 1882. It is such a setting of the story of the death and resurrection of Christ as might come out of France, possibly Italy, but certainly nowhere else. The sentiment of the "Redemption" is superficial, and its style is theatric. The sum of the composer's effort does not leave the hearer impressed by the solemnity of the theme. The march to Calvary might fitly accompany the burial of some jolly French officer whose life was sacrificed in a melee at some fashionable cafe, but does such a melody as Gounod uses here illustrate the awful nearness of the crucifixion? Again: In the scene at Christ's tomb, as the soldiers of the watch stand with terror before the miracle of the resurrection, is the snarly oboe obligato introduced an aid in depicting the intensity of the moment? These quotations will suffice to indicate our opinion on the value of the musical means used by Gounod to illustrate the most profound theme that poet or composer could accept. Considered only as music, the succession of airs, quartets, choruses and instrumental episodes Gounod has provided are interesting, and often beautiful. The French master has the most subtle and thorough knowledge of the human voice, and writes more understandingly and sympathetically for it than any of his confreres of the French school. Chorally the "Redemption" is not noteworthy. The part writing is easy and melodious and one or two of the new numbers are pompous and effective, but Gounod avoids vocal counterpoint and his polyphony is confined to a couple of pages in the final chorus. The several scenes are treated with very much variety, both vocal and instrumental, and Gounod deserves credit for one or two innovations. There is in the instrumental score a use of representative themes which is artistic and tends to give the work coherency. At this late day Gounod's charming qualities as a writer for instruments need no new acknowledgment; although the "Redemption" is marred by the composer's penchant for progression of semitone, the orchestration is very lovely and supports the voices admirably.

Of the performance as a whole, the heartiest praise may be spoken; we perhaps should say hearty praise, for the orchestra, always fine in tonality and fairly up to its own best level in matters of expression (it must be remembered it was in the hands of another than its own conductor), failed often in a prompt attack, the basses falling perceptibly behind in a number of places. The performance of the chorus was good, though in the "Redemption," more than any work thus far given, this week is there opportunity for expressive singing, which was not availed of. "Unfold ye portals" made a stupendous effect; the chorals were sung tunefully, and were well supported by Mr. Lang at the organ, and the separate and smaller choruses were in excellent hands. The "chorus" of "The reproaches" was sung by the solo quartet. The first place among the soloists belongs to Mr. Lloyd. The part of the tenor narrator is full of lyric beauty, and has moments of great tenderness. Mr. Lloyd's exquisite art, his perfectly-controlled voice, and the fervor of his singing have had no better expression than in this part; moreover, the music lies well for a high tenor. The beauty of Mr. Lloyd's voice was last night seen at its best, and the emission of tone was clearer than at any time before this week. The society might have complimented some of the younger singers of the city by entrusting to other voices than those of the narrators, the music assigned the two thieves, written respectively for tenor and bass. Oratorio singers are "discovered" in just this way, and the opportunities for giving a promising voice a trial are never very numerous. Mr. Lloyd's "technique" ought to set every tenor in this part of the country at work; then the race of pretty parlor and church singers might develop into artists. Mr. Whitney sang the music of the bass narrator with vocal freedom; his tones were free and full, and in style he was admirable. Mr. Whitney's voice seems in better condition than last year. Mr. Ludwig sang the music of Jesus with great tenderness. Miss DeVere proved herself most satisfying in the soprano part, singing with real feeling, and in the air "Lovely appear" with great charm of sentiment. There was no need of her forcing the voice in the earlier concerted music of the work; the organ itself is so beautifully pure and carries so well that harsh measures are not only unnecessary but tend to injure its delicate texture. Miss Winant sang with pathos her one solo and was enjoyed in all her work. Mrs. Walker was satisfactory in the trio. The festival will close on Sunday, with a performance of Handel's "Israel in Egypt." The soloists will be Miss DeVere, Miss Pool, Mr. Lloyd, Mr. Ludwig and Mr. Whitney.

BOSTON HERALD.
FRIDAY, APRIL 11, 1890.

The H. and H. Festival Concerts---"The Redemption."

Gounod's Sacred Trilogy Given a Grand Performance—The German Opera Season Continued with "Lohengrin"—Perotti and Reichmann Share the Evening's Honors.

The series of performances included in the festival scheme of the Handel and Haydn Society, in commemoration of the 75th anniversary of its organization, was continued last evening by the presentation of Gounod's sacred trilogy, "The Redemption," the work having its fifth hearing here by this society on this occasion. The popularity of this typical modern composition with the local public has been steadily maintained since its original production here seven years ago, and the size of last evening's audience again proved the favor with which the patrons of this society hold this number of its repertoire. The great festival chorus had the assistance in this performance of:

Miss Clementine DeVere	Soprano
Mrs. Jennie Patrick Walker	Soprano
Miss Emily Winant	Alto
Mr. Edward Lloyd	Tenor
Mr. William Ludwig	Bass
Mr. Myron W. Whitney	Bass
Mr. Carl Zerrahn	Conductor
Mr. B. J. Lang	Organist

and the Boston Symphony orchestra, with Mr. Franz Kneisel as principal.

A more competent list of soloists has not been had in any of the previous performances of the trilogy here, and the enjoyment of the performance was not marred by a single serious fault, either on the part of the principals or chorus, while the wonderful beauties of the orchestral score were given with a degree of even excellence that rounded out the production with delightful results. It is impossible, in listening to such a performance as that given on this occasion, to avoid a feeling of personal obligation to Mr. Carl Zerrahn for his conscientious labors in this class of performances during well nigh an entire generation; and the only real estimate that can be put upon his services in the cause of all that is best in music can only be made by a retrospective glance over the field of local musical endeavor during the period of his service in his present position. His direction of the performance last evening again proved his complete mastery of choral and orchestral forces, and his entire success in identifying himself with the composer's intent in all classes of compositions. The chorus again acquitted themselves with great credit, singing their tuneful numbers with excellent effect throughout the evening, and rising to the highest level in choral work in the great dramatic number, "Unfold, Ye Portals." The appearance of Mlle. DeVere proved a gratifying success, and her entire fitness for the trying soprano role of the work was fully proven. Her voice is peculiarly suited to the music assigned this role, and she displayed the faultless purity of her tones, the rarely sympathetic character of her voice, and her admirable skill and intelligence as a singer in all her numbers. Miss Emily Winant was similarly successful in the alto role, repeating her former interpretation of its music in earlier appearances here in the work with entire success. Mr. Lloyd, who gains steadily in favor with repeated hearings, sung the difficult tenor role with a degree of artistic finish in its delivery that charmed all hearers. There are times when exceptions may be taken to his phrasing, not because of any lack of elegance, but on account of his departure from the traditions associated with earlier performance, and there are times, also, when he gives evidence of not having entirely freed his throat from his native fogs; but against these characteristics he preserves such a thorough mastery of the oratorio style, sings with so much intelligence and expression, and shows so full an appreciation of the art of clean cut enunciation that the foremost rank he holds among English singers of oratorio music must be conceded as justly due him by all fair-minded hearers. No one has sung the music of the role of Jesus more acceptably than Mr. Ludwig did last evening, and he created as marked an impression in its delivery as he did in his performance in "Elijah" last Sunday evening. The music of the bass narrator was admirably well sung by Mr. Whitney, and the single number, assigned to Mrs. Walker, served to display her voice at its best. The performance was heartily appreciated by the great audience in attendance. The final performance of the festival will be given on Sunday evening, when Handel's "Israel in Egypt" will be given.

Boston Daily Globe.
FRIDAY, APRIL 11.

"THE REDEMPTION."

Gounod's Famous Trilogy Sung by the Handel and Haydn.

No work could be more appropriate for an Eastertide musical festival than Gounod's "Redemption." It is one of the noblest offerings in all the school of sacred music.

Music Hall was crowded by an attentive assemblage, and the performance of the trilogy proved altogether worthy. Upon Mr. Lloyd, as first narrator, devolved a task of a good deal of difficulty, which he admirably fulfilled. Mr. Ludwig sang the music of Jesus with admirable judgment and reserve. He made the appeal, "Why hast thou forsaken me?" singularly affecting. Miss De Vere gave the soprano solos beautifully. Her clear, sweet voice is easily the equal to every requirement of the part. Mrs. Walker, Miss Winant and Mr. Whitney added to the general good effect of the performance. The quartet in the first part did not make a particularly good impression, however. The chorus covered itself with honor, not only in "Unfold Ye Portals," but in the finale given with superb confidence and power.

"Israel in Egypt" is to close the Handel and Haydn anniversary festival on Sunday evening.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813
FRIDAY MORNING, APRIL 11, 1890.

"The Redemption."

With the third concert of the Handel and Haydn Society's 75th anniversary festival in Music Hall last evening, came "The Redemption," by Charles Gounod. First, let the acknowledgment be made in the heartiest manner that in their performance of the work the venerable society and the indefatigable conductor, Mr. Zerrahn, attained a genuine triumph. To the extent of their thorough, brilliant and painstaking service, at least, the performance might well impel the voice of criticism to remain silent and only that of praise be heard. Even had the great composer himself conducted it is difficult of belief that the spirit of his music would have breathed through every measure of the chorus more truly than it did. Let all slight faults of intonation be forgotten in memory of the sympathetic feeling in the utterance of words: The psychical observance of the various gradations of tone which were most sincerely and no less reverentially observed. The mocking chorus of the crucifixion, the chorus of the prophetic choir; and that grandest of all oratorio choruses—always excepting Handel's "Hallelujah"—the "Unfold Ye Portals," were magnificently sung.

The trilogy itself must have decisively gained in many a musician's estimate by this performance. Yet what a strange conglomeration of qualities the oft-discussed trilogy presents. True, it is far from being any such dull and lugubrious monotony long spun out, as an initial experience with it may have implied. It is nevertheless hard to become reconciled to certain portions of it. In the March to Calvary we surely have a pre-historic Pagan music. What else can it be? It was indeed a Pagan crowd, with scoffing yells and hissing dissonance that thirsted for the Saviour's blood; and as Gounod illustrates it, the yells and scoffs are now orchestrated with all of the composer having gone music mad, in his subserviency to the mere chaos of his theme. Most beautiful and effective, however, is the sobbing and sighing of the orchestra as it accompanies the immortal hymn, "Vexilla Regis Prodeunt," as it is first given out by soprani and then unisonally by the entire choir.

Perhaps the trilogy as a whole may best be described as a somewhat desultory epitome set to music, of the history of the musician's art from the early days of the church to the present time. Any student of history might naturally derive such an impression in noticing how strangely the old hymns alternate with the instrumental effects and monochromatic harmonies of the orchestral accompaniment. Contrasting with all this the vocal parts are studiously simple, and it is here alone that the devout aims of the composer appear to be adequately expressed. One can not fail to admire the liturgical character of most of the recitations, as well as the characteristically church-like strains of the hymn, "Forth the royal banners go," and finally let it be said, as the result of an adequate assessment of the work, that the composer is at least entitled to the credit of having imbibed the spirit of the religious artists of olden times, such, for example, as Fra Angelico in painting and Palestrina in his music.

"To return to our mutton" regarding the performance, an admirable effect was gained by placing the trumpets actually close to the orchestra in the opening chorus of the second part. Doubtless this may have been done at previous performances of the work, but if so it has escaped our memory.

In most respects the solo singing was a worthy complement to that of the chorus. The participating artists being selected as follows: Miss Clementine DeVere, soprano; Mrs. Jennie Patrick Walker, soprano; Miss Emily Winant, alto; Mr. Edward Lloyd, tenor; Mr. William Ludwig, bass; Mr. Myron W. Whitney, bass; Mr. Carl Zerrahn, conductor and Mr. B. J. Lang, organist. Each artist evidently made it a point of honor to place the French composer's music before the public in as devout a manner as possible, and all were successful, the most artistic honors of the evening, however, being with Messrs. Whitney and Lloyd. Mlle. De Vere, with her charming voice, was frequently at fault as regards phrasing; Mr. Ludwig's performance, while somewhat phlegmatic as regards his delivery, was otherwise excellent, and Miss Winant, also Mrs. Walker, were each heard with artistic effect in interpreting the holy women. Miss Winant's solo singing was also uncommonly good. As a whole, as has been pointed out, it was a remarkably interesting, artistic and effective performance.

C. L. CAPEN.

Boston Evening Transcript.
FRIDAY, APRIL 11, 1890.

THE HANDEL AND HAYDN FESTIVAL.

At the third concert of the festival held to celebrate the seventy-fifth anniversary of the Handel and Haydn Society, given in the Music Hall last evening, Gounod's "The Redemption" was performed. The solo parts were assigned as follows: Mrs. Jennie Patrick Walker and Miss Clementine de Vere, sopranos; Miss Emily Winaut, contralto; Mr. Edmund Lloyd, tenor; Messrs. William Ludwig and Myron W. Whitney, bassos;

This is the fifth time that Gounod's sacred trilogy has been presented by the society. Its first performance here, within five months after its original production in Birmingham, was highly creditable to the society as an evidence of its purpose to keep abreast of the times; and to include it in the scheme of the festival was also wise, in order that the several phases of oratorio writing might be fairly represented. Considered on purely musical grounds, however, "The Redemption" does not wear well. The company, more or less glorious, of opera writers who have also written for the church or have produced concert-works founded on scriptural or religious subjects gains no greater glory by the addition of Gounod. The great Mr. Handel, first in the list, may stand by himself. Later came Rossini with his "Stabat Mater," and Verdi with his "Manzoni Requiem," and neither work suffers in any respect by comparison with "The Redemption." Either Italian is to be credited with an honesty of purpose which led him to express himself freely and in his own manner,—to let himself go, so to speak. Gounod, on the other hand, either held himself back or endeavored to clothe himself in a new skin. The usual result followed. "The Redemption" is not first-class theatrical work, as one may call Rossini's sensuous setting of the famous hymn, or Verdi's lurid pictures in his Requiem, and is immeasurably behind the great work on which it is apparently modelled, the "Saint Matthew Passion Music." Occasionally, there is an enlivening moment in "The Redemption," the spirited chorus at the end of part two, "Unfold, ye portals," for instance. One is also pleasantly soothed by the two movements for soprano solo and chorus, "From thy love as a Father" and "Lovely appear over the mountains," and with reasonable frequency are found other passages that are well worth the hearing, while the orchestral work is always interesting and often highly effective. Against all its beauties set the tedious recitatives with their constant chromatics, and the unison choruses and the humdrum chorales, and much of the hearer's satisfaction is neutralized by the lifeless character of these portions.

The performance was very good, so far as the solo singers were concerned. Miss de Vere's bright voice and straightforward manner were displayed to fine advantage in the few opportunities offered. The others showed the good vocal characteristics that are severally theirs, and with which the patrons of the society's concerts are more or less familiar. As the composer, however, gives no one of the solo voices a chance for the exhibition of a power of expression, the solo work of the evening was generally dull in effect, as it has been at all previous performances of the trilogy. The chorus and orchestra were almost unvaryingly accurate in their movement, but were not always true to pitch.

An audience nearly as large as was gathered on Sunday night gave the closest attention throughout the evening.

The festival will be ended with the fourth concert on Sunday night, when Handel's "Israel in Egypt" will be performed, with Misses Clementine De Vere and Clara Poole, and Messrs. Edward Lloyd, William Ludwig and Myron W. Whitney for solo artists.

Boston Daily Traveller.
FRIDAY, APRIL 11, 1890.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Gounod's "Redemption" by the Handel and Haydn Society.

The third evening of this the festival week of the Handel and Haydn Society was devoted to a performance of Gounod's "Redemption." The soloists were Miss Clementine DeVere, Miss Emily Winant, Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr. M. W. Whitney, and Mr. William Ludwig. Mrs. Jennie Patrick Walker assisted in the concerted solo music for female voices. There was a very large audience, every seat being occupied, and nearly as many stood as at the "Elijah." Last night's performance of the "Redemption" was the fifth in seven years by the Handel and Haydn Society, so the public needs no new description of the characteristics of the work that created a veritable sensation when it was first brought out at the Birmingham Festival of 1882. It is such a setting of the story of the death and resurrection of Christ as might come out of France, possibly Italy, but certainly nowhere else. The sentiment of the "Redemption" is superficial, and its style is theatric. The sum of the composer's effort does not leave the hearer impressed by the solemnity of the theme. The march to Calvary might fitly accompany the burial of some jolly French officer whose life was sacrificed in a melee at some fashionable cafe, but does such a melody as Gounod uses here illustrate the awful nearness of the crucifixion? Again: In the scene at Christ's tomb, as the soldiers of the watch stand with terror before the miracle of the resurrection, is the snarly oboe obligato introduced an aid in depicting the intensity of the moment? These quotations will suffice to indicate our opinion on the value of the musical means used by Gounod to illustrate the most profound theme that poet or composer could accept. Considered only as music, the succession of airs, quartets, choruses and instrumental episodes Gounod has provided are interesting, and often beautiful. The French master has the most subtle and thorough knowledge of the human voice, and writes more understandingly and sympathetically for it than any of his confreres of the French school. Chorally the "Redemption" is not noteworthy. The part writing is easy and melodious and one or two of the new numbers are pompous and effective, but Gounod avoids vocal counterpoint and his polyphony is confined to a couple of pages in the final chorus. The several scenes are treated with very much variety, both vocal and instrumental, and Gounod deserves credit for one or two innovations. There is in the instrumental score a use of representative themes which is artistic and tends to give the work coherency. At this late day Gounod's charming qualities as a writer for instruments need no new acknowledgment; although the "Redemption" is marred by the composer's penchant for progression of semitone, the orchestration is very lovely and supports the voices admirably.

Of the performance as a whole, the heartiest praise may be spoken; we perhaps should say hearty praise, for the orchestra, always fine in tonality and fairly up to its own best level in matters of expression (it must be remembered it was in the hands of another than its own conductor), failed often in a prompt attack, the basses falling perceptibly behind in a number of places. The performance of the chorus was good, though in the "Redemption," more than any work thus far given, this week is there opportunity for expressive singing, which was not availed of. "Unfold ye portals" made a stupendous effect; the chorals were sung tunefully, and were well supported by Mr. Lang at the organ, and the separate and smaller choruses were in excellent hands. The "chorus" of "The reproaches" was sung by the solo quartet. The first place among the soloists belongs to Mr. Lloyd. The part of the tenor narrator is full of lyric beauty, and has moments of great tenderness. Mr. Lloyd's exquisite art, his perfectly-controlled voice, and the fervor of his singing have had no better expression than in this part; moreover, the music lies well for a high tenor. The beauty of Mr. Lloyd's voice was last night seen at its best, and the emission of tone was clearer than at any time before this week. The society might have complimented some of the younger singers of the city by entrusting to other voices than those of the narrators, the music assigned the two thieves, written respectively for tenor and bass. Oratorio singers are "discovered" in just this way, and the opportunities for giving a promising voice a trial are never very numerous. Mr. Lloyd's "technique" ought to set every tenor in this part of the country at work; then the race of pretty parlor and church singers might develop into artists. Mr. Whitney sang the music of the bass narrator with vocal freedom; his tones were free and full, and in style he was admirable. Mr. Whitney's voice seems in better condition than last year. Mr. Ludwig sang the music of Jesus with great tenderness. Miss DeVere proved herself most satisfying in the soprano part, singing with real feeling, and in the air "Lovely appear" with great charm of sentiment. There was no need of her forcing the voice in the earlier concerted music of the work; the organ itself is so beautifully pure and carries so well that harsh measures are not only unnecessary but tend to injure its delicate texture. Miss Winant sang with pathos her one solo and was enjoyed in all her work. Mrs. Walker was satisfactory in the trio. The festival will close on Sunday, with a performance of Handel's "Israel in Egypt." The soloists will be Miss DeVere, Miss Pool, Mr. Lloyd, Mr. Ludwig and Mr. Whitney.

[108]

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, APR. 12, 1890.

THE ORATORIO FESTIVAL.

There remains to give but one more of the nobly splendid oratorios with which the Handel and Haydn society is fitly commemorating its seventy-fifth anniversary—Handel's "Israel in Egypt," in which the solos will be sung by Miss De Vere, Miss Poole and Messrs. Lloyd, Ludwig and Whitney, the association of the last two artists insuring a thrilling performance of the great bass duet "The Lord is a Man of War." This concert is appointed for tomorrow evening, and it will be attended, like the others, by an immense and cultivated company. The week has been indeed one for which the society may be proud and in which the listeners have found the highest and best pleasure. There has been no insufficiency and no untoward incident to mar the beauty and the fulness of the performances—nothing indeed to wish for, except that a chorus of five hundred should be able to sing the delicately intertwining harmonies of Bach as lightly and clearly as a small trained choir and that grand oratorio should not have to be content with such meagre and graceless organ tone as can crawl out of the dilapidated instrument and over the sounding-board to join the general blending of voices and instruments. We should like to dwell at length upon the several oratorios, but we must be content with adverting to the salient features of the series. Beginning then with a broad line of praise for the chorus and orchestra, and for the steady, experienced and positive conducting of Mr. Zerrahn, we may note the thorough satisfaction which has come from Mr. Lloyd's singing. Expectation had been raised high, but it has been in no wise disappointed; in purity, exactness, compass and volume of voice the artist is an ideal tenor, while his delivery, secure in sense and honest in sentiment, is generous without excess or reserved without coldness, always adding to his music the value of his own personality, but never obtruding himself before his author. In "Elijah" his part was comparatively slight, and he gave less brilliancy to "Then shall the Righteous" then it might bear, while in the recitatives there was something more of portamento than we quite like; but as the Evangelist in the Bach "Christmas" oratorio he presented the long recitatives with the best proportion and finish, and added such a rendering of "In Native Worth" as was an experience and a lesson. Mme. Kalisch-Lehmann bore the weight of the soprano music in "Elijah," but with some hesitancy of step; the Widow's part and portions of "Hear ye, Israel" did not come home to one quite as when Mrs. Houston-West gave them at her best, and possibly the Youth's music did not lie easily for her; but all else was in the right spirit and manner. Miss Poole sang the contralto music with deep feeling, and Mr. Ludwig's Elijah was as dramatic and real a representation of the many phases of the prophet's life as Boston has known; that he often sacrificed quality of tone to emotion is undeniable, but the sense of indignation, contempt, depression, weakness and pathetic longing which he gave, overweighed in its rarity all technical defects. The second quartette, Mrs. Walker, Mrs. Wyman, Mr. Johnson and Dr. Clark, were exceptionally competent, and the concerted music went as almost never before; the "Angel" trio (Mme. Lehmann, Mrs. Walker and Miss Poole) was perfection. On Tuesday, in the Bach oratorio, Miss Winant and Mr. Whitney appeared, reading with devotional quietude, and Mme. Nordica gave the one soprano bit rightly, just warming her voice, as it were, for "On Mighty Pens," which she sang later with limpid tone and elegant phrasing. On this evening also Mr. J. C. D. Parker's "Saint John" was first heard, and made a great and genuine success. That Mr. Parker would write well—like a thoughtful gentleman and a finished scholar—was to be expected, but almost none could have been prepared for the genial warmth of feeling, at once soft and strong, the richly varied and always apposite orchestration and the new but never strained fancy which he showed. The cantata is eminently vocal, every bar of it lying easily and effectively, and the solo portions rising quietly but surely to telling climax. The narrative is told almost entirely, in a kind of Greek fashion, by the male voices in an elastic unison, around which the shifting accompaniment casts light and color; four soloists are required, although the soprano leads, having a long encouraging air early in the work and ending it with a jubilant and lofty strain soaring above the chorus; there is also an unaccompanied quartette of distinct value. The same artists sang here as in the Bach, and Mme. Nordica again showed her command of general method and specifically devotional style. Mr. Parker conducted simply but efficiently, obtaining many nice gradations of tone and expression. On Thursday there was an audience about as large as on Sunday evening to hear Gounod's "Redemption" and greet Miss De Vere on her appearance for the soprano. Just why this work should be so popular is not easy to understand; eliminate a few sweet airs and ringing choruses, which bring as much effusive relief as a melody of more than four notes in a Nibelung music-drama, and all the rest might be summed up as a set of serious studies in chromatic scales and chords, wearisome to listeners in their similarity and thankless for singers because of the limitations they impose. The artists carried this performance through gratefully by their perfect art and their devotion to duty; for the chorus was not always in tune and there was not so much made of their magnificent tone nor of the capacity of the orchestra as might and should have been. There were some alterations in effect, but no gradations, and the instrumental numbers lacked picturesqueness and character, and indeed with less intelligent players even the accompaniments would have been dully uniform in color. The long recitatives received exquisitely clear and simple statement alike from all the singers; Mr. Lloyd led by his perfectly poised tone and delicate enunciation, but Mr. Whitney was a close second, while Mr. Ludwig, having the advantage of phrases slightly more melodious in the music of Jesus, could add some warmth to his earnest and precise speech. Miss Winant's rich voice was well used in the small alto part, Mrs. Walker gave brightness to the little second soprano, and Miss DeVere sang the sky-seeking solos fervidly and brilliantly. The solo quartette began a little lamely, probably because the singers were separated, but came out well, and the great jubilant chorus of the last part, "Unfold, ye heavenly portals," was delivered splendidly—almost thrillingly. The performance was evidently much enjoyed, very few of the audience leaving before the end, and the interesting parts were heartily applauded.

Music.

THE TWENTY-SECOND SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Cherubini.....Overture, "Water Carriers"
Cowen.....Symphony No. 3, in C minor, "Scandinavian"
Reinecke.....Entr'acte from "Manfred"
Wagner.....Overture, "The Flying Dutchman"

Cowen's "Scandinavian" Symphony was put in the place of the Symphony in C minor by Frederic Cliffe, and it is said that the latter work will not be played this season. Many who have heard of the great success of this symphony wherever it has been played are disappointed. The reasons given for this sudden change of program are many and conflicting; it is said that at rehearsal the conductor was dissatisfied with the work itself; it is said again, that since it was the end of the season, it was thought hardly worth the while to spend so much time upon a new work. This, however, is mere gossip; the fact remains that Mr. Cliffe's Symphony in C minor has been put upon a shelf.

The concert of last Saturday does not call for an extended notice. Certainly the feature of the evening was the great performance of the "Flying Dutchman" overture. The "Scandinavian" Symphony of Cowen is in many respects a pleasing if not a strong work. The first movement contains much that is admirable, though the second motive is worked out ad infinitum and ad nauseam. The adagio is melodious, abounding in sentiment which comes dangerously near sentimentalism. It would have gained in effect, had the horns been put in a room adjacent to the stage. The Scherzo is musically weak, and as "imitative" music is unrealistic. The writer of the "notes" which were prepared for the first performance of this Symphony in London, 1880, asks apropos of the last movement, "Are we now in the midst of the ponderous giants and stern deities of the dark, albeit 'true and tender,' North? Is this the entrance of Thor with his hammer?" And without answering his self-propounded conundrums he leaves us there, panting and impatient. For surely the music itself gives no solution.

The sugary entr'acte of Reinecke does not deserve a place on a Symphony program, even though the venerable composer is still regarded at Leipsic as a bright and shining light. At a summer concert it can be listened to with pleasure, when it is judiciously sandwiched between a pot-pourri and a Strauss waltz.

What a contrast between the noble severity of the Cherubini Overture and the "tone-painting" of the woes of the tempest-tossed Dutchman pursued by the vengeance of Heaven, redeemed by the devotion of a pure and faithful woman. Is it the subject of congratulation or is it to be deplored that to modern ears the Wagner Overture seems immeasurably the greater work? Will the listeners in 1990, when the pendulum has swung in the other direction, class Wagner with Hans Makart and, tired of sensuous coloring, pronounce in favor of the severe outlines and cold musical ideas of Cherubini the Florentine?

HANDEL AND HAYDN FESTIVAL.

The Seventy-fifth Anniversary Festival of the Handel and Haydn Society, a society which has for years been the pride of this city, began Easter night. The oratorio chosen was "Elijah." The artists who took part were: Mrs. Lilli L. Kalisch, soprano; Mrs. Jennie P. Walker, soprano; Miss Clara Poole, alto; Mrs. W. C. Wyman, alto; Mr. Edward Lloyd, tenor; Mr. Herbert O. Johnson, tenor; Mr. William Ludwig, bass; Dr. George R. Clark, bass; Mr. Carl Zerrahn, conductor; Mr. B. J. Lang, organist. The orchestra was made up of members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Mr. Kneisel was the first violinist.

The demand for seats for the opening night far outstripped the supply; exorbitant prices were asked and obtained by the speculators; and every available inch of room was filled by men and women, willing, yes, eager to stand throughout the entire performance. It is possible that curiosity to hear the soloists had much to do with this unprecedented demand for seats; then, too, the oratorio chosen for the first night of the festival was a favorite. Nor are the reasons for the popularity of Mendelssohn's work remote or obscure. While it is regarded by many musicians as inferior as a work of art to "Paul" or the fragment "Christus," it is, so far as the first part is concerned, more dramatic in its text and in its music. It is true that certain of the German critics, and they are among the worshipers of Mendelssohn, insist that the text of Elijah is clumsily arranged, that the episode of the widow and her son is lugged in without fitness, and that the chorus is not judiciously employed. They also claim that the character of the Prophet while it is imposing is unsympathetic; that he shuts the heavens for the innocent as well as the guilty, that he causes the unoffending to suffer pangs of hunger, that he slays the priests of Baal and overthrows a kingdom, without definite purpose, without an abiding result. These criticisms do not appear to be well-founded; at least, the people care nothing for them. Whether the text be truly well adapted for music or for awakening and holding the popular attention, the fact remains that "Elijah" is a favorite work. The people exult and lament with the savage Prophet. Nor can it be said with truth that the first part of the oratorio is not dramatic. The introduction of Elijah at the very start, before the Overture, rivets the attention; and from the first chorus to the "Thanks be to God," there is a steady, well-maintained crescendo of interest.

Then, again, the music of "Elijah" contributes much to the wide-spread popularity of the work. While as pure music, it must stand below the "Walpurgis Night," the "Hymn of Praise," and, perhaps, "St. Paul," it appeals as a whole more potently to the popular ear. It is full of dramatic passages; there are familiar and pleasing solos; there are several superb choruses; the part of the Prophet is finely conceived, and carried out with an intensity rarely found in the works of Mendelssohn; and the orchestral writing is brilliant and diversified.

Elijah the Tishbite, of the inhabitants of Gilead, is the central figure in this oratorio, and not the chorus. From the opening inhuman curse to his mysterious disappearance from the earth, he is the dominating character. Cruel, vindictive, a zealot, the incarnation of a narrow and sublime faith, of him might Hugo have said as of Ezekiel, "this demagogue of the Bible would have joined '93 in the frightful sweeping out of Saint-Denis." The difficult role was sung, and almost acted I am tempted to say, by Mr. Ludwig in a remarkable manner. His conception of the part was wholly admirable. He was the shaggy man of the wilderness, the genius of the cave, who launched the thunderbolts of wrath against Ahab. Unmoved by the beauty of painted Jezebel, he laughed aloud, foreseeing that the dogs should eat her by the wall of Jezreel, and that they should find no more of her than the skull, and the feet, and the palms of her hands. He comforted the widow, railed at the priests of Baal, and broken-hearted prayed for death. Dramatically it was a wonderful performance; and although at times he forced his voice (notably, in the "Is not his word") so that he ceased to emit musical sounds, and at times juggled with it in a distressing manner, his declamation of the recitatives was full of intelligence and dramatic instinct. His delivery of the phrase "I journey hence to the wilderness," and his singing of the great air which follows are never to be forgotten. The same voice which forced seemed unendurable, was filled with tear-compelling pathos.

Mr. Edward Lloyd has but little opportunity in "Elijah." The singing of the few recitatives and solos allotted him was characterized by pure and beautiful tone, exquisite phrasing free from affectation or mannerisms, and a sympathetic, manly delivery, which qualities have combined to place him where he rightly belongs—at the head of oratorio tenors.

Mrs. Lehmann-Kalisch in the scenes between the Widow and Elijah did excellent work; as the Youth she did not succeed in animating the dead music of the part; the air "Hear ye Israel" was finely sung. It is an unpleasant duty to add that in the concerted "Holy" and in the final Quartet her singing was unsatisfactory. In the former her trill was incorrect and extremely unmusical; in the Quartet mentioned, her singing of the last two measures of the opening solo was unworthy of such an artist. It is perhaps unnecessary to add that when the music called for dramatic delivery, the expression of strong emotions, she rose to those demands.

Miss Poole while she sang throughout respectably, in the familiar "Oh rest in the Lord," made no distinct impression. Mrs. Walker, Mrs. Wyman and Messrs. Johnson and Clark filled acceptably the minor parts.

The unaccompanied trio was sung delightfully; seldom is heard such a blending of voices, such purity of intonation. The Quartet "Cast thy burden" was also well done, although the tenor part was unduly prominent.

And how about the work of the chorus? Perhaps it would be better in speaking in general of the present condition of the Handel and Haydn Society to defer judgment until the Festival is over and the gigantic choruses of "Israel in Egypt" have been sung. In "Elijah" several choruses which demanded simple power and vigor, as for instance, "Thanks be to God" and "Be not afraid" were sung in a most creditable manner. In several choruses, again, there was a hearty attack and a sonorous close, with thin and almost ragged middle passages. The altos were weak in attack and in four-part harmony. Both the men and women, in imitative passages, were often careless in "finishing" their phrases. They would begin bravely, struggle courageously, and end feebly. It must also be said that there were few if any pianissimo effects. For this reason the choruses "Behold, God the Lord," and "He that shall endure" were not satisfactorily sung, nor was the performance of "He watching over Israel" worthy of the society, the contrasts between forte and piano being hardly noticeable. Throughout the evening the work of the male chorus was particularly good, and the sopranos refrained from screaming. The orchestra as a rule played discreetly and with precision.

The oratorio was listened to with profound attention and the outbursts of delight were frequent and hearty. Nor were the faithful labors of Mr. Zerrahn passed by unnoticed. The presentation to him of a wreath was accompanied with spontaneous and long-continued applause.

"CHRISTMAS ORATORIO."—Tuesday the second evening of the Handel and Haydn Festival, was devoted to the performance of the first two parts of Bach's "Christmas Oratorio" and "St. John," a cantata written by Mr. J. D. C. Parker in 1889 for this very Festival. Between these works, "On Mighty Pens" and "In Native Worth" were sung by Mrs. Nordica and Mr. Lloyd respectively. The soloists of the evening were Mrs. Lillian Nordica, soprano; Miss Emily Winant, alto; Mr. Edward Lloyd, tenor, and Mr. Myron W. Whitney, bass.

Bach's "Christmas Oratorio," composed in 1734, and first given after his death at Breslau, 1844, is a hexamerous composition which, if given in its entirety, would be unendurable. Musically it cannot stand beside the mighty "Matthew Passion," or the "John," or many of the Church Cantatas. There is but little contrast; there is hardly any relief from a joy which ever-present becomes monotonous. The original text which serves as an amplification and explanation of the passages from Scripture is of a sickening sweetness, the infant Jesus being caressed and coddled with amatory diminutives, as was the fashion in German religious poetry in the eighteenth century; for the texts of that day were often of as inflammable nature as some of the Cantiques of the Romanists so deservedly mocked at by Alphonse Karr in "Les Femmes."

We have all been repeatedly told that the church music of Bach is, so far as religious feeling is concerned, a thing apart; that every note has a deep religious sense; that when Bach sat down to write his sacred works his soul was filled with mystic yearnings, and so forth and so on throughout the catalogue of musical-religious gush. Now what are the facts about the composition of this work? It is established that the greater part of the "Christmas Oratorio," nearly all of it in fact with the exception of the Chorals and Recitatives, was taken by Bach from his compositions of a secular nature written for special occasions; this music written for other words he applied to this "sacred" text often without change, and when changes were made they were generally confined to a change in the key. (See Bach's Works, Edition of the "Leipziger Bach-Gesellschaft," 5th year, 2d number). Sixteen numbers of the "Christmas Oratorio" are to be found partly in his "Dramma per Musica" 1733; partly in the Drama, "The Choice of Hercules" 1733; partly in a "Congratulatory Cantata on the arrival of the King." In fact, the first two secular cantatas are carried nearly bodily into the Oratorio. So it seems that Bach in this case was as practical a musician as Handel or Rossini in the making of a pasticcio; nor was Bach directly "inspired" by the contemplation of the Babe in a manger.

The performance of the choruses of this Oratorio by the Handel and Haydn Society brings up the question, whether it is judicious to entrust such extremely difficult pieces of polyphonic writing as "Glory to God in the Highest" to so large a chorus. True musical volume is not in direct proportion with the size of a chorus. Often better results are obtained from a comparatively small number of well trained and "musical" singers. (Witness the admirable performance of the "Hymn of Praise" a year ago, under the direction of Mr. Lang.) The works of the early Italian school were performed by a small choir, and we know from a letter of Bach that his great works were sung by a choir of fifty-four of which choir "seventeen members were competent, twenty hardly skilful enough, and seventeen unfit." Certainly the performance of that involved "Gloria" Tuesday night was unsatisfactory; it was neither clear nor musical, and the difficulty of the work was made apparent, not concealed by the finish of the execution. The chorals were sung with full tone and with little expression. The choral, "For us to earth," was taken at too fast a pace, and its orchestral part was not sufficiently subordinated.

So far as the soloists were concerned, Mr. Lloyd bore off the honors. His delivery of the recitatives was noble in its simplicity and full of musical sense, while his singing of the extremely difficult "Haste, ye Shepherds," was a masterpiece of vocal art, where intelligence, refined taste met nature and technique in friendly rivalry. The same may be said of his singing of the air from the "Creation."

Mr. Whitney declaimed the difficult and ungrateful recitatives with vigor, and was loudly applauded at the close of the air "Mighty Lord."

Miss Winant sang conscientiously the music which fell to her.

Mr. Parker's cantata has the elements of popularity; whether it was worthy of the occasion is another question. The most effective and the most musical parts of the work are the choral recitatives which are happily conceived and well worked out. The choruses, though they show commendable scholarship, are neither very original nor effective. The alto solo is weak in construction and barren in melody; the air of the soprano is of a trivial nature with a tawdry accompaniment; the quartet will, without doubt, prove to be a popular number, and Tuesday evening it met with manifest favor; yet both this quartet and the duet which follows a cleverly constructed recitative of altos and tenors, are disfigured by sentimentalism. The lack of unity seen in the work comes perhaps from the disconnected, thrown-together text. The whole work suffers, in truth, from a lack of dignity. It was well received, however, and Mr. Parker who conducted it was loudly applauded throughout the work and at its close.

Mrs. Lillian Nordica sang the music given to the solo-soprano as well as a recitative in the "Christmas Oratorio," and "On mighty pens" from the "Creation." An admirable singer in certain operas, endowed with a very pleasing voice which has been well trained, she is out of place in oratorio. To sing of earthly passion with the woes and raptures which cease with the final fall of the curtain is one thing; to sing of the mystic joys of the communion of the soul with its Maker, to sing of the drama in which men and women are the players before an unseen, invisible audience—this requires a special equipment. There are limitations to the powers of each and every singer. Take an aria in "operatic style," such as "On mighty pens," and Mme. Nordica can sing it so as to win well-deserved applause.

THE REDEMPTION.—Gounod's "Redemption" was given Thursday evening, the third night of the Handel and Haydn Festival, with the following soloists: Miss Clementine De Vere, soprano; Mrs. J. P. Walker, soprano, and Miss Emily Winant, alto. The music of the narrators was sung by Messrs. Lloyd and Whitney, and Mr. Ludwig sang the part of Jesus.

A more intimate acquaintance with this work of Gounod leads one to believe that its musical life will be short and that deservedly. It is a weak and rambling composition with here and there a cheap theatrical effect. Gounod is nothing if not amorous; and it was to be expected that in a work of this length there would be many sensuous passages; but the sensuousness seen in the "Redemption" is that of an old man dreaming of his youth. What religious feeling is found is like unto that which is aroused by the sight of the celebrant's robe and the smell of the pastil. The recitatives are long and dreary, and in the solos and choruses there is an absence of dignity and true dramatic strength. It is to be regretted that the work was chosen by the society for this occasion.

Nor can the performance be praised without qualification. It is true that the soloists did their best to invest the barren recitatives with a foreign charm, and in this Mr. Lloyd was particularly successful. The air "From thy love" was well sung by Miss De Vere, while her solo in the Third Part was made ineffective by the extraordinary tempo taken by Mr. Zerrahn who took both the solo and the chorus which precedes it at an absurdly fast pace. "The earth is my possession" was coarsely given and the "typical melody" given after this chorus to the flute, then to the clarinet was roughly dealt with. But a criticism of the performance of each number is not worth the pains; suffice it to say that in spite of occasional false intonation the chorus work as a whole was respectable.

It would have been more to the credit of the Society had it chosen as an example of the modern school, Verdi's Requiem, or Brahm's Requiem or a work by Berlioz or Gouvy. For the "Redemption," though it has gained a certain popularity in England, must be regarded as a failure, deserving the bitter remark of a well-known German critic, that it redeemed no one, not even Gounod as a writer of sacred music.

Mrs. Magdalena Steinbach Johns, who will sing at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on April 19, and will go with the orchestra on its concert tour to Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Western cities, is a soprano of recognized worth in Leipsic and other cities of Germany. She has chiefly been distinguished for her performances of the opera soubrettes, such as Marcellina in "Fidelio," Aunchen in "Der Freischütz," Zerlina in "Don Juan," and Cherubino in "Figaro." She is also credited with successful assumptions of characters requiring far deeper dramatic expression, Senta in "The Flying Dutchmen," for example. From 1882 until within a few years she was at the Leipsic Stadttheatre. Of late she has lived away from the theatre, but has occasionally appeared at charity concerts, the announcement of her assistance on such occasions being always sufficient to fill the house. She is said to be about thirty years old.

[109]

[illegible]

BOSTON, SUNDAY, APRIL 13, 1890.

HANDEL AND HAYDN FESTIVAL

The seventh triennial festival and seventy-fifth anniversary of the Handel and Haydn society opened with brilliant success in Music hall on Sunday evening. The oratorio was "Elijah," and the house was literally packed, the invariable success in point of patronage that is so characteristic of the society's concerts being, if possible, more than ever before conspicuous. "Elijah" is by far the more important of Mendelssohn's two oratorios, and by not a few it is regarded as perhaps the very grandest of oratorios. The performance on the society's part of it was well-nigh flawless from beginning to end. The color, uniformity, precision and grandeur with which the choruses were rendered can only be referred to in the heat of the moment as beyond praise.

The audience at the start may have been somewhat cold and critical, as Boston audiences usually are, but there was unrestrained enthusiasm at the manner in which the title rôle of the work was rendered by Mr. Ludwig, for his singing of the difficult part was simply magnificent. Never before has his voice been heard here at such telling advantage. His singing of "Is not his word like fire" was with a thrilling effect that has seldom been equalled here by any interpreter of the part; and in "I go my way" and "It is enough" his splendid voice came out with a fervor and sentiment that were simply entrancing. In the effective and declamatory passages of "Hear Ye, Israel," it cannot be said that Mme. Lehmann was adequately emphatic, nor was the episode of the Widow's song given out with all her customary intelligence. There seemed a slight inequality in her singing throughout the evening, and she occasionally sang with an explosiveness of vocal utterance that seemed wholly uncharacteristic of her. The lower tones of Miss Poole's voice came out with charming effect in the trio, "Lift thine eyes," and here, too, both Mmes. Kalisch and Walker sang finely. Messrs. Johnson and Clark also did excellent work, but the chief success of the performance, as has been stated, was with Mr. Ludwig's Elijah; also the splendid chorus work.

* * *

In the concert for Tuesday evening there could not have been a dull moment to such as were intelligent listeners, and that the musical public would be most generous in their response was a foregone conclusion. The works selected were Bach's Christmas oratorio and a sacred cantata entitled "St. John," by J. C. D. Parker. The choruses throughout the evening were finely rendered, the altos [and] basses meriting special mention for contributing to the ensemble a rich and musical quality of tone, while there was none the less an admirable balance of parts, and Mr. Zerrahn's sympathies as usual were solely with the spirit of the music at hand, so that the concert from beginning to end was a delightfully artistic success.

The new cantata by J. C. D. Parker is a richly endowed work, the subject being faithfully and devoutly treated throughout, and with rare mastery.

The composer has shown characteristic skill, consistent at least with his reputation as a musician, in his treatment of themes, and has subordinated the technical to the spiritual development of his task after the manner of the true composer. The inherent loveliness of the music is enhanced very materially by the scholarly yet none the less spontaneous harmonization employed.

Of the soloists for the concert Mr. Edward Lloyd, who had appeared on Sunday evening with indifferent success, contributed on the present occasion a genuine surprise, for his phrasing was flawless, his intonation perfect and his shading as artistic and refined as the most captious could have desired. His singing of "Native Worth" was a genuine triumph. Mme. Nordica also created much enthusiasm by her fine rendering of "On Mighty Pens." Mr. Whitney's voice was never under more perfect control. In Mr. Parker's work the soloists were throughout correspondingly good.

* * *

On Thursday evening Gounod's "Redemption" was given. Again the attendance was so immense as to completely fill the hall, the audience being one of the most fashionable and intelligent gatherings that has ever assembled in this city, so that the extremely favorable verdict with which the performance of the work was received could not have come from a more authoritative and competent jury.

For an adequate performance of Gounod's "Redemption" it is absolutely necessary that the choral portions that form such an important feature of the oratorio should be rendered by an ensemble that can not only sing but feel.

It is a matter for congratulation therefore that Boston can claim in the Handel and Haydn society such a remarkably well trained body of vocalists, who are capable of affording such choruses as the "Redemption" contains a genuine perception of their sacred import. Now that the true character of the trilogy is being generally understood, the simple means by which the composer speaks to the hearts of the people have become plain; and, with a certain power that the incredulous will at least acknowledge, steals upon them with a height of intensity that has rarely been attained by the greatest of composers.

In comparison with similar works of recent times its form is less stereotyped, while it emulates the devotional coloring without the severity of the ancient sacred music. The liturgical form of most of the recitatives, the song of the prophetic choir and the inspired chorals incident to the scene of the crucifixion fit it beyond most oratorios for general adoption at [illegible] or Easter time in the musical service [illegible]

[illegible] rendering of the trilogy was excellent and in the highest degree creditable to Conductor Zerrahn. The chorus merits special commendation for the sonority of the voices and for the observance of the nuances, and the ensemble's task, important and elaborate as it was, justified the highest encomiums. The soloists were Mr. Myron W. Whitney, Mr. Edward Lloyd, Miss Emily Winant, Miss Clementine de Vere and Mrs. Jennie Patrick Walker.

Mr. Lloyd's interpretation of the tenor rôle was one of the very ablest performances of the festival.

Miss De Vere was not wholly efficient in her rôle and this, too, notwithstanding the natural purity and freshness of her voice; but it is a voice that lacks power, and her singing, owing to her inartistic phrasing, had little of the smooth and refined style which the part demanded.

Mr. Whitney sang admirably, as did also Mr. Ludwig and Miss Winant. Mrs. Walker's voice also came out with its usual purity of effect in the ensemble numbers.

Tonight the performance will consist of Handel's "Israel in Egypt."

BOSTON HERALD.

MONDAY, APRIL 14, 1890.

The "Israel" Ends the Handel and Haydn Festival.

The fourth and last of the performances to commemorate the 75th anniversary of the organization of the Handel and Haydn Society given at Music Hall last evening, consisted of Handel's "Israel," a work that has not had a hearing here for five years. The oratorio is not calculated to create as much interest in an audience as it does in the chorus taking part in its performance, and so possibly a more brilliant work would have given a more pleasing ending to the festival scheme. However, the manner of its performance was as good a test as could be desired of the abilities of the chorus and the way in which the difficulties were attacked and conquered by the singers under Mr. Zerrahn, spoke volumes for his painstaking work in preparing for this performance. The faithful occupants of the chorus seats rallied for the last event of the season with full ranks, and sung as if the reputation of the society depended upon each and every member of the chorus. Indeed, it is difficult to recall a performance by this society in which there has been a more unanimous attempt to make the very best performance known in the society's experience. There was unusual care taken in the matter of light and shade, clearness of enunciation and sharp attack, and all these characteristics went to give the most desirable general results. Among the chorus numbers calling for especial commendation were the great "Hail Stone," the "He Rebuked the Red Sea," "The Horse and His Rider" and "He Spake the Word," all of which were fine examples of the ability of the chorus to meet the severest tests in the class of compositions. The society had the assistance in this concert of

Miss Clementine De Vere	Soprano
Miss Clara Poole	Alto
Mr. Edward Lloyd	Tenor
Mr. William Ludwig	Bass
Mr. Myron W. Whitney	Bass
Mr. Carl Zerrahn	Conductor
Mr. B. J. Lang	Organist

Mlle. de Vere again gave great satisfaction in the music of the soprano role, and quite gained her audience by her fine interpretation of her leading numbers. She is a rarely pleasing artist in whatever she undertakes, and shows herself a good musician as well as a cultured singer, at all times. She gave especial pleasure in the "Sing Ye to the Lord," which made a most pronounced success among the notable numbers of the evening. Miss Clara Poole has evidently been benefited by a dose of her native east wind, and her singing showed evidence of a marked gain in her condition. Always a pleasing artist, she gave especial delight in the "Thou Shalt Bring Them in," which was delivered with fine taste and expression. Mr. Lloyd has also evidently come to appreciate the beauties of the Boston climate and to know how to take its peculiarities. He was in fine form, and sung with perfect freedom in all his numbers. His recitatives were delivered with true artistic finish, and in "The Enemy Said I Will Pursue" he gave a remarkably brilliant effort in true oratorio singing. Messrs. Ludwig and Whitney were very happily suited in the two bass roles. Mr. Ludwig gave an especially brilliant effort in the "He Layeth the Beams," and Mr. Whitney sung the "Wave from Wave" in his best style, while these two great singers surpassed all previous interpretations of the duet "The Lord Is a Man of War." The orchestral work of the evening was in keeping with the record of the Symphony men during the week, and they have certainly contributed not a little to the enjoyment of the festival patrons by their efforts. The festival thus ended will be counted as a red letter event in the history of the society, and cannot but give added strength to its hold upon the local musical public. Financially, it is a pleasure to say, the result has been more than was expected, as, in round numbers, there will be a profit of about $2000 in the affair, which sum goes to swell the guarantee fund, making it about $32,000. It would be grossly unjust to close the record of the festival without a recognition of the service done by Mr. Carl Zerrahn, the veteran conductor. Where can his like be found in America? He has labored unceasingly, patiently and intelligently, as he always does in whatever he undertakes, and with the usual good results. The Handel and Haydn society and the public of New England will never fully realize his worth until his place has to be filled by another. May that day be far distant, and may another decade see him still able to lead the festival forces of 1900 to victory. A pleasant event of the evening was the presentation to Mr. Zerrahn from the chorus of an elegant floral tribute, which was passed up to the veteran leader as the chorus rose and greeted him with hand clappings and the waving of handkerchiefs.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813

MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 14, 1890.

The Handel and Haydn Festival, "Israel in Egypt," Last Night.

It was especially fitting that the great choral oratorio, "Israel in Egypt," should close the festival of a great chorus society, and the performance in Music Hall last night proved the stamina of the society more thoroughly than any other work that could have been selected. The grandeur of the Old Testament is in every part of the work, and its intricate double choruses make it an impossibility for any but the largest and best trained vocal societies.

The Handel and Haydn Society has another proud distinction; it is the only organization which spells Handel's middle name "Frideric," in spite of baptismal register, tombstone, the Roubillaic memorial monument in Westminster Abbey, the usage of all English and German choral societies, etc., etc. Nevertheless the bad spelling can be borne more easily than the retrogression in the arrangement of the work which was made. The interpolated songs are seldom given in the performances abroad at present, and they only retard the action and mar the choral effects.

In such a work it is fitting to speak of the choruses first, and the success attending the first part was unequivocal in the choral portions. The finale also was a triumph both for Mr. Zerrahn and the society. In the double choruses, the first chorus was at times timid in attack and weak in volume, this being evident even in the first concerted number. "They loathed to drink" was splendidly sung. How much of imagination there is in music! The commentators all tell us how full of nausea the phrases in this number are, yet the unprejudiced auditer will find nothing but sweetness. The accompaniments of some of the choruses and solos are however, realistic enough, and the skipping of the frogs and the buzzing of the locusts were given very effectively by the orchestra, albeit the touches are by no means as photographic as Haydn's oratorio tone-pictures. "He led them forth like sheep" was another success. It is one of the few pastoral effects in which Handel has deserted his favorite 12-8 rhythm. But the great choral success of the first part was the "Hailstone chorus," which was nobly sung, the antiphonal effects being splendidly brought out, and the basses covering themselves with glory.

The organ work in "He sent a thick darkness" was given by Mr. Lang with his customary musicianship, but the instrument seemed out of tune, and soon the chorus followed. The number is by no means such an impressive groping in the dark as the wonderful solo picture of darkness in the "Messiah." In the second part the chorus were a little over-anxious in "The horse and his rider," and it attained only mediocrity; but when, at the finale, the same song of Miriam becomes glorified with all the resources of the master's art, the result was something stupendous. Miss de Vere sang Miriam's phrases with ringing power, and the chorus sang as if inspired. There could not have been a worthier end to the festival.

As to the soloists: Miss de Vere sang unequally, sometimes too vehemently and sometimes off the pitch; Miss Poole sang at her best in "Thou shalt bring them in," although she took rather bold liberties with the phrasing. The worst part of the solo work was the duet of the two singers named above, "The Lord is my strength," which very nearly met with shipwreck. Mr. Ludwig presented the same merits and defects which I have already chronicled. His great dramatic intelligence carries the audience along with him always; nor is this in any sense meretricious, but it is to be wished that a less vehement vein and a more equal quality of tone were present. At times the phrases were too deep for the singer's voice, and at others the disagreeable timbre already spoken of, appeared, but it must be added that occasionally the voice would attain the loftiest power imaginable. On the other hand, spite of one very noticeable break, Mr. M. W. Whitney sang with a steadiness and delicious quality of tone that can scarcely be overpraised, and his singing of "Wave from Wave" was so lofty and dignified that it gave ample excuse for that interpolation. In the duet for basses, "The Lord is a Man of War," the two voices refused to coalesce; Mr. Ludwig became inaudible at times, and Mr. Whitney was occasionally out of tune.

Mr. Edward Lloyd again impressed me as a most intelligent artist in his school. He did not make quite the artistic success of last Tuesday in his one aria, "The enemy said," but this was because he was hampered with too slow an accompaniment, the ensemble being far from perfect here, and our low pitch (we are thankful that we have it) troubled him in a few phrases. But the public were in a frenzy of delight at the aria, and truth to tell, Mr. Lloyd's brilliancy and spirit deserved the recognition. But his recitatives were better evidences of his greatness and we have never had these thank, less portions of oratorio so well declaimed, so purely and refinedly sung. It might give a new meaning to such work in the minds of the multitude, if they could hear such an artist in Bach's "Passion Music." So ends the great festival, and all concerned are to be congratulated. The chorus gave two elegant presents to Mr. Zerrahn last night, the one floral, the other literary, and it may be conceded that he, and the chorus, the managers and the orchestra have carried the festival to far more than ordinary success.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

[illegible]

MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 14, 1890.

The Handel and Haydn Festival.

The closing concert in the festival of this society was given last evening by a performance of Handel's "Israel in Egypt." The hall was well filled, and a large number of the standees were following the oratorio with scores. It is essentially a choral oratorio—there being no less than 28 double choruses linked together by a few bars of recitatives. Few choral societies would be equal to the effort, and the excellent performance showed, more than anything during the festival, the sterling qualities of the Handel and Haydn Society. Much time must have been spent. Some of the choruses seemed very inharmonious, and it almost looked like a waste of time to learn them. But they were given with a volume of tone, a sharpness of attack and an intelligence that was inspiriting. The hailstone chorus went with a verve that moved everything, and it was vigorously applauded. All the chorals were so well sung—the division of the chorus was so even—that it would be useless to particularize, had we space to do so. Very much credit is due to the society and to the able director who has wielded the baton so many years for this society. After the chorus "I will sing unto the Lord," in the second part, a large and magnificent basket of flowers was handed to him—the gift of the chorus. It was a happy and justly deserved tribute to the veteran leader.

The soloists were Miss De Vere, Mme. Poole, Messrs. Lloyd, Ludwig and Whitney. No extended work is assigned to any of them, but that little is difficult, catchy and thankless in many cases. No artist would think of making a concert selection of anything except the duet for the basses, "The Lord is a man of war." This was given by Ludwig and Whitney with grand effect, and Mr. Whitney showed again what an artist he is. His voice has all the mellow tones, all the smoothness of utterance which has been so often praised at former performances of the society. Mr. Lloyd was given an ovation after the delivery of his single aria. It was one of the best things he has done, requiring dramatic force as well as a clean cut execution and phrasing. Miss De Vere's single aria was given with a breadth of style and an artistic spirit such as we have come to expect from her. The concerted numbers of the soloists were well done, barring a slip here and there, which was neither serious nor worthy of much attention. The festival has been a financial as well as artistic success, thanks to the liberality of the management.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, APRIL 13, 1890.

THE HANDEL AND HAYDN FESTIVAL.

No more satisfactory result has attended any event in the long history of the Handel and Haydn Society than that which has rewarded the enterprise and good judgment shown in planning and carrying out the scheme of the anniversary festival commemorative of the 75th year of this organization's existence. All of the performances of the scheme have yielded a profit, and the reserve fund of the society will be materially increased by the profits of this undertaking. The final performance, to be given at Music Hall this evening, will consist of Handel's "Israel in Egypt," which has not had a hearing here since Easter Sunday, five years ago. The society will have the assistance, as soloists, of Miss Clementina De Vere, Mr. Edward Lloyd, Miss Clara Poole, Mr. William Ludwig and Mr. Myron W. Whitney, none of whom have any need of introduction to a Boston audience.

EDWARD LLOYD AT HOME.

All who have enjoyed the singing of the famous English tenor, Edward Lloyd, at the Handel and Haydn festival during the week will be interested to know of the quiet English life of this singer. In recently speaking of his home life the artist said: "My house at Tulse hill is my home, my club, and everything. If I am singing in the West end the concert is usually over at 10:30, and my brougham takes me home by 11:15. I am content to live, you must know, by a very simple rule. By 7:30 in the morning I am up and about, and we all breakfast together at 8:30. My morning is occupied in practising, writing my letters, etc. In the afternoon I take a walk, or, in summer time, play tennis in the garden. I dine at 2 o'clock, and take nothing except tea before going to the concert in the evening, unless it is an egg beaten up in milk just before starting out. If I am not singing, by 10 o'clock I am in bed. I am quite out of the West end world. I have been asked to accept membership of both the musical clubs—the Lyric and Meistersingers—but declined. If you frequent a club, it means going home at 2 or 3 o'clock in the morning and catching colds in cabs. Toole, no doubt, really enjoys plenty of 'life' and society, or else he must surely have succumbed to so much feting. But I don't think singers should freely indulge in social pleasures. They can't rush from concert halls to clubs or drawing rooms and continually keep late hours without their art suffering. My grandfather was a bandmaster in the time of George IV.; my father had a fine tenor voice, and my uncle succeeded Stanford as choirmaster at Trinity College, Cambridge. My mother was also a good musician, and when my father died, at the early age of 45, leaving her very poor, with six children, she obtained an appointment at the newly established college for ladies at Cheltenham. I sang at Westminster Abbey, and Sir Arthur Sullivan and Cellier were among the other boys in the choir. I have often talked with Sullivan over those old times. With a little fellow named Dykes, who did not enter the profession, I was selected to sing the solos at the princess royal's wedding. A few months after going to Cheltenham with my mother I discovered the germs of a tenor voice. I was then about 18, and the voice had not broken. One day my uncle from Cambridge came and heard me sing—it was 'You and I,' an almost forgotten song—and he said there was a vacancy for a soloist in his choir, which I might be able to obtain. The appointment was to be filled by open competition, and 20 competitors came from different parts of the country. How well I remember that day! Not being able to sleep, I got up early in the morning and took a long walk—about the worst thing I could have done, so far as my voice was concerned. But I won the post, my successful piece being 'Angels Ever Bright and Fair.'"

[109]

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, APRIL 13, 1890.

HANDEL AND HAYDN FESTIVAL

The seventh triennial festival and seventy-fifth anniversary of the Handel and Haydn society opened with brilliant success in Music hall on Sunday evening. The oratorio was "Elijah," and the house was literally packed, the invariable success in point of patronage that is so characteristic of the society's concerts being, if possible, more than ever before conspicuous. "Elijah" is by far the more important of Mendelssohn's two oratorios, and by not a few it is regarded as perhaps the very grandest of oratorios. The performance on the society's part of it was well-nigh flawless from beginning to end. The color, uniformity, precision and grandeur with which the choruses were rendered can only be referred to in the heat of the moment as beyond praise.

The audience at the start may have been somewhat cold and critical, as Boston audiences usually are, but there was unrestrained enthusiasm at the manner in which the title rôle of the work was rendered by Mr. Ludwig, for his singing of the difficult part was simply magnificent. Never before has his voice been heard here at such telling advantage. His singing of "Is not his word like fire" was with a thrilling effect that has seldom been equalled here by any interpreter of the part; and in "I go my way" and "It is enough" his splendid voice came out with a fervor and sentiment that were simply entrancing. In the effective and declamatory passages of "Hear Ye, Israel," it cannot be said that Mme. Lehmann was adequately emphatic, nor was the episode of the Widow's song given out with all her customary intelligence. There seemed a slight inequality in her singing throughout the evening, and she occasionally sang with an explosiveness of vocal utterance that seemed wholly uncharacteristic of her. The lower tones of Miss Poole's voice came out with charming effect in the trio, "Lift thine eyes," and here, too, both Mmes. Kalisch and Walker sang finely. Messrs. Johnson and Clark also did excellent work, but the chief success of the performance, as has been stated, was with Mr. Ludwig's Elijah; also the splendid chorus work.

* * *

In the concert for Tuesday evening there could not have been a dull moment to such as were intelligent listeners, and that the musical public would be most generous in their response was a foregone conclusion. The works selected were Bach's Christmas oratorio and a sacred cantata entitled "St. John," by J. C. D. Parker. The choruses throughout the evening were finely rendered, the altos and basses meriting special mention for contributing to the ensemble a rich and musical quality of tone, while there was none the less an admirable balance of parts, and Mr. Zerrahn's sympathies as usual were solely with the spirit of the music at hand, so that the concert from beginning to end was a delightfully artistic success.

The new cantata by J. C. D. Parker is a richly endowed work, the subject being faithfully and devoutly treated throughout, and with rare mastery.

The composer has shown characteristic skill, consistent at least with his reputation as a musician, in his treatment of themes, and has subordinated the technical to the spiritual development of his task after the manner of the true composer. The inherent loveliness of the music is enhanced very materially by the scholarly yet none the less spontaneous harmonization employed.

Of the soloists for the concert Mr. Edward Lloyd, who had appeared on Sunday evening with indifferent success, contributed on the present occasion a genuine surprise, for his phrasing was flawless, his intonation perfect and his shading as artistic and refined as the most captious could have desired. His singing of "Native Worth" was a genuine triumph. Mme. Nordica also created much enthusiasm by her fine rendering of "On Mighty Pens." Mr. Whitney's voice was never under more perfect control. In Mr. Parker's work the soloists were throughout correspondingly good.

* * *

On Thursday evening Gounod's "Redemption" was given. Again the attendance was so immense as to completely fill the hall, the audience being one of the most fashionable and intelligent gatherings that has ever assembled in this city, so that the extremely favorable verdict with which the performance of the work was received could not have come from a more authoritative and competent jury.

For an adequate performance of Gounod's "Redemption" it is absolutely necessary that the choral portions that form such an important feature of the oratorio should be rendered by an ensemble that can not only sing but feel.

It is a matter for congratulation therefore that Boston can claim in the Handel and Haydn society such a remarkably well trained body of vocalists, who are capable of affording such choruses as the "Redemption" contains a genuine perception of their sacred import. Now that the true character of the trilogy is being generally understood, the simple means by which the composer speaks to the hearts of the people have become plain; and, with a certain power that the incredulous will at least acknowledge, steals upon them with a height of intensity that has rarely been attained by the greatest of composers.

In comparison with similar works of recent times its form is less stereotyped, while it emulates the devotional coloring without the severity of the ancient sacred music. The liturgical form of most of the recitatives, the song of the prophetic choir and the inspired chorals incident to the scene of the crucifixion fit it beyond most oratorios for general adoption at Christmas or Easter time in the musical service of our churches.

The general rendering of the trilogy was excellent and in the highest degree creditable to Conductor Zerrahn. The chorus merits special commendation for the sonority of the voices and for the observance of the nuances, and the ensemble's task, important and elaborate as it was, justified the highest encomiums. The soloists were Mr. Myron W. Whitney, Mr. Edward Lloyd, Miss Emily Winant, Miss Clementine de Vere and Mrs. Jennie Patrick Walker.

Mr. Lloyd's interpretation of the tenor rôle was one of the very ablest performances of the festival.

Miss De Vere was not wholly efficient in her rôle and this, too, notwithstanding the natural purity and freshness of her voice; but it is a voice that lacks power, and her singing, owing to her inartistic phrasing, had little of the smooth and refined style which the part demanded.

Mr. Whitney sang admirably, as did also Mr. Ludwig and Miss Winant. Mrs. Walker's voice also came out with its usual purity of effect in the ensemble numbers.

Tonight the performance will consist of Handel's "Israel in Egypt."

BOSTON HERALD.

MONDAY, APRIL 14, 1890.

The "Israel" Ends the Handel and Haydn Festival.

The fourth and last of the performances to commemorate the 75th anniversary of the organization of the Handel and Haydn Society given at Music Hall last evening, consisted of Handel's "Israel," a work that has not had a hearing here for five years. The oratorio is not calculated to create as much interest in an audience as it does in the chorus taking part in its performance, and so possibly a more brilliant work would have given a more pleasing ending to the festival scheme. However, the manner of its performance was as good a test as could be desired of the abilities of the chorus and the way in which the difficulties were attacked and conquered by the singers under Mr. Zerrahn, spoke volumes for his painstaking work in preparing for this performance. The faithful occupants of the chorus seats rallied for the last event of the season with full ranks, and sung as if the reputation of the society depended upon each and every member of the chorus. Indeed, it is difficult to recall a performance by this society in which there has been a more unanimous attempt to make the very best performance known in the society's experience. There was unusual care taken in the matter of light and shade, clearness of enunciation and sharp attack, and all these characteristics went to give the most desirable general results. Among the chorus numbers calling for especial commendation were the great "Hail Stone," the "He Rebuked the Red Sea," "The Horse and His Rider" and "He Spake the Word," all of which were fine examples of the ability of the chorus to meet the severest tests in the class of compositions. The society had the assistance in this concert of

Miss Clementine De Vere	Soprano
Miss Clara Poole	Alto
Mr. Edward Lloyd	Tenor
Mr. William Ludwig	Bass
Mr. Myron W. Whitney	Bass
Mr. Carl Zerrahn	Conductor
Mr. B. J. Lang	Organist

Mlle. de Vere again gave great satisfaction in the music of the soprano role, and quite gained her audience by her fine interpretation of her leading numbers. She is a rarely pleasing artist in whatever she undertakes, and shows herself a good musician as well as a cultured singer, at all times. She gave especial pleasure in the "Sing Ye to the Lord," which made a most pronounced success among the notable numbers of the evening. Miss Clara Poole has evidently been benefited by a dose of her native east wind, and her singing showed evidence of a marked gain in her condition. Always a pleasing artist, she gave especial delight in the "Thou Shalt Bring Them in," which was delivered with fine taste and expression. Mr. Lloyd has also evidently come to appreciate the beauties of the Boston climate and to know how to take its peculiarities. He was in fine form, and sung with perfect freedom in all his numbers. His recitatives were delivered with true artistic finish, and in "The Enemy Said I Will Pursue" he gave a remarkably brilliant effort in true oratorio singing. Messrs. Ludwig and Whitney were very happily suited in the two bass roles. Mr. Ludwig gave an especially brilliant effort in the "He Layeth the Beams," and Mr. Whitney sung the "Wave from Wave" in his best style, while these two great singers surpassed all previous interpretations of the duet "The Lord Is a Man of War." The orchestral work of the evening was in keeping with the record of the Symphony men during the week, and they have certainly contributed not a little to the enjoyment of the festival patrons by their efforts. The festival thus ended will be counted as a red letter event in the history of the society, and cannot but give added strength to its hold upon the local musical public. Financially, it is a pleasure to say, the result has been more than was expected, as, in round numbers, there will be a profit of about $2000 in the affair, which sum goes to swell the guarantee fund, making it about $32,000. It would be grossly unjust to close the record of the festival without a recognition of the service done by Mr. Carl Zerrahn, the veteran conductor. Where can his like be found in America? He has labored unceasingly, patiently and intelligently, as he always does in whatever he undertakes, and with the usual good results. The Handel and Haydn society and the public of New England will never fully realize his worth until his place has to be filled by another. May that day be far distant, and may another decade see him still able to lead the festival forces of 1900 to victory. A pleasant event of the evening was the presentation to Mr. Zerrahn from the chorus of an elegant floral tribute, which was passed up to the veteran leader as the chorus rose and greeted him with hand clappings and the waving of handkerchiefs.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 14, 1890.

The Handel and Haydn Festival, "Israel in Egypt," Last Night.

It was especially fitting that the great choral oratorio, "Israel in Egypt," should close the festival of a great chorus society, and the performance in Music Hall last night proved the stamina of the society more thoroughly than any other work that could have been selected. The grandeur of the Old Testament is in every part of the work, and its intricate double choruses make it an impossibility for any but the largest and best trained vocal societies.

The Handel and Haydn Society has another proud distinction; it is the only organization which spells Handel's middle name "Frideric," in spite of baptismal register, tombstone, the Roubillaic memorial monument in Westminster Abbey, the usage of all English and German choral societies, etc., etc. Nevertheless the bad spelling can be borne more easily than the retrogression in the arrangement of the work which was made. The interpolated songs are seldom given in the performances abroad at present, and they only retard the action and mar the choral effects.

In such a work it is fitting to speak of the choruses first, and the success attending the first part was unequivocal in the choral portions. The finale also was a triumph both for Mr. Zerrahn and the society. In the double choruses, the first chorus was at times timid in attack and weak in volume, this being evident even in the first concerted number. "They loathed to drink" was splendidly sung. How much of imagination there is in music! The commentators all tell us how full of nausea the phrases in this number are, yet the unprejudiced auditor will find nothing but sweetness. The accompaniments of some of the choruses and solos are however, realistic enough, and the skipping of the frogs and the buzzing of the locusts were given very effectively by the orchestra, albeit the touches are by no means as photographic as Haydn's oratorio tone-pictures. "He led them forth like sheep" was another success. It is one of the few pastoral effects in which Handel has deserted his favorite 12-8 rhythm. But the great choral success of the first part was the "Hailstone chorus," which was nobly sung, the antiphonal effects being splendidly brought out, and the basses covering themselves with glory.

The organ work in "He sent a thick darkness" was given by Mr. Lang with his customary musicianship, but the instrument seemed out of tune, and soon the chorus followed. The number is by no means such an impressive groping in the dark as the wonderful solo picture of darkness in the "Messiah." In the second part the chorus were a little over-anxious in "The horse and his rider," and it attained only mediocrity; but when, at the finale, the same song of Miriam becomes glorified with all the resources of the master's art, the result was something stupendous. Miss de Vere sang Miriam's phrases with ringing power, and the chorus sang as if inspired. There could not have been a worthier end to the festival.

As to the soloists: Miss de Vere sang unequally, sometimes too vehemently and sometimes off the pitch; Miss Poole sang at her best in "Thou shalt bring them in," although she took rather bold liberties with the phrasing. The worst part of the solo work was the duet of the two singers named above, "The Lord is my strength," which very nearly met with shipwreck. Mr. Ludwig presented the same merits and defects which I have already chronicled. His great dramatic intelligence carries the audience along with him always; nor is this in any sense meretricious, but it is to be wished that a less vehement vein and a more equal quality of tone were present. At times the phrases were too deep for the singer's voice, and at others the disagreeable timbre already spoken of, appeared, but it must be added that occasionally the voice would attain the loftiest power imaginable. On the other hand, spite of one very noticeable break, Mr. M. W. Whitney sang with a steadiness and delicious quality of tone that can scarcely be overpraised, and his singing of "Wave from Wave" was so lofty and dignified that it gave ample excuse for that interpolation. In the duet for basses, "The Lord is a Man of War," the two voices refused to coalesce; Mr. Ludwig became inaudible at times, and Mr. Whitney was occasionally out of tune.

Mr. Edward Lloyd again impressed me as a most intelligent artist in his school. He did not make quite the artistic success of last Tuesday in his one aria, "The enemy said," but this was because he was hampered with too slow an accompaniment, the ensemble being far from perfect here, and our low pitch (we are thankful that we have it) troubled him in a few phrases. But the public were in a frenzy of delight at the aria, and truth to tell, Mr. Lloyd's brilliancy and spirit deserved the recognition. But his recitatives were better evidences of his greatness and we have never had these thank, less portions of oratorio so well declaimed, so purely and refinedly sung. It might give a new meaning to such work in the minds of the multitude, if they could hear such an artist in Bach's "Passion Music." So ends the great festival, and all concerned are to be congratulated. The chorus gave two elegant presents to Mr. Zerrahn last night, the one floral, the other literary, and it may be conceded that he, and the chorus, the managers and the orchestra have carried the festival to far more than ordinary success.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Journal.

MORNING EDITION.

MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 14, 1890.

The Handel and Haydn Festival.

The closing concert in the festival of this society was given last evening by a performance of Handel's "Israel in Egypt." The hall was well filled, and a large number of the standees were following the oratorio with scores. It is essentially a choral oratorio—there being no less than 28 double choruses linked together by a few bars of recitatives. Few choral societies would be equal to the effort, and the excellent performance showed, more than anything during the festival, the sterling qualities of the Handel and Haydn Society. Much time must have been spent. Some of the choruses seemed very inharmonious, and it almost looked like a waste of time to learn them. But they were given with a volume of tone, a sharpness of attack and an intelligence that was inspiriting. The hailstone chorus went with a verve that moved everything, and it was vigorously applauded. All the chorals were so well sung—the division of the chorus was so even—that it would be useless to particularize, had we space to do so. Very much credit is due to the society and to the able director who has wielded the baton so many years for this society. After the chorus "I will sing unto the Lord," in the second part, a large and magnificent basket of flowers was handed to him—the gift of the chorus. It was a happy and justly deserved tribute to the veteran leader.

The soloists were Miss De Vere, Mme. Poole, Messrs. Lloyd, Ludwig and Whitney. No extended work is assigned to any of them, but that little is difficult, catchy and thankless in many cases. No artist would think of making a concert selection of anything except the duet for the basses, "The Lord is a man of war." This was given by Ludwig and Whitney with grand effect, and Mr. Whitney showed again what an artist he is. His voice has all the mellow tones, all the smoothness of utterance which has been so often praised at former performances of the society. Mr. Lloyd was given an ovation after the delivery of his single aria. It was one of the best things he has done, requiring dramatic force as well as a clean cut execution and phrasing. Miss De Vere's single aria was given with a breadth of style and an artistic spirit such as we have come to expect from her. The concerted numbers of the soloists were well done, barring a slip here and there, which was neither serious nor worthy of much attention. The festival has been a financial as well as artistic success, thanks to the liberality of the management.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, APRIL 13, 1890.

THE HANDEL AND HAYDN FESTIVAL.

No more satisfactory result has attended any event in the long history of the Handel and Haydn Society than that which has rewarded the enterprise and good judgment shown in planning and carrying out the scheme of the anniversary festival commemorative of the 75th year of this organization's existence. All of the performances of the scheme have yielded a profit, and the reserve fund of the society will be materially increased by the profits of this undertaking. The final performance, to be given at Music Hall this evening, will consist of Handel's "Israel in Egypt," which has not had a hearing here since Easter Sunday, five years ago. The society will have the assistance, as soloists, of Miss Clementina De Vere, Mr. Edward Lloyd, Miss Clara Poole, Mr. William Ludwig and Mr. Myron W. Whitney, none of whom have any need of introduction to a Boston audience.

EDWARD LLOYD AT HOME.

All who have enjoyed the singing of the famous English tenor, Edward Lloyd, at the Handel and Haydn festival during the week will be interested to know of the quiet English life of this singer. In recently speaking of his home life the artist said: "My house at Tulse hill is my home, my club, and everything. If I am singing in the West end the concert is usually over at 10:30, and my brougham takes me home by 11:15. I am content to live, you must know, by a very simple rule. By 7:30 in the morning I am up and about, and we all breakfast together at 8:30. My morning is occupied in practising, writing my letters, etc. In the afternoon I take a walk, or, in summer time, play tennis in the garden. I dine at 2 o'clock, and take nothing except tea before going to the concert in the evening, unless it is an egg beaten up in milk just before starting out. If I am not singing, by 10 o'clock I am in bed. I am quite out of the West end world. I have been asked to accept membership of both the musical clubs—the Lyric and Meistersingers—but declined. If you frequent a club, it means going home at 2 or 3 o'clock in the morning and catching colds in cabs. Toole, no doubt, really enjoys plenty of 'life' and society, or else he must surely have succumbed to so much feting. But I don't think singers should freely indulge in social pleasures. They can't rush from concert halls to clubs or drawing rooms and continually keep late hours without their art suffering. My grandfather was a bandmaster in the time of George IV.; my father had a fine tenor voice, and my uncle succeeded Stanford as choirmaster at Trinity College, Cambridge. My mother was also a good musician, and when my father died, at the early age of 45, leaving her very poor, with six children, she obtained an appointment at the newly established college for ladies at Cheltenham. I sang at Westminster Abbey, and Sir Arthur Sullivan and Cellier were among the other boys in the choir. I have often talked with Sullivan over those old times. With a little fellow named Dykes, who did not enter the profession, I was selected to sing the solos at the princess royal's wedding. A few months after going to Cheltenham with my mother I discovered the germs of a tenor voice. I was then about 18, and the voice had not broken. One day my uncle from Cambridge came and heard me sing—it was 'You and I,' an almost forgotten song—and he said there was a vacancy for a soloist in his choir, which I might be able to obtain. The appointment was to be filled by open competition, and 20 competitors came from different parts of the country. How well I remember that day! Not being able to sleep, I got up early in the morning and took a long walk—about the worst thing I could have done, so far as my voice was concerned. But I won the post, my successful piece being 'Angels Ever Bright and Fair.'"

Gazette

SUNDAY MORNING EDITION

Handel and Haydn Festival.

The Festival concerts of the Handel and Haydn Society last week were, in many respects, the best that the organization has ever given. The work of the chorus throughout was of an exceptionally high order of merit, and was especially noticeable for its steadiness, its precision, and the rich and well-balanced body of tone evolved. Another point for which the chorus is to be distinctly commended is the tone-color that was imparted to its singing through a careful observance of musical dynamics, by means of which a greater variety of effect and a finer artistic result was obtained than has before been the case in the chorus singing of the society. The performance of "Elijah," with which the Festival opened on Sunday evening, was listened to by an enormous audience. Mme. Lehmann-Kalisch sang the soprano solos, and is first to be complimented upon the excellence of her pronunciation of English and the clearness with which she enunciated the text. Her singing on the concert stage is never fully as effective as it is in opera, but her work showed the finely-trained and thoroughly-experienced singer throughout. In the duet "What have I do with thee?" her efforts were marked by fine force and dramatic feeling. In "Hear ye Israel" she was heard with impressive effect, except in the closing phrases, which were given with an unaccountable tameness that in its results, was an anti-climax. In the quartets she was heard to special advantage. Her interpretation of the music of the Youth was not so satisfying, owing to the thinness of the tone and the absence of expression with which it was sung. The contralto solos were sung by Miss Clara Poole, for whom, we understand, some consideration is to be made on account of recent serious illness. The consequence was that the familiar solo "Oh, rest in the Lord" was not as effectively sung as it is but just to concede it would have been under more favorable circumstances. The recitatives, especially those of the Angel, were admirably declaimed, and with a thorough sympathy with their dramatic force. In the tenor solos Mr. Edward Lloyd was heard on our concert stage for the first time. The oratorio does not afford any very striking opportunities for the tenor, but Mr. Lloyd made it clear beyond all cavil that he has a sweet and powerful voice that has been trained carefully in the best school; that his style is finished and artistic to the highest degree, and that the much abused word "artist" can be applied to him in its best sense. He does not stir by the vigor or the passionateness of his singing, and seems, perhaps, a trifle perfunctory in effect; but it is a genuine pleasure to listen to such finished and such perfect singing as is his. His performance of the recitative, "Ye people, rend your hearts," and the following air, "If with all your hearts," was of rare beauty. The expressiveness of his declamation in "Man of God" was not less exquisite. The great success of the night, however, fell to Mr. William Ludwig, whose singing of Elijah's music was masterly in every essential. Never before has the part been sung here with such splendid dramatic force or such finely-sustained power. A strong individuality was imparted to the character, and the impression made was remarkably vivid. The reading was not only brilliant, but it was strikingly original, and the results obtained were always within the line of refined and lofty art. The vigor of the effort was immense, and it was never relaxed for a moment. Where all was so fine, it is not easy or necessary to select any point for special praise. The singing was almost perfect, the only fault left for exacting criticism to dwell upon being a certain explosiveness of voice that became somewhat monotonous through repetition. For the rest, the effort was incomparably fine, and its success was as overwhelming as it was deserved.

On Tuesday evening the first and second parts of Bach's Christmas Oratorio, two solo selections from Haydn's "The Creation," and Mr. J. C. D. Parker's new cantata, "St. John," were performed, the soloists being Mad. Nordica, Miss Emily Winant, Mr. Edward Lloyd and Mr. Myron W. Whitney. The chorus work in the Bach oratorio was strong, clear and massive in the chorals, but in the more florid choruses it was cloudy in effect. This, however, was not owing to any lack of familiarity on the part of the singers with their music, but is to be traced to the impossibility of so many voices singing such music with due distinctness in effect. There was no hesitation; the attack was always prompt and steadiness was invariably maintained; but the rolling passages jostled each other and reached the ear confusedly. Madame Nordica sang but one brief recitative, in which there was no opportunity for a display of her powers. Miss Winant sang as she always sings, with care, intelligence and skill in equal combination, reaching her highest point in the lovely solo, "Slumber, Beloved." Mr. Whitney sang the bass solos with vigor and nobility of style, especially in "Mighty Lord and King," though the more florid passages did not flow with the smoothness and fluency most to be desired. Mr. Lloyd intensified the fine impression he made at the earlier performance, by his singing of the tenor solos, which was marked by exquisite beauty in phrasing, purity in style, justness in expression, and a thoroughly musicianly feeling in every essential. In the solo, "Haste ye Shepherds," he showed the possession of technical resources of a rare order in a modern tenor singer. It was, however, in Haydn's aria, "In Native Worth," that he was heard in the fulness of his powers. Nothing finer in the way of vocal art, nothing more sympathetic with the innermost meaning of the music, nothing more beautifully phrased and more perfectly sung than was this selection by Mr. Lloyd can be conceived. Its effect upon the chorus, the orchestra and the audience was electrical, and the artist was recalled three times with as thundering and as enthusiastic applause as has ever been heard in Music Hall. Madame Nordica sang "On Mighty Pens," also from "The Creation." The effort cannot be justly commended as an interpretation of Haydn in any sense. It was tunefully and smoothly sung, though its possibilities of expression were not reached by the artist. Her most praiseworthy moments were in her singing in half-voice, which was very sweet. At other times the cold and metallic quality of her voice and the lack of fervor in her style were obtrusive. She was heartily and loudly applauded and recalled. Mr. Parker's cantata, which brought the performance to an end, is of exceptional worth and interest, and enlists the attention and the respect of the listener from the very outset. It is rich in pure and graceful melody, is at once scholarly and flexible in style, and the orchestration is steadily beautiful. The high finish bestowed upon the work from beginning to end is one of its notable features. Several of the numbers are pervaded by a deep poetic feeling. The knowledge of the composer is displayed in two admirably written fugues, in which there is nothing of stiffness, and which are masterly in the clearness of their counterpoint and polyphony. The choruses are written for the voices with a thorough feeling for what is best and most effective in vocal color. A novel and impressive result is produced by the chorus doing the work usually given to the Narrator, breaking in as it does unexpectedly upon the calm and steady flow of the orchestra. The quartet, "Now are we the sons of God," is one of the gems of a work that is overflowing in charm. Another fine number is the duet for soprano and tenor, "And there shall be no more curse," which opens perhaps somewhat conventionally, but which grows steadily in strength, power and freshness. The concluding soprano solo and chorus brings the work to a brilliant culmination. Mr. Parker has here written a work that will last and that is an honor to our native art. He directed it himself with excellent skill, manifesting the possession of coolness, precision and self-poise,—the most essential qualities in a conductor. The performance was very good, the choruses doing some of its best work of the week, and the soloists, Mme. Nordica, Miss Winant and Mr. Lloyd doing ample justice to their tasks. The work was well received and made a brilliant success.

On Thursday evening Gounod's "The Redemption" was given, with Miss Clementine De Vere, Mrs. J. P. Walker, Miss Emily Winant, Mr. E. Lloyd, Mr. W. Ludwig and Mr. M. W. Whitney as the soloists. The performance of the work was one of the successes of the week. The oratorio gains upon acquaintance in several directions; but there are long stretches of dreariness in it, and now and then a pompous operatic pretentiousness not overimpressive on the ground of dignity or propriety. Some of the choruses, however, are as noble and as true in feeling as any that modern musical art has produced, and the orchestration is wonderfully fine, and colors the sentiment of the text with great felicity. Mr. Lloyd again enforced his right to be considered a master in his art. His music did not present any opportunities for him to stir his audience to the enthusiasm he excited at the earlier concerts, but his singing was none the less exquisite in finish, phrasing and true artistic intelligence. Mr. Ludwig won another well-merited triumph by his singing of the part of Jesus, bringing to bear upon it no less just a sympathy with the spirit of the music and the character than was displayed by him as Elijah. It was chastely fervent in style and beautiful in its simple pathos and dignified intensity of expression. Mr. Whitney sang his solos in his best manner, and fairly shared in the principal successes of the evening. Miss De Vere, in the leading soprano solos, was, on the whole, a disappointment. She has a charming voice, but it is not well suited to oratorio, and she is lacking in that broad and sustained style essential to music of that order. She sang her two solos in a choppy, disconnected manner, except in the last bars of her first aria, "Rise to light supernal, on wings of lowly faith," which were beautifully given. For the rest, her phrasing was often exceptionally poor. The chief drawback, however, to a critical enjoyment of her efforts was the absence of a necessary sustained or sostenuto effect. The other soloists met the demands made upon them conscientiously. The chorus acquitted itself very well, indeed. Its task was a difficult one, owing to the chromatic nature of much of its music, and there were several lapses in intonation; but otherwise the singing of this body showed careful training and impressive results. The orchestra, save for an occasional untunefulness in the wind instruments, did its work admirably. To-night the festival will close with "Israel in Egypt," in our review of which, in our next, we shall consider the festival as a whole.

Boston Post

MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 14, 1890

"ISRAEL IN EGYPT."

The Händel and Haydn Society's seventy-fifth anniversary festival was brought to a close at Music Hall last evening with a performance of Händel's "Israel in Egypt," the soloists being Miss Clementine De Vere, soprano; Miss Clara Poole, contralto; Mr. Edward Lloyd, tenor, and Mr. Myron W. Whitney and Mr. William Ludwig, basses. "Israel in Egypt" is one of the less familiar oratorios, last evening's production being but the eighth given by the Händel and Haydn Society since its first performance in 1859. The score consists chiefly of choral numbers that tested the strength and ability of the society; but the careful training of Mr. Zerrahn bore abundant fruit, and the most difficult passages were rendered with a smoothness and accuracy quite in contrast with some of the society's former efforts. The spirited number, "He gave them hailstones for rain," was sung with excellent effect, the orchestra rounding out the chorus, and this, with the more subdued passage, "But as for his people," was among the best choral numbers of the performance. The arias in the oratorio are not many, but, being somewhat intricate, require more than ordinary musical ability even for an oratorio singer. Mr. Lloyd made another distinct success in the tenor role. His voice showed marked purity of tone, as well as power, and in all the passages allotted to him there was little that could be improved. He was equally satisfactory in both aria and recitative, and in the principal number, "The enemy said, I will pursue," he won well-deserved applause from both audience and chorus. Mr. Ludwig also displayed his usual good taste in the bass numbers, and, with the exception of an occasional uncertainty in some of the notes, he was more than satisfactory. Mr. Myron W. Whitney gave a splendid performance and sang with the same vigor and depth of tone that has always been characteristic of his efforts in oratorio. Seldom has he been in better voice, and his aria, "Wave upon wave," was by far the best number of the programme. Miss Clara Poole's voice was not of sufficient volume to meet the requirements of the contralto role; and although her singing was in every way artistic, it lacked power. The same may be said of Miss De Vere. Her tones were pure and faultless, and in her opening recitative she sustained the high notes with excellent effect; but the heavy demands on her voice began to show results before the performance was concluded, and she displayed a marked weakness in some of the closing numbers. The oratorio, however, was most successful, and served as a fitting termination of the festival, demonstrating that the Händel and Haydn Society has not fallen from its original high musical standard and has every reason to hope for a successful existence of another three-quarters of a century. It is a singular coincidence that the oratorio was given on the 131st anniversary of the death of its composer.

Boston Daily Globe.

MONDAY, APRIL 14.

"ISRAEL IN EGYPT" SUNG.

Close of the Handel and Haydn Festival in Music Hall.

The anniversary festival of the Handel and Haydn Society was ended last evening by a performance of Handel's "Israel in Egypt." Again was Music Hall crowded to its capacity by an audience worthily representative of Boston's highest social and musical circles. The festival has proved successful beyond all expectations, financially as well as artistically. It was feared that the counter attraction of grand opera in German would detract from patronage of the oratorios, but larger audiences would only have been possible in a larger hall. Bostonians are naturally proud of a society capable of giving productions so meritorious, and have expressed appreciation in the substantial form of liberal patronage. It is pleasant to know of this willingness to lend support, as it promises well for the success of future undertakings by this organization.

"Israel in Egypt" has been heard here eight times. The last presentation of this oratorio by the Handel and Haydn Society, previous to last evening, was five years ago, and so admirable was the singing on this occasion that the performance proved rarely enjoyable.

Mr. Edward Lloyd was again heard with pleasure, and the hearty applause which rewarded the efforts of the other artists testified to their popularity here. Mr. Lloyd sang his several solos in a manner worthy the foremost of English oratorio singers. The recitatives of the first part were beautifully given, and well-merited was the enthusiastic applause bestowed upon his singing of "The enemy said, I will pursue." Mr. Ludwig's success was in keeping with his other triumphs of this festival. Magnificent was his rendering of the recitative, "He measured the waters." Mr. Whitney, of course, sang his music delightfully. One of the treats of the evening was the duet by these two famous singers. Mlle. De Vere's pure, resonant voice was well suited to the soprano solos, all of which she gave with good effect. It is needless, perhaps, to state that Miss Clara Poole sang her role superbly. She is a thorough artist and may always be depended on for the best of work in oratorio. The chorus won many expressions of approval, while upon Conductor Zerrahn honors and flowers were freely bestowed.

Boston Evening Transcript.

MONDAY, APRIL 14, 1890.

THE HANDEL AND HAYDN FESTIVAL.

The fourth and last concert of the Festival was given in the Music Hall last evening, Handel's "Israel in Egypt" being the work performed. The solos were sung by Miss Clementine de Vere (soprano), Miss Clara Poole (alto), Mr. Edward Lloyd (tenor), Mr. William Ludwig (bass), and Mr. Myron W. Whitney (bass). Mr. Carl Zerrahn conducted, and Mr. B. J. Lang was at the organ.

The great oratorio was not only given without cuts, but, as has been customary for some time, with some interpolated recitatives and airs from other works by Handel—a custom more honored in the breach than the observance. The only excuse for these interpolations is that they serve to break up that great Andes-chain of eleven choruses, from "He spake the word" to "And believed the Lord," and give the chorus singers occasional moments of rest. But, although something is undoubtedly gained in this way, by rendering the work less physically fatiguing to the singers than it would be in its original shape, those airs and recitatives tend to mar the unity of the composition, and one can not help wishing them out of the way.

Still, the presence of these interpolated numbers is not what is most to be regretted in performances of this grandest of all Handel's oratorios. The condition of the score is a far more serious subject for dissatisfaction. We do not know who wrote the additional accompaniments used in the airs and duets last evening; we suspect, however, that they were compiled from several sources. But, wherever they came from, they are insufficient. Every now and then the ear would be shocked by that eminently un-Handelian effect of the voice-part being supported by a mere ungarnished bass. At other times, even when the harmony was complete in Handel's score, orchestral effects were produced such as it is impossible that the composer should have contemplated. It is putting one's faith to a pretty severe test to try to argue that that faint, pastoral squeaking of two oboes and a bassoon in many parts of "The Lord is a man of war" would have satisfied Handel. Nothing could be more out of keeping with the massive and brilliant character of this mighty duet for two basses than this small piping on three reed instruments; it is simply comical. We know that oboe and bassoon parts were pretty heavily "doubled" in Handel's orchestra, as string parts are with us today; what more Handel did in passages like those we mention, with the organ or harpsichord, we do not know; but that he did something is more than probable. The Handel and Haydn society has shown no little energy of late years in the way of improving its chorus and making itself up to the times as an efficient body. It remains for it now to go one step further, and see to it that the Handel scores it gives shall be in a fit condition for performance. The high compliment Robert Franz paid the society, in dedicating to it his completed score of the "Messiah" ought to stimulate its ambition to do something of its own accord toward procuring adequate additional accompaniments to other scores of its "patron great master." The managers of the society must have found out by this time how idle it is to trust to heresay and English tradition in this matter. The additional accompaniments it has imported from London for the performance of some great works during the last few years—notably those for Bach's B minor mass—have proved mere snares and delusions, and have shown how little any reports "that they had been used in London with excellent effect" are to be trusted. True, Robert Franzes do not grow on every bush, and the society can hardly expect to find people to do such magnificent work for "Israel in Egypt" as he did for the "Messiah." But competent musicians can still be found to put the work into a far better shape than it is at present, especially as they would have in this case Mendelssohn's organ accompaniment to guide them. The good in this accompaniment of Mendelssohn's far outweighs the bad; and, although it is, unfortunately, practically useless for the most part in its present form, it would would be an admirable guide to any one who should undertake the task of filling out Handel's continuo in "Israel" orchestrally. It would be well for the Handel and Haydn to appreciate that, of all its artistic duties for the present and the near future, this one is the most imperative—to prevent the perpetuation of a crying injustice to Handel which no amount of tradition can make less unjust.

The performance last evening was, in the main, excellent, the chorus singing generally with vigor and precision. Of the solo work Mr. Lloyd's superb singing of "The enemy said" was especially memorable. It were hard to imagine how this terrible air could be better sung; it was magnificent at every point. Mr. Ludwig and Mr. Whitney were both capital in their bass solos, and in "The Lord is a man of war" (in which they are heartily to be thanked for not making the traditional turn in the last phrase), the one shining by his smooth and clear vocalization, and the other by his firm intellectual grasp of the music and his majestic vitality of style. Miss de Vere and Miss Poole did creditably; but both of them show to better advantage in music of another sort. The audience was simply enormous; indeed the whole festival has been one of the most successful the Handel and Haydn Society has ever given. It now enters upon the last quarter of its century with the fairest hopes for the future.

Boston Journal.

TUESDAY MORNING, APRIL 15, 1890.

The first Chopin recital by Vladimir de Pachmann was given yesterday afternoon in Chickering Hall. As an interpreter of Chopin the pianist's reputation is established, but the audience was hardly prepared for so brilliant, artistic and graceful a rendition as was given. The applause was unusually hearty for a piano recital. Like Von Bülow, the pianist has a habit of gazing at the audience when he had performed an unusually effective bit of work. Further recitals will be given Wednesday and Thursday.

The closing concert last evening by the Kneisel Quartette was one of exceeding interest. Miss Aus Der Ohe was the assisting artist in a fine rendition of Schubert's quintette in A major. There was also given Mozart's quartette for strings in C, and a very beautiful romance by Grieg, opening with the 'cello.

[illegible]

TUESDAY, APRIL 15.

Last Kneisel Quartet Concert.

The last of this season's concerts by the Kneisel quartet was given in Union Hall last evening. The audience was large and heartily expressed appreciation of the excellent programme, which included the quartet in C major by Mozart, the second movement from the quartet in G minor, Grieg and Schubert's "Forellen" quartet. Miss Adele Aus der Ohe was the soloist, and, needless to say, delighted the audience by her finished performance.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

TUESDAY MORNING, APRIL 15, 1890.

THE KNEISEL QUARTETTE.

The last Kneisel Quartette concert of the season took place last night at Union Hall. Miss Aus der Ohe was the pianist, and a Mozart quartette movement from Grieg's quartette in G minor and Schubert's quartette in A major constituted the programmee.

Boston Post

TUESDAY MORNING, APRIL 15, 1890

THE KNEISEL QUARTETTE CONCERT.

Counter attractions did not detract one whit from the largeness of the audience gathered in Union Hall last evening to listen to the last of the series of six chamber music concerts given by the Kneisel Quartette. For five seasons the work of this organization has been favored with the large enthusiasm that was most richly deserved, and even in the surfeit of good music that is given here in musical Boston, it is to be doubted if any better work has been done. Of the three numbers given last night, the first and third made their second appearance on the programmes of this quartette.

Quartette for strings, C major.....Mozart
Romance (andantino); from quartette in G minor, op. 27.....Gregi
Quintette in A major, for piano, violin, viola, 'cello and bass, op. 114.....Schubert
Pass, Mr. Goldstein.

The Mozart quartette has been given so recently that it is unnecessary to write but a word, and that of high commendation, of the manner in which one and all entered into their work. The Grieg "Romance" is delicious in brightness of theme and the delicacy of the working out, and as a comparative novelty is so happy that it, too, should be given again—a second performance at Kneisel concerts—to make it on a par with its companions. Miss Adele Aus der Ohe played the Schubert quintette without notes with wonderful precision and technique, as she did before with the Schumann quartette given by the same club. It is so seldom that the critic does not deplore the fact that the pianist plays with the cover of the piano up, that it is almost a pleasure to have to regret that the reverse seemed to be a detriment, as it was last night. Miss Aus der Ohe's delicacy of touch made the pianissimos almost inaudible. The next season's music would be indeed incomplete unless the Kneisel Quartette add to it the brilliancy and eclat of their efforts.

[illegible]TON DAILY GLOBE.

[illegible]TUESDAY, APRIL 15.

PACHMANN'S DEBUT.

The Russian Virtuoso Brilliantly Interprets Chopin in Chickering Hall.

A short, thickset, bearded gentleman is Vladimir Pachmann, latest in the line of pianists to astonish Boston. At Chickering Hall yesterday afternoon the Russian artist began the first of a series of Chopin concerts, and began them most brilliantly.

Mr. Pachmann is unique among recent visitors to our concert stage in a good many respects. For one thing, he makes no disguise of his emotions. If the hall is too warm he tells his auditors as much; if a whisper reaches his ear, he rebukes the whisperer publicly. He is ingenuous, not to say child-like in manner, with a curious way of taking his audience into his confidence; his entire manner at the piano, indeed, is peculiar to a degree.

His execution is a marvel of facileness, grace, distinctness and brilliancy. More than this, it is accurate. More than all and artistically better than all, Pachmann has caught the thought and soul of his loved composer.

We have never heard a Chopin mazurka played as Pachmann plays it, and the familiar waltz dedicated to the Countess Potocka seemed to unfold new beauties under the master's touch. This was repeated in response to an enthusiastic outburst of applause. Two etudes, given with astonishing brilliancy: an impromptu, the allegro de concert, and a scherzo completed the offering.

After such a brilliant debut it will be strange if Mr. Pachmann does not look into the faces of as large an assemblage tomorrow afternoon as Chickering Hall can well accommodate. The programme, as was the case yesterday, is made up exclusively of Chopin selections.

Gazette

SUNDAY MORNING EDITION

Handel and Haydn Festival.

The Festival concerts of the Handel and Haydn Society last week were, in many respects, the best that the organization has ever given. The work of the chorus throughout was of an exceptionally high order of merit, and was especially noticeable for its steadiness, its precision, and the rich and well-balanced body of tone evolved. Another point for which the chorus is to be distinctly commended is the tone-color that was imparted to its singing through a careful observance of musical dynamics, by means of which a greater variety of effect and a finer artistic result was obtained than has before been the case in the chorus singing of the society. The performance of "Elijah," with which the Festival opened on Sunday evening, was listened to by an enormous audience. Mme. Lehmann-Kalisch sang the soprano solos, and is first to be complimented upon the excellence of her pronunciation of English and the clearness with which she enunciated the text. Her singing on the concert stage is never fully as effective as it is in opera, but her work showed the finely-trained and thoroughly-experienced singer throughout. In the duet "What have I do with thee?" her efforts were marked by fine force and dramatic feeling. In "Hear ye Israel" she was heard with impressive effect, except in the closing phrases, which were given with an unaccountable tameness that in its results, was an anti-climax. In the quartets she was heard to special advantage. Her interpretation of the music of the Youth was not so satisfying, owing to the thinness of the tone and the absence of expression with which it was sung. The contralto solos were sung by Miss Clara Poole, for whom, we understand, some consideration is to be made on account of recent serious illness. The consequence was that the familiar solo "Oh, rest in the Lord" was not as effectively sung as it is but just to concede it would have been under more favorable circumstances. The recitatives, especially those of the Angel, were admirably declaimed, and with a thorough sympathy with their dramatic force. In the tenor solos Mr. Edward Lloyd was heard on our concert stage for the first time. The oratorio does not afford any very striking opportunities for the tenor, but Mr. Lloyd made it clear beyond all cavil that he has a sweet and powerful voice that has been trained carefully in the best school; that his style is finished and artistic to the highest degree, and that the much abused word "artist" can be applied to him in its best sense. He does not stir by the vigor or the passionateness of his singing, and seems, perhaps, a trifle perfunctory in effect; but it is a genuine pleasure to listen to such finished and such perfect singing as is his. His performance of the recitative, "Ye people, rend your hearts," and the following air, "If with all your hearts," was of rare beauty. The expressiveness of his declamation in "Man of God" was not less exquisite. The great success of the night, however, fell to Mr. William Ludwig, whose singing of Elijah's music was masterly in every essential. Never before has the part been sung here with such splendid dramatic force or such finely-sustained power. A strong individuality was imparted to the character, and the impression made was remarkably vivid. The reading was not only brilliant, but it was strikingly original, and the results obtained were always within the line of refined and lofty art. The vigor of the effort was immense, and it was never relaxed for a moment. Where all was so fine, it is not easy or necessary to select any point for special praise. The singing was almost perfect, the only fault left for exacting criticism to dwell upon being a certain explosiveness of voice that became somewhat monotonous through repetition. For the rest, the effort was incomparably fine, and its success was as overwhelming as it was deserved.

On Tuesday evening the first and second parts of Bach's Christmas Oratorio, two solo selections from Haydn's "The Creation," and Mr. J. C. D. Parker's new cantata, "St. John," were performed, the soloists being Mad. Nordica, Miss Emily Winant, Mr. Edward Lloyd and Mr. Myron W. Whitney. The chorus work in the Bach oratorio was strong, clear and massive in the chorals, but in the more florid choruses it was cloudy in effect. This, however, was not owing to any lack of familiarity on the part of the singers with their music, but is to be traced to the impossibility of so many voices singing such music with due distinctness in effect. There was no hesitation; the attack was always prompt and steadiness was invariably maintained; but the rolling passages jostled each other and reached the ear confusedly. Madame Nordica sang but one brief recitative, in which there was no opportunity for a display of her powers. Miss Winant sang as she always sings, with care, intelligence and skill in equal combination, reaching her highest point in the lovely solo, "Slumber, Beloved." Mr. Whitney sang the bass solos with vigor and nobility of style, especially in "Mighty Lord and King," though the more florid passages did not flow with the smoothness and fluency most to be desired. Mr. Lloyd intensified the fine impression he made at the earlier performance, by his singing of the tenor solos, which was marked by exquisite beauty in phrasing, purity in style, justness in expression, and a thoroughly musicianly feeling in every essential. In the solo, "Haste ye Shepherds," he showed the possession of technical resources of a rare order in a modern tenor singer. It was, however, in Haydn's aria, "In Native Worth," that he was heard in the fulness of his powers. Nothing finer in the way of vocal art, nothing more sympathetic with the innermost meaning of the music, nothing more beautifully phrased and more perfectly sung than was this selection by Mr. Lloyd can be conceived. Its effect upon the chorus, the orchestra and the audience was electrical, and the artist was recalled three times with as thundering and as enthusiastic applause as has ever been heard in Music Hall. Madame Nordica sang "On Mighty Pens," also from "The Creation." The effort cannot be justly commended as an interpretation of Haydn in any sense. It was tunefully and smoothly sung, though its possibilities of expression were not reached by the artist. Her most praiseworthy moments were in her singing in half-voice, which was very sweet. At other times the cold and metallic quality of her voice and the lack of fervor in her style were obtrusive. She was heartily and loudly applauded and recalled. Mr. Parker's cantata, which brought the performance to an end, is of exceptional worth and interest, and enlists the attention and the respect of the listener from the very outset. It is rich in pure and graceful melody, is at once scholarly and flexible in style, and the orchestration is steadily beautiful. The high finish bestowed upon the work from beginning to end is one of its notable features. Several of the numbers are pervaded by a deep poetic feeling. The knowledge of the composer is displayed in two admirably written fugues, in which there is nothing of stiffness, and which are masterly in the clearness of their counterpoint and polyphony. The choruses are written for the voices with a thorough feeling for what is best and most effective in vocal color. A novel and impressive result is produced by the chorus doing the work usually given to the Narrator, breaking in as it does unexpectedly upon the calm and steady flow of the orchestra. The quartet, "Now are we the sons of God," is one of the gems of a work that is overflowing in charm. Another fine number is the duet for soprano and tenor, "And there shall be no more curse," which opens perhaps somewhat conventionally, but which grows steadily in strength, power and freshness. The concluding soprano solo and chorus brings the work to a brilliant culmination. Mr. Parker has here written a work that will last and that is an honor to our native art. He directed it himself with excellent skill, manifesting the possession of coolness, precision and self poise,—the most essential qualities in a conductor. The performance was very good, the choruses doing some of its best work of the week, and the soloists, Mme. Nordica, Miss Winant and Mr. Lloyd doing ample justice to their tasks. The work was well received and made a brilliant success.

On Thursday evening Gounod's "The Redemption" was given, with Miss Clementine De Vere, Mrs. J. P. Walker, Miss Emily Winant, Mr. E. Lloyd, Mr. W. Ludwig and Mr. M. W. Whitney as the soloists. The performance of the work was one of the successes of the week. The oratorio gains upon acquaintance in several directions; but there are long stretches of dreariness in it, and now and then a pompous operatic pretentiousness not oversensitive on the ground of dignity or propriety. Some of the choruses, however, are as noble and as true in feeling as any that modern musical art has produced, and the orchestration is wonderfully fine, and colors the sentiment of the text with great felicity. Mr. Lloyd again enforced his right to be considered a master in his art. His music did not present any opportunities for him to stir his audience to the enthusiasm he excited at the earlier concerts, but his singing was none the less exquisite in finish, phrasing and true artistic intelligence. Mr. Ludwig won another well-merited triumph by his singing of the part of Jesus, bringing to bear upon it no less just a sympathy with the spirit of the music and the character than was displayed by him as Elijah. It was chastely fervent in style and beautiful in its simple pathos and dignified intensity of expression. Mr. Whitney sang his solos in his best manner, and fairly shared in the principal successes of the evening. Miss De Vere, in the leading soprano solos, was, on the whole, a disappointment. She has a charming voice, but it is not well suited to oratorio, and she is lacking in that broad and sustained style essential to music of that order. She sang her two solos in a choppy, disconnected manner, except in the last bars of her first aria, "Rise to light supernal, on wings of lowly faith," which were beautifully given. For the rest, her phrasing was often exceptionally poor. The chief drawback, however, to a critical enjoyment of her efforts was the absence of a necessary sustained or sostenuto effect. The other soloists met the demands made upon them conscientiously. The chorus acquitted itself very well, indeed. Its task was a difficult one, owing to the chromatic nature of much of its music, and there were several lapses in intonation; but otherwise the singing of this body showed careful training and impressive results. The orchestra, save for an occasional untunefulness in the wind instruments, did its work admirably. To-night the festival will close with "Israel in Egypt," in our review of which, in our next, we shall consider the festival as a whole.

Boston Post

MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 14, 1890

"ISRAEL IN EGYPT."

The Händel and Haydn Society's seventy-fifth anniversary festival was brought to a close at Music Hall last evening with a performance of Händel's "Israel in Egypt," the soloists being Miss Clementine De Vere, soprano; Miss Clara Poole, contralto; Mr. Edward Lloyd, tenor, and Mr. Myron W. Whitney and Mr. William Ludwig, basses. "Israel in Egypt" is one of the less familiar oratorios, last evening's production being but the eighth given by the Händel and Haydn Society since its first performance in 1859. The score consists chiefly of choral numbers that tested the strength and ability of the society; but the careful training of Mr. Zerrahn bore abundant fruit, and the most difficult passages were rendered with a smoothness and accuracy quite in contrast with some of the society's former efforts. The spirited number, "He gave them hailstones for rain," was sung with excellent effect, the orchestra rounding out the chorus, and this, with the more subdued passage, "But as for his people," was among the best choral numbers of the performance. The arias in the oratorio are not many, but, being somewhat intricate, require more than ordinary musical ability even for an oratorio singer. Mr. Lloyd made another distinct success in the tenor role. His voice showed marked purity of tone, as well as power, and in all the passages allotted to him there was little that could be improved. He was equally satisfactory in both aria and recitative, and in the principal number, "The enemy said, I will pursue," he won well-deserved applause from both audience and chorus. Mr. Ludwig also displayed his usual good taste in the bass numbers, and, with the exception of an occasional uncertainty in some of the notes, he was more than satisfactory. Mr. Myron W. Whitney gave a splendid performance and sang with the same vigor and depth of tone that has always been characteristic of his efforts in oratorio. Seldom has he been in better voice, and his aria, "Wave upon wave," was by far the best number of the programme. Miss Clara Poole's voice was not of sufficient volume to meet the requirements of the contralto role; and although her singing was in every way artistic, it lacked power. The same may be said of Miss De Vere. Her tones were pure and faultless, and in her opening recitative she sustained the high notes with excellent effect; but the heavy demands on her voice began to show results before the performance was concluded, and she displayed a marked weakness in some of the closing numbers. The oratorio, however, was most successful, and served as a fitting termination of the festival, demonstrating that the Händel and Haydn Society has not fallen from its original high musical standard and has every reason to hope for a successful existence of another three-quarters of a century. It is a singular coincidence that the oratorio was given on the 131st anniversary of the death of its composer.

Boston Daily Globe.

MONDAY, APRIL 14.

"ISRAEL IN EGYPT" SUNG.

Close of the Handel and Haydn Festival in Music Hall.

The anniversary festival of the Handel and Haydn Society was ended last evening by a performance of Handel's "Israel in Egypt." Again was Music Hall crowded to its capacity by an audience worthily representative of Boston's highest social and musical circles. The festival has proved successful beyond all expectations, financially as well as artistically. It was feared that the counter attraction of grand opera in German would detract from patronage of the oratorios, but larger audiences would only have been possible in a larger hall. Bostonians are naturally proud of a society capable of giving productions so meritorious, and have expressed appreciation in the substantial form of liberal patronage. It is pleasant to know of this willingness to lend support, as it promises well for the success of future undertakings by this organization.

"Israel in Egypt" has been heard here eight times. The last presentation of this oratorio by the Handel and Haydn Society, previous to last evening, was five years ago, and so admirable was the singing on this occasion that the performance proved rarely enjoyable.

Mr. Edward Lloyd was again heard with pleasure, and the hearty applause which rewarded the efforts of the other artists testified to their popularity here. Mr. Lloyd sang his several solos in a manner worthy the foremost of English oratorio singers. The recitatives of the first part were beautifully given, and well-merited was the enthusiastic applause bestowed upon his singing of "The enemy said, I will pursue." Mr. Ludwig's success was in keeping with his other triumphs of this festival. Magnificent was his rendering of the recitative, "He measured the waters." Mr. Whitney, of course, sang his music delightfully. One of the treats of the evening was the duet by these two famous singers. Mlle. De Vere's pure, resonant voice was well suited to the soprano solos, all of which she gave with good effect. It is needless, perhaps, to state that Miss Clara Poole sang her role superbly. She is a thorough artist and may always be depended on for the best of work in oratorio. The chorus won many expressions of approval, while upon Conductor Zerrahn honors and flowers were freely bestowed.

Boston Evening Transcript.

MONDAY, APRIL 14, 1890.

THE HANDEL AND HAYDN FESTIVAL.

The fourth and last concert of the Festival was given in the Music Hall last evening, Handel's "Israel in Egypt" being the work performed. The solos were sung by Miss Clementine De Vere (soprano), Miss Clara Poole (alto), Mr. Edward Lloyd (tenor), Mr. William Ludwig (base), and Mr. Myron W. Whitney (bass). Mr. Carl Zerrahn conducted, and Mr. B. J. Lang was at the organ.

The great oratorio was not only given without cuts, but, as has been customary for some time, with some interpolated recitatives and airs from other works by Handel—a custom more honored in the breach than the observance. The only excuse for these interpolations is that they serve to break up that great Andes-chain of eleven choruses, from "He spake the word" to "And believed the Lord," and give the chorus singers occasional moments of rest. But, although something is undoubtedly gained in this way, by rendering the work less physically fatiguing to the singers than it would be in its original shape, those airs and recitatives tend to mar the unity of the composition, and one can not help wishing them out of the way.

Still, the presence of these interpolated numbers is not what is most to be regretted in performances of this grandest of all Handel's oratorios. The condition of the score is a far more serious subject for dissatisfaction. We do not know who wrote the additional accompaniments used in the airs and duets last evening; we suspect, however, that they were compiled from several sources. But, wherever they came from, they are insufficient. Every now and then the ear would be shocked by that eminently un-Handelian effect of the voice-part being supported by a mere ungarnished bass. At other times, even when the harmony was complete in Handel's score, orchestral effects were produced such as it is impossible that the composer should have contemplated. It is putting one's faith to a pretty severe test to try to argue that that faint, pastoral squeaking of two oboes and a bassoon in many parts of "The Lord is a man of war" would have satisfied Handel. Nothing could be more out of keeping with the massive and brilliant character of this mighty duet for two basses than this small piping on three reed instruments; it is simply comical. We know that oboe and bassoon parts were pretty heavily "doubled" in Handel's orchestra, as string parts are with us today; what more Handel did in passages like those we mention, with the organ or harpsichord, we do not know; but that he did something is more than probable. The Handel and Haydn society has shown no little energy of late years in the way of improving its chorus and making itself up to the times as an efficient body. It remains for it now to go one step further, and see to it that the Handel scores it gives shall be in a fit condition for performance. The high compliment Robert Franz paid the society, in dedicating to it his completed score of the "Messiah" ought to stimulate its ambition to do something of its own accord toward procuring adequate additional accompaniments to other scores of its "patron great master." The managers of the society must have found out by this time how idle it is to trust to heresay and English tradition in this matter. The additional accompaniments it has imported from London for the performance of some great works during the last few years—notably those for Bach's B minor mass—have proved mere snares and delusions, and have shown how little any reports "that they had been used in London with excellent effect" are to be trusted. True, Robert Franzes do not grow on every bush, and the society can hardly expect to find people to do such magnificent work for "Israel in Egypt" as he did for the "Messiah." But competent musicians can still be found to put the work into a far better shape than it is at present, especially as they would have in this case Mendelssohn's organ accompaniment to guide them. The good in this accompaniment of Mendelssohn's far outweighs the bad; and, although it is, unfortunately, practically useless for the most part in its present form, it would would be an admirable guide to any one who should undertake the task of filling out Handel's continuo in "Israel" orchestrally. It would be well for the Handel and Haydn to appreciate that, of all its artistic duties for the present and the near future, this one is the most imperative—to prevent the perpetuation of a crying injustice to Handel which no amount of tradition can make less unjust.

The performance last evening was, in the main, excellent, the chorus singing generally with vigor and precision. Of the solo work Mr. Lloyd's superb singing of "The enemy said" was especially memorable. It were hard to imagine how this terrible air could be better sung; it was magnificent at every point. Mr. Ludwig and Mr. Whitney were both capital in their bass solos, and in "The Lord is a man of war" (in which they are heartily to be thanked for not making the traditional turn in the last phrase), the one shining by his smooth and clear vocalization, and the other by his firm intellectual grasp of the music and his majestic vitality of style. Miss de Vere and Miss Poole did creditably; but both of them show to better advantage in music of another sort. The audience was simply enormous; indeed the whole festival has been one of the most successful the Handel and Haydn Society has ever given. It now enters upon the last quarter of its century with the fairest hopes for the future.

Boston Journal.

TUESDAY MORNING, APRIL 15, 1890.

The first Chopin recital by Vladimir de Pachmann was given yesterday afternoon in Chickering Hall. As an interpreter of Chopin the pianist's reputation is established, but the audience was hardly prepared for so brilliant, artistic and graceful a rendition as was given. The applause was unusually hearty for a piano recital. Like Von Bülow, the pianist has a habit of gazing at the audience when he had performed an unusually effective bit of work. Further recitals will be given Wednesday and Thursday.

The closing concert last evening by the Kneisel Quartette was one of exceeding interest. Miss Aus Der Ohe was the assisting artist in a fine rendition of Schubert's quintette in A major. There was also given Mozart's quartette for strings in C, and a very beautiful romance by Grieg, opening with the 'cello.

Boston Daily Advertiser.

TUESDAY, APRIL 15.

Last Kneisel Quartet Concert.

The last of this season's concerts by the Kneisel quartet was given in Union Hall last evening. The audience was large and heartily expressed appreciation of the excellent programme, which included the quartet in C major by Mozart, the second movement from the quartet in G minor, Grieg and Schubert's "Forellen" quartet. Miss Adele Aus der Ohe was the soloist, and, needless to say, delighted the audience by her finished performance.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

TUESDAY MORNING, APRIL 15, 1890.

THE KNEISEL QUARTETTE.

The last Kneisel Quartette concert of the season took place last night at Union Hall. Miss Aus der Ohe was the pianist, and a Mozart quartette movement from Griez's quartette in G minor and Schubert's quartette in A major constituted the programmee.

Boston Post

TUESDAY MORNING, APRIL 15, 1890

THE KNEISEL QUARTETTE CONCERT.

Counter attractions did not detract one whit from the largeness of the audience gathered in Union Hall last evening to listen to the last of the series of six chamber music concerts given by the Kneisel Quartette. For five seasons the work of this organization has been favored with the large enthusiasm that was most richly deserved, and even in the surfeit of good music that is given here in musical Boston, it is to be doubted if any better work has been done. Of the three numbers given last night, the first and third made their second appearance on the programmes of this quartette.

Quartette for strings, C major.....Mozart
Romance (andantino); from quartette in G minor, op. 27.....Gregi
Quintette in A major, for piano, violin, viola, 'cello and bass, op. 114.....Schubert
Pass, Mr. Goldstein.

The Mozart quartette has been given so recently that it is unnecessary to write but a word, and that of high commendation, of the manner in which one and all entered into their work. The Grieg "Romance" is delicious in brightness of theme and the delicacy of the working out, and as a comparative novelty is so happy that it, too, should be given again—a second performance at Kneisel concerts—to make it on a par with its companions. Miss Adele Aus der Ohe played the Schubert quintette without notes with wonderful precision and technique, as she did before with the Schumann quartette given by the same club. It is so seldom that the critic does not deplore the fact that the pianist plays with the cover of the piano up, that it is almost a pleasure to have to regret that the reverse seemed to be a detriment, as it was last night. Miss Aus der Ohe's delicacy of touch made the pianissimos almost inaudible. The next season's music would be indeed incomplete unless the Kneisel Quartette add to it the brilliancy and eclat of their efforts.

TON DAILY GLOBE—

TUESDAY, APRIL 15.

PACHMANN'S DEBUT.

The Russian Virtuoso Brilliantly Interprets Chopin in Chickering Hall.

A short, thickset, bearded gentleman is Vladimir Pachmann, latest in the line of pianists to astonish Boston. At Chickering Hall yesterday afternoon the Russian artist began the first of a series of Chopin concerts, and began them most brilliantly.

Mr. Pachmann is unique among recent visitors to our concert stage in a good many respects. For one thing, he makes no disguise of his emotions. If the hall is too warm he tells his auditors as much; if a whisper reaches his ear, he rebukes the whisperer publicly. He is ingenuous, not to say child-like in manner, with a curious way of taking his audience into his confidence; his entire manner at the piano, indeed, is peculiar to a degree.

His execution is a marvel of facileness, grace, distinctness and brilliancy. More than this, it is accurate. More than all and artistically better than all, Pachmann has caught the thought and soul of his loved composer.

We have never heard a Chopin mazurka played as Pachmann plays it, and the familiar waltz dedicated to the Countess Potocka seemed to unfold new beauties under the master's touch. This was repeated in response to an enthusiastic outburst of applause. Two etudes, given with astonishing brilliancy: an impromptu, the allegro de concert, and a scherzo completed the offering.

After such a brilliant debut it will be strange if Mr. Pachmann does not look into the faces of as large an assemblage tomorrow afternoon as Chickering Hall can well accommodate. The programme, as was the case yesterday, is made up exclusively of Chopin selections.

Gazette

SUNDAY MORNING EDITION

Handel and Haydn Festival.

The Festival concerts of the Handel and Haydn Society last week were, in many respects, the best that the organization has ever given. The work of the chorus throughout was of an exceptionally high order of merit, and was especially noticeable for its steadiness, its precision, and the rich and well-balanced body of tone evolved. Another point for which the chorus is to be distinctly commended is the tone-color that was imparted to its singing through a careful observance of musical dynamics, by means of which a greater variety of effect and a finer artistic result was obtained than has before been the case in the chorus singing of the society. The performance of "Elijah," with which the Festival opened on Sunday evening, was listened to by an enormous audience. Mme. Lehmann-Kalisch sang the soprano solos, and is first to be complimented upon the excellence of her pronunciation of English and the clearness with which she enunciated the text. Her singing on the concert stage is never fully as effective as it is in opera, but her work showed the finely-trained and thoroughly-experienced singer throughout. In the duet "What have I do with thee?" her efforts were marked by fine force and dramatic feeling. In "Hear ye Israel" she was heard with impressive effect, except in the closing phrases, which were given with an unaccountable tameness that in its results, was an anti-climax. In the quartets she was heard to special advantage. Her interpretation of the music of the Youth was not so satisfying, owing to the thinness of the tone and the absence of expression with which it was sung. The contralto solos were sung by Miss Clara Poole, for whom, we understand, some consideration is to be made on account of recent serious illness. The consequence was that the familiar solo "Oh, rest in the Lord" was not as effectively sung as it is but just to concede it would have been under more favorable circumstances. The recitatives, especially those of the Angel, were admirably declaimed, and with a thorough sympathy with their dramatic force. In the tenor solos Mr. Edward Lloyd was heard on our concert stage for the first time. The oratorio does not afford any very striking opportunities for the tenor, but Mr. Lloyd made it clear beyond all cavil that he has a sweet and powerful voice that has been trained carefully in the best school; that his style is finished and artistic to the highest degree, and that the much abused word "artist" can be applied to him in its best sense. He does not stir by the vigor or the passionateness of his singing, and seems, perhaps, a trifle perfunctory in effect; but it is a genuine pleasure to listen to such finished and such perfect singing as is his. His performance of the recitative, "Ye people, rend your hearts," and the following air, "If with all your hearts," was of rare beauty. The expressiveness of his declamation in "Man of God" was not less exquisite. The great success of the night, however, fell to Mr. William Ludwig, whose singing of Elijah's music was masterly in every essential. Never before has the part been sung here with such splendid dramatic force or such finely-sustained power. A strong individuality was imparted to the character, and the impression made was remarkably vivid. The reading was not only brilliant, but it was strikingly original, and the results obtained were always within the line of refined and lofty art. The vigor of the effort was immense, and it was never relaxed for a moment. Where all was so fine, it is not easy or necessary to select any point for special praise. The singing was almost perfect, the only fault left for exacting criticism to dwell upon being a certain explosiveness of voice that became somewhat monotonous through repetition. For the rest, the effort was incomparably fine, and its success was as overwhelming as it was deserved.

On Tuesday evening the first and second parts of Bach's Christmas Oratorio, two solo selections from Haydn's "The Creation," and Mr. J. C. D. Parker's new cantata, "St. John," were performed, the soloists being Mad. Nordica, Miss Emily Winant, Mr Edward Lloyd and Mr. Myron W. Whitney. The chorus work in the Bach oratorio was strong, clear and massive in the chorals, but in the more florid choruses it was cloudy in effect. This, however, was not owing to any lack of familiarity on the part of the singers with their music, but is to be traced to the impossibility of so many voices singing such music with due distinctness in effect. There was no hesitation; the attack was always prompt and steadiness was invariably maintained; but the rolling passages jostled each other and reached the ear confusedly. Madame Nordica sang but one brief recitative, in which there was no opportunity for a display of her powers. Miss Winant sang as she always sings, with care, intelligence and skill in equal combination, reaching her highest point in the lovely solo, "Slumber, Beloved." Mr. Whitney sang the bass solos with vigor and nobility of style, especially in "Mighty Lord and King," though the more florid passages did not flow with the smoothness and fluency most to be desired. Mr. Lloyd intensified the fine impression he made at the earlier performance, by his singing of the tenor solos, which was marked by exquisite beauty in phrasing, purity in style, justness in expression, and a thoroughly musicianly feeling in every essential. In the solo, "Haste ye Shepherds," he showed the possession of technical resources of a rare order in a modern tenor singer. It was, however, in Haydn's aria, "In Native Worth," that he was heard in the fulness of his powers. Nothing finer in the way of vocal art, nothing more sympathetic with the innermost meaning of the music, nothing more beautifully phrased and more perfectly sung than was this selection by Mr. Lloyd can be conceived. Its effect upon the chorus, the orchestra and the audience was electrical, and the artist was recalled three times with as thundering and as enthusiastic applause as has ever been heard in Music Hall. Madame Nordica sang "On Mighty Pens," also from "The Creation." The effort cannot be justly commended as an interpretation of Haydn in any sense. It was tunefully and smoothly sung, though its possibilities of expression were not reached by the artist. Her most praiseworthy moments were in her singing in half-voice, which was very sweet. At other times the cold and metallic quality of her voice and the lack of fervor in her style were obtrusive. She was heartily and loudly applauded and recalled. Mr. Parker's cantata, which brought the performance to an end, is of exceptional worth and interest, and enlists the attention and the respect of the listener from the very outset. It is rich in pure and graceful melody, is at once scholarly and flexible in style, and the orchestration is steadily beautiful. The high finish bestowed upon the work from beginning to end is one of its notable features. Several of the numbers are pervaded by a deep poetic feeling. The knowledge of the composer is displayed in two admirably written fugues, in which there is nothing of stiffness, and which are masterly in the clearness of their counterpoint and polyphony. The choruses are written for the voices with a thorough feeling for what is best and most effective in vocal color. A novel and impressive result is produced by the chorus doing the work usually given to the Narrator, breaking in as it does unexpectedly upon the calm and steady flow of the orchestra. The quartet, "Now are we the sons of God," is one of the gems of a work that is overflowing in charm. Another fine number is the duet for soprano and tenor, "And there shall be no more curse," which opens perhaps somewhat conventionally, but which grows steadily in strength, power and freshness. The concluding soprano solo and chorus brings the work to a brilliant culmination. Mr. Parker has here written a work that will last and that is an honor to our native art. He directed it himself with excellent skill, manifesting the possession of coolness, precision and self poise,—the most essential qualities in a conductor. The performance was very good, the choruses doing some of its best work of the week, and the soloists, Mme. Nordica, Miss Winant and Mr. Lloyd doing ample justice to their tasks. The work was well received and made a brilliant success.

On Thursday evening Gounod's "The Redemption" was given, with Miss Clementine De Vere, Mrs. J. P. Walker, Miss Emily Winant, Mr. E. Lloyd, Mr. W. Ludwig and Mr. M. W. Whitney as the soloists. The performance of the work was one of the successes of the week. The oratorio gains upon acquaintance in several directions; but there are long stretches of dreariness in it, and now and then a pompous operatic pretentiousness not overimpressive on the ground of dignity or propriety. Some of the choruses, however, are as noble and as true in feeling as any that modern musical art has produced, and the orchestration is wonderfully fine, and colors the sentiment of the text with great felicity. Mr. Lloyd again enforced his right to be considered a master in his art. His music did not present any opportunities for him to stir his audience to the enthusiasm he excited at the earlier concerts, but his singing was none the less exquisite in finish, phrasing and true artistic intelligence. Mr. Ludwig won another well-merited triumph by his singing of the part of Jesus, bringing to bear upon it no less just a sympathy with the spirit of the music and the character than was displayed by him as Elijah. It was chastely fervent in style and beautiful in its simple pathos and dignified intensity of expression. Mr. Whitney sang his solos in his best manner, and fairly shared in the principal successes of the evening. Miss De Vere, in the leading soprano solos, was, on the whole, a disappointment. She has a charming voice, but it is not well suited to oratorio, and she is lacking in that broad and sustained style essential to music of that order. She sang her two solos in a choppy, disconnected manner, except in the last bars of her first aria, "Rise to light supernal, on wings of lowly faith," which were beautifully given. For the rest, her phrasing was often exceptionally poor. The chief drawback, however, to a critical enjoyment of her efforts was the absence of a necessary sustained or sostenuto effect. The other soloists met the demands made upon them conscientiously. The chorus acquitted itself very well, indeed. Its task was a difficult one, owing to the chromatic nature of much of its music, and there were several lapses in intonation; but otherwise the singing of this body showed careful training and impressive results. The orchestra, save for an occasional untunefulness in the wind instruments, did its work admirably. To-night the festival will close with "Israel in Egypt," in our review of which, in our next, we shall consider the festival as a whole.

Boston Post

MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 14, 1890

"ISRAEL IN EGYPT."

The Händel and Haydn Society's seventy-fifth anniversary festival was brought to a close at Music Hall last evening with a performance of Händel's "Israel in Egypt," the soloists being Miss Clementine De Vere, soprano; Miss Clara Poole, contralto; Mr. Edward Lloyd, tenor, and Mr. Myron W. Whitney and Mr. William Ludwig, basses. "Israel in Egypt" is one of the less familiar oratorios, last evening's production being but the eighth given by the Händel and Haydn Society since its first performance in 1859. The score consists chiefly of choral numbers that tested the strength and ability of the society; but the careful training of Mr. Zerrahn bore abundant fruit, and the most difficult passages were rendered with a smoothness and accuracy quite in contrast with some of the society's former efforts. The spirited number, "He gave them hailstones for rain," was sung with excellent effect, the orchestra rounding out the chorus, and this, with the more subdued passage, "But as for his people," was among the best choral numbers of the performance. The arias in the oratorio are not many, but, being somewhat intricate, require more than ordinary musical ability even for an oratorio singer. Mr. Lloyd made another distinct success in the tenor role. His voice showed marked purity of tone, as well as power, and in all the passages allotted to him there was little that could be improved. He was equally satisfactory in both aria and recitative, and in the principal number, "The enemy said, I will pursue," he won well-deserved applause from both audience and chorus. Mr. Ludwig also displayed his usual good taste in the bass numbers, and, with the exception of an occasional uncertainty in some of the notes, he was more than satisfactory. Mr. Myron W. Whitney gave a splendid performance and sang with the same vigor and depth of tone that has always been characteristic of his efforts in oratorio. Seldom has he been in better voice, and his aria, "Wave upon wave," was by far the best number of the programme. Miss Clara Poole's voice was not of sufficient volume to meet the requirements of the contralto role; and although her singing was in every way artistic, it lacked power. The same may be said of Miss De Vere. Her tones were pure and faultless, and in her opening recitative she sustained the high notes with excellent effect; but the heavy demands on her voice began to show results before the performance was concluded, and she displayed a marked weakness in some of the closing numbers. The oratorio, however, was most successful, and served as a fitting termination of the festival, demonstrating that the Händel and Haydn Society has not fallen from its original high musical standard and has every reason to hope for a successful existence of another three-quarters of a century. It is a singular coincidence that the oratorio was given on the 131st anniversary of the death of its composer.

Boston Daily Globe.

MONDAY, APRIL 14.

"ISRAEL IN EGYPT" SUNG.

Close of the Handel and Haydn Festival in Music Hall.

The anniversary festival of the Handel and Haydn Society was ended last evening by a performance of Handel's "Israel in Egypt." Again was Music Hall crowded to its capacity by an audience worthily representative of Boston's highest social and musical circles. The festival has proved successful beyond all expectations, financially as well as artistically. It was feared that the counter attraction of grand opera in German would detract from patronage of the oratorios, but larger audiences would only have been possible in a larger hall. Bostonians are naturally proud of a society capable of giving productions so meritorious, and have expressed appreciation in the substantial form of liberal patronage. It is pleasant to know of this willingness to lend support, as it promises well for the success of future undertakings by this organization.

"Israel in Egypt" has been heard here eight times. The last presentation of this oratorio by the Handel and Haydn Society, previous to last evening, was five years ago, and so admirable was the singing on this occasion that the performance proved rarely enjoyable.

Mr. Edward Lloyd was again heard with pleasure, and the hearty applause which rewarded the efforts of the other artists testified to their popularity here. Mr. Lloyd sang his several solos in a manner worthy the foremost of English oratorio singers. The recitatives of the first part were beautifully given, and well-merited was the enthusiastic applause bestowed upon his singing of "The enemy said, I will pursue." Mr. Ludwig's success was in keeping with his other triumphs of this festival. Magnificent was his rendering of the recitative, "He measured the waters." Mr. Whitney, of course, sang his music delightfully. One of the treats of the evening was the duet by these two famous singers. Mlle. De Vere's pure, resonant voice was well suited to the soprano solos, all of which she gave with good effect. It is needless, perhaps, to state that Miss Clara Poole sang her role superbly. She is a thorough artist and may always be depended on for the best of work in oratorio. The chorus won many expressions of approval, while upon Conductor Zerrahn honors and flowers were freely bestowed.

Boston Evening Transcript.

MONDAY, APRIL 14, 1890.

THE HANDEL AND HAYDN FESTIVAL.

The fourth and last concert of the Festival was given in the Music Hall last evening, Handel's "Israel in Egypt" being the work performed. The solos were sung by Miss Clementine de Vere (soprano), Miss Clara Poole (alto), Mr. Edward Lloyd (tenor), Mr. William Ludwig (bass), and Mr. Myron W. Whitney (bass). Mr. Carl Zerrahn conducted, and Mr. B. J. Lang was at the organ.

The great oratorio was not only given without cuts, but, as has been customary for some time, with some interpolated recitatives and airs from other works by Handel—a custom more honored in the breach than the observance. The only excuse for these interpolations is that they serve to break up that great Andes-chain of eleven choruses, from "He spake the word" to "And believed the Lord," and give the chorus singers occasional moments of rest. But, although something is undoubtedly gained in this way, by rendering the work less physically fatiguing to the singers than it would be in its original shape, those airs and recitatives tend to mar the unity of the composition, and one can not help wishing them out of the way.

Still, the presence of these interpolated numbers is not what is most to be regretted in performances of this grandest of all Handel's oratorios. The condition of the score is a far more serious subject for dissatisfaction. We do not know who wrote the additional accompaniments used in the airs and duets last evening; we suspect, however, that they were compiled from several sources. But, wherever they came from, they are insufficient. Every now and then the ear would be shocked by that eminently un-Handelian effect of the voice-part being supported by a mere ungarnished bass. At other times, even when the harmony was complete in Handel's score, orchestral effects were produced such as it is impossible that the composer should have contemplated. It is putting one's faith to a pretty severe test to try to argue that that faint, pastoral squeaking of two oboes and a bassoon in many parts of "The Lord is a man of war" would have satisfied Handel. Nothing could be more out of keeping with the massive and brilliant character of this mighty duet for two basses than this small piping on three reed instruments; it is simply comical. We know that oboe and bassoon parts were pretty heavily "doubled" in Handel's orchestra, as string parts are with us today; what more Handel did in passages like those we mention, with the organ or harpsichord, we do not know; but that he did something is more than probable. The Handel and Haydn society has shown no little energy of late years in the way of improving its chorus and making itself up to the times as an efficient body. It remains for it now to go one step further, and see to it that the Handel scores it gives shall be in a fit condition for performance. The high compliment Robert Franz paid the society, in dedicating to it his completed score of the "Messiah" ought to stimulate its ambition to do something of its own accord toward procuring adequate additional accompaniments to other scores of its "patron great master." The managers of the society must have found out by this time how idle it is to trust to heresay and English tradition in this matter. The additional accompaniments it has imported from London for the performance of some great works during the last few years—notably those for Bach's B minor mass—have proved mere snares and delusions, and have shown how little any reports "that they had been used in London with excellent effect" are to to be trusted. True, Robert Franzes do not grow on every bush, and the society can hardly expect to find people to do such magnificent work for "Israel in Egypt" as he did for the "Messiah." But competent musicians can still be found to put the work into a far better shape than it is at present, especially as they would have in this case Mendelssohn's organ accompaniment to guide them. The good in this accompaniment of Mendelssohn's far outweighs the bad; and, although it is, unfortunately, practically useless for the most part in its present form, it would would be an admirable guide to any one who should undertake the task of filling out Handel's continuo in "Israel" orchestrally. It would be well for the Handel and Haydn to appreciate that, of all its artistic duties for the present and the near future, this one is the most imperative—to prevent the perpetuation of a crying injustice to Handel which no amount of tradition can make less unjust.

The performance last evening was, in the main, excellent, the chorus singing generally with vigor and precision. Of the solo work Mr. Lloyd's superb singing of "The enemy said" was especially memorable. It were hard to imagine how this terrible air could be better sung; it was magnificent at every point. Mr. Ludwig and Mr. Whitney were both capital in their bass solos, and in "The Lord is a man of war" (in which they are heartily to be thanked for not making the traditional turn in the last phrase), the one shining by his smooth and clear vocalization, and the other by his firm intellectual grasp of the music and his majestic vitality of style. Miss de Vere and Miss Poole did creditably; but both of them show to better advantage in music of another sort. The audience was simply enormous; indeed the whole festival has been one of the most successful the Handel and Haydn Society has ever given. It now enters upon the last quarter of its century with the fairest hopes for the future.

Boston Journal.

TUESDAY MORNING, APRIL 15, 1890.

The first Chopin recital by Vladimir de Pachmann was given yesterday afternoon in Chickering Hall. As an interpreter of Chopin the pianist's reputation is established, but the audience was hardly prepared for so brilliant, artistic and graceful a rendition as was given. The applause was unusually hearty for a piano recital. Like Von Bülow, the pianist has a habit of gazing at the audience when he had performed an unusually effective bit of work. Further recitals will be given Wednesday and Thursday.

The closing concert last evening by the Kneisel Quartette was one of exceeding interest. Miss Aus Der Ohe was the assisting artist in a fine rendition of Schubert's quintette in A major. There was also given Mozart's quartette for strings in C, and a very beautiful romance by Grieg, opening with the 'cello

Boston Daily Globe.

TUESDAY, APRIL 15.

Last Kneisel Quartet Concert.

The last of this season's concerts by the Kneisel quartet was given in Union Hall last evening. The audience was large and heartily expressed appreciation of the excellent programme, which included the quartet in C major by Mozart, the second movement from the quartet in G minor, Grieg and Schubert's "Forellen" quartet. Miss Adele Aus der Ohe was the soloist, and, needless to say, delighted the audience by her finished performance.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

TUESDAY MORNING, APRIL 15, 1890.

THE KNEISEL QUARTETTE.

The last Kneisel Quartette concert of the season took place last night at Union Hall. Miss Aus der Ohe was the pianist, and a Mozart quartette movement from Grieg's quartette in G minor and Schubert's quartette in A major constituted the programmee.

Boston Post

TUESDAY MORNING, APRIL 15, 1890

THE KNEISEL QUARTETTE CONCERT.

Counter attractions did not detract one whit from the largeness of the audience gathered in Union Hall last evening to listen to the last of the series of six chamber music concerts given by the Kneisel Quartette. For five seasons the work of this organization has been favored with the large enthusiasm that was most richly deserved, and even in the surfeit of good music that is given here in musical Boston, it is to be doubted if any better work has been done. Of the three numbers given last night, the first and third made their second appearance on the programmes of this quartette.

Quartette for strings, C major.....Mozart
Romance (andantino); from quartette in G minor, op. 27.....Gregi
Quintette in A major, for piano, violin, viola, 'cello and bass, op. 114.....Schubert
Bass, Mr. Goldstein.

The Mozart quartette has been given so recently that it is unnecessary to write but a word, and that of high commendation, of the manner in which one and all entered into their work. The Grieg "Romance" is delicious in brightness of theme and the delicacy of the working out, and as a comparative novelty is so happy that it, too, should be given again—a second performance at Kneisel concerts—to make it on a par with its companions. Miss Adele Aus der Ohe played the Schubert quintette without notes with wonderful precision and technique, as she did before with the Schumann quartette given by the same club. It is so seldom that the critic does not deplore the fact that the pianist plays with the cover of the piano up, that it is almost a pleasure to have to regret that the reverse seemed to be a detriment, as it was last night. Miss Aus der Ohe's delicacy of touch made the pianissimos almost inaudible. The next season's music would be indeed incomplete unless the Kneisel Quartette add to it the brilliancy and eclat of their efforts.

TON DAILY GLOBE—

TUESDAY, APRIL 15.

PACHMANN'S DEBUT.

The Russian Virtuoso Brilliantly Interprets Chopin in Chickering Hall.

A short, thickset, bearded gentleman is Vladimir Pachmann, latest in the line of pianists to astonish Boston. At Chickering Hall yesterday afternoon the Russian artist began the first of a series of Chopin concerts, and began them most brilliantly.

Mr. Pachmann is unique among recent visitors to our concert stage in a good many respects. For one thing, he makes no disguise of his emotions. If the hall is too warm he tells his auditors as much; if a whisper reaches his ear, he rebukes the whisperer publicly. He is ingenuous, not to say child-like in manner, with a curious way of taking his audience into his confidence; his entire manner at the piano, indeed, is peculiar to a degree.

His execution is a marvel of facileness, grace, distinctness and brilliancy. More than this, it is accurate. More than all and artistically better than all, Pachmann has caught the thought and soul of his loved composer.

We have never heard a Chopin mazurka played as Pachmann plays it, and the familiar waltz dedicated to the Countess Potocka seemed to unfold new beauties under the master's touch. This was repeated in response to an enthusiastic outburst of applause. Two etudes, given with astonishing brilliancy: an impromptu, the allegro de concert, and a scherzo completed the offering.

After such a brilliant debut it will be strange if Mr. Pachmann does not look into the faces of as large an assemblage tomorrow afternoon as Chickering Hall can well accommodate. The programme, as was the case yesterday, is made up exclusively of Chopin selections.

...el's "Israel in Egypt" ...ives the Handel and Haydn Festival.

Handel's oratorio of "Israel in Egypt," performed on Sunday evening in the presence of a vast audience, brought to a close the ... performances with which the Handel and Haydn Society commemorated its seventy-fifth anniversary. Mr. Zerrahn conducted, Mr. Lang was the organist, and the soloists were Miss Clementine De Vere, Miss Clara Poole, Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr. William Ludwig, and Mr. Myron W. Whitney.

Mr. Handel's great gift of taking somebody's else tune and in the twinkling of an eye winding an harmonic and polyphonic web about it has not been equalled. This faculty was not only the rarest among Mr. Handel's many talents, but he exercised it with extraordinary perseverance. "Israel in Egypt" is certainty his chef d'œuvre in this respect. It is a monumental pasticcio. Where did he get his material? Oh, early Italian cantatas, youthful works of his own, organ fugues of prehistoric Germans, themes from this and that composer, all went into the vast Handelian melting pot. A "Magnificat" by Erba, published in 1690, and a Serenade by Stradella were very nearly completely injected into "Israel."

Nine numbers have been taken from the "Magnificat." Among them are: The chorus, "He is my God"; soprano duet, "The Lord is my strength"; the chorus, "He rebuked the Red Sea"; the fragment, "Thy right hand, O Lord"; the great duet for two basses, "The Lord is a Man of War"; the chorus, "Thou sendeth forth thy wrath"; chorus, "And with a blast of thy nostrils"; duet, "Thou in thy mercy"; chorus, "The earth swallowed them." Six numbers are taken from the Serenade.

The passages from the "Magnificat" went into "Israel" with very little change, but Mr. Flotow's tunes were somewhat "worked." Ah, but Mr. Handel, Händel, Hendel, George Frederic, or Georg Frideric, whichever way Mr. Hagar, Mr. Elson or Mr. Jenks will permit us to spell the mighty magician's name, was a great man!

He compiled "Israel" in twenty-four days. As to the choruses, they are majestic, but a sorrier lot of melodies no immortal composer before or after Mr. Handel ever stole or invented. Then the words of the English version are so unpleasantly realistic; the "bug" chorus of the first part brings a terrible strain on polite society. The Handel and Haydn Society were not guilty of the heinous crime perpetrated by a society at Kiel, Germany, which was reported in the Musikalisches Wochenblatt to have omitted three choruses ("They loathed to drink," "Egypt was glad," and "He is my God"); to have taken the duet "The Lord is my strength and my song" from its proper place and placed it in the first part after "But as for his people"; to have interpolated two songs between the choruses—the air, "It is the Lord that ruleth the sea," from the "Chandos Anthems," before the chorus "He rebuked the Red Sea," and the florid song, "Hallelujah" from "Esther," inserted by special desire of the soprano after the chorus, "Thy right hand, O Lord," which, to our thinking, was perfectly permissible jugglery; nor did it allot the duet, "The Lord is a Man of War," to all the tenors and basses of the chorus, as was done at Crystal Palace under Mr. Barnby.

The performance of "Israel in Egypt" was the best chorally of the week. The intricate polyphonic passages were safely bridged, and that is saying a good deal; there was at times a lack of tone, the basses of the second chorus were inaudible in the florid portions of the chorus "The horse and its rider," and in the chorus "He sent a thick darkness" the bad use of consonants produced a varied assortment of s's; but as a whole the pedestal of the performance was set in the chorus, and it and the conductor deserve all credit. The "attack" was very fine, and the tenors outdid themselves, that held high A natural in "But as for his people" ought to go into the fifth volume of the society's records. In view of the fine work of this department of the chorus we are justified in not mentioning the entrance just in front of the beat of the little old gentleman who, for some forty years more or less, has had this failing (?) must point out the mistake made in singing staccato the line "There was not one of them" in number fourteen; it destroyed all the continuous grandeur of tone the composer intended.

The soloists, considered collectively, were unsatisfactory. The individual excellences were: Mr. Whitney's "Wave from wave," which was the most satisfactory single effort of the whole performance; Miss Poole's singing of "Thou shalt bring them in," and Mr. Ludwig's of "He Measured the waters," met a good average, but were not altogether good. Miss Poole has not been well during the week, and her shortcomings as to style may be condoned. Mr Ludwig's voice is too short for the music assigned the higher bass in "Israel"; this lack was painfully manifested in the duet, "The Lord is a man of war," which, though it won much applause, was comparatively ineffective. Miss De Vere's selection for the soprano solos of "Israel" was a mistake; she is not artist enough in oratorio singing to cope with Mr. Handel's lofty periods. The duet with the alto, "The Lord is my strength," tottered a good deal. Miss De Vere also pushed her voice beyond ... normal limit and it lost in quality. It ... to speak of Mr. Lloyd, who astonished ... by making two serious breaks in the ... "He overthrew" and "he was so ... some temporary ... for it, but ... same it came as a shock.

Everything else Mr. Lloyd did was admirable in style, but his tones were not so free from throatiness as in the "Redemption." There were two pretty incidents last night: Mr. Zerrahn was given a huge basket of flowers by the chorus, and after Miss De Vere's air an old gentleman in the near from rows walked up to the platform and gave her a bunch of lilies of the valley.

Our concluding word on the festival must be brief. The society showed much enterprise in embarking upon so costly a series of performances, and it is gratifying to know that there is a balance of about $2000 on the right side. The scheme of works was a good one, albeit the substitute of something more resolute than Gounod's "Redemption" would have improved it. With the exception of the assignment in "Israel," the allotment of soloists was admirable. Mr. Lloyd's singing entirely justified the expense and trouble it took to get him. We overlooked Mme. Lehmann's performance of the Youth in "Elijah"; we recall it now to agree with the writer of the communication sent to this morning's Post, who declares it to be the most beautiful conception and rendering of the part he ever listened to. And Ludwig's Elijah was as Mendelssohn wished it: "A thorough prophet; such an one as we might need in our own day—strong and zealous and even stern, wrathful and gloomy—a contrast to the court myrmidons and popular rabble, in opposition almost to the whole world, and yet borne as on angels' wings." The Handel and Haydn chorus was never so fine as at present; with the possible exception of the Chicago Apollo Club, which we have not heard, it is by all odds the best in the land. Mr. Zerrahn has done well during his long career with it, but for the future there is need of new blood, methods and ideas. The patronage given the society emphatically justifies Boston's proud position as the choral centre of the country.

DAILY ADVERTISER ...
...ated him with a ... APRIL 15, ...R

The First Pachmann Recitals Yesterday Afternoon.

Chickering Hall should have been crowded to the doors yesterday afternoon when M. Vladimir de Pachmann gave his first Chopin recital. Spite of all his eccentricities this man is a great pianist, and the ill-natured remark of the New Yorkers that he is only a great pianissimist is more witty than truthful. He certainly does not make Chopin mawkish in any degree, and is a standing rebuke to those pianists who feel called upon to shed tears over the keyboard whenever they play any of his works. It is, however, undoubtedly true that M. de Pachmann embellishes his performance with a totally unnecessary series of grimaces and gazes out into the hall with affectionate glances that are uncalled for. He seems to devote too large a share of his attention to developing an entente cordiale between the audience and himself. No one of the general public enjoys M. de Pachmann's playing better than M. de Pachmann himself. I do not know whether the story is true, that at the end of an especially excellent performance, the pianist cried out, with the audience, "Bravo, Pachmann!" but it is certain that he is endeavoring to rival von Bülow as a concert orator, for yesterday he took the entire audience into his confidence from the first number, where he communicated the fact, "Il fait chaud!" to a series of comments on the allegro di concert. Nevertheless, if one closes his eyes to these ill-chosen exhibitions (which lower the dignity of a great artist in the eyes of the public even while they applaud them) one finds a Chopin genius revealed. The rubato is often used in the players interpretations, but this is entirely in accord with the spirit of the composer. It is said of Chopin that he used the rubato so freely that he never played the same composition twice alike, and when he was in one of his jesting moods and was urged to play, he would perform one of his works in an exact tempo, and the effect was ludicrous to those who were accustomed to his free interpretation. M. de Pachmann understands this well, and the true spirit and delicacy of Chopin breathed from every one of the numbers given, spite of his grimaces. The B minor sonata was in just this free, elastic delivery, never übertrieben, always effective. The shading of the two etudes was entirely faultless, and the brilliancy of the Allegro di Concert was most commendable. There were not any slips or false notes to condone in any of the numbers, and I have seldom heard a surer pianist. The careful use of the pedal, too, calls for unmitigated praise. In fact in this opening concert of the series animadversion is silenced. Yet amid all the excellences one may choose the best, and I think that the shorter numbers display the artist better than those cast in a larger and grander mold. The gem of the entire programme was the waltz in D flat major, op. 64, which has never been so deliciously given in Boston. When it was rapturously redemanded the pianist played it over again in a slightly different, yet not less effective vein. The public enthusiasm was constant during the recital, and to a blind man, who could not perceive the affectation of manner, and the gestures a la Jullien, with which the work was garnished, M. de Pachmann would seem the beau ideal of a Chopin interpreter.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

UNION HALL, 18 BOLYSTON STREET.

FIFTH SEASON 1889-90.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin.
Mr. OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin.
Mr. LOUIS SVEČENSKI, Viola.
Mr. ANTON HEKKING, Violoncello.

WITH THE ASSISTANCE OF

Miss ADELE AUS DER OHE, Pianist.

VI. CONCERT.

(LAST OF THE SEASON.)

MONDAY, APRIL 14TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

MOZART. QUARTET for STRINGS, C major, (Köchel 465).
Adagio: Allegro.—
Andante cantabile.—
Menuetto, (Allegretto).—
Allegro molto.

GRIEG. ROMANCE.—(Andantino); from QUARTET in G minor, op. 27.

SCHUBERT. QUINTET in A major, for PIANO, VIOLIN, VIOLA, 'CELLO and BASS. op. 114.
Allegro vivace.—Andante.—Scherzo, (Presto).—
Andante con variazione.—Allegro giusto.
Bass, Mr. GOLDSTEIN.

The Pianoforte is a Steinway.

BOSTON POST, TUESD...
MORNING, APRIL 15,

MR. VLADIMIR DE PACHMANN'S RECITAL.

After yesterday afternoon it is very easy to understand the furore which Mr. de Pachmann's playing has just created in New York. There exist many anecdotes of the extraordinary power which Chopin himself exerted over his listeners when he played his own music. We are told, for example, that on one occasion, when he was travelling through Poland, he began to play upon a rather antiquated piano in the "Post-haus" while the horses were being changed. Landlord, waiters, hostlers, peasants and the like all came crowding into the room; listened with tears in their eyes, and when he left they offered simple little presents to him and carried him to the diligence. Indeed, there does exist a peculiar power, an indescribable mysterious force in his music which appeals most vehemently to people's impressions—if the performer can really make the music speak—and just this Mr. de Pachmann most preëminently succeeds in accomplishing. So Chopin must have thought and felt and played this music himself. This Russian interpreter of the great Slavic piano poet's burning music verses has great technique and an almost faultless gift of phrasing, but these are not the points which chiefly impress the listener—it is the spontaneous truth of his musical intelligence which is overpowering. One cannot for a moment escape the feeling that he really is interpreting the music and truly showing what it means, and this uncommon talent is as delightful as it is unusual. He played the following varied and well-chosen programme:

Sonata, B minor. Ballade, G minor. Nocturne, op. 55, No. 1. Etudes, op. 25, Nos. 2 and 3. Allegrode Concert, A major. Impromptu, A-flat major. Preludes, op. 28, Nos. 21 and 22. Mazourka, op. 41, No. 1. Valse, D-flat major, No. 1. Scherzo, B-flat minor.

It is impossible to speak of this long programme in detail, but it is immediately evident to the connoisseur that the selection was most carefully made to exhibit Chopin's genius in many different moods, and all of them were so exquisitely performed that the interest and enthusiasm of the audience did not flag for an instant. No lover of this wonderful music—which is and always will be a school apart—should miss hearing this artist who talks to you in Chopin's voice and tells you all his deepest secrets. Even words and sentences are sometimes vague, ambiguous and difficult to comprehend, but this Russian's Chopin playing is as clear as crystal.

[111]

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Handel's "Israel in Egypt" Closes the Handel and Haydn Festival.

Handel's oratorio of "Israel in Egypt," performed on Sunday evening in the presence of a vast audience, brought to a close the four performances with which the Handel and Haydn Society commemorated its seventy-fifth anniversary. Mr. Zerrahn conducted, Mr. Lang was the organist, and the soloists were Miss Clementine De Vere, Miss Clara Poole, Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr. William Ludwig, and Mr. Myron W. Whitney.

Mr. Handel's great gift of taking somebody's else tune and in the twinkling of an eye winding an harmonic and polyphonic web about it has not been equalled. This faculty was not only the rarest among Mr. Handel's many talents, but he exercised it with extraordinary perseverance. "Israel in Egypt" is certainty his chef d'œuvre in this respect. It is a monumental pasticcio. Where did he get his material? Oh, early Italian cantatas, youthful works of his own, organ fugues of prehistoric Germans, themes from this and that composer, all went into the vast Handelian melting pot. A "Magnificat" by Erba, published in 1690, and a Serenade by Stradella were very nearly completely injected into "Israel."

Nine numbers have been taken from the "Magnificat." Among them are: The chorus, "He is my God"; soprano duet, "The Lord is my strength"; the chorus, "He rebuked the Red Sea"; the fragment, "Thy right hand, O Lord"; the great duet for two basses, "The Lord is a Man of War"; the chorus, "Thou sendeth forth thy wrath"; chorus, "And with a blast of thy nostrils"; duet, "Thou in thy mercy"; chorus, "The earth swallowed them." Six numbers are taken from the Serenade.

The passages from the "Magnificat" went into "Israel" with very little change, but Mr. Flotow's tunes were somewhat "worked." Ah, but Mr. Handel, Händel, Hendel, George Frederic, or Georg Frideric, whichever way Mr. Hagar, Mr. Elson or Mr. Jenks will permit us to spell the mighty magician's name, was a great man!

He compiled "Israel" in twenty-four days. As to the choruses, they are majestic, but a sorrier lot of melodies no immortal composer before or after Mr. Handel ever stole or invented. Then the words of the English version are so unpleasantly realistic; the "bug" chorus of the first part brings a terrible strain on polite society. The Handel and Haydn Society were not guilty of the heinous crime perpetrated by a society at Kiel, Germany, which was reported in the Musikalisches Wochenblatt to have omitted three choruses ("They loathed to drink," "Egypt was glad," and "He is my God"); to have taken the duet "The Lord is my strength and my song" from its proper place and placed it in the first part after "But as for his people"; to have interpolated two songs between the choruses—the air, "It is the Lord that ruleth the sea," from the "Chandos Anthems," before the chorus "He rebuked the Red Sea," and the florid song, "Hallelujah" from "Esther," inserted by special desire of the soprano after the chorus, "Thy right hand, O Lord," which, to our thinking, was perfectly permissible jugglery; nor did it allot the duet, "The Lord is a Man of War," to all the tenors and basses of the chorus, as was done at Crystal Palace under Mr. Barnby.

The performance of "Israel in Egypt" was the best chorally of the week. The intricate polyphonic passages were safely bridged, and that is saying a good deal; there was at times a lack of tone, the basses of the second chorus were inaudible in the florid portions of the chorus "The horse and its rider," and in the chorus "He sent a thick darkness" the bad use of consonants produced a varied assortment of s's; but as a whole the pedestal of the performance was set in the chorus, and it and the conductor deserve all credit. The "attack" was very fine, and the tenors outdid themselves, that held high A natural in "But as for his people" ought to go into the fifth volume of the society's records. In view of the fine work of this department of the chorus we are justified in not mentioning the entrance just in front of the beat of the little old gentleman who, for some forty years more or less, has had this falling (?) must point out the mistake made in singing staccato the line "There was not one of them" in number fourteen; it destroyed all the continuous grandeur of tone the composer intended.

The soloists, considered collectively, were unsatisfactory. The individual excellences were: Mr. Whitney's "Wave from wave," which was the most satisfactory single effort of the whole performance; Miss Poole's singing of "Thou shalt bring them in," and Mr. Ludwig's of "He Measured the waters," met a good average, but were not altogether good. Miss Poole has not been well during the week, and her shortcomings as to style may be condoned. Mr Ludwig's voice is too short for the music assigned the higher bass in "Israel"; this lack was painfully manifested in the duet, "The Lord is a man of war," which, though it won much applause, was comparatively ineffective. Miss De Vere's selection for the soprano solos of "Israel" was a mistake; she is not artist enough in oratorio singing to cope with Mr. Handel's bold periods. The duet with the alto, "The Lord is my strength," tottered a good deal. Miss De Vere also pushed her voice beyond its normal limit and it lost in quality. It remains to speak of Mr. Lloyd, who astonished us by making two serious breaks in the phrase of "The evening said"; he was so [illegible] it that at the close of the aria he [illegible] by a ringing high [illegible] and the shook [illegible] some temporary excuse for it, but all the same it came as a shock.

Everything else Mr. Lloyd did was admirable in style, but his tones were not so free from throatiness as in the "Redemption." There were two pretty incidents last night: Mr. Zerrahn was given a huge basket of flowers by the chorus, and after Miss De Vere's air an old gentleman in the near from rows walked up to the platform and gave her a bunch of lilies of the valley.

Our concluding word on the festival must be brief. The society showed much enterprise in embarking upon so costly a series of performances, and it is gratifying to know that there is a balance of about $2000 on the right side. The scheme of works was a good one, albeit the substitute of something more resolute than Gounod's "Redemption" would have improved it. With the exception of the assignment in "Israel," the allotment of soloists was admirable. Mr. Lloyd's singing entirely justified the expense and trouble it took to get him. We overlooked Mme. Lehmann's performance of the Youth in "Elijah"; we recall it now to agree with the writer of the communication sent to this morning's Post, who declares it to be the most beautiful conception and rendering of the part he ever listened to. And Ludwig's Elijah was as Mendelssohn wished it: "A thorough prophet; such an one as we might need in our own day—strong and zealous and even stern, wrathful and gloomy—a contrast to the court myrmidons and popular rabble, in opposition almost to the whole world, and yet borne as on angels' wings." The Handel and Haydn chorus was never so fine as at present; with the possible exception of the Chicago Apollo Club, which we have not heard, it is by all odds the best in the land. Mr. Zerrahn has done well during his long career with it, but for the future there is need of new blood, methods and ideas. The patronage given the society emphatically justifies Boston's proud position as the choral centre of the country.

DAILY ADVERTISER T
ated him with a APRIL 15, IE

The First Pachmann Recitals Yesterday Afternoon.

Chickering Hall should have been crowded to the doors yesterday afternoon when M. Vladimir de Pachmann gave his first Chopin recital. Spite of all his eccentricities this man is a great pianist, and the ill-natured remark of the New Yorkers that he is only a great pianissimist is more witty than truthful. He certainly does not make Chopin mawkish in any degree, and is a standing rebuke to those pianists who feel called upon to shed tears over the keyboard whenever they play any of his works. It is, however, undoubtedly true that M. de Pachmann embellishes his performance with a totally unnecessary series of grimaces and gazes out into the hall with affectionate glances that are uncalled for. He seems to devote too large a share of his attention to developing an entente cordiale between the audience and himself. No one of the general public enjoys M. de Pachmann's playing better than M. de Pachmann himself. I do not know whether the story is true, that at the end of an especially excellent performance, the pianist cried out, with the audience, "Bravo, Pachmann!" but it is certain that he is endeavoring to rival von Bülow as a concert orator, for yesterday he took the entire audience into his confidence from the first number, where he communicated the fact, "Il fait chaud!" to a series of comments on the allegro di concert. Nevertheless, if one closes his eyes to these ill-chosen exhibitions (which lower the dignity of a great artist in the eyes of the public even while they applaud them) one finds a Chopin genius revealed. The rubato is often used in the players interpretations, but this is entirely in accord with the spirit of the composer. It is said of Chopin that he used the rubato so freely that he never played the same composition twice alike, and when he was in one of his jesting moods and was urged to play, he would perform one of his works in an exact tempo, and the effect was ludicrous to those who were accustomed to his free interpretation. M. de Pachmann understands this well, and the true spirit and delicacy of Chopin breathed from every one of the numbers given, spite of his grimaces. The B minor sonato was in just this free, elastic delivery, never übertrieben, always effective. The shading of the two etudes was entirely faultless, and the brilliancy of the Allegro di Concert was most commendable. There were not any slips or false notes to condone in any of the numbers, and I have seldom heard a surer pianist. The careful use of the pedal, too, calls for unmitigated praise. In fact in this opening concert of the series animadversion is silenced. Yet amid all the excellences one may choose the best, and I think that the shorter numbers display the artist better than those cast in a larger and grander mold. The gem of the entire programme was the waltz in D flat major, op. 64, which has never been so deliciously given in Boston. When it was rapturously redemanded the pianist played it over again in a slightly different, yet not less effective vein. The public enthusiasm was constant during the recital, and to a blind man, who could not perceive the affectation of manner, and the gestures a la Jullien, with which the work was garnished, M. de Pachmann would seem the beau ideal of a Chopin interpreter.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

UNION HALL, 18 BOLYSTON STREET.

FIFTH SEASON 1889-90.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin.
Mr. OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin.
Mr. LOUIS SVEČENSKI, Viola.
Mr. ANTON HEKKING, Violoncello.
WITH THE ASSISTANCE OF
Miss ADELE AUS DER OHE, Pianist.

VI. CONCERT.

(LAST OF THE SEASON.)

MONDAY, APRIL 14TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

MOZART. QUARTET for STRINGS, C major, (Köchel 465).
Adagio: Allegro.—
Andante cantabile.—
Menuetto, (Allegretto).—
Allegro molto.

GRIEG. ROMANCE.—(Andantino); from QUARTET in G minor, op. 27.

SCHUBERT. QUINTET in A major, for PIANO, VIOLIN, VIOLA, 'CELLO and BASS. op. 114.
Allegro vivace.—Andante.—Scherzo, (Presto).—
Andante con variazione.—Allegro giusto.
Bass, Mr. GOLDSTEIN.

The Pianoforte is a Steinway.

BOSTON POST, TUESD
MORNING, APRIL 15,

MR. VLADIMIR DE PACHMANN'S RECITAL.

After yesterday afternoon it is very easy to understand the furore which Mr. de Pachmann's playing has just created in New York. There exist many anecdotes of the extraordinary power which Chopin himself exerted over his listeners when he played his own music. We are told, for example, that on one occasion, when he was travelling through Poland, he began to play upon a rather antiquated piano in the "Post-haus" while the horses were being changed. Landlord, waiters, hostlers, peasants and the like all came crowding into the room; listened with tears in their eyes, and when he left they offered simple little presents to him and carried him to the diligence. Indeed, there does exist a peculiar power, an indescribable mysterious force in his music which appeals most vehemently to people's impressions—if the performer can really make the music speak—and just this Mr. de Pachmann most preëminently succeeds in accomplishing. So Chopin must have thought and felt and played this music himself. This Russian interpreter of the great Slavic piano poet's burning music verses has great technique and an almost faultless gift of phrasing, but these are not the points which chiefly impress the listener—it is the spontaneous truth of his musical intelligence which is overpowering. One cannot for a moment escape the feeling that he really is interpreting the music and truly showing what it means, and this uncommon talent is as delightful as it is unusual. He played the following varied and well-chosen programme:

Sonata, B minor. Ballade, G minor. Nocturne, op. 55, No. 1. Etudes, op. 25, Nos. 2 and 3. Allegrode Concert, A major. Impromptu, A-flat major. Preludes, op. 28, Nos. 21 and 22. Mazourka, op. 41. No. 1. Valse, D-flat major, No. 1. Scherzo, B-flat minor.

It is impossible to speak of this long programme in detail, but it is immediately evident to the connoisseur that the selection was most carefully made to exhibit Chopin's genius in many different moods, and all of them were so exquisitely performed that the interest and enthusiasm of the audience did not flag for an instant. No lover of this wonderful music—which is and always will be a school apart—should miss hearing this artist who talks to you in Chopin's voice and tells you all his deepest secrets. Even words and sentences are sometimes vague, ambiguous and difficult to comprehend, but this Russian's Chopin playing is as clear as crystal.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Handel's "Israel in Egypt" Closes the Handel and Haydn Festival.

Handel's oratorio of "Israel in Egypt," performed on Sunday evening in the presence of a vast audience, brought to a close the four performances with which the Handel and Haydn Society commemorated its seventy-fifth anniversary. Mr. Zerrahn conducted, Mr. Lang was the organist, and the soloists were Miss Clementine De Vere, Miss Clara Poole, Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr. William Ludwig, and Mr. Myron W. Whitney.

Mr. Handel's great gift of taking somebody's else tune and in the twinkling of an eye winding an harmonic and polyphonic web about it has not been equalled. This faculty was not only the rarest among Mr. Handel's many talents, but he exercised it with extraordinary perseverance. "Israel in Egypt" is certainty his chef d'œuvre in this respect. It is a monumental pasticcio. Where did he get his material? Oh, early Italian cantatas, youthful works of his own, organ fugues of prehistoric Germans, themes from this and that composer, all went into the vast Handelian melting pot. A "Magnificat" by Erba, published in 1690, and a Serenade by Stradella were very nearly completely injected into "Israel."

Nine numbers have been taken from the "Magnificat." Among them are: The chorus, "He is my God"; soprano duet, "The Lord is my strength"; the chorus, "He rebuked the Red Sea"; the fragment, "Thy right hand, O Lord"; the great duet for two basses, "The Lord is a Man of War"; the chorus, "Thou sendeth forth thy wrath"; chorus, "And with a blast of thy nostrils"; duet, "Thou in thy mercy"; chorus, "The earth swallowed them." Six numbers are taken from the Serenade.

The passages from the "Magnificat" went into "Israel" with very little change, but Mr. Flotow's tunes were somewhat "worked." Ah, but Mr. Handel, Händel, Hendel, George Frederic, or Georg Frideric, whichever way Mr. Hagar, Mr. Elson or Mr. Jenks will permit us to spell the mighty magician's name, was a great man!

He compiled "Israel" in twenty-four days. As to the choruses, they are majestic, but a sorrier lot of melodies no immortal composer before or after Mr. Handel ever stole or invented. Then the words of the English version are so unpleasantly realistic; the "bug" chorus of the first part brings a terrible strain on polite society. The Handel and Haydn Society were not guilty of the henious crime perpetrated by a society at Kiel, Germany, which was reported in the Musikalisches Wochenblatt to have omitted three choruses ("They loathed to drink," "Egypt was glad," and "He is my God"); to have taken the duet "The Lord is my strength and my song" from its proper place and placed it in the first part after "But as for his people"; to have interpolated two songs between the choruses—the air, "It is the Lord that ruleth the sea," from the "Chandos Anthems," before the chorus "He rebuked the Red Sea," and the florid song, "Hallelujah" from "Esther," inserted by special desire of the soprano after the chorus, "Thy right hand, O Lord," which, to our thinking, was perfectly permissible jugglery; nor did it allot the duet, "The Lord is a Man of War," to all the tenors and basses of the chorus, as was done at Crystal Palace under Mr. Barnby.

The performance of "Israel in Egypt" was the best chorally of the week. The intricate polyphonic passages were safely bridged, and that is saying a good deal; there was at times a lack of tone, the basses of the second chorus were inaudible in the florid portions of the chorus "The horse and its rider," and in the chorus "He sent a thick darkness" the bad use of consonants produced a varied assortment of s's; but as a whole the pedestal of the performance was set in the chorus, and if and the conductor deserve all credit. The "attack" was very fine, and the tenors outdid themselves, that held high A natural in "But as for his people" ought to go into the fifth volume of the society's records. In view of the fine work of this department of the chorus we are justified in not mentioning the entrance just in front of the beat of the little old gentleman who, for some forty years more or less, has had this failing (?) must point out the mistake made in singing staccato the line "There was not one of them" in number fourteen; it destroyed all the continuous grandeur of tone the composer intended.

The soloists, considered collectively, were unsatisfactory. The individual excellences were: Mr. Whitney's "Wave from wave," which was the most satisfactory single effort of the whole performance; Miss Poole's singing of "Thou shalt bring them in," and Mr. Ludwig's of "He Measured the waters," met a good average, but were not altogether good. Miss Poole has not been well during the week, and her shortcomings as to style may be condoned. Mr Ludwig's voice is too short for the music assigned the higher bass in "Israel"; this lack was painfully manifested in the duet, "The Lord is a man of war," which, though it won much applause, was comparatively ineffective. Miss De Vere's selection for the soprano solos of "Israel" was a mistake; she is not artist enough in oratorio singing to cope with Mr. Handel's bold periods. The duet with the alto, "The Lord is my strength," tottered a good deal. Miss De Vere also pushed her voice beyond its normal limit and it lost in quality. It remains to speak of Mr. Lloyd, who astonished us by making two serious breaks in the phrase of "The evening said"; he was so put out by it that at the close of the aria he [illegible] to make amends by a ringing high [illegible] was fine, and the audience was delighted, but the [illegible] shook their heads. Of course, there was some temporary excuse for it, but all the same it came as a shock.

Everything else Mr. Lloyd did was admirable in style, but his tones were not so free from throatiness as in the "Redemption." There were two pretty incidents last night: Mr. Zerrahn was given a huge basket of flowers by the chorus, and after Miss De Vere's air an old gentleman in the near from rows walked up to the platform and gave her a bunch of lilies of the valley.

Our concluding word on the festival must be brief. The society showed much enterprise in embarking upon so costly a series of performances, and it is gratifying to know that there is a balance of about $2000 on the right side. The scheme of works was a good one, albeit the substitute of something more resolute than Gounod's "Redemption" would have improved it. With the except ion of the assignment in "Israel," the allotment of soloists was admirable. Mr. Lloyd's singing entirely justified the expense and trouble it took to get him. We overlooked Mme. Lehmann's performance of the Youth in "Elijah"; we recall it now to agree with the writer of the communication sent to this morning's Post, who declares it to be the most beautiful conception and rendering of the part he ever listened to. And Ludwig's Elijah was as Mendelssohn wished it: "A thorough prophet; such an one as we might need in our own day—strong and zealous and even stern, wrathful and gloomy—a contrast to the court myrmidons and popular rabble, in opposition almost to the whole world, and yet borne as on angels' wings." The Handel and Haydn chorus was never so fine as at present; with the possible exception of the Chicago Apollo Club, which we have not heard, it is by all odds the best in the land. Mr. Zerrahn has done well during his long career with it, but for the future there is need of new blood, methods and ideas. The patronage given the society emphatically justifies Boston's proud position as the choral centre of the country.

DAILY ADVERTISER [illegible]

[illegible]ted him with a APRIL 15, [illegible]E

The First Pachmann Recitals Yesterday Afternoon.

Chickering Hall should have been crowded to the doors yesterday afternoon when M. Vladimir de Pachmann gave his first Chopin recital. Spite of all his eccentricities this man is a great pianist, and the ill-natured remark of the New Yorkers that he is only a great pianissimist is more witty than truthful. He certainly does not make Chopin mawkish in any degree, and is a standing rebuke to those pianists who feel called upon to shed tears over the keyboard whenever they play any of his works. It is, however, undoubtedly true that M. de Pachmann embellishes his performance with a totally unnecessary series of grimaces and gazes out into the hall with affectionate glances that are uncalled for. He seems to devote too large a share of his attention to developing an entente cordiale between the audience and himself. No one of the general public enjoys M. de Pachmann's playing better than M. de Pachmann himself. I do not know whether the story is true, that at the end of an especially excellent performance, the pianist cried out, with the audience, "Bravo, Pachmann!" but it is certain that he is endeavoring to rival von Bülow as a concert orator, for yesterday he took the entire audience into his confidence from the first number, where he communicated the fact, "Il fait chaud!" to a series of comments on the allegro di concert. Nevertheless, if one closes his eyes to these ill-chosen exhibitions (which lower the dignity of a great artist in the eyes of the public even while they applaud them) one finds a Chopin genius revealed. The rubato is often used in the players interpretations, but this is entirely in accord with the spirit of the composer. It is said of Chopin that he used the rubato so freely that he never played the same composition twice alike, and when he was in one of his jesting moods and was urged to play, he would perform one of his works in an exact tempo, and the effect was ludicrous to those who were accustomed to his free interpretation. M. de Pachmann understands this well, and the true spirit and delicacy of Chopin breathed from every one of the numbers given, spite of his grimaces. The B minor sonato was in just this free, elastic delivery, never übertrieben, always effective. The shading of the two etudes was entirely faultless, and the brilliancy of the Allegro di Concert was most commendable. There were not any slips or false notes to condone in any of the numbers, and I have seldom heard a surer pianist. The careful use of the pedal, too, calls for unmitigated praise. In fact in this opening concert of the series animadversion is silenced. Yet amid all the excellences one may choose the best, and I think that the shorter numbers display the artist better than those cast in a larger and grander mold. The gem of the entire programme was the waltz in D flat major, op. 64, which has never been so deliciously given in Boston. When it was rapturously redemanded the pianist played it over again in a slightly different, yet not less effective vein. The public enthusiasm was constant during the recital, and to a blind man, who could not perceive the affectation of manner, and the gestures a la Jullien, with which the work was garnished, M. de Pachmann would seem the beau ideal of a Chopin interpreter.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

UNION HALL, 18 BOLYSTON STREET.

FIFTH SEASON 1889-90.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin.
Mr. OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin.
Mr. LOUIS SVECENSKI, Viola.
Mr. ANTON HEKKING, Violoncello.
WITH THE ASSISTANCE OF
Miss ADELE AUS DER OHE, Pianist.

VI. CONCERT.

(LAST OF THE SEASON.)

MONDAY, APRIL 14TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

MOZART. QUARTET for STRINGS, C major, (Köchel 465).
Adagio; Allegro.—
Andante cantabile.—
Menuetto, (Allegretto).—
Allegro molto.

GRIEG. ROMANCE.—(Andantino); from QUARTET in G minor, op. 27.

SCHUBERT. QUINTET in A major, for PIANO, VIOLIN, VIOLA, 'CELLO and BASS. op. 114.
Allegro vivace.—Andante.—Scherzo, (Presto).—
Andante con variazione.—Allegro giusto.
Bass, Mr. GOLDSTEIN.

The Pianoforte is a Steinway.

BOSTON POST, TUESDA[illegible]

MORNING, APRIL 15, [illegible]

MR. VLADIMIR DE PACHMANN'S RECITAL.

After yesterday afternoon it is very easy to understand the furore which Mr. de Pachmann's playing has just created in New York. There exist many anecdotes of the extraordinary power which Chopin himself exerted over his listeners when he played his own music. We are told, for example, that on one occasion, when he was travelling through Poland, he began to play upon a rather antiquated piano in the "Post-haus" while the horses were being changed. Landlord, waiters, hostlers, peasants and the like all came crowding into the room; listened with tears in their eyes, and when he left they offered simple little presents to him and carried him to the diligence. Indeed, there does exist a peculiar power, an indescribable mysterious force in his music which appeals most vehemently to people's impressions—if the performer can really make the music speak—and just this Mr. de Pachmann most preëminently succeeds in accomplishing. So Chopin must have thought and felt and played this music himself. This Russian interpreter of the great Slavic piano poet's burning music verses has great technique and an almost faultless gift of phrasing, but these are not the points which chiefly impress the listener—it is the spontaneous truth of his musical intelligence which is overpowering. One cannot for a moment escape the feeling that he really is interpreting the music and truly showing what it means, and this uncommon talent is as delightful as it is unusual. He played the following varied and well-chosen programme:

Sonata, B minor. Ballade, G minor. Nocturne, op. 55, No. 1. Etudes, op. 25, Nos. 2 and 3. Allegrode Concert, A major. Impromptu, A-flat major. Preludes, op. 28, Nos. 21 and 22. Mazourka, op. 41, No. 1. Valse, D-flat major, No. 1. Scherzo, B-flat minor.

It is impossible to speak of this long programme in detail, but it is immediately evident to the connoisseur that the selection was most carefully made to exhibit Chopin's genius in many different moods, and all of them were so exquisitely performed that the interest and enthusiasm of the audience did not flag for an instant. No lover of this wonderful music—which is and always will be a school apart—should miss hearing this artist who talks to you in Chopin's voice and tells you all his deepest secrets. Even words and sentences are sometimes vague, ambiguous and difficult to comprehend, but this Russian's Chopin playing is as clear as crystal.

[111]

Six quartets, composed in Vienna during the years 1782-85, and dedicated to his master, Josef Haydn, are the highest expression of Mozart's genius in this form. The quartet in C major (465 K) was the last one of these written. In number, Mozart's quartets are fewer than Haydn's, though Mozart was the more rapid writer, and both lived in Vienna at a time when chamber music was earnestly followed. As Haydn (who gave the quartet characteristic form) was at first met with suspicion, so likewise Mozart—his follower and contemporary, who with settled purpose, renounced the genial master's fanciful style (notably in the quartets 1782–85) for one more broad—found himself misunderstood. A kind critic (Vienna 1787) said: "It is a pity that in his truly artistic and beautiful compositions, Mozart should carry his effort after originality so far, to the detriment of the sentiment and heart of his works. His new quartets, dedicated to Haydn, are much too highly spiced to be palatable for any length of time." These are strange words to the generation who listen to Schubert, Schumann and Brahms. Among musicians and connoisseurs the new quartets were at first rejected. Inaccurate, some said, contrary to all rule and euphony, while the introduction to the one in C major produced a veritable riot among the critics, Haydn merely saying that, "if Mozart wrote it, he must have had his reasons."

In his great work on Mozart, Otto Jahn treats of the quartets with singular clearness, and the exhaustive character of his research is everywhere shown. To quote him will be profitable. Of the six quartets, he says: "An equal wealth of characterization and technical elaboration meets us in comparison of the separate movements. The ground-plan of the first movement is the usual one, and the centre of gravity is always the working out at the beginning of the second part, which is therefore distinguished by its length as a principal portion of the movement. The working out of each quartet is peculiar to itself . . . in the C major quartet the treatment of the principal subject is indicated at once, but the importance of the modest theme is only made apparent by the harmonic and contrapuntal art of its working out, leading to the expressive climax of the coda and conclusion. The slow movements of the quartets are the mature fruit of deep feeling and masterly skill. . . . The crown of them all in delicacy of form and depth of expression is the andante of the last quartet, in C major; it belongs to those wonderful manifestations of genius which are only of the earth in so far as they take effect upon human minds. . . . The minuets are characteristic of Mozart's tendencies as opposed to Haydn's. . . . Haydn's are the product of a laughter-loving, national life, Mozart's give the tone of good society. . . . The finales have more meaning and emphasis than has hitherto been the case in Mozart's instrumental compositions. Three of them are in rondo form—the C major being one—quick, easy-flowing movements, rich in graceful motifs and interesting features in the working out." Referring in particular to the C major quartet, Jahn says: "The frame of mind expressed in it is a noble, manly cheerfulness, rising in the andante to an almost supernatural serenity. The sharp accents of the first and second movements, the struggling agony of the trio in the minuet, the wonderful depth of beauty in the subject of the finale, startling us by its entry, first in E flat and then in A flat major, are perhaps the most striking illustrations of this; but the introdnction stands forth as an element which gives birth to all the happy serenity of the work. The contrast between the troubled depressed phrase, and the shrill, agitated one, has a direct effect upon the hearer; both phrases have one solution. The manner in which they are opposed to each other and the devices by which their opposition is thrown into strong relief, are of unusual but by no means unjustifiable harshness. But the goal is not reached by one bound; no sooner does serenity seem to be attained than the recurrence of the b draws the clouds together again, and peace and the power of breathing and moving freely are only won by slow and painful degrees." (Second performance at Kneisel Concerts.)

Edward Grieg is a true Norseman. "My native place," he says, "is Bergen, and my home is still in the neighborhood of that town. I passed my early childhood among some of the grandest scenery of the North, and ever since I can remember has the beauty of my country impressed me as something wonderful and magnificent beyond expression. It is our mountains, our lakes and forests which have influenced my work far more than any human being has done, and even now, though I am over forty (I was born in 1843), they have the self-same power over me. My musical education up to my fifteenth year was solely in the hands of my mother, who was a very good pianist indeed, and who was very careful in her teaching. I remember one amusing scene at school, when I was about nine years old, and when my first composition failed to find favor in the eyes of my master. We were having a German lesson, and every pupil was supposed to bring a bulky dictionary to school. I had forgotten mine, and was duly scolded by the teacher, when the boy who sat next to me burst out, 'He hasn't got his dictionary, but he has got something else. He has a piece of music which he himself has written.' It had to be produced, and the verdict was that I would far better leave such rubbish at home and think of my lessons. I dare say it was rubbish. At all events, it does not exist any more."

Schubert's pianoforte quintet, op. 114, contains as the subject of the andantino, Schubert's own lied, "Die Forelle." Grove says that Schubert achieved in the same feat which is somewhere ascribed to Mozart, of writing out the separate parts without first making a score, and no doubt played the pianoforte part by heart. The quintet, which his biographers pass hastily over, was composed at a time when Schubert was comparatively happy. It is an early work—his best chamber music, the quartets in D minor and G major, came later—and was written during a summer holiday spent with loving friends. (Second performance at Kneisel Concerts.)

SUMMARY OF WORKS PERFORMED AT SIX CONCERTS. SEASON OF 1889-1890.

BEETHOVEN. Four Scotch Songs.
" Piano Trio, D, op. 70, No. 1.
" Piano Trio, B flat, op. 97.
" String Quartet, C minor, op. 18, No. 4.
" String Quartet, C, op. 59. No. 3.

BRAHMS. String Quartet, B flat, op. 67.
" String Quintet, F, op. 88.
" Song. "An die Tauben."

CHADWICK. Piano Quintet, E flat.

FOOTE. Piano and Violin Sonata, G minor, op. 20. (New.)

GREIG. Romance from String Quartet, G minor, op. 27.

HAYDN. String Quartet in G, op. 33, No. 5.

LISZT. Song. "Die Lorelei."

MOSZKOWSKI. Song. "Schlaf Bübchen Schlaf."

MOZART. String Quartet, C. (K 465.)

PRESSER. Song. "By the Danube."

SCHUBERT. Piano Quintet, A, op. 114.
" String Quartet, D minor.
" String Quintet, C, op. 163.

SCHUMANN. Song. "The Almond Tree."

VOLKMANN. String Quartet, E minor, op. 35, No. 4.

WELD. Adagio from String Quartet, C.

T. WOLFF. Song. "Tuscan Song."

G. H. W.

...; to have interpolated two songs between the choruses—the air, "It is the Lord that ruleth the sea," from the "Chandos Anthems," before the chorus "He rebuked the Red Sea," and the florid song, "Hallelujah" from "Esther," inserted by special desire of the soprano after the chorus, "Thy right hand, O Lord," which, to our thinking, was perfectly permissible jugglery; nor did it allot the duet, "The Lord is a Man of War," to all the tenors and basses of the chorus, as was done at Crystal Palace under Mr. Barnby.

The performance of "Israel in Egypt" was the best chorally of the week. The intricate polyphonic passages were safely bridged, and that is saying a good deal; there was at times a lack of tone, the basses of the second chorus were inaudible in the florid portions of the chorus "The horse and its rider," and in the chorus "He sent a thick darkness" the bad use of consonants produced a varied assortment of s's; but as a whole the pedestal of the performance was set in the chorus, and it and the conductor deserve all credit. The "attack" was very fine, and the tenors outdid themselves, that held high A natural in "But as for his people" ought to go into the fifth volume of the society's records. In view of the fine work of this department of the chorus we are justified in not mentioning the entrance just in front of the beat of the little old gentleman who, for some forty years more or less, has had this failing (?) must point out the mistake made in singing staccato the line "There was not one of them" in number fourteen; it destroyed all the continuous grandeur of tone the composer intended.

The soloists, considered collectively, were unsatisfactory. The individual excellences were: Mr. Whitney's "Wave from wave," which was the most satisfactory single effort of the whole performance; Miss Poole's singing of "Thou shalt bring them in," and Mr. Ludwig's of "He Measured the waters," met a good average, but were not altogether good. Miss Poole has not been well during the week, and her shortcomings as to style may be condoned. Mr Ludwig's voice is too short for the music assigned the higher bass in "Israel"; this lack was painfully manifested in the duet, "The Lord is a man of war," which, though it won much applause, was comparatively ineffective. Miss De Vere's selection for the soprano solos of "Israel" was a mistake; she is not artist enough in oratorio singing to cope with Mr. Handel's grand periods. The duet with the alto, "The Lord is my strength," tottered a good deal. Miss De Vere also pushed her voice beyond its natural limit and it lost in quality. It seems to speak of Mr. Lloyd, who astonished by making two serious breaks in the [illegible] he was so

...of grimaces and gazes out into the hall with affectionate glances that are uncalled for. He seems to devote too large a share of his attention to developing an entente cordiale between the audience and himself. No one of the general public enjoys M. de Pachmann's playing better than M. de Pachmann himself. I do not know whether the story is true, that at the end of an especially excellent performance, the pianist cried out, with the audience, "Bravo, Pachmann!" but it is certain that he is endeavoring to rival von Bülow as a concert orator, for yesterday he took the entire audience into his confidence from the first number, where he communicated the fact, "Il fait chaud!" to a series of comments on the allegro di concert. Nevertheless, if one closes his eyes to these ill-chosen exhibitions (which lower the dignity of a great artist in the eyes of the public even while they applaud them) one finds a Chopin genius revealed. The rubato is often used in the players interpretations, but this is entirely in accord with the spirit of the composer. It is said of Chopin that he used the rubato so freely that he never played the same composition twice alike, and when he was in one of his jesting moods and was urged to play, he would perform one of his works in an exact tempo, and the effect was ludicrous to those who were accustomed to his free interpretation. M. de Pachmann understands this well, and the true spirit and delicacy of Chopin breathed from every one of the numbers given, spite of his grimaces. The B minor sonata was in just this free, elastic delivery, never übertrieben, always effective. The shading of the two etudes was entirely faultless, and the brilliancy of the Allegro di Concert was most commendable. There were not any slips or false notes to condone in any of the numbers, and I have seldom heard a surer pianist. The careful use of the pedal, too, calls for unmitigated praise. In fact in this opening concert of the series animadversion is silenced. Yet amid all the excellences one may choose the best, and I think that the shorter numbers display the artist better than those cast in a larger and grander mold. The gem of the entire programme was the waltz in D flat major, op. 64, which has never been so deliciously given in Boston. When it was rapturously redemanded the pianist played it over again in a slightly different, yet not less effective vein. The public enthusiasm was constant during the recital, and to a blind man, who could not perceive the affectation of manner, and the gestures a la Jullien, with which the work was garnished, M. de Pachmann would seem the beau ideal of a Chopin interpreter.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

BOSTON POST, TUESDA...
MORNING, APRIL 15,

MR. VLADIMIR DE PACHMANN'S RECITAL.

After yesterday afternoon it is very easy to understand the furore which Mr. de Pachmann's playing has just created in New York. There exist many anecdotes of the extraordinary power which Chopin himself exerted over his listeners when he played his own music. We are told, for example, that on one occasion, when he was travelling through Poland, he began to play upon a rather antiquated piano in the "Post-haus" while the horses were being changed. Landlord, waiters, hostlers, peasants and the like all came crowding into the room; listened with tears in their eyes, and when he left they offered simple little presents to him and carried him to the diligence. Indeed, there does exist a peculiar power, an indescribable mysterious force in his music which appeals most vehemently to people's impressions—if the performer can really make the music speak—and just this Mr. de Pachmann most preëminently succeeds in accomplishing. So Chopin must have thought and felt and played this music himself. This Russian interpreter of the great Slavic piano poet's burning music verses has great technique and an almost faultless gift of phrasing, but these are not the points which chiefly impress the listener—it is the spontaneous truth of his musical intelligence which is overpowering. One cannot for a moment escape the feeling that he really is interpreting the music and truly showing what it means, and this uncommon talent is as delightful as it is unusual. He played the following varied and well-chosen programme:

Sonata, B minor. Ballade, G minor. Nocturne, op. 55, No. 1. Etudes, op. 25, Nos. 2 and 3. Allegro de Concert, A major. Impromptu, A-flat major. Preludes, op. 28, Nos. 21 and 22. Mazourka, op. 41, No. 1. Valse, D-flat major, No. 1. Scherzo, B-flat minor.

It is impossible to speak of this long programme in detail, but it is immediately evident to the connoisseur that the selection was most carefully made to exhibit Chopin's genius in many different moods, and all of them were so exquisitely performed that the interest and enthusiasm of the audience did not flag for an instant. No lover of this wonderful music—which is and always will be a school apart—should miss hearing this artist who talks to you in Chopin's voice and tells you all his deepest secrets. Even words and sentences are sometimes vague, ambiguous and difficult to comprehend, but this Russian's Chopin playing is as clear as crystal.

[111]

[illegible]

[illegible], APRIL 14, 1890.

DE PACHMANN'S RECITALS.

The advent of a pianist who can command a financial success in these days is an event of so rare an occurrence that it calls for prominent mention. Vladimir de Pachmann has done this, and he has accomplished it by his merits as a player, unaided by the arts of the professional manager, his appearance having been made with hardly more than a stereotyped announcement of his coming, coupled with the statement that he would confine his recitals to the works of his favorite composer, Chopin. His programmes have been made evidently with a view to affording the widest possible range within the limit set, and also to afford a hearing of many compositions by this composer that seldom appear upon the concert programmes of the day. Yesterday afternoon, at Chickering Hall, a large audience listened to the first of the three programmes announced here, the numbers played being as follows:

1. Sonata, op. 58.
2. Ballade, op. 23.
3. Nocturne, op. 55.
4. Etudes, op. 25. (Nos. 2 and 3.)
5. Allegro de concert, op. 46.
6. Impromptu, op. 29.
7. Preludes, op. 28. (Nos. 21 and 22.)
8. Mazourka, op. 41. (No. 1.)
9. Valse, op. 64. (No. 1.)
10. Scherzo, op. 31.

Vladimir de Pachmann is not a great artist, but he is a thoroughly enjoyable one. He may not command the admiration that a man of broader intellectuality and more solid musical ability receives, but he has merits as a pianist that are well calculated to make a marked impression upon the average concert patron, and he certainly accomplished this desired result in his first effort in this city. His personal and artistic characteristics are peculiarly suited to the playing of the romantic music of Chopin, and whatever exception may be taken to his manner or methods it can but be admitted that he is a most charming interpreter of the compositions chosen for his present series of concerts. In style he more nearly resembles Joseffy when he was first heard in this country than any player of the present period, and he gains his success by much the same means as were used so successfully by Joseffy. With all his ability as a pianist, it is doubtful if De Pachmann would create the impression he does without exercising his faculty of winning an audience by taking them into his confidence, and, by a look or gesture, calling their attention to the points he makes in playing. He is an adept at this sort of stage business, and his success in this line at his concert yesterday quite captured his audience. The sympathies of the feminine attendants—and nine out of ten were of this sex, were immediately engaged by his remark, "It ees zo hot," after the opening movement of the sonata, and he lost no opportunity to disarm criticism by a look of disgust whenever a slip of any sort occurred in his playing. He has the key board under marvellous control in the production of the gossamer like tones which were such a characteristic of Josseffy in his earlier years here, but his playing lacks character and force wherever these qualities are demanded. His touch is faultlessly clear and pearly, even in passages of lightning-like rapidity, and he produces at times a singing tone of velvety softness which both surprises and charms the hearer. Whatever this pianist may be from the standard of calm criticism, his power to please and charm an audience cannot be denied, and so his debut here was an admitted success. He plays again at Chickering Hall on Wednesday and Thursday afternoons in other Chopin programmes.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The closing concert of the season's series by the Kneisel string quartet was given at Union Hall last evening, the assisting artist being Miss Adele Aus Der Ohe, pianist, and the programme including the quartet in C major, Mozart; second movement from the quartet in G minor, Grieg, and quintet (Forrellen), Schubert. The works chosen for the evening again proved the excellent judgment of Mr. Franz Kneisel as a programme maker, and the performance of the several members was in keeping with the high standard that has always been maintained in the concerts by this organization. Miss Aus der Ohe gave excellent assistance in the Schubert quintet, proving herself as satisfying in ensemble playing as she is as a soloist. The concerts of the season thus ended have reached the highest point of excellence known here in the line of chamber music performances, and have gained a substantial financial support, which insures their continuance in the future under the same auspices.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

THURSDAY MORNING, APRIL 17, 1890.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Second De Pachmann Recital Yesterday Afternoon.

At Chickering Hall, yesterday afternoon, Vladimir de Pachmann gave the second instalment of evidence that he is the most consummate of Chopin interpreters. There was a large audience present, and an amount of enthusiasm was evinced that is rarely seen at a Boston piano recital. The programme was a well-selected one, and was calculated to display to best advantage the great virtuosity of the pianist, as well as his fine appreciation for the master he reveals. The same mannerisms appeared in the player's methods, but they grow less offensive on acquaintance, and may be put down as arising from his intense interest in his work. It should be said here that De Pachmann was certainly not at his best on Monday, and that yesterday's glorious performance was a revelation to the critics, who were not entirely disposed at first to rank him as the greatest player of Chopin.

The concert began with the fantasie, op. 49, and gave no decided promise of the splendid achievements that were to follow. Nor, indeed, did the sonata, op. 35, nor the polonaise, op. 26, which came next, though the sherzo of the sonata was crisply and delicately done. Evidently De Pachmann has his moods, and the glories of today may be partial disappointments tomorrow. But when the great ballade, op. 47, was reached it became evident enough that a master genius was at the piano, and that such a superbly romantic and technically faultless rendering of the work had never before been heard in this city. The no turne op 27 which followed was also played with great feeling, never degenerating into sentimentalism, and the impromptu op. 35 was most satisfactory. Then came the triumph of the afternoon in the shape of the etude op. 25, with its extremely difficult continuous double trill. This was played with the most perfect smoothness and finish, and aroused a tremendous amount of enthusiasm among the auditors, who demanded and obtained an encore. The recital closed with the valse op. 42, which was all that could be desired.

Boston Evening Transcript.

MONDAY, APRIL 14, 1890.

MR. DE PACHMANN'S RECITAL.

Mr. Vladimir de Pachmann gave the first of his three Chopin recitals in Chickering Hall yesterday afternoon, the programme being as follows:

Sonata in B minor, Op. 58.
Ballade in G minor, Op. 23.
Nocturne in F minor, Op. 55. No. 1.
Etudes in F minor and F major, Op. 25, Nos. 2 and 3.
Allegro de Concert in A, Op. 46.
Impromptu in A-flat, Op. 29.
Preludes in B-flat and G minor, Op. 28, Nos. 21 and 22.
Mazurka in C-sharp minor, Op. 41, No. 1.
Waltz in D-flat, Op. 64, No. 1.
Scherzo in B-flat minor, Op. 31.

Mr. de Pachmann is so unusual a pianist in many respects that one does not quite know how to foot him up artistically after but a single recital. His wonderfully clear and fluent technique calls for nothing but admiration; but a wonderful technique is nowadays as much of a sine qua non with pianists of world-wide reputation as an amazing mastery over the art of orchestration is with modern French composers. His technique alone does not differentiate him from other great living pianists; in this matter perfection is to be expected.

There is, however, one trait in him that does distinguish him from most of the more famous heroes of the keyboard whom we have heard during the past few years, and one which peculiarly fits him for being a Chopin player: he is always mindful of producing a pure and beautiful tone from the pianoforte; he never pounds, nor strikes through his tone. He does not impute to the pianoforte more than it can legitimately do.

Specially, as a Chopin player, however, he makes one curious impression. It almost seems as if he must have studied some of the prevailing faults in the average Chopin playing of today, and then have done his best to push the diametric opposite of these faults ad absurdum. For instance, it has been noticed of more than one pianist of late how, in playing Chopin, undue prominence was given to the left hand, either in the way of over-emphasizing repeated chords in the middle of the keyboard (thus giving a mere harmonic accompaniment too much value in relation to the melody), or else by thundering down in the bass, to the utter extinction of what is played in the right hand. Mr. de Pachmann does just the opposite: his left hand is often all but inaudible. Of his moderate treatment of the middle parts in the harmony (where the accompaniment is purely homophonic) one can speak only in high praise; but in many passages, like the greater part of the D-flat Waltz, or that glorious cantilena in D-flat major in the first part of the B-flat minor Scherzo, you hear virtually no bass at all. This is almost as bad as the other way! Again, as if in protest against that frantic pounding and thundering in which some players are wont to indulge themselves, making the music sound as if it had been written by the avenging Furies, instead of by Chopin, Mr. de Pachmann pushes pianissimo effects fairly to excess. During the first third of the recital one hardly heard a real fortissimo.

In the matter of interpretation Mr. de Pachmann is among the freest of the free. At times he will not even allow Chopin the right to his own expression marks, but substitutes staccato for legato, pianissimo for forte, and the like, with the utmost coolness. Now, as in parts of the G minor Ballade, he will positively bewilder you with the rapidly shifting variety of effects he heaps upon the music, and again, as in the slow movement of the sonata, you stand amazed at the complete monotony of his playing.

Yet with and in spite of all this, the man has great magnetism and an indescribable charm. It is a very sophisticated, artificial, hot-house sort of fascination, if you will; we could find no touch of genuine, wholesome Nature in it, nor any of that equally genuine morbidness of feeling from which Chopin himself was by no means free; but it is undeniably fascinating, for all that. Its worst side is its all too evident seeming affectation. All those wonderful salon airs and graces in phrasing made one think of Herz, Hünten and writers of that ilk, far more than of the warm-feeling and sincere Chopin. We have rarely heard a pianist take the art of being charming so seriously; he seemed to be playing to all the pretty women in the audience. At moments he made Chopin sound absolutely coquettish. But his great merit of always playing the pianoforte like a pianoforte, and not like an orchestra, the invariable beauty of his tone, the exquisite effects he produces, still remain. We have seldom heard a player in such complete sympathy with the nature of his instrument.

Boston Post

THURSDAY MORNING, APRIL 17, 1890

THE SECOND PACHMANN CHOPIN RECITAL.

This was again a very delightful concert. One cannot always agree with the idea of this extraordinary pianist, and he occasionally falls wholly short of making the least effect. For example, his playing of the celebrated marche funèbre, from the sonata, op. 35, was anything but agreeable, and did not at all move the audience, but this is a mere detail of no importance, for his playing in some places was so simply entrancing that he might have easily redeemed all the failures of his life in five minutes at the piano. His playing of the celebrated etude in thirds (op. 25, No. 6) is probably the most remarkable pianistic tour-de-force which has ever been heard in this city, and it is to be hoped that he will repeat it this afternoon. Again, the A flat song or ballade, op. 67, was played in a manner that fairly brought down the house. His pianissimo touch is almost fabulous; it gets so very soft that one hardly expects to hear the next note at all, and yet it is all perfectly clear; and opposed to this, he has also a very fine, virile and clear-cut fortissimo, but, as aforesaid, his mastery of his art lies in his beautiful interpretation rather than in his astounding technique. This afternoon (his last appearance) he plays, among other things, the Fantasie Impromptu and the great polonaise, op. 53.

ARTHUR WELD.

Boston Daily [illegible]

TUESDAY, APRIL 15, 1890.

The Kneisel Quartet Concert.

The sixth and last concert of the season by the Kneisel Quartet took place at Union Hall Monday evening, Miss Aus der Ohe assisting.

The following programme was given: Mozart, Quartet for Strings, C major; Grieg, Romance from Quartet in G minor, op. 27; Schubert, Quintet in A major, op. 114. The contrasting elements in this programme afforded ample opportunity for the display of skill and versatility which have come to be expected from this talented quartet of players. The Mozart Quartet and Schubert Quintet, both of which were given for the second time, are characteristic of their composers, the first revealing Mozart's tendency to withdraw from the more florid school of quartet-writing, of which Haydn was then one of the leading exponents—and the latter introducing in the third movement the simple but beautiful theme from his own "Die Forelle," thus showing his proneness to remain in the field of German lieder wherein his talents have made him the compeer of Schumann and Franz. The Grieg Romance abounds in sharp transitions of key, broken rythms and unexpected intervals, which suggested that the composer's mind was colored not only by the natural scenery of his native Bergen, but the Norse mythology as well. The romance proper then begins to assume form upon the three higher stringed instruments, its suave flowing melody being in strong contrast to the rugged earlier passages. The quartet played throughout with exquisite finish, shading and unity of sentiment. Miss Ous der Ohe did not find in the piano-score of the quintet opportunity for the full exhibition of her virtuosity, but nevertheless showed in her ensemble-playing, a commendable willingness to subordinate her instrument to its true proportional value in the combined effect. That this accomplished young player has long been possessed of the most thorough technique and ample resources, is patent to all—that she is now content to sink her personality in order to secure the highest ends of music, is an earnest of the mellower and maturer art which will surely be hers and place her in the foremost ranks not only of pianists but musicians.

E. H. G.

De Pachmann, Pianist.

The first of Vladimir De Pachmann's three concerts, devoted to the pianoforte music of Chopin, was given yesterday afternoon in Chickering Hall. The programme: Sonata, op. 58; ballade, op. 23; nocturne, op. 55; etudes, op. 25 (Nos. 2 and 3); allegro de concert, op. 46; impromptu, op. 29; preludes, op. 28 (Nos. 21 and 22); mazourka, op. 41 (No. 1); valse, op. 64 (No. 1); scherzo, op. 31. Here, indeed, is a poet player. De Pachmann is not imperious, like Rubinstein, nor the bulwark of intellectuality Von Buelow is; he is gentle, tender and caressing. With technique ample and consummate he makes you forget the intricacies of the structure of what he plays, because of the charm with which he adorns it. Then, too, his powerful personality exerts an influence. The man loves his music and it is no wonder that he takes the audience into his confidence as he passes over some particularly interesting or expressive phrase. There is no question about De Pachmann's beautiful piano playing, to a consideration of which we shall return. The large and cultivated audience of yesterday could scarce contain itself because of the great enthusiasm De Pachmann aroused. Seats for Wednesday's and Thursday's concerts will soon be at a premium.

G. H. W.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 13, 1890.

THE ORATORIOS.

On the evening of Easter Sunday Music Hall was crowded to the last foot of standing room, at the opening concert of the festival celebrating the seventy-fifth anniversary of the Handel and Haydn Society. The public has been kept well informed of the elaborate preparations that have been made for this event, but it will not be amiss to give a complete list of the soloists engaged for the four concerts. It includes the names of Mrs. Lilli Lehmann-Kalisch, Mrs. Jennie Patrick Walker, Miss Clara Poole, Mrs. Walter C. Wyman, Miss Emily Winant, Miss Clementina de Vere, Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr. Herbert O. Johnson, Mr. William Ludwig, Dr. George R. Clark, Mr. Myron W. Whitney. A more effective work for the opening concert than "Elijah" could not on the whole have been chosen. Its distinctively modern, yet classic style, suggesting, but not imitating, the characteristics of its numerous heroic ancestors, and its wealth of dramatic situations, combine to make it popular both with the thoughtfully inclined and the merely music loving attendant of oratorio. It is a work, however, which is more impressive from a dramatic than a spiritual point of view. The music appeals strongly to one's emotions and sympathies, but does not stir one to the very depths of his being as, for example, the Bach Passion music does. The soloists of the evening, being composed largely of visitors, may be considered first. Mr. William Ludwig was almost Elijah himself. So realistic was his conception of the part that it needed only a costume and scenic accessories to complete a living picture of the prophet. His interpretation of the various recitatives and solos, whether they expressed denunciation, scorn, passionate appeal, or pathos, was equally strong. It is true, his singing was not always tuneful, for he frequently displayed that knack that too many of our dramatic singers have of striking a note on both sides instead of in the center. That he could sing with accurate intonation, however, was shown in the aria "Lord God of Abraham," in which he was at his best. This aria, and "Is not His word like a fire," which was shouted rather than sung, were greeted with great enthusiasm. Mr. Edward Lloyd comes next in importance. In the air "If with all your hearts," his voice and the simplicity of his style at once won the hearts and applause of the audience. Mr. Lloyd is a fresh, fine-looking man, whose bearing as well as his voice and singing justify the high esteem with which the British public regard him. His part in the oratorio was rather brief; but in the few recitatives that fell to him, and in the aria "Then shall the righteous shine forth," his beautifully clear voice and artistic phrasing, so direct and full of meaning, left nothing to be desired. Mrs. Lilli Lehmann Kalisch also had a comparatively small part. Her delivery of the recitatives in the part of the widow was highly dramatic, but in those of the youth she was singularly ineffective. "Hear ye, Israel," was given with the skill of a true artist; still there was a tinge of coldness throughout the aria which marred its effect. Miss Clara Poole's success was similarly qualified. Her singing was admirable both with regard to trueness in pitch and phrasing. But there was little of breadth or pathos in her rendering of "Woe unto thee," or "O rest in the Lord." Of the concentrated numbers the trio "Lift thine eyes," was sung perfectly by Mrs. Kalisch, Mrs. Walker and Miss Poole, and the applause which followed almost reached the point of an encore. The quartets and double quartets, in which Mrs. Walter C. Wyman, Mr. H. O. Johnson and Dr. George R. Clark also appeared, were effective, although the voices, fine as they were individually, did not always blend happily. The chorus deserves warm praise for the earnestness it displayed throughout the evening, and for the generally excellent character of its work. "He watching over Israel" was beautifully sung, and "Thanks be to God," and the closing choruses were also rendered with much vigor and precision. The orchestra of Symphony men, and Mr. Lang at the organ were efficient. Mr. Zerrahn, on his appearance at the beginning of the concert, was received enthusiastically, and throughoutt the evening conducted with his well known ability.

At the second concert on Tuesday evening the programme consisted of parts one and two of Bach's Christmas oratorio, two airs from "The Creation," and J. C. D. Parker's "Saint John," which was composed last year for this festival. Mrs. Lillian Nordica, Miss Emily Winant, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Myron W. Whitney were the soloists. The performance of this programme evidently was productive of great enjoyment, as the frequent, spontaneous applause of the audience testified. In the Christmas music Miss Emily Winant sang in a manner that was on the whole satisfactory. Her voice has not that full and musical quality that is indispensable for the perfect delivery of Bach's soulful melodies, neither is her tone production as true and steady in volume as could be wished. But her sincerity and sense of the artistic fitness of things are unquestionable; and her singing of "Prepare thyself, Zion," and the exquisite "Slumber, Beloved," gave great pleasure, if it was not impressive. Mr. Lloyd gave further proof of the genuineness of his right to be ranked among the first of oratorio singers. In the recitatives and the aria "Haste, Ye Shepards," his fine unobtrusive method, his steadiness, accuracy in pitch, and musicianly feeling, were as instructive as they were delightful. Mr. Whitney's face was a welcome sight, as it always is. And although in "Mighty Lord, and King all glorious," his voice showed the change which time alone has been able in his case to work, one listened to him with mind fixed so firmly upon his glorious past that any moments of present disappointment were quickly forgotten. The chorals and the first chorus were finely sung, but the chorus "Glory to God" was poorly given: not without reason, however, for it is depressingly difficult. Mr. Parker's "Saint John," while not giving evidence of originality or of special skill in construction, contains elements which will no doubt insure its popularity. It is melodious, its harmonies are agreeable if not rich, and its instrumentation is graceful and adequate; as a whole, the work is both pleasing and singable. Mrs. Nordica had two solos, Miss Winant one, and Mrs. Nordica and Mr. Lloyd had a duet, all of which were sung with fine effect. Mr. Parker conducted his own work. The two arias from "The Creation" "On mighty pens uplifted soars," and "In native worth and honor clad" were a happy interpolation between the principal works. In the first of these numbers Mrs. Nordica made a thoroughly deserved success. Her beautiful and flexible voice adapted itself well to the music, and her artistic temperament was also clearly shown. One can easily believe that if she should devote as much time to this class of music as, for instance, Mrs. Henschel has done, she would be excelled by no one in its interpretation. It is not necessary to speak of Mr. Lloyd's treatment of the second aria; it can easily be imagined.

On Thursday evening Gounod's "Redemption" was given, with the assistance of Miss Clementine de Vere, Mrs. Walker, Miss Winant, Mr Lloyd, Mr. Ludwig and Mr. Whitney. Whatever may be thought of the merits of this "sacred trilogy," or the appropriateness of Gounod's setting of the subject, there is no doubt that it is, from a theatrical point of view, both descriptive and entertaining. The instrumental part of the score is by far the most attractive side of the work. Of the vocal portion, the solo recitatives, notwithstanding the beauty of some of them, and their melodic and skillfully scored accompaniments, soon grow monotonous. The singer that can infuse into these "narrations" any degree of color must be a rare singer indeed. And no matter how well they are sung they still remain uninteresting in the concert room. Some of the chorals and short choruses are beautiful, and the closing grand choruses of each part are highly effective; in fact, the strength of the whole work lies in them. The performance, taken altogether, was fairly good. To Mr. Lloyd must be assigned the first place among the soloists. His beautiful voice, and skillful tone-production lent an interest to the part of the first narrator, which in the hands of a less gifted singer would have been hopelessly dull. The impaired condition of Mr. Whitney's voice was painfully apparent in the part of the second narrator. His singing not only was colorless, but frequently off the pitch. Miss Winant's solo, "While my watch I am keeping," was sung with much steadiness and beauty of expression. Miss de Vere in the solo "From Thy love as a Father," sang charmingly, although at her rendering there were indications of inexperience. The purity of her voice was also affected by her efforts to sing with greater power than is present within her capacity. Hers is a beautiful voice, and the ease with which she sustains the high B, in her second solo, "Over the barren wastes," was truly a pleasure to hear. In a smaller hall she must prove a thoroughly delightful singer, and in any case she is a welcome addition to our small list of fine sopranos. But let us hope sincerely that the vibrato, which through forcing, has already made its appearance in her voice, will not be permitted to gain further headway. Mr. Ludwig's singing in the part of Jesus was almost entirely disappointing. In one or two instances, notably in the exclamatory phrase, "My God, why hast thou forsaken me!" he was both artistic and pathetic. Elsewhere his delivery was generally unsteady and untuneful. The chorus singing was more evenly good than that of the two previous concerts. In the many unison passages the volume of tone was satisfactory, and often strong in quality and power. The closing choruses of each part were finely sung.

[112]

BOSTON HERALD.

TUESDAY, APRIL 15, 1890.

DE PACHMANN'S RECITALS.

The advent of a pianist who can command a financial success in these days is an event of so rare an occurrence that it calls for prominent mention. Vladimir de Pachmann has done this, and he has accomplished it by his merits as a player, unaided by the arts of the professional manager, his appearance having been made with hardly more than a stereotyped announcement of his coming, coupled with the statement that he would confine his recitals to the works of his favorite composer, Chopin. His programmes have been made evidently with a view to affording the widest possible range within the limit set, and also to afford a hearing of many compositions by this composer that seldom appear upon the concert programmes of the day. Yesterday afternoon, at Chickering Hall, a large audience listened to the first of the three programmes announced here, the numbers played being as follows:

1. Sonata, op. 58.
2. Ballade, op. 23.
3. Nocturne, op. 55.
4. Etudes, op. 25. (Nos. 2 and 3.)
5. Allegro de concert, op. 46.
6. Impromptu, op. 29.
7. Preludes, op. 28. (Nos. 21 and 22.)
8. Mazourka, op. 41. (No. 1.)
9. Valse, op. 64. (No. 1.)
10. Scherzo, op. 31.

Vladimir de Pachmann is not a great artist, but he is a thoroughly enjoyable one. He may not command the admiration that a man of broader intellectuality and more solid musical ability receives, but he has merits as a pianist that are well calculated to make a marked impression upon the average concert patron, and he certainly accomplished this desired result in his first effort in this city. His personal and artistic characteristics are peculiarly suited to the playing of the romantic music of Chopin, and whatever exception may be taken to his manner or methods it can but be admitted that he is a most charming interpreter of the compositions chosen for his present series of concerts. In style he more nearly resembles Joseffy when he was first heard in this country than any player of the present period, and he gains his success by much the same means as were used so successfully by Joseffy. With all his ability as a pianist, it is doubtful if De Pachmann would create the impression he does without exercising his faculty of winning an audience by taking them into his confidence, and, by a look or gesture, calling their attention to the points he makes in playing. He is an adept at this sort of stage business, and his success in this line at his concert yesterday quite captured his audience. The sympathies of the feminine attendants—and nine out of ten were of this sex, were immediately engaged by his remark, "It ees zo hot," after the opening movement of the sonata, and he lost no opportunity to disarm criticism by a look of disgust whenever a slip of any sort occurred in his playing. He has the key board under marvellous control in the production of the gossamer like tones which were such a characteristic of Josseffy in his earlier years here, but his playing lacks character and force wherever these qualities are demanded. His touch is faultlessly clear and pearly, even in passages of lightning-like rapidity, and he produces at times a singing tone of velvety softness which both surprises and charms the hearer. Whatever this pianist may be from the standard of calm criticism, his power to please and charm an audience cannot be denied, and so his debut here was an admitted success. He plays again at Chickering Hall on Wednesday and Thursday afternoons in other Chopin programmes.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The closing concert of the season's series by the Kneisel string quartet was given at Union Hall last evening, the assisting artist being Miss Adele Aus Der Ohe, pianist, and the programme including the quartet in C major, Mozart; second movement from the quartet in G minor, Grieg, and quintet (Forrellen), Schubert. The works chosen for the evening again proved the excellent judgment of Mr. Franz Kneisel as a programme maker, and the performance of the several members was in keeping with the high standard that has always been maintained in the concerts by this organization. Miss Aus der Ohe gave excellent assistance in the Schubert quintet, proving herself as satisfying in ensemble playing as she is as a soloist. The concerts of the season thus ended have reached the highest point of excellence known here in the line of chamber music performances, and have gained a substantial financial support, which insures their continuance in the future under the same auspices.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

THURSDAY MORNING, APRIL 17, 1890.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Second De Pachmann Recital Yesterday Afternoon.

At Chickering Hall, yesterday afternoon, Vladimir de Pachmann gave the second instalment of evidence that he is the most consummate of Chopin interpreters. There was a large audience present, and an amount of enthusiasm was evinced that is rarely seen at a Boston piano recital. The programme was a well-selected one, and was calculated to display to best advantage the great virtuosity of the pianist, as well as his fine appreciation for the master he reveals. The same mannerisms appeared in the player's methods, but they grow less offensive on acquaintance, and may be put down as arising from his intense interest in his work. It should be said here that De Pachmann was certainly not at his best on Monday, and that yesterday's glorious performance was a revelation to the critics, who were not entirely disposed at first to rank him as the greatest player of Chopin.

The concert began with the fantasie, op. 49, and gave no decided promise of the splendid achievements that were to follow. Nor, indeed, did the sonata, op. 35, nor the polonaise, op. 26, which came next, though the sherzo of the sonata was crisply and delicately done. Evidently De Pachmann has his moods, and the glories of today may be partial disappointments tomorrow. But when the great ballade, op. 47, was reached it became evident enough that a master genius was at the piano, and that such a superbly romantic and technically faultless rendering of the work had never before been heard in this city. The no turne op 27 which followed was also played with great feeling, never degenerating into sentimentalism, and the impromptu op. 36 was most satisfactory. Then came the triumph of the afternoon in the shape of the etude op. 25, with its extremely difficult continuous double trill. This was played with the most perfect smoothness and finish, and aroused a tremendous amount of enthusiasm among the auditors, who demanded and obtained an encore. The recital closed with the valse op. 42, which was all that could be desired.

Boston Evening Transcript.

MONDAY, APRIL 14, 1890.

MR. DE PACHMANN'S RECITAL.

Mr. Vladimir de Pachmann gave the first of his three Chopin recitals in Chickering Hall yesterday afternoon, the programme being as follows:

Sonata in B minor, Op. 58.
Ballade in G minor, Op. 23.
Nocturne in F minor, Op. 55. No. 1.
Etudes in F minor and F major, Op. 25, Nos. 2 and 3.
Allegro de Concert in A, Op. 46.
Impromptu in A-flat, Op. 29.
Preludes in B-flat and G minor, Op. 28, Nos. 21 and 22.
Mazurka in C-sharp minor, Op. 41, No. 1.
Waltz in D-flat, Op. 64, No. 1.
Scherzo in B-flat minor, Op. 31.

Mr. de Pachmann is so unusual a pianist in many respects that one does not quite know how to foot him up artistically after but a single recital. His wonderfully clear and fluent technique calls for nothing but admiration; but a wonderful technique is nowadays as much of a sine qua non with pianists of world-wide reputation as an amazing mastery over the art of orchestration is with modern French composers. His technique alone does not differentiate him from other great living pianists; in this matter perfection is to be expected.

There is, however, one trait in him that does distinguish him from most of the more famous heroes of the keyboard whom we have heard during the past few years, and one which peculiarly fits him for being a Chopin player: he is always mindful of producing a pure and beautiful tone from the pianoforte; he never pounds, nor strikes through his tone. He does not impute to the pianoforte more than it can legitimately do.

Specially, as a Chopin player, however, he makes one curious impression. It almost seems as if he must have studied some of the prevailing faults in the average Chopin playing of today, and then have done his best to push the diametric opposite of these faults ad absurdum. For instance, it has been noticed of more than one pianist of late how, in playing Chopin, undue prominence was given to the left hand, either in the way of over-emphasizing repeated chords in the middle of the keyboard (thus giving a mere harmonic accompaniment too much value in relation to the melody), or else by thundering down in the bass, to the utter extinction of what is played in the right hand. Mr. de Pachmann does just the opposite: his left hand is often all but inaudible. Of his moderate treatment of the middle parts in the harmony (where the accompaniment is purely homophonic) one can speak only in high praise; but in many passages, like the greater part of the D-flat Waltz, or that glorious cantilena in D-flat major in the first part of the B-flat minor Scherzo, you hear virtually no bass at all. This is almost as bad as the other way! Again, as if in protest against that frantic pounding and thundering in which some players are wont to indulge themselves, making the music sound as if it had been written by the avenging Furies, instead of by Chopin, Mr. de Pachmann pushes pianissimo effects fairly to excess. During the first third of the recital one hardly heard a real fortissimo.

In the matter of interpretation Mr. de Pachmann is among the freest of the free. At times he will not even allow Chopin the right to his own expression marks, but substitutes staccato for legato, pianissimo for forte, and the like, with the utmost coolness. Now, as in parts of the G minor Ballade, he will positively bewilder you with the rapidly shifting variety of effects he heaps upon the music, and again, as in the slow movement of the sonata, you stand amazed at the complete monotony of his playing.

Yet with and in spite of all this, the man has great magnetism and an indescribable charm. It is a very sophisticated, artificial, hot-house sort of fascination, if you will; we could find no touch of genuine, wholesome Nature in it, nor any of that equally genuine morbidness of feeling from which Chopin himself was by no means free; but it is undeniably fascinating, for all that. Its worst side is its all too evident seeming affectation. All those wonderful salon airs and graces in phrasing made one think of Herz, Hünten and writers of that ilk, far more than of the warm-feeling and sincere Chopin. We have rarely heard a pianist take the art of being charming so seriously; he seemed to be playing to all the pretty women in the audience. At moments he made Chopin sound absolutely coquettish. But his great merit of always playing the pianoforte like a pianoforte, and not like an orchestra, the invariable beauty of his tone, the exquisite effects he produces, still remain. We have seldom heard a player in such complete sympathy with the nature of his instrument.

Boston Post

THURSDAY MORNING, APRIL 17, 1890

THE SECOND PACHMANN CHOPIN RECITAL.

This was again a very delightful concert. One cannot always agree with the idea of this extraordinary pianist, and he occasionally falls wholly short of making the least effect. For example, his playing of the celebrated marche funèbre, from the sonata, op. 35, was anything but agreeable, and did not at all move the audience, but this is a mere detail of no importance, for his playing in some places was so simply entrancing that he might have easily redeemed all the failures of his life in five minutes at the piano. His playing of the celebrated etude in thirds (op. 25, No. 6) is probably the most remarkable pianistic tour-de-force which has ever been heard in this city, and it is to be hoped that he will repeat it this afternoon. Again, the A flat song or ballade, op. 67, was played in a manner that fairly brought down the house. His pianissimo touch is almost fabulous; it gets so very soft that one hardly expects to hear the next note at all, and yet it is all perfectly clear; and opposed to this, he has also a very fine, virile and clear-cut fortissimo, but, as aforesaid, his mastery of his art lies in his beautiful interpretation rather than in his astounding technique. This afternoon (his last appearance) he plays, among other things, the Fantaisie Impromptu and the great polonaise, op. 53.

ARTHUR WELD.

Boston Daily Courier.

TUESDAY, APRIL 15, 1890.

The Kneisel Quartet Concert.

The sixth and last concert of the season by the Kneisel Quartet took place at Union Hall Monday evening, Miss Aus der Ohe assisting.

The following programme was given: Mozart, Quartet for Strings, C major; Grieg, Romance from Quartet in G minor, op. 27; Schubert, Quintet in A major, op. 114. The contrasting elements in this programme afforded ample opportunity for the display of skill and versatility which have come to be expected from this talented quartet of players. The Mozart Quartet and Schubert Quintet, both of which were given for the second time, are characteristic of their composers, the first revealing Mozart's tendency to withdraw from the more florid school of quartet-writing, of which Haydn was then one of the leading exponents—and the latter introducing in the third movement the simple but beautiful theme from his own "Die Forelle," thus showing his proneness to remain in the field of German lieder wherein his talents have made him the compeer of Schumann and Franz. The Grieg Romance abounds in sharp transitions of key, broken rythms and unexpected intervals, which suggested that the composer's mind was colored not only by the natural scenery of his native Bergen, but the Norse mythology as well. The romance proper then begins to assume form upon the three higher stringed-instruments, its suave flowing melody being in strong contrast to the rugged earlier passages. The quartet played throughout with exquisite finish, shading and unity of sentiment. Miss Ous der Ohe did not find in the piano-score of the quintet opportunity for the full exhibition of her virtuosity, but nevertheless showed in her ensemble-playing, a commendable willingness to subordinate her instrument to its true proportional value in the combined effect. That this accomplished young player has long been possessed of the most thorough technique and ample resources, is patent to all—that she is now content to sink her personality in order to secure the highest ends of music, is an earnest of the mellower and maturer art which will surely be hers and place her in the foremost ranks not only of pianists but musicians. E. H. G.

De Pachmann, Pianist.

The first of Vladimir De Pachmann's three concerts, devoted to the pianoforte music of Chopin, was given yesterday afternoon in Chickering Hall. The programme: Sonata, op. 58; ballade, op. 23; nocturne, op. 55; etudes, op. 25 (Nos. 2 and 3); allegro de concert, op. 46; impromptu, op. 29; preludes, op. 28 (Nos. 21 and 22); mazourka, op. 41 (No. 1); valse, op. 64 (No. 1); scherzo, op. 31. Here, indeed, is a poet player. De Pachmann is not imperious, like Rubinstein, nor the bulwark of intellectuality Von Buelow is; he is gentle, tender and caressing. With technique ample and consummate he makes you forget the intricacies of the structure of what he plays, because of the charm with which he adorns it. Then, too, his powerful personality exerts an influence. The man loves his music and it is no wonder that he takes the audience into his confidence as he passes over some particularly interesting or expressive phrase. There is no question about De Pachmann's beautiful piano playing, to a consideration of which we shall return. The large and cultivated audience of yesterday could scarce contain itself because of the great enthusiasm De Pachmann aroused. Seats for Wednesday's and Thursday's concerts will soon be at a premium.

G. H. W.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 13, 1890.

THE ORATORIOS.

On the evening of Easter Sunday Music Hall was crowded to the last foot of standing room, at the opening concert of the festival celebrating the seventy-fifth anniversary of the Handel and Haydn Society. The public has been kept well informed of the elaborate preparations that have been made for this event, but it will not be amiss to give a complete list of the soloists engaged for the four concerts. It includes the names of Mrs. Lilli Lehmann-Kalisch, Mrs. Jennie Patrick Walker, Miss Clara Poole, Mrs. Walter C. Wyman, Miss Emily Winant, Miss Clementina de Vere, Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr. Herbert O. Johnson, Mr. William Ludwig, Dr. George R. Clark, Mr. Myron W. Whitney. A more effective work for the opening concert than "Elijah" could not on the whole have been chosen. Its distinctively modern, yet classic style, suggesting, but not imitating, the characteristics of its numerous heroic ancestors, and its wealth of dramatic situations, combine to make it popular both with the thoughtfully inclined and the merely music loving attendant of oratorio. It is a work, however, which is more impressive from a dramatic than a spiritual point of view. The music appeals strongly to one's emotions and sympathies, but does not stir one to the very depths of his being as, for example, the Bach Passion music does. The soloists of the evening, being composed largely of visitors, may be considered first. Mr. William Ludwig was almost Elijah himself. So realistic was his conception of the part that it needed only a costume and scenic accessories to complete a living picture of the prophet. His interpretation of the various recitatives and solos, whether they expressed denunciation, scorn, passionate appeal, or pathos, was equally strong. It is true, his singing was not always tuneful, for he frequently displayed that knack that too many of our dramatic singers have of striking a note on both sides instead of in the center. That he could sing with accurate intonation, however, was shown in the aria "Lord God of Abraham," in which he was at his best. This aria, and "Is not His word like a fire," which was shouted rather than sung, were greeted with great enthusiasm. Mr. Edward Lloyd comes next in importance. In the air "If with all your hearts," his voice and the simplicity of his style at once won the hearts and applause of the audience. Mr. Lloyd is a fresh, fine-looking man, whose bearing as well as his voice and singing justify the high esteem with which the British public regard him. His part in the oratorio was rather brief; but in the few recitatives that fell to him, and in the aria "Then shall the righteous shine forth," his beautifully clear voice and artistic phrasing, so direct and full of meaning, left nothing to be desired. Mrs. Lilli Lehmann Kalisch also had a comparatively small part. Her delivery of the recitatives in the part of the widow was highly dramatic, but in those of the youth she was singularly ineffective. "Hear ye, Israel," was given with the skill of a true artist; still there was a tinge of coldness throughout the aria which marred its effect. Miss Clara Poole's success was similarly qualified. Her singing was admirable both with regard to trueness in pitch and phrasing. But there was little of breadth or pathos in her rendering of "Woe unto thee," or "O rest in the Lord." Of the concentrated numbers the trio "Lift thine eyes," was sung perfectly by Mrs. Kalisch, Mrs. Walker and Miss Poole, and the applause which followed almost reached the point of an encore. The quartets and double quartets, in which Mrs. Walter C. Wyman, Mr. H. O. Johnson and Dr. George R. Clark also appeared, were effective, although the voices, fine as they were individually, did not always blend happily. The chorus deserves warm praise for the earnestness it displayed throughout the evening, and for the generally excellent character of its work. "He watching over Israel" was beautifully sung, and "Thanks be to God," and the closing choruses were also rendered with much vigor and precision. The orchestra of Symphony men, and Mr. Lang at the organ were efficient. Mr. Zerrahn, on his appearance at the beginning of the concert, was received enthusiastically, and throughoutt the evening conducted with his well known ability.

At the second concert on Tuesday evening the programme consisted of parts one and two of Bach's Christmas oratorio, two airs from "The Creation," and J. C. D. Parker's "Saint John," which was composed last year for this festival. Mrs. Lillian Nordica, Miss Emily Winant, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Myron W. Whitney were the soloists. The performance of this programme evidently was productive of great enjoyment, as the frequent, spontaneous applause of the audience testified. In the Christmas music Miss Emily Winant sang in a manner that was on the whole satisfactory. Her voice has not that full and musical quality that is indispensable for the perfect delivery of Bach's soulful melodies, neither is her tone production as true and steady in volume as could be wished. But her sincerity and sense of the artistic fitness of things are unquestionable; and her singing of "Prepare thyself, Zion," and the exquisite "Slumber, Beloved," gave great pleasure, if it was not impressive. Mr. Lloyd gave further proof of the genuineness of his right to be ranked among the first of oratorio singers. In the recitatives and the aria "Haste, Ye Shepards," his fine unobtrusive method, his steadiness, accuracy in pitch, and musicianly feeling, were as instructive as they were delightful. Mr. Whitney's face was a welcome sight, as it always is. And although in "Mighty Lord, and King all glorious," his voice showed the change which time alone has been able in his case to work, one listened to him with mind fixed so firmly upon his glorious past that any moments of present disappointment were quickly forgotten. The chorals and the first chorus were finely sung, but the chorus "Glory to God" was poorly given: not without reason, however, for it is depressingly difficult. Mr. Parker's "Saint John," while not giving evidence of originality or of special skill in construction, contains elements which will no doubt insure its popularity. It is melodious, its harmonies are agreeable if not rich, and its instrumentation is graceful and adequate; as a whole, the work is both pleasing and singable. Mrs. Nordica had two solos, Miss Winant one, and Mrs. Nordica and Mr. Lloyd had a duet, all of which were sung with fine effect. Mr. Parker conducted his own work. The two arias from "The Creation" "On mighty pens uplifted soars," and "In native worth and honor clad" were a happy interpolation between the principal works. In the first of these numbers Mrs. Nordica made a thoroughly deserved success. Her beautiful and flexible voice adapted itself well to the music, and her artistic temperament was also clearly shown. One can easily believe that if she should devote as much time to this class of music as, for instance, Mrs. Henschel has done, she would be excelled by no one in its interpretation. It is not necessary to speak of Mr. Lloyd's treatment of the second aria; it can easily be imagined.

On Thursday evening Gounod's "Redemption" was given, with the assistance of Miss Clementine de Vere, Mrs. Walker, Miss Winant, Mr Lloyd, Mr. Ludwig and Mr. Whitney. Whatever may be thought of the merits of this "sacred trilogy," or the appropriateness of Gounod's setting of the subject, there is no doubt that it is, from a theatrical point of view, both descriptive and entertaining. The instrumental part of the score is by far the most attractive side of the work. Of the vocal portion, the solo recitatives, notwithstanding the beauty of some of them, and their melodic and skillfully scored accompaniments, soon grow monotonous. The singer that can infuse into these "narrations" any degree of color must be a rare singer indeed. And no matter how well they are sung they still remain uninteresting in the concert room. Some of the chorals and short choruses are beautiful, and the closing grand choruses of each part are highly effective; in fact, the strength of the whole work lies in them. The performance, taken altogether, was fairly good. To Mr. Lloyd must be assigned the first place among the soloists. His beautiful voice, and skillful tone-production lent an interest to the part of the first narrator, which in the hands of a less gifted singer would have been hopelessly dull. The impaired condition of Mr. Whitney's voice was painfully apparent in the part of the second narrator. His singing not only was colorless, but frequently off the pitch. Miss Winant's solo, "While my watch I am keeping," was sung with much steadiness and beauty of expression. Miss de Vere in the solo "From Thy love as a Father," sang charmingly, although at her rendering there were indications of inexperience. The purity of her voice was also affected by her efforts to sing with greater power than is present within her capacity. Hers is a beautiful voice, and the ease with which she sustains the high B, in her second solo, "Over the barren wastes," was truly a pleasure to hear. In a smaller hall she must prove a thoroughly delightful singer, and in any case she is a welcome addition to our small list of fine sopranos. But let us hope sincerely that the vibrato, which through forcing, has already made its appearance in her voice, will not be permitted to gain further headway. Mr. Ludwig's singing in the part of Jesus was almost entirely disappointing. In one or two instances, notably in the exclamatory phrase, "My God, why hast thou forsaken me!" he was both artistic and pathetic. Elsewhere his delivery was generally unsteady and untuneful. The chorus singing was more evenly good than that of the two previous concerts. In the many unison passages the volume of tone was satisfactory, and often strong in quality and power. The closing choruses of each part were finely sung.

[112]

[113]

Music Hall, - Taunton.

WEDNESDAY EVENING, - - APRIL 16TH, 1890, AT 8.

ONLY APPEARANCE OF THE FAMOUS

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, CONDUCTOR.

Soloist:

MISS ADELE AUS DER OHE.

TICKETS, 75 cts., $1, $1.25 and $1.50, may be obtained at Barker's Drug Store, or by addressing the Manager of the "Artists' Course," F.W.Perry, Academy of Music, Taunton.

THE HERALD.

PACHMANN RECITAL.

The Russian pianist, Vladimir de Pachmann, made his second appearance at Chickering Hall yesterday afternoon, playing the second of his series of Chopin programmes, the works included in the list being as follows:

Fantasie, op. 49.
Sonata, op. 35.
Polonaise, op. 26.
Ballade, op. 47.
Nocturne, op. 37 (No. 2).
Impromptu, op. 36.
Etudes, op. 25 (No. 6), op. 10 (Nos. 4 and 5).
Mazourkas, op. 33 (No. 4).
Scherzo, op. 39.
Valse, op. 42.

There is little to add to what has been already said concerning the playing of this pianist, but the impression gained of his abilities at his first recital was strengthened by his performances yesterday, and the most conservative musicians joined in applauding his efforts. He is, as an artist, decidedly unique. He shows little care for the conventionalities of the concert room, and gives himself over to the enjoyment of his own work quite as unreservedly as those who make up his audience. It would be folly to claim or assert that all of the selections named on the list of the day had an equally satisfactory interpretation, or to deny that this player is incapable of realizing all the beauties included in such a wide variety of compositions as he gave a hearing of on this occasion. He charms and delights an audience, and it is difficult to imagine a better reason to admit his success than such a result. He swayed his audience at his own will yesterday afternoon, and easily commanded their applause by his wonderfully enjoyable playing. In the group of etudes he fairly dazzled his audience by his exhibition of technique, and a more brilliant victory over the difficulties of these studies has not been known here by the concertgoers of the present day. The last recital takes place this afternoon.

Boston Daily Globe.

THURSDAY, APRIL 17.

PACHMANN'S RECITAL.

Musicians Enthusiastically Applaud His Chopin Interpretations.

Vladimir de Pachmann gave the second of his series of Chopin recitals in Chickering Hall yesterday afternoon. The audience attending was much larger than at the first concert. If it was generally known what a truly great pianist Mr. Pachmann is, Chickering Hall would surely be many times too small to accommodate all who would rush to hear him. More brilliant performers may have been heard here, D'Albert for instance, but none have approached the exquisite delicacy and sentiment of his Chopin interpretations. What he can do in rendering the works of other composers remains to be shown, and it is to be hoped that Boston will soon have an opportunity of hearing him in a miscellaneous programme.

It is not remembered that the playing of any pianist ever won such honest enthusiasm from a representative Boston audience as awarded Mr. Pachmann's playing of the study in thirds op. 25. That this composition could be played pianissimo at the tempo he maintained, would seem well-nigh impossible. D'Albert played the same work with astonishing rapidity, but it was fortissimo from first to last. Mr. Pachmann expressed appreciation of the demonstrative applause by repeating the piece, much to every one's delight as well as surprise, for it was scarcely to be expected that he would be willing to perform again a task so difficult. The programme, though of great length, held attention to the end. It is impossible to comment upon it in detail, but it must be said that there was not a number which did not deserve unqualified praise for daintiness of execution and beauty of expression.

The third and last Chopin recital will be given in Chickering Hall at 2.30 p. m. today. Following is the programme: Three etudes, op. 10; barcarole, op. 60; three preludes, op. 28; scherzo, op. 20; nocturne, op. 37; two mazourkas, op. 50; ballade, op. 38; tarantelle, 43; berceuse, op. 57; fantasie, op. 66; valse, op. 64, and polonaise, op. 53.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 16, 1890.

The Handel and Haydn Festival and the German Opera in Boston.

BOSTON, April 11.

BOSTON is more musically inclined than ever before, and not only has Music Hall been crowded to the doors during the Händel and Haydn concerts, but the German Opera Company, too, have had no cause to complain of lack of either patronage or enthusiasm. Of course the occurrence of the two events simultaneously caused the critics to attempt ubiquity, and I will not attempt to describe the amount of pedestrianism done between the Music Hall and the Boston Theatre (for in Boston the musical reviewers do not keep their own carriages and coachmen), but will give proper precedence to the festival of our great Oratorio Society, as far as I heard it. Without unseemly vaunting it may be said that we are as far ahead of other American cities in the sacred school as New York is in advance of us in operatic matters. The Händel and Haydn Festival (the seventy-fifth anniversary of the foundation of the society) began with a performance of "Elijah" before the largest audience I have ever seen in Music Hall. Hundreds of persons were turned from the doors unable to obtain even standing room. The extreme radicals may disdain Mendelssohn as much as they please, and may stigmatize "Elijah" as "a parlor oratorio," but the great public will still throng to hear it when it is well given and will still become enthusiastic over the dramatic "Thanks be to God" and the mellifluous "O, rest in the Lord."

The performance opened well. The overture, with its dark string phrases and its clarinet work in chalumeau register, was well given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the first chorus, "Help, Lord," was sung with power. The soprano voices, however, seemed rather thin and dry, as if they had been overrehearsed, and did not balance well against the other parts. Per contra, the tenors sang with inspiring boldness and power. The choruses to "Baal" were full of dramatic force, and "Thanks be to God" was excellent both in its vocal and instrumental parts.

The soloists were generally adequate. Lilli Lehmann gave "Hear ye, Israel," with majestic power, and I certainly approve of the contrasts of tempo which she used in the second part of this air. Miss Poole was unsatisfactory. She sang with a coldness that froze up everything in her part. "O, rest in the Lord," is certainly the most expressive alto solo that the master ever created, but it was sung in a manner that even the enthusiastic audience could not sanction, and passed unapplauded a specimen of iced Mendelssohn. Mr. Ludwig was "Elijah," and gave much dramatic fervor to the part. His voice was sometimes disagreeable in quality, as if he were overforcing it; but he was applauded to the echo, although he was so unequal. Nevertheless dramatic power counts for a great deal in so graphic a part as this, and the effort may be chronicled as a success. Mr. Edward Lloyd did not do himself justice at this concert, for he was throaty, and used the portamento as a route to all his high notes, but in "Then shall the righteous" he began to "shine forth."

Most perfect was the concerted solo music, for such singers as Mrs. Walker, Mrs. Wyman and Messrs. Johnson and Clark assisted. The double quartet "For he shall give his angels" was excellent, and the trio "Lift thine eyes" was sung better than I have heard it given. It was a pity that the part of the "Youth" was not given by a treble voice, since even Lilli Lehmann could not make a success of this ancient meteorological bureau. The second concert of the festival gave the first two parts of the Christmas oratorio (that work where Bach starts out in D major and proves his devotion to musical form by returning to that key two weeks later!) a couple of arias from the "Creation" and a new cantata by J. C. D. Parker. The chorales of the first work were well sung, although the sopranos were still not a perfect counterpoise to the other parts. The very difficult "Glory to God" was very well given, however, and did credit to the training of Carl Zerrahn, the veteran conductor.

Mr. Lloyd in this work showed himself to be a great artist in the greatest school. His phrasing was a model to study, for he did not mince up the roulades by breathing anywhere and everywhere in them as so many native singers do. His singing of "In native worth" was a triumph, and the audience fairly rose at him at its close. Lillian Nordica sang "On mighty pens" (not a tribute to the power of the press) with equal success, her fioriture being amazingly delicate and clear. Miss Emily Winant was also in good voice, and had won much applause in the exquisitely tender "Slumber Beloved," one of the very sweetest of all Bach's airs, and everyone was in a good mood to listen to the new cantata. I must not forget to chronicle the success of the "Pastoral Symphony," in which there were two English horns, as the composer demands, and the veteran De Ribas blew the second one, and the tempo, balance and phrasing were all commendable. I think it would be a wiser plan to drop the word "symphony" in this connection, and call the number simply "pastorale," for few, except musical antiquaries, know the old-fashioned pre-Haydnite use of the word.

When Mr. Parker stepped on the conductor's stand to lead his work he received an ovation which must have assured him that he occupies a warm place in the Bostonian heart. Mr. Parker is one of the pioneers of native art, and his efforts to advance it entitle him to the most distinguished consideration. But the cantata of "St. John" may be judged solely upon its merits, and will still receive a good position in the répertoire. At the very beginning it is impressive in a novel manner. In the treatment of such subjects one expects many connecting links of recitative, given generally by the tenor, in the character of either "narrator" or "Evangelist," but in this work a new departure has been made by giving such passages to the chorus in unison chanting phrases, while melodious subthemes appear in the orchestra as accompaniment. This has an indescribably majestic dignity, and will undoubtedly be employed by other composers. There is a skillful fugato in the first chorus at the words "That saith unto Zion," but the finest effect of this kind is found in the later chorus, "And they shall reign," which is a masterly fugue, and was finely sung also.

Strange to say, the composer goes into the opposite extreme in other parts of the work. The alto solo "Eye hath not seen" (beautifully sung by Miss Winant) is reminiscent of Mendelssohn in its sweetness, and the duet, "There shall be no more curse," goes even further in the sugary direction, and not even "Guarda che bianca Luna" could be more saccharine. A quartet beginning a capella—"Now are we the sons of God"—strikes the happy medium, and is a good specimen of the musicianly leading of the voices and melodic grace. There was just a little slip in the bass part here, but it was only momentary. And this leads me to add that I had almost omitted to mention the splendid quality of Mr. Myron Whitney's singing. His voice was under perfect control, and his intonation always exact. It will be a long time yet before this basso is to be placed on the retired list. Gounod's rather poor but popular work, "The Redemption," in which the promise of the Atonement is made in an agreeable polka theme, and in which the composer gives a vulgar march because he thinks that the ancient Jews deserved it (a theory against every principle of true art), was given at the third concert, but as "Lohengrin" was being presented at the Boston Theatre I chose a good work weakly rendered in preference to a weak one well given.

BOSTON HERALD.

THURSDAY, APRIL 17, 1890.

THE PACHMANN RECITAL.

The Russian pianist, Vladimir de Pachmann, made his second appearance at Chickering Hall yesterday afternoon, playing the second of his series of Chopin programmes, the works included in the list being as follows:

1. Fantasie, op. 49.
2. Sonata, op. 35.
3. Polonaise, op. 26.
4. Ballade, op. 47.
5. Nocturne, op. 27 (No. 2).
6. Impromptu, op. 36.
7. Etudes, op. 25 (No. 6), op. 10 (Nos. 4 and 5).
8. Mazourka, op. 33 (No. 4).
9. Scherzo, op. 39.
10. Valse, op. 42.

There is little to add to what has been already said concerning the playing of this pianist, but the impression gained of his abilities at his first recital was strengthened by his performances yesterday, and the most conservative musicians joined in applauding his efforts. He is, as an artist, decidedly unique. He shows little care for the conventionalities of the concert room, and gives himself over to the enjoyment of his own work quite as unreservedly as those who make up his audience. It would be folly to claim or assert that all of the selections named on the list of the day had an equally satisfactory interpretation, or to deny that this player is incapable of realizing all the beauties included in such a wide variety of compositions as he gave a hearing of on this occasion. He charms and delights an audience, and it is difficult to imagine a better reason to admit his success than such a result. He swayed his audience at his own will yesterday afternoon, and easily commanded their applause by his wonderfully enjoyable playing. In the group of studies he fairly dazzled his audience by his exhibition of technique, and a more brilliant victory over the difficulties of these studies has not been known here by the concertgoers of the present day. The last recital takes place this afternoon.

Boston Daily Globe.

THURSDAY, APRIL 17.

PACHMANN'S RECITAL.

Musicians Enthusiastically Applaud His Chopin Interpretations.

Vladimir de Pachmann gave the second of his series of Chopin recitals in Chickering Hall yesterday afternoon. The audience attending was much larger than at the first concert. If it was generally known what a truly great pianist Mr. Pachmann is, Chickering Hall would surely be many times too small to accommodate all who would rush to hear him. More brilliant performers may have been heard here, D'Albert for instance, but none have approached the exquisite delicacy and sentiment of his Chopin interpretations. What he can do in rendering the works of other composers remains to be shown, and it is to be honed that Boston will soon have an opportunity of hearing him in a miscellaneous programme.

It is not remembered that the playing of any pianist ever won such honest enthusiasm from a representative Boston audience as awarded Mr. Pachmann's playing of the study in thirds op. 25. That this composition could be played pianissimo at the tempo he maintained, would seem well-nigh impossible. D'Albert played the same work with astonishing rapidity, but it was fortissimo from first to last. Mr. Pachmann expressed appreciation of the demonstrative applause by repeating the piece, much to every one's delight as well as surprise, for it was scarcely to be expected that he would be willing to perform again a task so difficult. The programme, though of great length, held attention to the end. It is impossible to comment upon it in detail, but it must be said that there was not a number which did not deserve unqualified praise for daintiness of execution and beauty of expression.

The third and last Chopin recital will be given in Chickering Hall at 2.30 p. m. today. Following is the programme: Three etudes, op. 10; barcarole, op. 60; three preludes, op. 28; scherzo, op. 20; nocturne, op. 37; two mazourkas, op. 50; ballade, op. 38; tarantelle, 43; berceuse, op. 57; fantasie, op. 66; valse, op. 64, and polonaise, op. 53.

Music Hall, - Taunton.

WEDNESDAY EVENING, - - APRIL 16TH, 1890, AT 8.

ONLY APPEARANCE OF THE FAMOUS

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, CONDUCTOR.

Soloist:

MISS ADELE AUS DER OHE.

TICKETS, 75 cts., $1, $1.25 and $1.50, may be obtained at Barker's Drug Store, or by addressing the Manager of the "Artists' Course," F.W.Perry, Academy of Music, Taunton.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 16, 1890.

The Handel and Haydn Festival and the German Opera in Boston.

BOSTON, April 11.

BOSTON is more musically inclined than ever before, and not only has Music Hall been crowded to the doors during the Händel and Haydn concerts, but the German Opera Company, too, have had no cause to complain of lack of either patronage or enthusiasm. Of course the occurrence of the two events simultaneously caused the critics to attempt ubiquity, and I will not attempt to describe the amount of pedestrianism done between the Music Hall and the Boston Theatre (for in Boston the musical reviewers do not keep their own carriages and coachmen), but will give proper precedence to the festival of our great Oratorio Society, as far as I heard it. Without unseemly vaunting it may be said that we are as far ahead of other American cities in the sacred school as New York is in advance of us in operatic matters. The Händel and Haydn Festival (the seventy-fifth anniversary of the foundation of the society) began with a performance of "Elijah" before the largest audience I have ever seen in Music Hall. Hundreds of persons were turned from the doors unable to obtain even standing room. The extreme radicals may disdain Mendelssohn as much as they please, and may stigmatize "Elijah" as "a parlor oratorio," but the great public will still throng to hear it when it is well given and will still become enthusiastic over the dramatic "Thanks be to God" and the mellifluous "O, rest in the Lord."

The performance opened well. The overture, with its dark string phrases and its clarinet work in chalumeau register, was well given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the first chorus, "Help, Lord," was sung with power. The soprano voices, however, seemed rather thin and dry, as if they had been overrehearsed, and did not balance well against the other parts. Per contra, the tenors sang with inspiring boldness and power. The choruses to "Baal" were full of dramatic force, and "Thanks be to God" was excellent both in its vocal and instrumental parts.

The soloists were generally adequate. Lilli Lehmann gave "Hear ye, Israel," with majestic power, and I certainly approve of the contrasts of tempo which she used in the second part of this air. Miss Poole was unsatisfactory. She sang with a coldness that froze up everything in her part. "O, rest in the Lord," is certainly the most expressive alto solo that the master ever created, but it was sung in a manner that even the enthusiastic audience could not sanction, and passed unapplauded a specimen of iced Mendelssohn. Mr. Ludwig was "Elijah," and gave much dramatic fervor to the part. His voice was sometimes disagreeable in quality, as if he were overforcing it; but he was applauded to the echo, although he was so unequal. Nevertheless dramatic power counts for a great deal in so graphic a part as this, and the effort may be chronicled as a success. Mr. Edward Lloyd did not do himself justice at this concert, for he was throaty, and used the portamento as a route to all his high notes, but in "Then shall the righteous" he began to "shine forth."

Most perfect was the concerted solo music, for such singers as Mrs. Walker, Mrs. Wyman and Messrs. Johnson and Clark assisted. The double quartet "For he shall give his angels" was excellent, and the trio "Lift thine eyes" was sung better than I have heard it given. It was a pity that the part of the "Youth" was not given by a treble voice, since even Lilli Lehmann could not make a success of this ancient meteorological bureau. The second concert of the festival gave the first two parts of the Christmas oratorio (that work where Bach starts out in D major and proves his devotion to musical form by returning to that key two weeks later!) a couple of arias from the "Creation" and a new cantata by J. C. D. Parker. The chorales of the first work were well sung, although the sopranos were still not a perfect counterpoise to the other parts. The very difficult "Glory to God" was very well given, however, and did credit to the training of Carl Zerrahn, the veteran conductor.

Mr. Lloyd in this work showed himself to be a great artist in the greatest school. His phrasing was a model to study, for he did not mince up the roulades by breathing anywhere and everywhere in them as so many native singers do. His singing of "In native worth" was a triumph, and the audience fairly rose at him at its close. Lillian Nordica sang "On mighty pens" (not a tribute to the power of the press) with equal success, her fioriture being amazingly delicate and clear. Miss Emily Winant was also in good voice, and had won much applause in the exquisitely tender "Slumber Beloved," one of the very sweetest of all Bach's airs, and everyone was in a good mood to listen to the new cantata. I must not forget to chronicle the success of the "Pastoral Symphony," in which there were two English horns, as the composer demands, and the veteran De Ribas blew the second one, and the tempo, balance and phrasing were all commendable. I think it would be a wiser plan to drop the word "symphony" in this connection, and call the number simply "pastorale," for few, except musical antiquaries, know the old-fashioned pre-Haydnite use of the word.

When Mr. Parker stepped on the conductor's stand to lead his work he received an ovation which must have assured him that he occupies a warm place in the Bostonian heart. Mr. Parker is one of the pioneers of native art, and his efforts to advance it entitle him to the most distinguished consideration. But the cantata of "St. John" may be judged solely upon its merits, and will still receive a good position in the répertoire. At the very beginning it is impressive in a novel manner. In the treatment of such subjects one expects many connecting links of recitative, given generally by the tenor, in the character of either "narrator" or "Evangelist," but in this work a new departure has been made by giving such passages to the chorus in unison chanting phrases, while melodious subthemes appear in the orchestra as accompaniment. This has an indescribably majestic dignity, and will undoubtedly be employed by other composers. There is a skillful fugato in the first chorus at the words "That saith unto Zion," but the finest effect of this kind is found in the later chorus, "And they shall reign," which is a masterly fugue, and was finely sung also.

Strange to say, the composer goes into the opposite extreme in other parts of the work. The alto solo "Eye hath not seen" (beautifully sung by Miss Winant) is reminiscent of Mendelssohn in its sweetness, and the duet, "There shall be no more curse," goes even further in the sugary direction, and not even "Guarda che bianca Luna" could be more saccharine. A quartet beginning a capella—"Now are we the sons of God"—strikes the happy medium, and is a good specimen of the musicianly leading of the voices and melodic grace. There was just a little slip in the bass part here, but it was only momentary. And this leads me to add that I had almost omitted to mention the splendid quality of Mr. Myron Whitney's singing. His voice was under perfect control, and his intonation always exact. It will be a long time yet before this basso is to be placed on the retired list. Gounod's rather poor but popular work, "The Redemption," in which the promise of the Atonement is made in an agreeable polka theme, and in which the composer gives a vulgar march because he thinks that the ancient Jews deserved it (a theory against every principle of true art), was given at the third concert, but as "Lohengrin" was being presented at the Boston Theatre I chose a good work weakly rendered in preference to a weak one well given.

Wakefield Baby Coaches.

GLENWOOD FURNISHING CO.,

GENERAL HOUSE FURNISHERS.

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 16TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE. "Mignon." . . . . . A. THOMAS

CONCERTO FOR PIANOFORTE, in E. flat. . . . . LISZT
MISS AUS DER OHE.

SUITE. "Peer Gynt." . . . . . GRIEG

DAYBREAK.
THE DEATH OF AASE.
ANITRA'S DANCE.
IN THE HALLS OF THE KING OF THE DOVRE MOUNTAINS.
(The Imps are chasing Peer Gynt.)

SOLO for PIANOFORTE. . . . . .
MISS AUS DER OHE.

SYMPHONY in A. (Italian.) . . . . . MENDELSSOHN
Allegro vivace.—Andante con moto.—
Con moto moderato.—Saltarello.

great length, held attention to the end. It is impossible to comment upon it in detail, but it must be said that there was not a number which did not deserve unqualified praise for daintiness of execution and beauty of expression.

The third and last Chopin recital will be given in Chickering Hall at 2.30 p. m. today. Following is the programme: Three etudes, op. 10; barcarole, op. 60; three preludes, op. 28; scherzo, op. 20; nocturne, op. 37; two mazourkas, op. 50; ballade, op. 38; tarantelle, 43; berceuse, op. 57; fantasie, op. 66; valse, op. 64, and polonaise, op. 53.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 16, 1890.

The Handel and Haydn Festival and the German Opera in Boston.

BOSTON, April 11.

BOSTON is more musically inclined than ever before, and not only has Music Hall been crowded to the doors during the Händel and Haydn concerts, but the German Opera Company, too, have had no cause to complain of lack of either patronage or enthusiasm. Of course the occurrence of the two events simultaneously caused the critics to attempt ubiquity, and I will not attempt to describe the amount of pedestrianism done between the Music Hall and the Boston Theatre (for in Boston the musical reviewers do not keep their own carriages and coachmen), but will give proper precedence to the festival of our great Oratorio Society, as far as I heard it. Without unseemly vaunting it may be said that we are as far ahead of other American cities in the sacred school as New York is in advance of us in operatic matters. The Händel and Haydn Festival (the seventy-fifth anniversary of the foundation of the society) began with a performance of "Elijah" before the largest audience I have ever seen in Music Hall. Hundreds of persons were turned from the doors unable to obtain even standing room. The extreme radicals may disdain Mendelssohn as much as they please, and may stigmatize "Elijah" as "a parlor oratorio," but the great public will still throng to hear it when it is well given and will still become enthusiastic over the dramatic "Thanks be to God" and the mellifluous "O, rest in the Lord."

The performance opened well. The overture, with its dark string phrases and its clarinet work in chalumeau register, was well given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the first chorus, "Help, Lord," was sung with power. The soprano voices, however, seemed rather thin and dry, as if they had been overrehearsed, and did not balance well against the other parts. Per contra, the tenors sang with inspiring boldness and power. The choruses to "Baal" were full of dramatic force, and "Thanks be to God" was excellent both in its vocal and instrumental parts.

The soloists were generally adequate. Lilli Lehmann gave "Hear ye, Israel," with majestic power, and I certainly approve of the contrasts of tempo which she used in the second part of this air. Miss Poole was unsatisfactory. She sang with a coldness that froze up everything in her part. "O, rest in the Lord," is certainly the most expressive alto solo that the master ever created, but it was sung in a manner that even the enthusiastic audience could not sanction, and passed unapplauded a specimen of iced Mendelssohn. Mr. Ludwig was "Elijah," and gave much dramatic fervor to the part. His voice was sometimes disagreeable in quality, as if he were overforcing it; but he was applauded to the echo, although he was so unequal. Nevertheless dramatic power counts for a great deal in so graphic a part as this, and the effort may be chronicled as a success. Mr. Edward Lloyd did not do himself justice at this concert, for he was throaty, and used the portamento as a route to all his high notes, but in "Then shall the righteous" he began to "shine forth."

Most perfect was the concerted solo music, for such singers as Mrs. Walker, Mrs. Wyman and Messrs. Johnson and Clark assisted. The double quartet "For he shall give his angels" was excellent, and the trio "Lift thine eyes" was sung better than I have heard it given. It was a pity that the part of the "Youth" was not given by a treble voice, since even Lilli Lehmann could not make a success of this ancient meteorological bureau. The second concert of the festival gave the first two parts of the Christmas oratorio (that work where Bach starts out in D major and proves his devotion to musical form by returning to that key two weeks later!) a couple of arias from the "Creation" and a new cantata by J. C. D. Parker. The chorales of the first work were well sung, although the sopranos were still not a perfect counterpoise to the other parts. The very difficult "Glory to God" was very well given, however, and did credit to the training of Carl Zerrahn, the veteran conductor.

Mr. Lloyd in this work showed himself to be a great artist in the greatest school. His phrasing was a model to study, for he did not mince up the roulades by breathing anywhere and everywhere in them as so many native singers do. His singing of "In native worth" was a triumph, and the audience fairly rose at him at its close. Lillian Nordica sang "On mighty pens" (not a tribute to the power of the press) with equal success, her fioriture being amazingly delicate and clear. Miss Emily Winant was also in good voice, and had won much applause in the exquisitely tender "Slumber Beloved," one of the very sweetest of all Bach's airs, and everyone was in a good mood to listen to the new cantata. I must not forget to chronicle the success of the "Pastoral Symphony," in which there were two English horns, as the composer demands, and the veteran De Ribas blew the second one, and the tempo, balance and phrasing were all commendable. I think it would be a wiser plan to drop the word "symphony" in this connection, and call the number simply "pastorale," for few, except musical antiquaries, know the old-fashioned pre-Haydnite use of the word.

When Mr. Parker stepped on the conductor's stand to lead his work he received an ovation which must have assured him that he occupies a warm place in the Bostonian heart. Mr. Parker is one of the pioneers of native art, and his efforts to advance it entitle him to the most distinguished consideration. But the cantata of "St. John" may be judged solely upon its merits, and will still receive a good position in the répertoire. At the very beginning it is impressive in a novel manner. In the treatment of such subjects one expects many connecting links of recitative, given generally by the tenor, in the character of either "narrator" or "Evangelist," but in this work a new departure has been made by giving such passages to the chorus in unison chanting phrases, while melodious subthemes appear in the orchestra as accompaniment. This has an indescribably majestic dignity, and will undoubtedly be employed by other composers. There is a skillful fugato in the first chorus at the words "That saith unto Zion," but the finest effect of this kind is found in the later chorus, "And they shall reign," which is a masterly fugue, and was finely sung also.

Strange to say, the composer goes into the opposite extreme in other parts of the work. The alto solo "Eye hath not seen" (beautifully sung by Miss Winant) is reminiscent of Mendelssohn in its sweetness, and the duet, "There shall be no more curse," goes even further in the sugary direction, and not even "Guarda che bianca Luna" could be more saccharine. A quartet beginning a capella—"Now are we the sons of God"—strikes the happy medium, and is a good specimen of the musicianly leading of the voices and melodic grace. There was just a little slip in the bass part here, but it was only momentary. And this leads me to add that I had almost omitted to mention the splendid quality of Mr. Myron Whitney's singing. His voice was under perfect control, and his intonation always exact. It will be a long time yet before this basso is to be placed on the retired list. Gounod's rather poor but popular work, "The Redemption," in which the promise of the Atonement is made in an agreeable polka theme, and in which the composer gives a vulgar march because he thinks that the ancient Jews deserved it (a theory against every principle of true art), was given at the third concert, but as "Lohengrin" was being presented at the Boston Theatre I chose a good work weakly rendered in preference to a weak one well given.

H. C. PERRY & SON.

We are ready to show the Largest and most complete stock of Ladies and Gentlemens Spring Style Shoes ever offered.

We have given SPECIAL attention in selecting the most desirable and stylish goods that can be found.

MISSES AND CHILDRENS GOODS in all grades and prices.

BANISTER'S CELEBRATED JERSEY SHOES

For Men a specialty.

SILK and GLORIA UMBRELLAS always in stock.

Examine our line of ELEGANT HATS for Gentlemen before purchasing.

H. C. PERRY & SON.

Taunton Academy of Music.

FRANCIS W. PERRY, Vocalist. GEORGE H. HOWARD, Pianist.

Complete course in

VOICE CULTURE, PIANOFORTE PLAYING,
HARMONY AND THEORY, SIGHT SINGING etc.

A special class in Harmony will be started next week.

Terms, $5.00 for Ten Lessons.

For full particulars in any Department

Address the Director,

FRANCIS W. PERRY,
Taunton Academy of Music,
Taunton, Mass.

great length, held attention to the end. It is impossible to comment upon it in detail, but it must be said that there was not a number which did not deserve unqualified praise for daintiness of execution and beauty of expression.

The third and last Chopin recital will be given in Chickering Hall at 2.30 p. m. today. Following is the programme: Three etudes, op. 10; barcarole, op. 60; three preludes, op. 28; scherzo, op. 20; nocturne, op. 37; two mazourkas, op. 50; ballade, op. 38; tarantelle, 43; berceuse, op. 57; fantasie, op. 66; valse, op. 64, and polonaise, op. 53.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 16, 1890.

The Handel and Haydn Festival and the German Opera in Boston.

BOSTON, April 11.

BOSTON is more musically inclined than ever before, and not only has Music Hall been crowded to the doors during the Händel and Haydn concerts, but the German Opera Company, too, have had no cause to complain of lack of either patronage or enthusiasm. Of course the occurrence of the two events simultaneously caused the critics to attempt ubiquity, and I will not attempt to describe the amount of pedestrianism done between the Music Hall and the Boston Theatre (for in Boston the musical reviewers do not keep their own carriages and coachmen), but will give proper precedence to the festival of our great Oratorio Society, as far as I heard it. Without unseemly vaunting it may be said that we are as far ahead of other American cities in the sacred school as New York is in advance of us in operatic matters. The Händel and Haydn Festival (the seventy-fifth anniversary of the foundation of the society) began with a performance of "Elijah" before the largest audience I have ever seen in Music Hall. Hundreds of persons were turned from the doors unable to obtain even standing room. The extreme radicals may disdain Mendelssohn as much as they please, and may stigmatize "Elijah" as "a parlor oratorio," but the great public will still throng to hear it when it is well given and will still become enthusiastic over the dramatic "Thanks be to God" and the mellifluous "O, rest in the Lord."

The performance opened well. The overture, with its dark string phrases and its clarinet work in chalumeau register, was well given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the first chorus, "Help, Lord," was sung with power. The soprano voices, however, seemed rather thin and dry, as if they had been overrehearsed, and did not balance well against the other parts. Per contra, the tenors sang with inspiring boldness and power. The choruses to "Baal" were full of dramatic force, and "Thanks be to God" was excellent both in its vocal and instrumental parts.

The soloists were generally adequate. Lilli Lehmann gave "Hear ye, Israel," with majestic power, and I certainly approve of the contrasts of tempo which she used in the second part of this air. Miss Poole was unsatisfactory. She sang with a coldness that froze up everything in her part. "O, rest in the Lord," is certainly the most expressive alto solo that the master ever created, but it was sung in a manner that even the enthusiastic audience could not sanction, and passed unapplauded a specimen of iced Mendelssohn. Mr. Ludwig was "Elijah," and gave much dramatic fervor to the part. His voice was sometimes disagreeable in quality, as if he were overforcing it; but he was applauded to the echo, although he was so unequal. Nevertheless dramatic power counts for a great deal in so graphic a part as this, and the effort may be chronicled as a success. Mr. Edward Lloyd did not do himself justice at this concert, for he was throaty, and used the portamento as a route to all his high notes, but in "Then shall the righteous" he began to "shine forth."

Most perfect was the concerted solo music, for such singers as Mrs. Walker, Mrs. Wyman and Messrs. Johnson and Clark assisted. The double quartet "For he shall give his angels" was excellent, and the trio "Lift thine eyes" was sung better than I have heard it given. It was a pity that the part of the "Youth" was not given by a treble voice, since even Lilli Lehmann could not make a success of this ancient meteorological bureau. The second concert of the festival gave the first two parts of the Christmas oratorio (that work where Bach starts out in D major and proves his devotion to musical form by returning to that key two weeks later!) a couple of arias from the "Creation" and a new cantata by J. C. D. Parker. The chorales of the first work were well sung, although the sopranos were still not a perfect counterpoise to the other parts. The very difficult "Glory to God" was very well given, however, and did credit to the training of Carl Zerrahn, the veteran conductor.

Mr. Lloyd in this work showed himself to be a great artist in the greatest school. His phrasing was a model to study, for he did not mince up the roulades by breathing anywhere and everywhere in them as so many native singers do. His singing of "In native worth" was a triumph, and the audience fairly rose at him at its close. Lillian Nordica sang "On mighty pens" (not a tribute to the power of the press) with equal success, her fioriture being amazingly delicate and clear. Miss Emily Winant was also in good voice, and had won much applause in the exquisitely tender "Slumber Beloved," one of the very sweetest of all Bach's airs, and everyone was in a good mood to listen to the new cantata. I must not forget to chronicle the success of the "Pastoral Symphony," in which there were two English horns, as the composer demands, and the veteran De Ribas blew the second one, and the tempo, balance and phrasing were all commendable. I think it would be a wiser plan to drop the word "symphony" in this connection, and call the number simply "pastorale," for few, except musical antiquaries, know the old-fashioned pre-Haydnite use of the word.

When Mr. Parker stepped on the conductor's stand to lead his work he received an ovation which must have assured him that he occupies a warm place in the Bostonian heart. Mr. Parker is one of the pioneers of native art, and his efforts to advance it entitle him to the most distinguished consideration. But the cantata of "St. John" may be judged solely upon its merits, and will still receive a good position in the répertoire. At the very beginning it is impressive in a novel manner. In the treatment of such subjects one expects many connecting links of recitative, given generally by the tenor, in the character of either "narrator" or "Evangelist," but in this work a new departure has been made by giving such passages to the chorus in unison chanting phrases, while melodious subthemes appear in the orchestra as accompaniment. This has an indescribably majestic dignity, and will undoubtedly be employed by other composers. There is a skillful fugato in the first chorus at the words "That saith unto Zion," but the finest effect of this kind is found in the later chorus, "And they shall reign," which is a masterly fugue, and was finely sung also.

Strange to say, the composer goes into the opposite extreme in other parts of the work. The alto solo "Eye hath not seen" (beautifully sung by Miss Winant) is reminiscent of Mendelssohn in its sweetness, and the duet, "There shall be no more curse," goes even further in the sugary direction, and not even "Guarda che bianca Luna" could be more saccharine. A quartet beginning a capella—"Now are we the sons of God"—strikes the happy medium, and is a good specimen of the musicianly leading of the voices and melodic grace. There was just a little slip in the bass part here, but it was only momentary. And this leads me to add that I had almost omitted to mention the splendid quality of Mr. Myron Whitney's singing. His voice was under perfect control, and his intonation always exact. It will be a long time yet before this basso is to be placed on the retired list. Gounod's rather poor but popular work, "The Redemption," in which the promise of the Atonement is made in an agreeable polka theme, and in which the composer gives a vulgar march because he thinks that the ancient Jews deserved it (a theory against every principle of true art), was given at the third concert, but as "Lohengrin" was being presented at the Boston Theatre I chose a good work weakly rendered in preference to a weak one well given.

[114]

...HERALD.

...

The Pachmann Chopin Cycles Concluded.

Vladimir de Pachmann, the Russian pianist, concluded the Chopin cyclus, at Chickering hall, yesterday afternoon, the third and last of the programme announced being played before a much larger audience than had attended either of the preceding events. The pianist was in his happiest mood, apparently, and threw himself into the afternoon's work with even more than his usual abandon. His selections for the day were these:

1. Barcarole, op. 60.
2. Preludes, op. 28 (Nos. 11, 12 and 24).
3. Etudes, op. 10 (Nos. 11 and 12), op. 25 (No. 9).
4. Scherzo, op. 20.
5. Nocturne, op. 37 (No. 1).
6. Mazurkas, op. 50 (No. 1), op. 24 (No. 4).
7. Ballade, op. 38.
8. Tarantelle, op. 43.
9. Berceuse, op. 57.
10. Fantaisie, op. 66.
11. Valse, op. 64 (No. 2).
12. Polonaise, op. 53.

This list of compositions and the way in which the several numbers were played made a fitting climax to the remarkable performances of the series, and the audience was carried to the highest pitch of excitement by the remarkable exhibition of the pianist's virtuosity given during the concert. Only by hearing Vladimir de Pachmann can a just estimate of his skill be formed and the most skeptical and conservative of patrons have been led to admit all that has been claimed for him after attending the performances of this cyclus. The great polonaise which ended the programme was, as played by De Pachmann, a marvel of piano work, showing the possibilities of the instrument in its interpretation that have been rarely realized by the present generation of pianists. Great prominence was also given to the lovely berceuse and fantasie impromptu in the afternoon's triumphs, and another remarkable success was won by the player in the ballad and the two mazourkas. The surprise of certain talkative members of the audience may be imagined when the player showed his annoyance at the entrance of a belated lady patron by hissing at her deliberately and very audibly. He kindly repeated the etude, op. 25, which created such a marked impression upon the previous day and again dazzled all who heard him. Those who, with true Boston conservatism, have waited to discover if De Pachmann, is really a remarkable player, may possibly be afforded an opportunity to hear him, as he will, in all probability, give one more recital here in the course of 10 days, before leaving for the western cities.

Boston Post

FRIDAY MORNING, APRIL 18, 1890

THE LAST PACHMANN CHOPIN RECITAL.

Again this wonderful Russian held his audience spell-bound for an hour and a half, their periods of pleasure and amazement being punctuated by bursts of applause. With each hearing the extraordinary fascination of his playing exerts itself more and more over the listener, and the almost boundless possibilities of his technique are more clearly seen. He repeated the etude in thirds, op. 25, No. 6 (by request), and was again applauded to the echo. It was stated yesterday in these columns that that was perhaps the most extraordinary pianistic tour-de-force ever heard in this city, but in yesterday's concert Pachmann surpassed even this. In the great polonaise, op. 53, in the middle part, he played the remarkably difficult octave passage in the left hand in such an easy, almost nonchalant manner, that it was almost impossible to believe one's ears. In fact, he put himself almost in the position of a man illustrating and accomplishing an impossibility. Not only did he play the notes, but he achieved a gradual but tremendous crescendo which was almost incredible. In the face of certain of Vladimir de Pachmann's performances in this city, it is easy to understand the enthusiastic utterances of some of our most conservative musicians. He has, like every other, his limitations, but the things which he can do he does as they were never done in this city before. It is understood that a movement is on foot to have him repeat certain of these concerts in Boston, and it is most sincerely to be hoped that this plan will be carried out, for his playing is indeed both a pleasure and an education.

ARTHUR WELD.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

FRIDAY MORNING, APRIL 18, 1890.

DE PACHMANN'S LAST RECITAL.

Vladimir de Pachmann gave the third and last of his Chopin recitals at Chickering Hall yesterday before the largest audience of the series. The pianist was put in an execrable temper at the outset by the arrival of late comers, and his ferocious outbreak against the luckless offenders was startling, to say the least, and seemed to have a sinister effect on the whole performance, which was not on the lofty plane of Wednesday's. For all that, it was a great musical event, and formed part of a series long to be remembered. The magnificent etude, op. 25, was repeated by request, and was given with almost the same faultless beauty as before. Another etude, op. 10, aroused the greatest enthusiasm, which it certainly deserved for its smooth brilliancy of execution. For the first time thus far, there was a slight tendency toward sentimentalism, appearing in the nocturne, op. 37. The polonaise, op. 53, formed a fitting conclusion to the recital, and was given with a great amount of dignity and clearness of execution.

Boston Daily Globe.

FRIDAY, APRIL 18.

Vladimir de Pachmann gave his third and last Chopin recital in Chickering Hall, yesterday afternoon, to a large and warmly enthusiastic audience. If Mr. Pachmann returns to Boston he will be cordially welcomed.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mme. Magdalene Steinbach-Jahns will be the soloist at this week's public rehearsal and concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mme. Jahns, who has never before appeared in America, until recently was the leading dramatic soprano at the Leipsic Stadt Theatre, and is said to be a supreme favorite with the critical Leipsic public.

She will sing at the rehearsal this afternoon an aria from "Die Entuefhrung aus dem Serail," Mozart, and songs by Liszt, Schubert and Grieg, with piano accompaniment by Mr. Nikisch.

Boston Evening Transcript.

FRIDAY, APRIL 18, 1890.

MR. DE PACHMANN'S RECITALS.

Mr. Vladimir de Pachmann gave the third and last of his Chopin recitals in Chickering Hall yesterday afternoon, the programme being:

Barcarolle, in F-sharp, Op. 60.
Preludes in B, G-sharp minor, and D-minor, Op. 28, Nos. 11, 12 and 24.
Etudes in E flat, C minor, and G flat, Op. 10, Nos. 11 and 12, and Op. 25, No. 9.
Scherzo in B minor, Op. 20.
Nocturne in G minor, Op. 37, No. 1.
Mazurkas in G, Op. 50, No. 1, and in B-flat minor, Op. 24, No. 4.
Ballade in F, Op. 38.
Tarentelle in A-flat, Op. 43.
Berceuse in D-flat, Op. 57.
Fantaisie Impromptu in C-sharp minor, Op. 66.
Waltz in C-sharp minor, Op 64, No. 2.
Polonaise in A-flat, Op. 53.

Mr. de Pachmann has now been heard here for three afternoons, and under more favorable and congenial circumstances than almost any other famous transatlantic pianist who has played here for many years. Rubinstein, von Bülow, Rosenthal and Eugen d'Albert were first heard here in the Music Hall, and three of them have played in the Music Hall only. Joseffy appeared first in Horticultural Hall, which gave him a marked advantage over the others; and now Mr. de Pachmann has played in Chickering Hall with all the advantages to be derived from a small hall of good acoustics, and from those quasi-intimate relations with his audience which can be established only in a small hall. One has thus had excellent opportunity for forming an opinion of his po w ers as a pianist, and, if not as an interpreter of a wide range of music, at least as a Chopin player.

His incomparably sure and brilliant technique, the beauty of his tone, especially in passages where he uses the soft pedal, his persistently confining the pianoforte to its proper, natural functions, never forcing the tone unduly, never banging, all equip him admirably for playing Chopin. Beyond these, however, one finds little in him that is in sympathy with the great Polish pianoforte writer.

In speaking of Chopin, people in general lay stress upon his romanticism, his depth and grace of sentiment, his poetic nature, his passion, and now and then, also, upon a certain morbid strain there was in him. It even happens sometimes that people speak of his piquancy as an item worthy of note. All these qualities Chopin indubitably possessed, and each one of them to a high degree. But it is important to remember that these qualities in him were controlled and made artistically efficacious by others, which the more thoughtless of his admirers are wont to emphasize less frequently. First and foremost of these was the absolute and thoroughgoing genuineness of his nature, his complete freedom from affectation; everything in him was real, his morbidness and his occasional melancholy as real as his grace and poetic romanticism. Then there was his perfect refinement; it pervaded everything he wrote; his passion never reaches the pitch of vulgar raving, his piquancy never degenerates into mere chic, his fondness for embellishments and sensuous beauty never bewrayed him into what was meretricious. His artistic taste was well-nigh impeccable; exaggeration was his abhorrence. Last, but by no manner of means least, stood the distinctly and specifically musical character of his mind and instincts. Tone-poet as he has been called, and was, he was something more than a tone-poet; he was no energumen of "Instrumental- und Vocal-Poesie, die keine Musik ist." Not only was his inspiration essentially musical in character, but his instinct was always to make it assume a plastic musical shape. Clearness, balance and perfection of musical form were as much his aim as warmth of musical expression. He was no contrapuntist, to be sure, but his musical instinct was so fine, his harmony so logical and well put together, that it has aptly been called "verschleierter Kontrapunkt" (veiled counterpoint) by a German commentator. His sense for musical form per se was very fine. In complete mastery over the larger musical forms he has been surpassed; but his power, even here, has been too often underrated, and his instinct and striving were ever in the direction of that artistic process of crystalization by which pure emotion is enabled to reveal itself in articulate, coherent and logical forms of expression. Some contemporaries of his—Berlioz and Meyerbeer among them—complained that, in his playing, Chopin showed a defective sense for rhythm. We think, however, that the fault must have lain largely in their ears, rather than in Chopin's playing. His style of rubato phrasing was something new then, and might well have tended to make unaccustomed ears lose their bearings. Certainly his compositions show the very finest rhythmic construction, and it is credibly reported of his playing, that, whatever liberties his right hand might take with the melody, his left hand always acted as Kapellmeister, and held the music together in rhythmic unity. Rhythmic freedom in playing has often been mistaken for rhythmic insecurity and obscurity, just as, in composition, frequent modulation has often wrongly been called indefinite tonality. Rhythmic security in playing does not mean persistency, but a clear distinctness of accent, which, amid all sorts of modifications of the tempo, always lets the listener know immediately just where he is.

Now, of all these characteristics of Chopin, we could find only one which seemed to call forth a sympathetic response in kind from Mr. de Pachmann. This was Chopin's piquancy. Light, fairy-like, trickey things like the Waltzes in D-flat and A-flat, the Scherzo of the B minor Sonata, and, above all, the G-sharp minor Etude, from Opus 25, he plays with a nimbleness, a charm and witchery of effect that are simply astonishing. Where Chopin contents himself with being bewitching, he finds in Mr. de Pachmann an interpreter like few. Yet even here Mr. de Pachmann shows a terribly defective rhythmic sense; in some of his very rapid playing you cannot, for the life of you, tell whether he is playing in even or triple time. This want of rhythmic feeling runs through the greater part of his playing. But when we leave the piquant and bewitching in Chopin, we meet with no adequate response to his other qualities from Mr. de Pachmann. We have heard some people go into raptures over the romanticism of his playing. We find it impossible to feel this. He plays often with a certain overstrained and premeditated expressiveness which might, for a while, pass current as romanticism; but it seems to us a very suspicious, self-conscious and skin-deep sort of romanticism, devoid of all true poetic feeling, as it is of really musical quality. Mr. de Pachmann seems to know clearly enough what Chopin was, and what were his more prominent traits. But he seldom shows a perception of anything but the mere external manifestation of these traits, nor is he able to mirror them back to us, in his playing, otherwise than in a purely external and artificial way. Modifications of the tempo, of dynamic shading from pianissimo to forte, the giving prominence to this or that melodic phrase, these things he is master of; but what he seems to have little, or no, distinct perception of is the wealth of musical, poetic and emotional life that underlies all these, and necessitates them as its true outward expression. In all his three recitals we can remember hearing him play hardly a phrase of slow cantilena at once effectively and naturally, that is, vocally, as pure musical feeling and true emotion would prompt. His playing of slow or moderate movements is generally either flat and ineffective, as in the first part of the Barcarolle, or vague and giving no impression of definite form or coherence, as in the first movement of the B minor sonata, when it is not tortured all out of musical shape and meaning.

When he attempts the tragic his sentimentalism is simply cloying; his playing of the Funeral March can only be called impudent. That he has great charm is not to be denied; but it seems, for the most part, of the shallow, superficial sort. It smells of æsthetic salons, vers de société, and of the utterly-utter, ineffable and supreme in general. His sentimental phrasing so lays itself out to be charming, it is so full of far-fetched, mincing graces, and well-studied fascinations, that it seems meretricious. We have not the deeply-rooted antipathy to what is meretricious that some grave people have; we find virtue admirable, but still have a considerable liking for cakes and ale; we had far rather be pleased meretriciously than not be pleased at all. But everything has its place, and meretriciousness has no more to do with Chopin than poetry has with Tupper. And when we hear much of Chopin played as Mr. de Pachmann plays it, there is a something in us that rebels. That sort of charm and sentiment should be kept for men like Herz, Goria or Rosellen, men who have a fascinating gift for talking, but nothing to say.

There is one trait in Mr. de Pachmann that strikes us as rather suspicious. That he often perverts the character of the music he plays, adapting it to those peculiar effects of which he is most surely master, is, of itself, not so strange as that he should pervert just the passages he does. At several points in the F minor Fantasia, the B-flat minor Scherzo, the C minor Etude, and elsewhere, just when Chopin is rushing on headlong, white-hot with passion, Mr. de Pachmann suddenly falls a murmuring and cooing with the most seductive sweetness. He took the trouble, to be sure, to tell the audience that he had it on Liszt's authority that the C minor study was not "dramatic" but "poetic." Well, "dramatic" and "poetic" are not very definite musical terms, and are open to considerable latitude of interpretation. At any rate, fortissimo is not essentially more dramatic nor less poetic than piano. We know, for one thing, that some passages in the C minor study and other similar ones that we have hinted at, demand the very greatest physical strength and endurance in the player; if any pianist of less notable technique than Mr. de Pachmann had ventured to play them piano, instead of with the utmost vigor and intensity of fire, he would have laid himself open to the suspicion of doing so because it was easier.

Boston Daily Traveller.

FRIDAY, APRIL 18, 1890.

De Pachmann's Piano Recitals—Closing Performances of German Opera.

De Pachmann played a Chopin programme on Wednesday, and another on Thursday afternoon, in Chickering Hall, each time to a full house; in fact, yesterday's audience tested the capacity of the room. His three programmes have shown us the subtle Polish composer in all his moods. Exception will undoubtedly be taken to some of De Pachmann's readings, what may be called liberties with the text, and it is possible that his over-sentimentalization of his composer becomes wearisome to many, but after all is said, the man is a genius, and no more lovelier piano playing has ever been heard here. To enter into details is not called for. At De Pachmann's concerts the listener sits and just drinks the music in; the player's pantomime is a part of him, and is no mean factor in impressing an audience. Should De Pachmann return, we hope he will not be tempted to leave Chickering Hall, which is just the place for him, and may we venture the hope that the next series of recitals may have to do with pianoforte composers in general. It is to be hoped that the talented wife of the pianist may play to us. The following pen picture of De Pachmann is the tribute of a New Yorker:

"Have you seen Pachmann? I don't mean to listen to his charming piano playing, but have you gazed upon one of the most eccentric of modern pianists?

"Bulow's eccentricity tastes of preparation, and his so-called impromptus are the result of careful premeditation; but this funny little Sclavic goblin, this pianistic gnome, a genuine Mime of the keyboard, does everything on the spur of the moment. He is naive to a fault, and at his first recital I heard him murmur softly after the performance of a very clever run, 'Bravo! bravo!' Indeed, the intense appreciation of his own music is delightful. He boldly declares that nobody plays the barcarolle of Chopin as he does, and when a brother pianist told him he had played like a 'little god,' he exclaimed: 'Who is the great god? You? I am the great god of the piano,' and he ran away in a trice.

"His face, which is very mobile, reflects as a sort of psychical mirror every emotion he is portraying in his music; hence his recitals partake of something of the nature of a Delsartian exposition, with some very fine music thrown in."

[114]

BOSTON HERALD.

SUNDAY, APRIL 17, 1890.

The Pachmann Chopin Cycius Concluded.

Vladimir de Pachmann, the Russian pianist, concluded the Chopin cycius, at Chickering hall, yesterday afternoon, the third and last of the programme announced being played before a much larger audience than had attended either of the preceding events. The pianist was in his happiest mood, apparently, and threw himself into the afternoon's work with even more than his usual abandon. His selections for the day were these:

1. Barcarole, op. 60.
2. Preludes, op. 28 (Nos. 11, 12 and 24).
3. Etudes, op. 10 (Nos. 11 and 12), op. 25 (No. 9).
4. Scherzo, op. 20.
5. Nocturne, op. 37 (No. 1).
6. Mazurkas, op. 50 (No. 1), op. 24 (No. 4).
7. Ballade, op. 38.
8. Tarantelle, op. 43.
9. Berceuse, op. 57.
10. Fantaisie, op. 66.
11. Valse, op. 64 (No. 2).
12. Polonaise, op. 53.

This list of compositions and the way in which the several numbers were played made a fitting climax to the remarkable performances of the series, and the audience was carried to the highest pitch of excitement by the remarkable exhibition of the pianist's virtuosity given during the concert. Only by hearing Vladimir de Pachmann can a just estimate of his skill be formed and the most skeptical and conservative of patrons have been led to admit all that has been claimed for him after attending the performances of this cycius. The great polonaise which ended the programme was, as played by De Pachmann, a marvel of piano work, showing the possibilities of the instrument in its interpretation that have been rarely realized by the present generation of pianists. Great prominence was also given to the lovely berceuse and fantasie impromptu in the afternoon's triumphs, and another remarkable success was won by the player in the ballad and the two mazourkas. The surprise of certain talkative members of the audience may be imagined when the player showed his annoyance at the entrance of a belated lady patron by hissing at her deliberately and very audibly. He kindly repeated the etude, op. 25, which created such a marked impression upon the previous day and again dazzled all who heard him. Those who, with true Boston conservatism, have waited to discover if De Pachmann, is really a remarkable player, may possibly be afforded an opportunity to hear him, as he will, in all probability, give one more recital here in the course of 10 days, before leaving for the western cities.

Boston Post

FRIDAY MORNING, APRIL 18, 1890

THE LAST PACHMANN CHOPIN RECITAL.

Again this wonderful Russian held his audience spell-bound for an hour and a half, their periods of pleasure and amazement being punctuated by bursts of applause. With each hearing the extraordinary fascination of his playing exerts itself more and more over the listener, and the almost boundless possibilities of his technique are more clearly seen. He repeated the etude in thirds, op. 25, No. 6 (by request), and was again applauded to the echo. It was stated yesterday in these columns that that was perhaps the most extraordinary pianistic tour-de-force ever heard in this city, but in yesterday's concert Pachmann surpassed even this. In the great polonaise, op. 53, in the middle part, he played the remarkably difficult octave passage in the left hand in such an easy, almost nonchalant manner, that it was almost impossible to believe one's ears. In fact, he put himself almost in the position of a man illustrating and accomplishing an impossibility. Not only did he play the notes, but he achieved a gradual but tremendous crescendo which was almost incredible. In the face of certain of Vladimir de Pachmann's performances in this city, it is easy to understand the enthusiastic utterances of some of our most conservative musicians. He has, like every other, his limitations, but the things which he can do he does as they were never done in this city before. It is understood that a movement is on foot to have him repeat certain of these concerts in Boston, and it is most sincerely to be hoped that this plan will be carried out, for his playing is indeed both a pleasure and an education.

ARTHUR WELD.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

FRIDAY MORNING, APRIL 18, 1890.

DE PACHMANN'S LAST RECITAL.

Vladimir de Pachmann gave the third and last of his Chopin recitals at Chickering Hall yesterday before the largest audience of the series. The pianist was put in an execrable temper at the outset by the arrival of late comers, and his ferocious outbreak against the luckless offenders was startling, to say the least, and seemed to have a sinister effect on the whole performance, which was not on the lofty plane of Wednesday's. For all that, it was a great musical event, and formed part of a series long to be remembered. The magnificent etude, op. 25, was repeated by request, and was given with almost the same faultless beauty as before. Another etude, op. 10, aroused the greatest enthusiasm, which it certainly deserved for its smooth brilliancy of execution. For the first time thus far, there was a slight tendency toward sentimentalism, appearing in the nocturne, op. 37. The polonaise, op. 53, formed a fitting conclusion to the recital, and was given with a great amount of dignity and clearness of execution.

Boston Daily Globe.

FRIDAY, APRIL 18.

Vladimir de Pachmann gave his third and last Chopin recital in Chickering Hall, yesterday afternoon, to a large and warmly enthusiastic audience. If Mr. Pachmann returns to Boston he will be cordially welcomed.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mme. Magdalene Steinbach-Jahns will be the soloist at this week's public rehearsal and concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mme. Jahns, who has never before appeared in America, until recently was the leading dramatic soprano at the Leipsic Stadt Theatre, and is said to be a supreme favorite with the critical Leipsic public.

She will sing at the rehearsal this afternoon an aria from "Die Entuefhrung aus dem Serail," Mozart, and songs by Liszt, Schubert and Grieg, with piano accompaniment by Mr. Nikisch.

Boston Evening Transcript.

FRIDAY, APRIL 18, 1890.

MR. DE PACHMANN'S RECITALS.

Mr. Vladimir de Pachmann gave the third and last of his Chopin recitals in Chickering Hall yesterday afternoon, the programme being:

Barcarolle, in F-sharp, Op. 60.
Preludes in B, G-sharp minor, and D-minor, Op. 28, Nos. 11, 12 and 24.
Etudes in E flat, C minor, and G flat, Op. 10, Nos. 11 and 12, and Op. 25, No. 9.
Scherzo in B minor, Op. 20.
Nocturne in G minor, Op. 37, No. 1.
Mazurkas in G, Op. 50, No. 1, and in B-flat minor, Op. 24, No. 4.
Ballade in F, Op. 38.
Tarentelle in A-flat, Op. 43.
Berceuse in D-flat, Op. 57.
Fantaisie Impromptu in C-sharp minor, Op. 66.
Waltz in C-sharp minor, Op 64, No. 2.
Polonaise in A-flat, Op. 53.

Mr. de Pachmann has now been heard here for three afternoons, and under more favorable and congenial circumstances than almost any other famous transatlantic pianist who has played here for many years. Rubinstein, von Bülow, Rosenthal and Eugen d'Albert were first heard here in the Music Hall, and three of them have played in the Music Hall only. Joseffy appeared first in Horticultural Hall, which gave him a marked advantage over the others; and now Mr. de Pachmann has played in Chickering Hall with all the advantages to be derived from a small hall of good acoustics, and from those quasi-intimate relations with his audience which can be established only in a small hall. One has thus had excellent opportunity for forming an opinion of his po w ers as a pianist, and, if not as an interpreter of a wide range of music, at least as a Chopin player.

His incomparably sure and brilliant technique, the beauty of his tone, especially in passages where he uses the soft pedal, his persistently confining the pianoforte to its proper, natural functions, never forcing the tone unduly, never banging, all equip him admirably for playing Chopin. Beyond these, however, one finds little in him that is in sympathy with the great Polish pianoforte writer.

In speaking of Chopin, people in general lay stress upon his romanticism, his depth and grace of sentiment, his poetic nature, his passion, and now and then, also, upon a certain morbid strain there was in him. It even happens sometimes that people speak of his piquancy as an item worthy of note. All these qualities Chopin indubitably possessed, and each one of them to a high degree. But it is important to remember that these qualities in him were controlled and made artistically efficacious by others, which the more thoughtless of his admirers are wont to emphasize less frequently. First and foremost of these was the absolute and thoroughgoing genuineness of his nature, his complete freedom from affectation; everything in him was real, his morbidness and his occasional melancholy as real as his grace and poetic romanticism. Then there was his perfect refinement; it pervaded everything he wrote; his passion never reaches the pitch of vulgar raving, his piquancy never degenerates into mere chic, his fondness for embellishments and sensuous beauty never bewrayed him into what was meretricious. His artistic taste was well-nigh impeccable; exaggeration was his abhorrence. Last, but by no manner of means least, stood the distinctly and specifically musical character of his mind and instincts. Tone-poet as he has been called, and was, he was something more than a tone-poet; he was no energumen of "Instrumental- und Vocal-Poesie, die keine Musik ist." Not only was his inspiration essentially musical in character, but his instinct was always to make it assume a plastic musical shape. Clearness, balance and perfection of musical form were as much his aim as warmth of musical expression. He was no contrapuntist, to be sure, but his musical instinct was so fine, his harmony so logical and well put together, that it has aptly been called "verschleierter Kontrapunkt" (veiled counterpoint) by a German commentator. His sense for musical form per se was very fine. In complete mastery over the larger musical forms he has been surpassed; but his power, even here, has been too often underrated, and his instinct and striving were ever in the direction of that artistic process of crystalization by which pure emotion is enabled to reveal itself in articulate, coherent and logical forms of expression. Some contemporaries of his—Berlioz and Meyerbeer among them—complained that, in his playing, Chopin showed a defective sense for rhythm. We think, however, that the fault must have lain largely in their ears, rather than in Chopin's playing. His style of rubato phrasing was something new then, and might well have tended to make unaccustomed ears lose their bearings. Certainly his compositions show the very finest rhythmic construction, and it is credibly reported of his playing, that, whatever liberties his right hand might take with the melody, his left hand always acted as Kapellmeister, and held the music together in rhythmic unity. Rhythmic freedom in playing has often been mistaken for rhythmic insecurity and obscurity, just as, in composition, frequent modulation has often wrongly been called indefinite tonality. Rhythmic security in playing does not mean persistency, but a clear distinctness of accent, which, amid all sorts of modifications of the tempo, always lets the listener know immediately just where he is.

Now, of all these characteristics of Chopin, we could find only one which seemed to call forth a sympathetic response in kind from Mr. de Pachmann. This was Chopin's piquancy. Light, fairy-like, trickey things like the Waltzes in D-flat and A-flat, the Scherzo of the B minor Sonata, and, above all, the G-sharp minor Etude, from Opus 25, he plays with a nimbleness, a charm and witchery of effect that are simply astonishing. Where Chopin contents himself with being bewitching, he finds in Mr. de Pachmann an interpreter like few. Yet even here Mr. de Pachmann shows a terribly defective rhythmic sense; in some of his very rapid playing you cannot, for the life of you, tell whether he is playing in even or triple time. This want of rhythmic feeling runs through the greater part of his playing. But when we leave the piquant and bewitching in Chopin, we meet with no adequate response to his other qualities from Mr. de Pachmann. We have heard some people go into raptures over the romanticism of his playing. We find it impossible to feel this. He plays often with a certain overstrained and premeditated expressiveness which might, for a while, pass current as romanticism; but it seems to us a very suspicious, self-conscious and skin-deep sort of romanticism, devoid of all true poetic feeling, as it is of really musical quality. Mr. de Pachmann seems to know clearly enough what Chopin was, and what were his more prominent traits. But he seldom shows a perception of anything but the mere external manifestation of these traits, nor is he able to mirror them back to us, in his playing, otherwise than in a purely external and artificial way. Modifications of the tempo, of dynamic shading from pianissimo to forte, the giving prominence to this or that melodic phrase, these things he is master of; but what he seems to have little, or no, distinct perception of is the wealth of musical, poetic and emotional life that underlies all these, and necessitates them as its true outward expression. In all his three recitals we can remember hearing him play hardly a phrase of slow cantilena at once effectively and naturally, that is, vocally, as pure musical feeling and true emotion would prompt. His playing of slow or moderate movements is generally either flat and ineffective, as in the first part of the Barcarolle, or vague and giving no impression of definite form or coherence, as in the first movement of the B minor sonata, when it is not tortured all out of musical shape and meaning.

When he attempts the tragic his sentimentalism is simply cloying; his playing of the Funeral March can only be called impudent. That he has great charm is not to be denied; but it seems, for the most part, of the shallow, superficial sort. It smells of æsthetic salons, vers de société, and of the utterly-utter, ineffable and supreme in general. His sentimental phrasing so lays itself out to be charming, it is so full of far-fetched, mincing graces, and well-studied fascinations, that it seems meretricious. We have not the deeply-rooted antipathy to what is meretricious that some grave people have; we find virtue admirable, but still have a considerable liking for cakes and ale; we had far rather be pleased meretriciously than not be pleased at all. But everything has its place, and meretriciousness has no more to do with Chopin than poetry has with Tupper. And when we hear much of Chopin played as Mr. de Pachmann plays it, there is a something in us that rebels. That sort of charm and sentiment should be kept for men like Herz, Goria or Rosellen, men who have a fascinating gift for talking, but nothing to say.

There is one trait in Mr. de Pachmann that strikes us as rather suspicious. That he often perverts the character of the music he plays, adapting it to those peculiar effects of which he is most surely master, is, of itself, not so strange as that he should pervert just the passages he does. At several points in the F minor Fantasia, the B-flat minor Scherzo, the C minor Etude, and elsewhere, just when Chopin is rushing on headlong, white-hot with passion, Mr. de Pachmann suddenly falls a murmuring and cooing with the most seductive sweetness. He took the trouble, to be sure, to tell the audience that he had it on Liszt's authority that the C minor study was not "dramatic" but "poetic." Well, "dramatic" and "poetic" are not very definite musical terms, and are open to considerable latitude of interpretation. At any rate, fortissimo is not essentially more dramatic nor less poetic than piano. We know, for one thing, that some passages in the C minor study and other similar ones that we have hinted at, demand the very greatest physical strength and endurance in the player; if any pianist of less notable technique than Mr. de Pachmann had ventured to play them piano, instead of with the utmost vigor and intensity of fire, he would have laid himself open to the suspicion of doing so because it was easier.

Boston Daily Traveller.

FRIDAY, APRIL 18, 1890.

De Pachmann's Piano Recitals—Closing Performances of German Opera.

De Pachmann played a Chopin programme on Wednesday, and another on Thursday afternoon, in Chickering Hall, each time to a full house; in fact, yesterday's audience tested the capacity of the room. His three programmes have shown us the subtle Polish composer in all his moods. Exception will undoubtedly be taken to some of De Pachmann's readings, what may be called liberties with the text, and it is possible that his over-sentimentalization of his composer becomes wearisome to many, but after all is said, the man is a genius, and no more lovelier piano playing has ever been heard here. To enter into details is not called for. At De Pachmann's concerts the listener sits and just drinks the music in; the player's pantomime is a part of him, and is no mean factor in impressing an audience. Should De Pachmann return, we hope he will not be tempted to leave Chickering Hall, which is just the place for him, and may we venture the hope that the next series of recitals may have to do with pianoforte composers in general. It is to be hoped that the talented wife of the pianist may play to us. The following pen picture of De Pachmann is the tribute of a New Yorker:

"Have you seen Pachmann? I don't mean to listen to his charming piano playing, but have you gazed upon one of the most eccentric of modern pianists?

"Bulow's eccentricity tastes of preparation, and his so-called impromptus are the result of careful premeditation; but this funny little Sclavic goblin, this pianistic gnome, a genuine Mime of the keyboard, does everything on the spur of the moment. He is naive to a fault, and at his first recital I heard him murmur softly after the performance of a very clever run, 'Bravo! bravo!' Indeed, the intense appreciation of his own music is delightful. He boldly declares that nobody plays the barcarolle of Chopin as he does, and when a brother pianist told him he had played like a 'little god,' he exclaimed: 'Who is the great god? You? I am the great god of the piano,' and he ran away in a trice.

"His face, which is very mobile, reflects as a sort of psychical mirror every emotion he is portraying in his music; hence his recitals partake of something of the nature of a Delsartian exposition, with some very fine music thrown in."

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, APR. 19, 1890.

THE ORATORIO FESTIVAL.

Handel's "Israel in Egypt" ended the Handel and Haydn Society's series of festival performances, and was given before an enormous audience on Sunday evening, which was the anniversary of the composer's death. That the rarely broken succession of immense choruses might be relieved, some short airs were transferred from other works; but it may be questioned whether the good result was sufficient to balance the inconsistency, because whoever goes to hear this work is likely to go with an intelligent understanding of its arrangement, and depending upon the refreshment which can be found in the more exciting choruses, in one or two airs for the tenor and the bass duet, "The Lord is a Man of War." On this evening the highest pitch of enthusiasm was reached under the influence of that duet, to which Mr. Ludwig and Mr. Whitney imparted such immense spirit and ardor that a repetition was only staved off with difficulty. The tenor part is small and secondary, but Mr. Lloyd made it appear of more consequence than it is by his perfect apportionment of his voice and his arts of delivery to each passage, treating each phrase as though that alone were the test by which he had to be measured. The music assigned for solo voices of women is also subordinated to the great choral movement, but Miss De Vere and Miss Poole won credit in it, although it must be noted that the light soprano of the former and her style, more eminent for finesse than force, were at some disadvantage here. The choir was at times superb in volume, in animation, in spirit and in correctness of reading, while at others it fell short of sustaining its phrases, missed its accents and lost its expressiveness. And this brings us at last to something which must needs be said seriously and should be taken to heart in the right spirit. It is now time that something more should be done with this strong, intelligent and interested choir than Mr. Zerrahn has yet done with it. He is not to be blamed that this body, like those aggregations of provincial societies and conventions with which he is so much engaged, has hitherto been so constituted that he must devote himself above all to forcing them into their places and keeping them going, which is in itself something that no beat less strong, compulsory and unrelaxing could have done, and would have exhausted a less tenacious and determined disposition than his. Many a time all that has prevented collapse or disaster has been his imperious call, his opportune outcry of the lead and his indomitable courage to urge on and to carry his point. But this chorus is now ready and able to do more than this crude work, and it must be made to do it—that this is possible the successful shadings obtained by Mr. Parker in his "Saint John" conclusively proved. Strong, broad outlines are necessary, but they are only the beginning of art; color, taste, fine finish and expressiveness are equally demanded, and that will be inadequate conductorship which does not now insist upon having them. Mr. Zerrahn must not treat this chorus like others and be content with the rudiments of rendering; he must insist upon correct and symmetrical phrasing, true contrasts of force, progressive gradations of tone and incontestable accuracy of emphasis. The old state of things upon the seats before him has passed away, and he must bend up his energies with a will toward making all things new there. The pecuniary profit of the festival has been gratifyingly large, and of all who have found something to criticize in the selection of the oratorios or the performance of particular passages none has had any word but of praise for the honorable ambition, the patient, energetic preparation and the liberal, high-spirited dealing of the management. The conclusion is encouraging; it proves that the great mass of music-lovers are willing to sustain the society when it exerts itself to give the best which can be had and it sets in clear light the merits and the defects of the society as it stands today, giving warning, encouragement and hope.

DE PACHMANN AND CHOPIN.

There is almost always a great discrepancy between what has been written about the music of Chopin and the effect produced by it. He has been said to have embodied in it the most characteristic of Polish traits and manners as they were in their best estate, and to have depicted in piano poetry, the romance, the passion, the love of voluptuousness and grace, the fancy, the glitter, the pageantry, the undulant motion and the pulsating, fluctuating sentiment of fine festivity or intimate hour; and they who heard and knew and have clared that all this and more came before them as he touched the keys. But as this music is generally played it is only by hard effort of memory and imagination that any suggestion of that poetry and imagery can be obtained. Occasionally an isolated extract comes vivid and stimulating from under some hand, or a foreign stranger imparts to a few selections a different and less prosaic influence; but as a rule, even perfection of form is not instinct with the expected and longed-for spirit, and the listener wonders if he has been all wrong in his desires and the expectations which he had been led to cherish. But at last there has come a man who—in spite of some interfering eccentricities of manner and some unacceptable views of this music—plays by the hour from Chopin and makes the hearer feel that the soul of the pages is passing out into sound and giving the ear, the imagination and the feeling what has lain so long concealed and unapproachable. In such space as we can command it is not possible to detail the three programmes which Vladimir de Pachmann has performed this week at Chickering's or to analyze his treatment of them—not even to specify those numbers in which he reached the height of beauty and limpidity of technique and of spiritual insight, or those in which he seemed to wander far astray from the truth. The essential peculiarity of his rendering is that he disregards the formal developments which the rhetoric and logic of music have always dictated, and arrives, as if by instinct, at conclusions totally different, infinitely more satisfying and convincingly accordant with what is understood of Chopin's own sensitive variable nature and unique manner of expression. Things which have been positively marked and demonstrated are insinuated and floated into the mind; those which have been urged are almost reluctantly confessed; the unrelaxing movement changes to concessive wavy flow, and emphatic crescent conclusions die meltingly away in softening, lingering strains. And all these fancies and sentiments are presented through a style which is incomparably delicate, distinct and pearly in its lightest phases, manly, firm and large in the greater ones and which is so absolutely at the player's command that it leaves him free, even in the most dangerous movements, to gaze into the faces of his auditors and to take them into his confidence with little running comments—things which savor either of extreme affectation or utter ingenuousness, and often distract the attention which it is a pity to disturb. In a word, then, allowance made for any disagreement as to interpretation in individual pieces, this Chopin playing of De Pachmann is distinctly new, astonishing, delightful and satisfying.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

There is some new music for the concert of tonight, the programme naming Goldmark's "Spring" overture, Volkmann's Serenade in D-minor, and the first symphony of Brahms. Also there is a new artist, in the person of Mme. Steinbach-Jahns, who arrived in New York a few days ago and now makes her American début, preparatory to joining the orchestra in their spring tour through the South and West. This lady, who has held a position as leading dramatic (but not heavy) soprano at the Leipzig theatre, and now comes under the special auspices of Mr. Nikisch, who of course had, as conductor, the best opportunities for knowing her abilities, presents herself first in the bold, brilliant "Matern aller Arten," from Mozart's "Ent führuhg aus dem Serail," rich in dramatic bravura, of course with orchestral accompaniment, and then later in these songs with the piano—Liszt's "O Lieb," Schubert's "Du bist die Ruh," Grieg's "Hoffnung." The impression she made yesterday was distinctly favorable and auspicious for this evening. She is a tall, shapely woman, of interesting and expressive face, graceful and easy in bearing. Her voice is of equable timbre, smooth in the lower register and rising clearly and resonantly to the notes high above the staff. Her intonation is firm and true, her phrasing broad, and she sings colorature with unusual generosity and volume; if there be a lack in her method it will probably be found in the mezzo voce which was yesterday too full and incisive. But allowance must be made for a tentative first appearance under conditions all new and strange. The air was delivered with great freedom and spirit and its difficult repeated high notes nobly struck, while the lieder were well contrasted in their dramatic character, the second and third pleasing the audience particularly. The overture, which is new, is delightfully true to its name; its general temper is calm, suave, gently expanding and aspiring, illuminated by many bright brief voicings as of birds and swellings as of early birds, and occasionally there is a keener air or a bolder burst; but the tone is chiefly pastoral, hopeful and lightly gay. The Serenade, new to these concerts, brings some reminders of its author's other works in this genre, but is individualized by an important obbligato for violoncello (well played by Mr. Hekking) which is now in free recitative, now antiphonal with the orchestra and now in antithesis to it. The work is in Volkmann's more bland and cheerful vein, and in the latter part are some passages whose fancy is almost turned with a humorous bent. The orchestra played all finely and often with exceeding delicacy, and Mr. Nikisch's piano accompaniments were exquisite. The programme for the last concert, which comes next week, has been thus appointed: Beethoven, Symphony No. 4, in B-flat; Paganini, Moto perpetuo, Allegro de Concert, (for 32 violins); Wagner, Prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

ON HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, APRIL 19, 1890

ISRAEL IN EGYPT.—The seventy-fifth Anniversary Festival of the Handel and Hayden Society is now over. Handel's "Israel in Egypt" was given Sunday evening, the last evening of the Festival. The soloists were Miss Clemensine De Vere, Miss Clara Poole, Messrs. Lloyd, Ludwig and Whitney.

When "Israel" was first brought out, it failed; and during Handel's life it was given only nine times. Mistress Delany wrote in 1756, apropos of its revival, that it did not please the people; it was too solemn for ordinary ears; and she herself preferred to go to a coffee-party rather than listen to its performance. For her reckless truthfulness she has been pilloried by the learned Dr. Chrysander and by other Handel worshippers; yet was not the lady right?

Handel himself tried by the introduction of airs, by doctoring it in various ways, to make it "popular"; his efforts were in vain.

It certainly is an extraordinary work. It is extraordinary as an exhibition of the piratical prowess of Handel. For fourteen numbers of "Israel" are to be found (whole or in part) in the compositions of Kerl, Urio, Erba and Stradella. He is one of the noble army of robbers, with Shakespere, Molière, Sterne, Charles Reade. For this the ingenious Ernst David has defended him, saying, "in Handel's time these borrowings were not looked upon as thefts, and musical education consisted in showing one's skill in the contrapuntal treatment of a given theme; the originality of an idea was not considered so important as it is to-day." But the chorus "Egypt was glad" is almost note for note the same as an organ canzona in the Phrygian mode by Kerl, and in three other choruses the treatment of voices is almost identical with the music of Erba. Nor did Handel scruple to utilize for voices, fugues written by him for instruments. I have dwelt upon this side of the Oratorio for the purpose of showing that Handel as well as other composers did not hesitate to set to certain words music which was written originally for words conveying opposite ideas, and yet how much has been written about the dramatic fitness of this very music, about the "sacred absorption" of Handel in his mighty task.

So too it might be of interest to speak of the original form of this oratorio, how at first Handel thought of "the Funeral Anthem" as the first part of "Israel," how afterwards he added solos, and interpolated extracts from "Solomon" and the "occasional Oratorio." The musical events of the week forbid such digressions, so let us speak at once of the performance.

The chorus of the Society sung upon the whole the difficult and exhausting numbers in a very creditable manner. Here and there were a few slips; at times there was false intonation; and again, noticeably in the majestic opening chorus, no attention whatever was paid to the dynamic marks. It is also true that towards the end of the concert there were evidences of fatigue on the part of the sopranos, and throughout the work the altos were not proportionally strong. When one considers, however, the great difficulties of the self-imposed task and the demands made upon physical endurance alone, the society can honestly be praised for the good work done.

To relieve the chorus, recitatives and solos were introduced. "He layeth the beams," taken from Handel's opera "Ezio," was sung by Mr. Ludwig; "Wave from wave" by Mr. Whitney; while two interpolated recitatives were sung by Miss De Vere. Mr. Ludwig is not so successful in airs of the old school demanding great powers of execution as in phrases where dramatic intensity must be first considered. He and Mr. Whitney were loudly applauded for the spirited manner in which they sung the familiar duet. Mr. Lloyd, although he was a little hampered by the uncertainty of the accompaniment, sung the great tenor air superbly. Miss De Vere and Miss Poole in the solos were unsatisfactory, in the duets absolutely bad.

And there was something lacking in the accompaniment, not from any special fault of either orchestra or organ, but from the accompaniment itself. It is impossible to believe that in Handel's time, he would have been satisfied with such an inadequate orchestral score; but what he himself did and how he did it, who knows? In this connection the remarks of Saint-Saëns in an article upon the oratorios of Bach and Handel may not be out of place. "Take the case of a director who opens a score of Handel with the idea of having it played. . . . . There are no nuances, there are no coups d'archet; the indications of what tempo is proper are enigmatical or wanting. The bass is figured, and one sees at a glance that it is necessary to restore, to reconstruct. To what degree? How? Upon this point each has his own ideas. There are no traditions. In England, where they should have been preserved, they are lost. . . . . Instrumentation has changed and progressed enormously since Handel's day. The young people of our orchestra are all virtuosos and they find easy that which formerly was regarded as impossible. This music written en grosses notes, wanting in the delicacy which characterizes modern instrumentation, bores them beyond expression; and not from frivolity or indifference; it is from the instinctive repugnance felt by a refined nature when the task is heavy and coarse. These oratorios are essentially vocal works, for the symphonic art did not exist when they were created. So as a revival of vocal music, they are exceedingly valuable, and chorus singers love them as much as instrumental players dread them. Then, too, there are arias. . . . . To obey the demands of his soloists and his public, Handel seldom wrote, and it is a pity, duos, trios, or morceaux d'ensemble. Aria follows aria with a monotony which provokes despair. There are among them treasures of melody and of noble style, but there are also torrents of roulades terribly out of fashion and of tiresome length. Then again these airs, that is nearly all of them, wind up in the same way, with a pompous, emphatic formula applied to all morceaux and to all situations. It is true certain people find this "magnificent"; much good may it do them. . . . . These works are performed in England, and how? There are some good soloists, singers of great talent, who make a specialty of oratorio work. Conductors and performers follow their individual caprice and fantasy. Such performances would be regarded at Paris as wretched. Fortunately for itself, the English public is endowed with indomitable patience; it is never bored, it rather accepts ennui as a necessity. . . . For these and other reasons, some musicians think that ancient works should not be performed so much for immediate and complete artistic enjoyment, as for the education of the performers, the public and composers. The performers would thoroughly learn the 'grand style'; the public would become accustomed to listen to serious compositions; composers would find a point de départ, and so strong works of beauty would be brought forth which would be enjoyed according to their merit."

It is gratifying to record that financially the Society received the substantial assistance which the courage and labor of the directors and members deserved.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.—The sixth and last concert of the fifth season of the Kneisel Quartet took place at Union Hall, Monday evening. The Quartet was assisted by Miss Adele Aus der Ohe, pianist, and Mr. Goldstein, double-bass. The program was as follows:

Mozart.....Quartet C Major
Grieg.....Romance—(Andantino); from quartet in G minor, op. 27.
Schubert....Quintet in A major, for piano, violin viola, 'cello and bass, op. 114.

This last concert was a fitting close, both in program and performance, of the present season. Not only were the individual numbers of great merit; they were so arranged that there was not a tedious moment. The noble quartet of Mozart with its andante full of heavenly peace and serenity was followed by a passionate movement from the intensely modern quartet of Grieg; then came the great "Trout" quintet of Schubert with Miss Aus der Ohe. Of her exquisite performance it is impossible to speak too highly. She knows that in chamber music the piano is only one of the instruments. A brilliant soloist, in a quintet she is simply one of five musicians. And how perfect was the ensemble on Monday evening.

It is with regret that we all chronicle the last concert of this series; it is with impatience that we look forward to the sixth season of this admirable quartet. The summary of the works performed this season will be found in another column; merely looking over this résumé will bring to the minds of many the pure and healthy musical enjoyment which was awakened at the individual concerts by the exquisite playing of these artists.

THE PACHMANN RECITALS.—Mr. Vladimir de Pachmann gave three pianoforte recitals, at Chickering Hall, Monday, Wednesday and Thursday of this week. The programs were made up exclusively of Chopin's compositions, of which he played the following: Sonatas, op. 49 and 58; Ballades, op. 23, 38, 47; Nocturnes, op. 27, 37, 55; Etudes, op. 25, Nos. 2, 3, 6, 9, op. 10, Nos. 4, 5, 11, 12; Impromptus, op. 29, 36, 66; Preludes, op. 28, Nos. 11, 12, 21, 22, 24; Mazurkas, op. 24, No. 4, op. 33, No. 4, op. 50, No. 1; Waltzes, 42, op. 64, Nos. 1 and 2; Scherzos, op. 20, 31, 39; Polonaises, op. 26, No. 2, op. 53; Allegro de concert, op. 46; Fantaisie, op. 49; Barcarole, op. 60; Tarantelle, op. 43; Berceuse, op. 57.

Mr. Pachmann has dissected his piano. He knows its strength, its weakness. When he sits before it, he does not frown, nor after measuring its size does he attack it with an air of grim determination, as though resolved to conquer or die. He fondles it, he caresses it, as though he would coax from it secrets hitherto jealously guarded; persuades it—at first timid—to sing its song of joy and woe.

Louis Ehrlert, in that little essay which in the effect produced by the diction resembles tones drawn from a viola, or the perfume of strange flowers bred from unnatural alliances, says that Chopin has the misfortune to be so popular that there is no parlor where he is not falsified or misunderstood. This is true too often of the concert hall.

For consider for a moment the character of the composition and the man. Abstractly the personality of the composer should have nothing to do with the compositions left by him; but it seems as though Chopin and nearly all of his works are one and the same thing. You find everywhere in his music that strange mixture of chivalric virility and almost womanly weakness which impelled George Sand even after she had touched his lips to look upon him as a study, to "use him for copy."

And pianists are almost inevitably led to exaggerate one side of his nature at the expense of the other; sentiment becomes with some mere mawkishness; and on the other hand the heroic side alone is italicized, and rude hands tear apart even the arabesques which delicately ornament, as the filmy lace of the fan which coquettishly hides the lustrous eyes of a southern beauty wooed in the night.

Mr. Pachmann has been reproached for a lack of "virility." This, translated, means that he does not pound, that he does not abuse his marvelous technique. There is no need of speaking at length of the mechanical side of Mr. Pachmann's playing. It is not so much in these days when technique has run mad a question of the degree of technique; the absorbing question is, How does the man use it? But we have been so overrun with piano-athletes that some of us, perhaps, have been induced to believe that brutality is strength. Far higher and nobler than such a feat of virtuosity as his performance of the Etude in thirds, or the Polonaise op. 53, is his exquisite touch. More to be wondered at than perfection of technique is his playing of the waltz in C sharp minor or his interpretation of the much-neglected Mazurkas which, with the preludes, are, perhaps, the most characteristic of the works of Chopin: "these Mazurzas full of sadness, these wailing dances." "O my weary feet, you must dance in gaily-colored shoes; would that you were at rest in the grave."

How he sings a melody; as though the dead keys were a voice coming from human throat, rich with warm blood. If at times his song seems affected, if at times certain liberties seem to be the expression of deliberate affectation, such occasions are rare. He is one of the very few pianists who has what is so lost sight of to-day, a true cantabile, full of soul, full of color. His technique is such that he is absolutely free of the keyboard, and so he is able to hear himself, to be one of the audience, as it were; he does not endeavor by deliberate attempt to rigidly convey to the people that which is in his mind; it is as though he listened to himself, and sitting close to the hearer, by personal contact, by the magnetism of the body the two become one in spirit. Never does he seem absorbed in the accomplishing a difficult feat.

Take for example his playing of what is sometimes called the "simple" Nocturne in G minor. As played by him, it was a "symphony in gray." In the "choral," he produced wonderful effects by the way in which it was sung, without mannered ritardandos.

His use of the pedal, that difficult point in piano-playing, calls for comment. In cantabile playing it is most remarkable; one sees that he almost never pedals on the beat. This without doubt leads many to attribute the effect gained to his singing—touch alone. In bravura-playing his employment of the pedal is not so heartily to be praised; and it would seem as though the very finesse, which is so successful in cantabile, produces opposite results when employed in bravura passages, where the less pedal used, the better. The astounding clearness of Joseffy's bravura-playing is due to his comparative neglect of the pedal. Mr. Pachmann himself in the terrific scale passage in the A flat polonaise, a passage generally smeared by pianists, used the pedal so little that the notes were as clear as crystal.

Too often the appearance of a pianist provokes disgust and a contempt for the piano. But when a man like Pachmann plays, we see that the art of piano-playing is not wholly lost, that the piano in a small hall and with such a player can awaken emotions by legitimate means. Would there were more pianists like him.

It is necessary to add that Mr. Pachmann and many of the audience were seriously annoyed by the noisy arrival of late-comers; for strangely enough the doors were not closed during the playing of a number.

PHILIP HALE.

[115]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, - RICHMOND.

FRIDAY EVENING, - - MAY 2.
SATURDAY EVENING, - - MAY 3.

UNDER THE AUSPICES OF FHE MOZART ASSOCIATION.

FOURTH TOUR.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

FOR PARTICULARS AS TO THE SALE OF TICKETS SEE DAILY PAPERS.

Boston Sunday Globe.

TWENTY-FOUR PAGES.

SUNDAY, APRIL 20, 1890.

AT THE SYMPHONY!

American Debut of Mme. Steinbach-Jahns—Mr. Nikisch's Adieu This Week.

A singer from Leipsic, where Arthur Nikisch's absence in America is still so much regretted, made her first appearance in America at the Symphony concert last week. Mme. Steinbach-Jahns is to accompany the Boston Symphony orchestra on their four weeks' tour. She comes to this country with a high reputation for success, chiefly in opera. Her voice is certainly very flexible. She sang the florid music of the air of Constance from Mozart's "Seraglio" with remarkable ease and skill. But the quality of her voice is not altogether agreeable; a thinness and sharpness in the upper tones marred the effect of her work, although expressiveness and earnestness are characteristics of her singing by no means to be denied. Mme. Steinbach-Jahns was more successful in the songs by Liszt, Schubert and Grieg, given to Mr. Nikisch's pianoforte accompaniment, than in the operatic air.

A delightful impression was made by the orchestral novelty on the programme — Goldmark's "Spring" overture. It is a very melodious, dainty composition, rich in its scoring and thoroughly effective in orchestration, quite worthy the composer of "The Queen of Sheba." Volkman's serénade for string orchestra gave Mr. Hekking opportunities on the 'cello. The orchestra also gained high honors in the charming work. Brahms' first symphony, strongly in contrast with the melodious character of the general programme, found earnest and conscientious interpretation. Mr. Nikisch's reading was appreciative, and the performance reasonably effective. But not all symphony patrons en oy Brahms.

The final concert of the season occurs this week. Beethoven's Fourth Symphony, the prelude to "The Mastersingers," and the Paganini "Moto Perpetuo" (for 32 violins), constitute the programme. Mr. Nikisch, after the brief tour, will take a "summer rest," in the assurance that Boston likes and admires his works, and will be glad to greet him anew when the autumn brings another symphony season.

De Pachmann Recitals.

The pronounced success of Mr. Vladimir de Pachmann's piano recitals last week, and a generally expressed desire for another opportunity to hear the great Russian artist, has induced his manager to arrange two more recitals at Chickering Hall before his departure for the West. These concerts will be given on the afternoons of April 25 and 30. The first will be a [illegible] de Pachmann and the second [illegible] de Pachmann, who [illegible] the success [illegible] concerts.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, APRIL 20, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The American debut of Mme. Steinbach-Jahns was the event of the 23d of the season's series of symphony concerts at Music Hall last evening, and the artist may well be complimented upon the success attending her first appearance here. She comes direct from Leipsic, where she has been held in high favor since she joined the opera company, which was formerly directed by Mr. Nikisch. She held a prominent position in this organization for half a dozen years, and since her marriage, two years ago, has confined her public appearances to the concert stage. She chose as her selections for last evening M zart's aria, "Thou may'st learn to hat- me," from "Die Entfuehrung aus dem Serail," and the songs, "O Lieb," Liszt; "Du bist die Ruh'," Schubert, and "Hoffnung," Grieg. This singer has been graciously favored with nature's endowments to fit her for the operatic and concert careers in which she has been so successful since her first appearance at Frankfort a little over 10 years ago. She has a prepossessing stage presence, which wins her the immediate attention of an audience upon her entrance, and her gifts as a singer make good all the pleasant anticipations she arouses. She has a singularly fresh, bright and pleasing soprano voice, which shows the result of a thoroughly intelligent training, and in its use there is ample evidence of the keen musical instinct which always adds so much to the success of a vocalist. The aria by Mozart served to display her perfect control of the technique of her art, and her phrasing and delivery of the number gave great satisfaction. The group of songs, sung to the piano accompaniment of Mr. Nikisch, were not altogether happily chosen to display the singer's gifts at their best, but she pleased her audience by her interpretation of the selections, and, as upon the conclusion of the aria, was rewarded with a most pronounced demonstration of the audience. She is certainly a singer who will find favor with American audiences. The instrumental novelty of the evening was Goldmark's "Spring" overture, a pleasing composition, full of lively themes, which are treated with the skill which this composer has shown in the tone pictures of his more familiar works. Schubert's delightful serenade for string orchestra, op. 69, was also on the programme, and its performance showed the admirable qualities of this division of Mr. Nikisch's forces to fine advantage. The solo for 'cello, as played by Anton Hekking, ranked with the best work of this class that has ever been heard here, and commanded the admiration, and, at times, almost breathless attention, of the audience. The first of the Brahms symphonies ended the programme, and had a remarkably successful performance. Next Saturday evening the season will be ended with a programme including the following compositions: Beethoven's Symphony No. 4, in B-flat; Paganini's Moto Perpetuo, allegro de concert (for 32 violins), and Wagner's Vorspiel, "Die Meistersinger."

MONDAY MORNING, APRIL [illegible]

TWENTY-THIRD SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Only one more concert and then the Boston music lovers will be puzzled what to do with their Saturday nights. For this concert Mr. Nikisch presented the following programme:

Overture—"Spring" ..... Goldmark
(First time in Boston.)
Aria—"Thou may'st learn to hate me" from "Die Entfuehrung aus dem Serail" ..... Mozart
Senerade for string orchestra, in D minor, op. 69 ..... Volkmann
(First time at these concerts).
Solo violoncello, Mr. Auton Hekking.
Songs, with Piano, (a) "O Lieb" ..... Liszt. (b) "Du bist die Ruh" ..... Schubert. (c) "Hoffnung" ..... Grieg
Symphony No. 1, in C minor, op 68 ... Brahms
Un poco sostenuto; Allegro—Andante sostenuto—Un poco allegretto e grazioso—Adagio piu andante; Allegro non troppo, ma con brio.
Soloist, Mme. Steinbach-Jahns.

The "Spring" overture is one of two which were quite recently published, and which have already been heard in Vienna and one or two other cities. It is a melodious, flowing and finely scored work, but it is lacking in strength, and is altogether hardly up to the standard which one may justly expect Goldmark to attain. We are informed by the programme that Mr. Brockhoven has discovered a great deal of humor, especially Schumannesque humor, in the Volkmann serenade. He goes on to explain that humor consists in contrast. If this is so, the chief humor of the serenade is in its very marked contrast with the other familiar works of its author. It seems dry and uninteresting and without any especial raison d'être. The 'cello solo was very beautifully played by Mr. Anton Hekking, whose fine work grows in strength and intellectual power every day, and the whole serenade was performed as only the strings of our orchestra could do it. The soloist was Mme. Steinbach-Jahns, from Leipsic, who has been engaged to accompany the orchestra upon the long tournée through Southern, Central and Western cities which begins Monday, April 28. She has a fine voice, with a well developed colorature. The Mozart aria was an unfortunate selection, as it is highly conventional and commonplace, and was evidently written merely to exhibit vocal technique, and even Mozart is uninteresting when he is masquerading as a musical showmaster. She sang it conscientiously and with great dramatic power, but her evident nervousness was probably the cause of a slight tendency to sing sharp. In the songs she was much more effective; the second especially—"Du bist die Ruh"—was remarkably well sung. Everything which she does is imbued with strong dramatic feeling and intelligence, and on the stage she must be very effective, especially in Wagner roles. Mr. Nikisch is certainly a most exquisite accompanist. Nearly every song which he has so far accompanied in public has gained a new and beautiful light by the masterly manner in which he presides over the piano.

The Brahms symphony was superbly played, and it gained greatly in interest and power by the strong, sympathetic and dramatic interpretation of Mr. Nikisch. Yet even he cannot seem to give any clew as to the musical common sense of the last movement. While in places it is certainly the most beautiful part of the whole work, its lack of form and continuity becomes more apparent with each hearing. No matter how carefully one may have studied the score beforehand and no matter how earnestly and conscientiously one endeavors to listen, one is constantly baffled and disappointed. All through, even in the very coda, new material is introduced in the most unmotived and apparently wilful manner. This destroys the true sense of musical development and is very disturbing to the ear. The themes themselves are so marked and so beautiful that if they had been consistently developed without this introduction of useless new material the present restless effect would have been avoided and the movement would have gained immensely. It is the fashion in our city to throw oneself blindly at Brahms's feet and cry out, "Oh! master, give us more; no matter what it is; no matter whether we understand it or not"; and there is no length of exaggerated expression to which the true Brahms devotee will not go. They regard Beethoven as a worthy student, who prepared the way for the "real master", and everything before Beethoven was mere groping in the dark. Now, although no one can deny the power of the C minor symphony, a great many can and do deny that it is beautiful. It will always be interesting to musicians, as its wealth of counterpoint is engrossing and in every way worthy of careful study, and its charming third movement will always please everybody. Still, the public at large will probably prefer the flowing melodies and simpler structure of the second D major symphony. The latter is certainly a more spontaneous work, and hence more likely to retain its popularity. At the same time, the mental qualifications necessary to become a true Brahms enthusiast are so peculiar that one may safely prophesy that the "master's" friends will always say the most and claim the most for those of his works which are least comprehensible to the untutored layman and the uninitiated musician. And in this sense the last movement of the C minor symphony is never likely to be understood by those who are not of "the elect."

Next week there will be one rather sensational number—the playing of the immensely difficult Paganini moto perpetuo by all the violins of the orchestra in unison; this is a tremendous task, but the fine strings of our orchestra will doubtless accomplish it with ease and effect.

ARTHUR WELD.

THE SYMPHONY.

TWENTY-THIRD CONCERT.

The Symphony concerts keep on the even tenor of their way and with scarcely less interest than usual notwithstanding the musical season for the past two weeks has been more than ever crowded. Last night the programme was:

Goldmark ..... Overture, "Spring"
Mozart ..... Aria, "Thou may'st learn to hate me," from "Die Entfuehrung aus dem Serail"
Volkmann ..... Serenade for String Orchestra in D minor, Op. 69.
Solo Violoncello, Mr. Anton Hekking.
Songs with Piano.
a Liszt ..... "O Lieb"
b Schubert ..... "Du bist die Ruh"
c Grieg ..... "Hoffnung"
Brahms ... Symphony No. 1, in C. Minor, Op. 68
Soloist, Mme. Steinbach-Jahns.

The Goldmark overture is a delightful piece of music, yet no one would suspect it as belonging to the same family as the "Saknntola" by the same composer, it being less heavily orchestrated, by far, and more melodious, clear and pleasing, if neither so popular or remarkable as the "Saknntola."

Mme. Johns is evidently an experienced concert singer, but her style is explosive and void of any true cantabile, though her singing of the group of songs was now and then agreeable, and sometimes artistic. But the conspicuous feature of her singing is with her very mature vocalization.

The orchestra played the Serenade well, but the best performance of the evening was of the finale of the Brahms Symphony which was splendidly given.

HANDEL'S MASTERPIECE.

Is "Israel in Egypt" Greater than "The Messiah?"—Its Notable Features and Its Title to Long Life.

Never did Handel write more ennobling music within the limits of a single oratorio than he has done in "Israel in Egypt;" and if not Handel, who else? Surely no other composer of oratorio has equalled him, unless indeed it may be said of Mendelssohn's "Elijah" that there is a grandeur attained in it which not even Handel could have surpassed; but the composer of "Israel in Egypt" was a composer with whom none other can reasonably be compared. He was individual. His musical resources were not great. Beethoven truly said of him: "Go home and see how, with such small means, such great effects were produced." It was with just such "small means" that Handel had the "infinite capacity for taking pains;" yet he was none the less spontaneous.

Never was a composer more dependent than he upon religious moods and influence. To him religion was little else than music, and hence to the admirers of his oratorios his music is all religion. Handel's art is incomparable in its appeals to the religious nature.

In "Israel in Egypt" he deals with one of the most important epochs in religious history. This history to him is in no profane sense true, as it might have been to Mendelssohn, or to any anti-Christian, free-thinker or atheist. To Handel, on the contrary, it was inspired truth. How reverently and with what sincere tenderness and pathos does he depict the sorrow of the Children of Israel in the opening chorus of his oratorio! Here we have, indeed, a well-defined language of tones interpreting the oppression of an enslaved people. Here again Handel's religion asserts itself, and his genius is in its most active condition.

The scientific treatment of themes throughout the oratorio is a no less remarkable feature of the work. For example, how splendid is the subject of the fourth chorus; and, as it foreshadows the fugue that follows, and as one keeps pace with it to the end of the fugue, the impression is as unmistakable as it is genuine.

Here has been created a monument of genius such as not even Bach has surpassed. Many there are who prefer "Israel in Egypt" to "The Messiah." Yet in the latter work Handel simply speaks with more clearness and charm, yet to the soul of the people less eloquently. The more worthy of the two works is unquestionably "Israel in Egypt." It will outlast the other, not simply in the hearts of musicians, but in the respect of the public.

If the work could only be heard oftener, or could it be favored with some of the partiality that is now bestowed upon "The Messiah," its chance would certainly be excellent of gaining the popular reputation for being something more than cold and scholastic, for its importance and supremely remarkable characters become more and more impressive with each repeated hearing.

[116]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, - RICHMOND.

FRIDAY EVENING, - - MAY 2.
SATURDAY EVENING, - - MAY 3.

UNDER THE AUSPICES OF FHE MOZART ASSOCIATION.

———FOURTH TOUR.———

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. CONIEE, Ass't Manager.

FOR PARTICULARS AS TO THE SALE OF TICKETS SEE DAILY PAPERS.

Boston Sunday Globe.

TWENTY-FOUR PAGES.

SUNDAY, APRIL 20, 1890.

AT THE SYMPHONY.

American Debut of Mme. Steinbach-Jahns—Mr. Nikisch's Adieu This Week.

A singer from Leipsic, where Arthur Nikisch's absence in America is still so much regretted, made her first appearance in America at the Symphony concert last week. Mme. Steinbach-Jahns is to accompany the Boston Symphony orchestra on their four weeks' tour. She comes to this country with a high reputation for success, chiefly in opera. Her voice is certainly very flexible. She sang the florid music of the air of Constance from Mozart's "Seraglio" with remarkable ease and skill. But the quality of her voice is not altogether agreeable; a thinness and sharpness in the upper tones marred the effect of her work, although expressiveness and earnestness are characteristics of her singing by no means to be denied. Mme. Steinbach-Jahns was more successful in the songs by Liszt, Schubert and Grieg, given to Mr. Nikisch's pianoforte accompaniment, than in the operatic air.

A delightful impression was made by the orchestral novelty on the programme — Goldmark's "Spring" overture. It is a very melodious, dainty composition, rich in its scoring and thoroughly effective in orchestration, quite worthy the composer of "The Queen of Sheba." Volkman's serenade for string orchestra gave Mr. Hekking opportunities on the 'cello. The orchestra also gained high honors in the charming work. Brahms' first symphony, strongly in contrast with the melodious character of the general programme, found earnest and conscientious interpretation. Mr. Nikisch's reading was appreciative, and the performance reasonably effective. But not all symphony patrons enjoy Brahms.

The final concert of the season occurs this week. Beethoven's Fourth Symphony, the prelude to "The Mastersingers," and the Paganini "Moto Perpetuo" (for 32 violins), constitute the programme. Mr. Nikisch, after the brief tour, will take a "summer rest," in the assurance that Boston likes and admires his works, and will be glad to greet him anew when the autumn brings another symphony season.

De Pachmann Recitals.

The pronounced success of Mr. Vladimir de Pachmann's piano recitals last week, and a generally expressed desire for another opportunity to hear the great Russian artist, has induced his manager to arrange two more recitals at Chickering Hall before his departure for the West. These concerts will be given on the afternoon of April 28 and 30. The first will be a recital by Mr. de Pachmann and the second will introduce Mme. de Pachmann, who fairly divided with her husband the success of the New York performances. [illegible] for both concerts will be ready at [illegible] to-morrow.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, APRIL 20, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The American debut of Mme. Steinbach-Jahns was the event of the 23d of the season's series of symphony concerts at Music Hall last evening, and the artist may well be complimented upon the success attending her first appearance here. She comes direct from Leipsic, where she has been held in high favor since she joined the opera company, which was formerly directed by Mr. Nikisch. She held a prominent position in this organization for half a dozen years, and since her marriage, two years ago, has confined her public appearances to the concert stage. She chose as her selections for last evening Mozart's aria, "Thou may'st learn to hate me," from "Die Entfuehrung aus dem Serail," and the songs, "O Lieb," Liszt; "Du bist die Ruh'," Schubert, and "Hoffnung," Grieg. This singer has been graciously favored with nature's endowments to fit her for the operatic and concert careers in which she has been so successful since her first appearance at Frankfort a little over 10 years ago. She has a prepossessing stage presence, which wins her the immediate attention of an audience upon her entrance, and her gifts as a singer make good all the pleasant anticipations she arouses. She has a singularly fresh, bright and pleasing soprano voice, which shows the result of a thoroughly intelligent training, and in its use there is ample evidence of the keen musical instinct which always adds so much to the success of a vocalist. The aria by Mozart served to display her perfect control of the technique of her art, and her phrasing and delivery of the number gave great satisfaction. The group of songs, sung to the piano accompaniment of Mr. Nikisch, were not altogether happily chosen to display the singer's gifts at their best, but she pleased her audience by her interpretation of the selections, and, as upon the conclusion of the aria, was rewarded with a most pronounced demonstration of the audience. She is certainly a singer who will find favor with American audiences. The instrumental novelty of the evening was Goldmark's "Spring" overture, a pleasing composition, full of lively themes, which are treated with the skill which this composer has shown in the tone pictures of his more familiar works. Schubert's delightful serenade for string orchestra, op. 69, was also on the programme, and its performance showed the admirable qualities of this division of Mr. Nikisch's forces to fine advantage. The solo for 'cello, as played by Anton Hekking, ranked with the best work of this class that has ever been heard here, and commanded the admiration, and, at times, almost breathless attention, of the audience. The first of the Brahms symphonies ended the programme, and had a remarkably successful performance. Next Saturday evening the season will be ended with a programme, including the following compositions: Beethoven's Symphony No. 4, in B-flat; Paganini's Moto Perpetuo, allegro de concert (for 32 violins), and Wagner's vorspiel, "Die Meistersinger."

Boston Post

MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 21, 1890

TWENTY-THIRD SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Only one more concert and then the Boston music lovers will be puzzled what to do with their Saturday nights. For this concert Mr. Nikisch presented the following programme:

Overture—"Spring".....Goldmark
(First time in Boston.)
Aria—"Thou may'st learn to hate me", from "Die Entfuehrung aus dem Serail".....Mozart
Serenade for string orchestra, in D minor, op. 69.....Volkmann
(First time at these concerts).
Solo violoncello, Mr. Anton Hekking.
Songs, with Piano, {(a) "O Lieb".....Liszt (b) "Du bist die Ruh".....Schubert (c) "Hoffnung".....Grieg
Symphony No. 1, in C minor, op 68...Brahms
Un poco sostenuto; Allegro—Andante sostenuto—Un poco allegretto e grazioso—Adagio piu andante; Allegro non troppo, ma con brio.
Soloist, Mme. Steinbach-Jahns.

The "Spring" overture is one of two which were quite recently published, and which have already been heard in Vienna and one or two other cities. It is a melodious, flowing and finely scored work, but it is lacking in strength, and is altogether hardly up to the standard which one may justly expect Goldmark to attain. We are informed by the programme that Mr. Brockhoven has discovered a great deal of humor, especially Schumannesque humor, in the Volkmann serenade. He goes on to explain that humor consists in contrast. If this is so, the chief humor of the serenade is in its very marked contrast with the other familiar works of its author. It seems dry and uninteresting and without any especial raison d'être. The 'cello solo was very beautifully played by Mr. Anton Hekking, whose fine work grows in strength and intellectual power every day, and the whole serenade was performed as only the strings of our orchestra could do it. The soloist was Mme. Steinbach-Jahns, from Leipsic, who has been engaged to accompany the orchestra upon the long tournée through Southern, Central and Western cities which begins Monday, April 28. She has a fine voice, with a well developed colorature. The Mozart aria was an unfortunate selection, as it is highly conventional and commonplace, and was evidently written merely to exhibit vocal technique, and even Mozart is uninteresting when he is masquerading as a musical showmaster. She sang it conscientiously and with great dramatic power, but her evident nervousness was probably the cause of a slight tendency to sing sharp. In the songs she was much more effective; the second especially—"Du bist die Ruh"—was remarkably well sung. Everything which she does is imbued with strong dramatic feeling and intelligence, and on the stage she must be very effective, especially in Wagner roles. Mr. Nikisch is certainly a most exquisite accompanist. Nearly every song which he has so far accompanied in public has gained a new and beautiful light by the masterly manner in which he presides over the piano.

The Brahms symphony was superbly played, and it gained greatly in interest and power by the strong, sympathetic and dramatic interpretation of Mr. Nikisch. Yet even he cannot seem to give any clew as to the musical common sense of the last movement. While in places it is certainly the most beautiful part of the whole work, its lack of form and continuity becomes more apparent with each hearing. No matter how carefully one may have studied the score beforehand and no matter how earnestly and conscientiously one endeavors to listen, one is constantly baffled and disappointed. All through, even in the very coda, new material is introduced in the most unmotived and apparently wilful manner. This destroys the true sense of musical development and is very disturbing to the ear. The themes themselves are so marked and so beautiful that if they had been consistently developed without this introduction of useless new material the present restless effect would have been avoided and the movement would have gained immensely. It is the fashion in our city to throw oneself blindly at Brahms's feet and cry out, "Oh! master, give us more; no matter what it is; no matter whether we understand it or not"; and there is no length of exaggerated expression to which the true Brahms devotee will not go. They regard Beethoven as a worthy student, who prepared the way for the "real master", and everything before Beethoven was mere groping in the dark. Now, although no one can deny the power of the C minor symphony, a great many can and do deny that it is beautiful. It will always be interesting to musicians, as its wealth of counterpoint is engrossing and in every way worthy of careful study, and its charming third movement will always please everybody. Still, the public at large will probably prefer the flowing melodies and simpler structure of the second D major symphony. The latter is certainly a more spontaneous work, and hence more likely to retain its popularity. At the same time the mental qualifications necessary to become a true Brahms enthusiast are so peculiar that one may safely prophesy that the "master's" friends will always say the most and claim the most for those of his works which are least comprehensible to the untutored layman and the uninitiated musician. And in this sense the last movement of the C minor symphony is never likely to be understood by those who are not of "the elect."

Next week there will be one rather sensational number—the playing of the immensely difficult Paganini moto perpetuo by all the violins of the orchestra in unison; this is a tremendous task, but the fine strings of our orchestra will doubtless accomplish it with ease and effect.

ARTHUR WELD.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, APRIL 20, 1890.

THE SYMPHONIES.

TWENTY-THIRD CONCERT.

The Symphony concerts keep on the even tenor of their way and with scarcely less interest than usual notwithstanding the musical season for the past two weeks has been more than ever crowded. Last night the programme was:

Goldmark.....Overture, "Spring"
Mozart.....Aria, "Thou may'st learn to hate me," from "Die Entfuehrung aus dem Serail"
Volkmann.....Serenade for String Orchestra in D minor, Op. 69.
Solo Violoncello, Mr. Anton Hekking.
Songs with Piano.
a Liszt......"O Lieb"
b Schubert....."Du bist die Ruh"
c Grieg....."Hoffnung"
Brahms...Symphony No. 1, in C. Minor, Op. 68
Soloist, Mme. Steinbach-Jahns.

The Goldmark overture is a delightful piece of music, yet no one would suspect it as belonging to the same family as the "Sakuntola" by the same composer, it being less heavily orchestrated, by far, and more melodious, clear, and pleasing, if neither so popular or remarkable as the "Sakuntola."

Mme. Johns is evidently an experienced concert singer, but her style is explosive and void of any true cantabile, though her singing of the group of songs was now and then agreeable, and sometimes artistic. But the conspicuous feature of her singing is with her very mature vocalization.

The orchestra played the Serenade well, but the best performance of the evening was of the finale of the Brahms Symphony which was splendidly given.

HANDEL'S MASTERPIECE.

Is "Israel in Egypt" Greater than "The Messiah?"—Its Notable Features and Its Title to Long Life.

Never did Handel write more ennobling music within the limits of a single oratorio than he has done in "Israel in Egypt;" and if not Handel, who else? Surely no other composer of oratorio has equalled him, unless indeed it may be said of Mendelssohn's "Elijah" that there is a grandeur attained in it which not even Handel could have surpassed; but the composer of "Israel in Egypt" was a composer with whom none other can reasonably be compared. He was individual. His musical resources were not great. Beethoven truly said of him: "Go home and see how, with such small means, such great effects were produced." It was with just such "small means" that Handel had the "infinite capacity for taking pains;" yet he was none the less spontaneous.

Never was a composer more dependent than he upon religious moods and influence. To him religion was little else than music, and hence to the admirers of his oratorios his music is all religion. Handel's art is incomparable in its appeals to the religious nature.

In "Israel in Egypt" he deals with one of the most important epochs in religious history. This history to him is in no profane sense true, as it might have been to Mendelssohn, or to any anti-Christian, free-thinker or atheist. To Handel, on the contrary, it was inspired truth. How reverently and with what sincere tenderness and pathos does he depict the sorrow of the Children of Israel in the opening chorus of his oratorio! Here we have, indeed, a well-defined language of tones interpreting the oppression of an enslaved people. Here again Handel's religion asserts itself, and his genius is in its most active condition.

The scientific treatment of themes throughout the oratorio is a no less remarkable feature of the work. For example, how splendid is the subject of the fourth chorus; and, as it foreshadows the fugue that follows, and as one keeps pace with it to the end of the fugue, the impression is as unmistakable as it is genuine.

Here has been created a monument of genius such as not even Bach has surpassed. Many there are who prefer "Israel in Egypt" to "The Messiah." Yet in the latter work Handel simply speaks with more clearness and charm, yet to the soul of the people less eloquently. The more worthy of the two works is unquestionably "Israel in Egypt." It will outlast the other, not simply in the hearts of musicians, but in the respect of the public.

If the work could only be heard oftener, or could it be favored with some of the partiality that is now bestowed upon "The Messiah," its chance would certainly be excellent of gaining the popular reputation for being something more than cold and scholastic, for its importance and supremely remarkable characters become more and more impressive with each repeated hearing.

[116]

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 20, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT LAST NIGHT—THE GERMAN OPERA AND PACHMANN CONCERTS—OTHER MUSICAL EVENTS.

The twenty-third concert, and last but one of the season, was unusually interesting owing to the first appearance of Mme. Steinbach-Jahns, and to the first performance of a "Spring" overture, by Goldmark and of a serenade for string orchestra in D minor by Volkmann. Mme. Steinbach-Jahns comes from Leipzig expressly to accompany the orchestra in its tour, which begins at the conclusion of the concerts here. She has for several years held the position of first soprano at the Stadt Theatre in Leipzig, and has been especially successful in Wagnerian roles. Since she has made her successes in opera it would be impossible to estimate the extent of her abilities in one hearing in concert. Her voice is a high soprano the quality of which must formerly have been full and brilliant, but which now appears considerably worn. Technically, she has had good training as was evinced by the ease with which she executed the extremely difficult aria, "Thou mays't learn to hate me," from Mozart's early comic opera "Die Entfuhrung." She also sang three songs with pianoforte accompaniment, "O Lieb," by Liszt; "Du bist die Ruh," by Schubert; and "Hoffnung," by Grieg. The first, which is almost identical with the third of the Liebestraume" nocturnes that Liszt wrote for the piano, was unsatisfactorily rendered. The second, however, was beautifully sung, and the last was given with much strength and dramatic fervor. Mr. Nikisch played the accompaniment delightfully. Mme. Jahns' agreeable presence as well as her singing won the favor of the audience, who recalled her several times; and at the conclusion of the Mozart aria she was presented with three very large floral decorations, one of which was in the form of a star, and another being a large basket of roses, all of which took the united efforts of two ushers to remove from the stage. The overture was thoroughly suggestive of its title. It is not especially original in material, but its buoyant, airy, opening theme is as exhilarating as are the beautiful days that will soon be upon us, while the tranquil second theme, a simple melody beautifully harmonized forms a happy contrast. The instrumentation is equally charming, descriptive and brilliant, the colors being laid on by the hand of one who had in mind the beauties of Nature herself. The work is not long nor theatrical. Neither is it great. But it is a delightful, well-rounded tone-poem, with an odor of fresh air about it that gives one genuine and healthful pleasure. The serenade also was enjoyable from beginning to end. Although there are several themes and as many changes of tempo, the work is in the form of one unbroken movement. It opens with a solo for 'cello in larghetto time, which is soon interrupted by the full string orchestra. Next the movement changes to andante expression, then to prestissimo, after which the solo again appears for a few measures and leads up to an allegro, which constitutes the body of the work. Finally the solo resumes, and the serenade ends with fragments of the first theme, still interrupted by pianissimo chords from the orchestra. Mr. Hekking played the solo parts with great beauty of tone and phrasing; and the entire work was given with the perfection that we have learned to expect from the string orchestra. It was received with much enthusiasm. The symphony was Brahms' first in C minor. The greatness of this becomes more and more apparent with each succeeding hearing, and it surely ought to have a place on the programmes of every season. It was magnificently played, and must be considered one of the great successes of the season. The last movement, especially, was rendered with tremendous breadth; while the horn playing of Mr. Reiter was something not soon to be forgotten. Its conclusion was greeted with a burst of spontaneous applause, such as has been seldom heard at the close of any of the concerts.

THE PACHMANN CONCERTS.

On Monday, Wednesday and Thursday afternoons of last week Mr. Vladimir de Pachmann gave recitals in Chickering Hall, his programmes being composed entirely of pianoforte works by Chopin. Mr. de Pachmann is called by eminent authority a born interpreter of Chopin, and certainly in many respects that title properly belongs to him. His technique is peculiarly adapted to Chopin's music. His touch is remarkably musical, clear, delicate, yet full of vitality. He produces a tone such as we had begun to dream of as having once existed, and which seems fast becoming a lost art. He makes the piano sing wonderfully, and in a perfectly legitimate manner. Whether the melody lies in a simple passage of single notes, the top notes of a series of chords, in the middle voices, or in the bass, he always brings it to the surface and binds the fast receding tones of the piano together in a pure and unbroken cantabile. His legato in scales and arpeggios is equally beautiful, and is positively refreshing, coming in the midst of so much staccato playing. As for the more modern technical inventions, such as double thirds, sixths, and repeating octaves, his technique is fully equal to all their demands. In fact, one hardly realizes that he possesses a technique which is really great, so carefully is it held subservient to the music itself. Even in the studies the mechanical difficulties are kept so far out of sight that the idea of a study never occurs to one. They are rendered as a nocturne or a ballade would be, and rightly; for nearly all Chopin's studies are as musical in thought and intention as the rest of his music is. With such qualifications combined with a temperament which lends itself readily to the joyful, the mournful, the sparkling, and to some extent the passionate moods of Chopin, and an evident all-absorbing love for that master and his music, it is no wonder that he plays Chopin in a manner which not only appeals strongly to the listener, but which is postively unique. As to the actual artistic value of his playing there is doubtless among musicians considerable difference of opinion. There is no doubt that his personality has much to do with his success. He wins the attention of his audience quickly, and their hearts are not slow in capitulating. His face is soon discovered to be kaleidescopic in its expressiveness, and his smiles and frowns, his words of self-complacent approbation, and melancholy shakes of self-condemnation, which at first impress one as being simply amusing, come to be eagerly watched, and in the end draw the observer into a net which is as entangling to one's musical judgment as was that of the spider. To us he is a delightful but not a great interpreter of Chopin. He never reveals the full meaning of that poet-musician. Chopin had the spirit within him of a man. He is often called effeminate, and no doubt there are those who are sure of their reasons for thinking so. But we cannot recall a passage in any of his typical works that is effeminate. Like all composers he wrote music that was unworthy of his signature, but who would think of quoting it? On the contrary, he wrote music that could only be conceived by one who was a man through and through. For example, the polonaises opus 53 and 22, and the "Military Polonaise;" the ballades, the scherzo opus 39, and the prelude No. 24. Mr. de Pachmann sets his audience crazy with envy and delight over his marvellously executed and exquisitely finished performances of the studies, and similarly constructed works; he makes them sing with him in nocturne and ballade, and dance with him in waltz and mazurka. But he never makes them really mourn with Chopin, nor cry out as he does with passion and anguish; nor does he invest his greatest works with the breadth and virility which are preeminently their characteristics.

On Monday his playing, although it had delightful moments, was so far inferior to that of the two remaining concerts as to prove the truth of the report that he was not well. The study opus 25 No. 3, and the allegro de concert were perhaps the best performances of the day. On Wednesday, the fantasie in F minor and the sonata in B flat were played in a highly finished manner, and with far greater strength than he had before displayed. Still it was apparent that the beauty of detail was obtained at the expense of breadth. In the Ballade, opus 47, however, the pianist was thoroughly satisfying. The lively tempo, at which he took the second theme, was especially pleasing, and the absence of a sentimental rubato was equally so. The nocturne, opus 27, was gracefully but not impressively played; but the much abused impromptu, opus 36, was positively delightful. Such treatment of the difficult octave passage in the bass, which is usually a chaos of noise, and of the melodic accompaniment of the closing scale passages, which is too often never heard at all, should be a lesson to all players who were present. The famous study in double thirds was indeed a revelation. In evenness, legato, tempo, and finish, it was marvellous and exquisite. Needless to say, it was re-demanded, and was given once more with equal satisfaction to player and listener. His playing of the mazurka, opus 33, No 4, and the waltz in A flat, opus 42, was also a lesson in rhythm. The most fascinating effects were produced wholly through light and shade, while the bass was heard moving on steadily and crisply, seldom accelerating or retarding. The great scherzo in C sharp minor was finely played, being to us his broadest and strongest interpretation of all of the larger works included in three programmes. On Thursday there was more delightful playing in the barcarole, the tarantelle, and some studies, including that in double-thirds, which was repeated by request. After playing the study for the left hand, opus 10, No. 12, the wonderful little man forstalled criticism by a short speech, in which he said that he had it from Liszt that this study should not be rendered dramatically, but as he gave it, in a quiet, melancholy manner. This may be true, but it is certain that no other pupil of Liszt plays it so, and equally certain that such an interpretation is entirely antagonistic to the evident character of the study. The seldom played ballade in F., opus 38, was ineffectively given, the presto movements being hurried and confused, especially in the bass. The Berceuse, too, has frequently been played here in a more interesting manner. His rendering of the polonaise in A flat was far from being great. It was clearly and beautifully played, and the frightful octav passage for the left hand was given with wonderful ease and elasticity. But there was no trace of the fire and passion with which its every page is alive, and which only a Rubinstein can reproduce on the piano. As a pianoforte player Mr. Pachmann is the most delightful we have ever heard. He does not strive to make an orchestra of the instrument; on the contrary, he strives to keep it in its legitimate place, and thoroughly succeeds in doing so. His playing is a valuable lesson as showing us what the piano may still be in spite of the bad reputation it is fast acquiring through the harsh, unmusical sounds that so many of our "virtuosos" evoke from it. His success in bringing out the most beautiful qualities of the instrument he plays should also be a lesson to makers of pianos in reminding them that the future success of their business depends largely upon the judgment they display in advertising their wares in large or small halls. If Mr. Pachmann returns to Boston he should be heard by every lover of music.

"ISRAEL IN EGYPT."

Music Hall Sunday evening was again crowded to the doors at the performance of "Israel in Egypt." There was a true sense of the fitness of things displayed in selecting this work for the closing concert of the festival; for, while the honors might easily be shared equally by soloists and chorus in the works presented at the previous concerts, there could be no question, if there were any to be won at the performance of this oratorio, that they would belong to the chorus almost entirely. It certainly was a performance worthy of high praise. The choruses as a whole were finely sung. In fact, with one or two exceptions, it would be hard to say wherein one excelled another. In all there was displayed a volume of tone that gave ample testimony of the presence of fine material. The rendering of polyphonic passages also was more satisfactory than usual, and there were several creditable attempts at shading, notably in "But as for his people," which was given so well as to gain considerable applause. The audience however were not inclined strongly towards demonstrations of approval, except in response to the efforts of the soloists. Whether they were stunned by the grandeur of the music, or overcome by the remorseless vigor with which they were bombarded by the chorus and double-chorus it would be hard to say. It is small wonder that at performances of the work it is deemed essential to relieve the monotony of the first part by the introduction of certain recitatives and airs. Of the soloists, Mr. Lloyd made a tremendous success, as also did Mr. Whitney. The former sang the tenor recitatives, and those in the second part which belong to the soprano, with his usual directness, beauty of tone and phrasing. In "The enemy said, I will pursue," he outdid all previous efforts during the festival in dramatic effectiveness. Every note was thrilling in its intensity, while the whole air was rendered with a magnificent breadth and consistency that can only be attained by a master. The applause was of the kind that might have shaken the building, and both performance and response formed a worthy climax to his splendid work and the hearty appreciation which has been his during the week. Mr. Whitney also seemed inspired and certainly was in remarkably good condition. His voice in the air "Wave from Wave" was almost entirely free from the hollowness of tone which had marred his singing on former evenings, and his technique seemed in some magical way to have recovered its old-time fluency and elasticity. Excepting one or two husky notes, his delivery of the air was faultless, and that the audience thought so was proved by the tremendous applause that greeted him at its completion. Miss de Vere, on the contrary, was only fairly successful with her first aria "Hail, holy light." In her recitatives, and the solo with chorus as well, her singing was lacking in steadiness and expressiveness, and her tones indicated clearly the strain which her voice was undergoing. The aria "Thou didst blow with thy wind," however, was well sung and received with applause. Miss Poole also was untuneful in the aria "Their land brought forth frogs;" but "Thou shall bring them in" was perhaps her strongest effort during the festival, and met with an enthusiastic reception. Mr. Ludwig gave a vigorous and artistic rendering of the recitative and aria "He measured the waters," which redeemed his singing in the "Redemption." The duets for soprano and alto, the two basses, and the alto and tenor were well given, and the orchestra and organ rendered efficient service throughout the performance. It is a pleasure to say here that the managers of the festival deserve the highest praise for the manner in which it was conducted. The chorus and conductor have labored long and faithfully; and while the results have not always been as satisfactory as could be wished, the marked improvement in the quality of the chorus and of the singing is so encouraging as to lead one to hope that the standard of the society will soon be as high as that of the Symphony orchestra.

THE KNEISEL CONCERT.

The last of the series of concerts by the Kneisel Quartet was given in Union Hall, Monday evening, and proved to be one of the most charming of them all. Mr. Kneisel has shown most excellent taste and judgment in the selection of his programmes, and it is pleasing to see that his efforts have met with public approval more than sufficient to warrant him in continuing the concerts and maintaining them in future seasons at the same high standard. The concert Monday evening began with Mozart's quartet for strings in C major, which was rendered in a manner that was technically flawless, while at the same time the various performers contributed an individuality to their playing, which in the ensemble produced a most pleasing and human effect. The fluidity and sweetness which it was intended by its composer should be prevalent throughout the quartet was reproduced most satisfactorily, and showed of what delicate work the musicians are capable. The romance from Grieg's quartet in G minor, opus 27, which followed, was no less correctly played. All its subtle phasings and tender meanings were interpreted with a skill that in its results was truly charming, and which met with the enthusiastic approval of the audience. In the performance of the last number, Schubert's quintet for pianoforte, violin, viola, violoncello and bass, opus 114, the quartet had the assistance of Miss Adele Aus der Ohe and Mr. A. Goldstein. Although the former was heard to much less advantage than usually when she has appeared upon the concert stage she yet, notwithstanding the subordination of her part, displayed the same wonderful and perfect command of the instrument for which when playing in solo she has made herself distinguished.

The extraordinary success of the concerts given by Mr. Vladimir de Pachmann, last week, and an unmistakable desire on the part of the public for another opportunity to hear the famous Russian artist, have induced his manager to arrange a single concert to be given in Chickering Hall on Monday afternoon, April 28. A second recital will be given at the same place on Wednesday afternoon, April 30, by Mme. Marguerite de Pachmann, who fairly shared the honors of the New York concerts with her gifted husband. Tickets for both concerts go on sale at Music Hall tomorrow morning.

American Art Journal

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, APRIL 19, 1890.

M. and Mme. de Pachmann's Orchestral Concert.

On Friday evening, April 11, the Chopin, cyclus of concerts given by M. de Pachmann at Chickering Hall, came to a brilliant close. The genial pianist had the co-operation of Mr. Frank Van der Stucken and his orchestra, and Mme. Marguerite de Pachmann made her New York début upon the occasion. The programme was perhaps too lengthy, owing to the number of orchestral pieces indulged in, some of which might have been omitted advantageously. For example, the Suite of four numbers by Arnold Krug, which was uttely devoid of musical value. It dealt upon the different phases of a love affair, and was very tiresome, as most love episodes are to any but those concerned therein.

The remaining orchestral numbers, which included Mendelssohn's "Ruy Blas" overture, two charming sketches by Mr. Van der Stucken, entitled "Pagina d'Amore" and "Caliban's Pursuit," and the unique ball scene from Peter Benoit's "Charlotte Corday," were full of interest and were well played.

Mme. de Pachmann is certainly a pianiste of great merit. She plays with rare command of technique, has power and brilliancy, and is always artistic and correct in her work. Her first number was Liszt's E flat major Concerto. To say that she played it well is to express but faintly what one would say of her performance. She has a healthy and vigorous style of playing that is very pleasing, and with this she has imbibed enough of her illustrious husband's delicacy and refinement of method to render her conception of the work of intellectual as well as artistic value. She uses tone color with rare discretion, and while she plays with fire and dashing brilliancy whenever the occasion warrants, she never betrayed the least inclination to pound or thump. The extreme lucidity of her playing was admirable, leaving, as it did, every note of the difficult work well defined, excepting where the orchestra overweighted her, as is did now and then when the conductor's enthusiasm ruled supreme. It was evident that Mme. de Pachmann finds it no trouble to execute with ease the most difficult passages, and she plays with commendable disregard of all startling effects and sensationalism. It was good, honest playing, imbued with a refinement and elegance not often heard in our concert halls. She has not yet acquired the soft and singing touch and great polish that distinguishes M. de Pachmann, but she has sufficient good qualities to place her upon a high artistic plane of her own, and all comparisons are odious where both are so excellent. She afterward gave Henselt's "Danklied nach dem Sturm," and a "Rondeau brilliant" by Weber.

De Pachmann has quite established himself as a supreme favorite with the New York public, and his appearance upon the scene was the signal for an ovation from the vast audience. He was heard in Chopin's F-minor Concerto, in which he has won such a reputation abroad. He plays it marvelously well. The first movement is not especially beautiful, and has nothing to distinguish it in its composition. It calls for no great effort in any one way, and when M. Pachmann had performed it in a broadly intellectual style, and with the fine finish and correct phrasing he accords to all he plays, there was nothing more to be done.

It is in the Larghetto and Allegro Vivace that all the wondrous beauty of the concerto is concentrated. The Larghetto is without doubt the finest bit of playing that Pachmann has done here. The marvelously flowing cantabile touch, the delicacy with which the manifold nuances were given, the grace and certainty of the many swift runs that form the arabesques with which the Larghetto is ornamented, the delicious trills, the softly-rounded staccato were all accessory to the final end, but above all these was the music, the divine melody which sang like a human voice full of pathos and sympathy. This was what the audience heard, and while hearing forgot that there was a pianist.

It was the very spirit of music that entered into their hearts for the few moments that the "Larghetto" lasted. At its close the enthusiasm was unbounded. The Allegro Vivace M. Pachmann gave with a half humorous exuberance of manner that was inexpressibly charming. Figuratively speaking, he danced and laughed his way through the movement like a wayward child, willful, capricious as a fairy, with everchanging moods that found expression through the vivacious music. It was a complete exposition of moods upon the pianoforte that afforded the most exquisite pleasure to the hearers. It was little wonder that they recalled him five or six times at the close, and insisted upon yet another selection from his inspired fingers.

Mr. van der Stucken managed his orchestra admirably during this concerto, and he had no easy task, for Pachmann takes his own time for everything and hardly two bars are played in the same tempo. His piano solos were Schumann's "Romanza," op. 32; "Reverie du Lac," a charming little composition by Mme. de Pachmann, and "La Fileuse," by Raff, all of which he gave in the style we have become accustomed to in his recitals.

The concert closed with a "Scherzo," op. 87, for two pianos, by Saint Saens, given by Mme. and M. de Pachmann, who made the most of an exceedingly uninteresting composition that came at the end of an already too lengthy concert, and were well applauded for their efforts.

Boston Journal.

MORNING EDITION.

MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 21, 1890.

The Symphony Concert.

The feature of the Symphony concert Saturday night, the last but one in the series, was the appearance of Mme. Steinbach-Jahns, who had been sent for by Mr. Nikisch from Leipsic as a soloist in this city and to accompany the orchestra in its Western trip. The lady has an easy and commanding stage presence, and received a cordial greeting, as was due her by courtesy on her first appearance in this country in concert. She is credited with having met with large success in Germany, where Mr. Nikisch conducted before coming to this country, and had appeared in concerts there, as well as formerly in opera. She gave two selections, a very difficult aria from Mozart, and some songs with piano, to the accompaniment of Mr. Nikisch. To our mind her singing was a disappointment. Perhaps the glowing accounts we had heard of her success had led us to anticipate too much. Certainly she did not please the audience of Saturday evening far in advance of anything that has been heard on Music Hall stage. Her voice is powerful enough, but its quality is unpleasant to the ear and without any sympathetic feeling. The aria, in all but the florid passages, was the best thing, perhaps, and the songs, excepting one by Grieg, the poorest. Her method was, as was to be expected, of the German school, and we could imagine that in some of Wagner's music she might be excellent, particularly when correct intonation and a powerful delivery were requisite. But in selections like those essayed Saturday evening there was a feeling that something was needed to touch the hearts of the listeners, or claim their attention. She was presented with large floral offerings, but the applause showed that it was, in a large measure, due to courtesy.

The orchestra played with its usual care, the symphony by Brahms being delightfully rendered; a serenade by Volkmann and Goldmark's Spring Overture being the other numbers. The next Symphony Saturday evening will be the last of the season.

[117]

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 20, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT LAST NIGHT—THE GERMAN OPERA AND PACHMANN CONCERTS—OTHER MUSICAL EVENTS.

The twenty-third concert, and last but one of the season, was unusually interesting owing to the first appearance of Mme. Steinbach-Jahns, and to the first performance of a "Spring" overture, by Goldmark and of a serenade for string orchestra in D minor by Volkmann. Mme. Steinbach-Jahns comes from Leipzig expressly to accompany the orchestra in its tour, which begins at the conclusion of the concerts here. She has for several years held the position of first soprano at the Stadt Theatre in Leipzig, and has been especially successful in Wagnerian roles. Since she has made her successes in opera it would be impossible to estimate the extent of her abilities in one hearing in concert. Her voice is a high soprano the quality of which must formerly have been full and brilliant, but which now appears considerably worn. Technically, she has had good training as was evinced by the ease with which she executed the extremely difficult aria, "Thou mays't learn to hate me," from Mozart's early comic opera "Die Entfuhrung." She also sang three songs with pianoforte accompaniment, "O Lieb," by Liszt; "Du bist die Ruh," by Schubert; and "Hoffnung," by Grieg. The first, which is almost identical with the third of the Liebestraume" nocturnes that Liszt wrote for the piano, was unsatisfactorily rendered. The second, however, was beautifully sung, and the last was given with much strength and dramatic fervor. Mr. Nikisch played the accompaniment delightfully. Mme. Jahns' agreeable presence as well as her singing won the favor of the audience, who recalled her several times; and at the conclusion of the Mozart aria she was presented with three very large floral decorations, one of which was in the form of a star, and another being a large basket of roses, all of which took the united efforts of two ushers to remove from the stage. The overture was thoroughly suggestive of its title. It is not especially original in material, but its buoyant, airy, opening theme is as exhilarating as are the beautiful days that will soon be upon us, while the tranquil second theme, a simple melody beautifully harmonized forms a happy contrast. The instrumentation is equally charming, descriptive and brilliant, the colors being laid on by the hand of one who had in mind the beauties of Nature herself. The work is not long nor theatrical. Neither is it great. But it is a delightful, well-rounded tone-poem, with an odor of fresh air about it that gives one genuine and healthful pleasure. The serenade also was enjoyable from beginning to end. Although there are several themes and as many changes of tempo, the work is in the form of one unbroken movement. It opens with a solo for 'cello in larghetto time, which is soon interrupted by the full string orchestra. Next the movement changes to andante expression, then to prestissimo, after which the solo again appears for a few measures and leads up to an allegro, which constitutes the body of the work. Finally the solo resumes, and the serenade ends with fragments of the first theme, still interrupted by pianissimo chords from the orchestra. Mr. Hekking played the solo parts with great beauty of tone and phrasing; and the entire work was given with the perfection that we have learned to expect from the string orchestra. It was received with much enthusiasm. The symphony was Brahms' first in C minor. The greatness of this becomes more and more apparent with each succeeding hearing, and it surely ought to have a place on the programmes of every season. It was magnificently played, and must be considered one of the great successes of the season. The last movement, especially, was rendered with tremendous breadth; while the horn playing of Mr. Reiter was something not soon to be forgotten. Its conclusion was greeted with a burst of spontaneous applause, such as has been seldom heard at the close of any of the concerts.

THE PACHMANN CONCERTS.

On Monday, Wednesday and Thursday afternoons of last week Mr. Vladimir de Pachmann gave recitals in Chickering Hall, his programmes being composed entirely of pianoforte works by Chopin. Mr. de Pachmann is called by eminent authority a born interpreter of Chopin, and certainly in many respects that title properly belongs to him. His technique is peculiarly adapted to Chopin's music. His touch is remarkably musical, clear, delicate, yet full of vitality. He produces a tone such as we had begun to dream of as having once existed, and which seems fast becoming a lost art. He makes the piano sing wonderfully, and in a perfectly legitimate manner. Whether the melody lies in a simple passage of single notes, the top notes of a series of chords, in the middle voices, or in the bass, he always brings it to the surface and binds the fast receding tones of the piano together in a pure and unbroken cantabile. His legato in scales and arpeggios is equally beautiful, and is positively refreshing, coming in the midst of so much staccato playing. As for the more modern technical inventions, such as double thirds, sixths, and repeating octaves, his technique is fully equal to all their demands. In fact, one hardly realizes that he possesses a technique which is really great, so carefully is it held subservient to the music itself. Even in the studies the mechanical difficulties are kept so far out of sight that the idea of a study never occurs to one. They are rendered as a nocturne or a ballade would be, and rightly; for nearly all Chopin's studies are as musical in thought and intention as the rest of his music is. With such qualifications combined with a temperament which lends itself readily to the joyful, the mournful, the sparkling, and to some extent the passionate moods of Chopin, and an evident all-absorbing love for that master and his music, it is no wonder that he plays Chopin in a manner which not only appeals strongly to the listener, but which is positively unique. As to the actual artistic value of his playing there is doubtless among musicians considerable difference of opinion. There is no doubt that his personality has much to do with his success. He wins the attention of his audience quickly, and their hearts are not slow in capitulating. His face is soon discovered to be kaleidescopic in its expressiveness, and his smiles and frowns, his words of self-complacent approbation, and melancholy shakes of self-condemnation, which at first impress one as being simply amusing, come to be eagerly watched, and in the end draw the observer into a net which is as entangling to one's musical judgment as was that of the spider. To us he is a delightful but not a great interpreter of Chopin. He never reveals the full meaning of that poet-musician. Chopin had the spirit within him of a man. He is often called effeminate, and no doubt there are those who are sure of their reasons for thinking so. But we cannot recall a passage in any of his typical works that is effeminate. Like all composers he wrote music that was unworthy of his signature, but who would think of quoting it? On the contrary, he wrote music that could only be conceived by one who was a man through and through. For example, the polonaises opus 53 and 22, and the "Military Polonaise;" the ballades, the scherzo opus 39, and the prelude No. 24. Mr. de Pachmann sets his audience crazy with envy and delight over his marvellously executed and exquisitely finished performances of the studies, and similarly constructed works; he makes them sing with him in nocturne and ballade, and dance with him in waltz and mazurka. But he never makes them really mourn with Chopin, nor cry out as he does with passion and anguish; nor does he invest his greatest works with the breadth and virility which are preeminently their characteristics.

On Monday his playing, although it had delightful moments, was so far inferior to that of the two remaining concerts as to prove the truth of the report that he was not well. The study opus 25 No. 3, and the allegro de concert were perhaps the best performances of the day. On Wednesday, the fantasie in F minor and the sonata in B flat were played in a highly finished manner, and with far greater strength than he had before displayed. Still it was apparent that the beauty of detail was obtained at the expense of breadth. In the Ballade, opus 47, however, the pianist was thoroughly satisfying. The lively tempo, at which he took the second theme, was especially pleasing, and the absence of a sentimental rubato was equally so. The nocturne, opus 27, was gracefully but not impressively played; but the much abused impromptu, opus 36, was positively delightful. Such treatment of the difficult octave passage in the bass, which is usually a chaos of noise, and of the melodic accompaniment of the closing scale passages, which is too often never heard at all, should be a lesson to all players who were present. The famous study in double thirds was indeed a revelation. In evenness, legato, tempo, and finish, it was marvellous and exquisite. Needless to say, it was re-demanded, and was given once more with equal satisfaction to player and listener. His playing of the mazurka, opus 33, No 4, and the waltz in A flat, opus 42, was also a lesson in rhythm. The most fascinating effects were produced wholly through light and shade, while the bass was heard moving on steadily and crisply, seldom accelerating or retarding. The great scherzo in C sharp minor was finely played, being to us his broadest and strongest interpretation of all of the larger works included in three programmes. On Thursday there was more delightful playing in the barcarole, the tarantelle, and some studies, including that in double-thirds, which was repeated by request. After playing the study for the left hand, opus 10, No. 12, the wonderful little man forstalled criticism by a short speech, in which he said that he had it from Liszt that this study should not be rendered dramatically, but as he gave it, in a quiet, melancholy manner. This may be true, but it is certain that no other pupil of Liszt plays it so, and equally certain that such an interpretation is entirely antagonistic to the evident character of the study. The seldom played ballade in F., opus 38, was ineffectively given, the presto movements being hurried and confused, especially in the bass. The Berceuse, too, has frequently been played here in a more interesting manner. His rendering of the polonaise in A flat was far from being great. It was clearly and beautifully played, and the frightful octav passage for the left hand was given with wonderful ease and elasticity. But there was no trace of the fire and passion with which its every page is alive, and which only a Rubinstein can reproduce on the piano. As a pianoforte player Mr. Pachmann is the most delightful we have ever heard. He does not strive to make an orchestra of the instrument; on the contrary, he strives to keep it in its legitimate place, and thoroughly succeeds in doing so. His playing is a valuable lesson as showing us what the piano may still be in spite of the bad reputation it is fast acquiring through the harsh, unmusical sounds that so many of our "virtuosos" evoke from it. His success in bringing out the most beautiful qualities of the instrument he plays should also be a lesson to makers of pianos in reminding them that the future success of their business depends largely upon the judgment they display in advertising their wares in large or small halls. If Mr. Pachmann returns to Boston he should be heard by every lover of music.

"ISRAEL IN EGYPT."

Music Hall Sunday evening was again crowded to the doors at the performance of "Israel in Egypt." There was a true sense of the fitness of things displayed in selecting this work for the closing concert of the festival; for, while the honors might easily be shared equally by soloists and chorus in the works presented at the previous concerts, there could be no question, if there were any to be won at the performance of this oratorio, that they would belong to the chorus almost entirely. It certainly was a performance worthy of high praise. The choruses as a whole were finely sung. In fact, with one or two exceptions, it would be hard to say wherein one excelled another. In all there was displayed a volume of tone that gave ample testimony of the presence of fine material. The rendering of polyphonic passages also was more satisfactory than usual, and there were several creditable attempts at shading, notably in "But as for his people," which was given so well as to gain considerable applause. The audience however were not inclined strongly towards demonstrations of approval, except in response to the efforts of the soloists. Whether they were stunned by the grandeur of the music, or overcome by the remorseless vigor with which they were bombarded by the chorus and double-chorus it would be hard to say. It is small wonder that at performances of the work it is deemed essential to relieve the monotony of the first part by the introduction of certain recitatives and airs. Of the soloists, Mr. Lloyd made a tremendous success, as also did Mr. Whitney. The former sang the tenor recitatives, and those in the second part which belong to the soprano, with his usual directness, beauty of tone and phrasing. In "The enemy said, I will pursue," he outdid all previous efforts during the festival in dramatic effectiveness. Every note was thrilling in its intensity, while the whole air was rendered with a magnificent breadth and consistency that can only be attained by a master. The applause was of the kind that might have shaken the building, and both performance and response formed a worthy climax to his splendid work and the hearty appreciation which has been his during the week. Mr. Whitney also seemed inspired and certainly was in remarkably good condition. His voice in the air "Wave from Wave" was almost entirely free from the hollowness of tone which had marred his singing on former evenings, and his technique seemed in some magical way to have recovered its old-time fluency and elasticity. Excepting one or two husky notes, his delivery of the air was faultless, and that the audience thought so was proved by the tremendous applause that greeted him at its completion. Miss de Vere, on the contrary, was only fairly successful with her first aria "Hail, holy light." In her recitatives, and the solo with chorus as well, her singing was lacking in steadiness and expressiveness, and her tones indicated clearly the strain which her voice was undergoing. The aria "Thou didst blow with thy wind," however, was well sung and received with applause. Miss Poole also was untuneful in the aria "Their land brought forth frogs;" but "Thou shall bring them in" was perhaps her strongest effort during the festival, and met with an enthusiastic reception. Mr. Ludwig gave a vigorous and artistic rendering of the recitative and aria "He measured the waters," which redeemed his singing in the "Redemption." The duets for soprano and alto, the two basses, and the alto and tenor were well given, and the orchestra and organ rendered efficient service throughout the performance. It is a pleasure to say here that the managers of the festival deserve the highest praise for the manner in which it was conducted. The chorus and conductor have labored long and faithfully; and while the results have not always been as satisfactory as could be wished, the marked improvement in the quality of the chorus and of the singing is so encouraging as to lead one to hope that the standard of the society will soon be as high as that of the Symphony orchestra.

THE KNEISEL CONCERT.

The last of the series of concerts by the Kneisel Quartet was given in Union Hall, Monday evening, and proved to be one of the most charming of them all. Mr. Kneisel has shown most excellent taste and judgment in the selection of his programmes, and it is pleasing to see that his efforts have met with public approval more than sufficient to warrant him in continuing the concerts and maintaining them in future seasons at the same high standard. The concert Monday evening began with Mozart's quartet for strings in C major, which was rendered in a manner that was technically flawless, while at the same time the various performers contributed an individuality to their playing, which in the ensemble produced a most pleasing and human effect. The fluidity and sweetness which it was intended by its composer should be prevalent throughout the quartet was reproduced most satisfactorily, and showed of what delicate work the musicians are capable. The romance from Grieg's quartet in G minor, opus 27, which followed, was no less correctly played. All its subtle phasings and tender meanings were interpreted with a skill that in its results was truly charming, and which met with the enthusiastic approval of the audience. In the performance of the last number, Schubert's quintet for pianoforte, violin, viola, violoncello and bass, opus 114, the quartet had the assistance of Miss Adele Aus der Ohe and Mr. A. Goldstein. Although the former was heard to much less advantage than usually when she has appeared upon the concert stage she yet, notwithstanding the subordination of her part, displayed the same wonderful and perfect command of the instrument for which when playing in solo she has made herself distinguished.

The extraordinary success of the concerts given by Mr. Vladimir de Pachmann, last week, and an unmistakable desire on the part of the public for another opportunity to hear the famous Russian artist, have induced his manager to arrange a single concert to be given in Chickering Hall on Monday afternoon, April 28. A second recital will be given at the same place on Wednesday afternoon, April 30, by Mme. Marguerite de Pachmann, who fairly shared the honors of the New York concerts with her gifted husband. Tickets for both concerts go on sale at Music Hall tomorrow morning.

American Art Journal

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, APRIL 19, 1890.

M. and Mme. de Pachmann's Orchestral Concert.

On Friday evening, April 11, the Chopin, cyclus of concerts given by M. de Pachmann at Chickering Hall, came to a brilliant close. The genial pianist had the co-operation of Mr. Frank Van der Stucken and his orchestra, and Mme. Marguerite de Pachmann made her New York début upon the occasion. The programme was perhaps too lengthy, owing to the number of orchestral pieces indulged in, some of which might have been omitted advantageously. For example, the Suite of four numbers by Arnold Krug, which was uttely devoid of musical value. It dealt upon the different phases of a love affair, and was very tiresome, as most love episodes are to any but those concerned therein.

The remaining orchestral numbers, which included Mendelssohn's "Ruy Blas" overture, two charming sketches by Mr. Van der Stucken, entitled "Pagina d'Amore" and "Caliban's Pursuit," and the unique ball scene from Peter Benoit's "Charlotte Corday," were full of interest and were well played.

Mme. de Pachmann is certainly a pianiste of great merit. She plays with rare command of technique, has power and brilliancy, and is always artistic and correct in her work. Her first number was Liszt's E flat major Concerto. To say that she played it well is to express but faintly what one would say of her performance. She has a healthy and vigorous style of playing that is very pleasing, and with this she has imbibed enough of her illustrious husband's delicacy and refinement of method to render her conception of the work of intellectual as well as artistic value. She uses tone color with rare discretion, and while she plays with fire and dashing brilliancy whenever the occasion warrants, she never betrayed the least inclination to pound or thump. The extreme lucidity of her playing was admirable, leaving, as it did, every note of the difficult work well defined, excepting where the orchestra overweighted her, as is did now and then when the conductor's enthusiasm ruled supreme. It was evident that Mme. de Pachmann finds it no trouble to execute with ease the most difficult passages, and she plays with commendable disregard of all startling effects and sensationalism. It was good, honest playing, imbued with a refinement and elegance not often heard in our concert halls. She has not yet acquired the soft and singing touch and great polish that distinguishes M. de Pachmann, but she has sufficient good qualities to place her upon a high artistic plane of her own, and all comparisons are odious where both are so excellent. She afterward gave Henselt's "Danklied nach dem Sturm," and a "Rondeau brilliant" by Weber.

De Pachmann has quite established himself as a supreme favorite with the New York public, and his appearance upon the scene was the signal for an ovation from the vast audience. He was heard in Chopin's F-minor Concerto, in which he has won such a reputation abroad. He plays it marvelously well. The first movement is not especially beautiful, and has nothing to distinguish it in its composition. It calls for no great effort in any one way, and when M. Pachmann had performed it in a broadly intellectual style, and with the fine finish and correct phrasing he accords to all he plays, there was nothing more to be done.

It is in the Larghetto and Allegro Vivace that all the wondrous beauty of the concerto is concentrated. The Larghetto is without doubt the finest bit of playing that Pachmann has done here. The marvelously flowing cantabile touch, the delicacy with which the manifold nuances were given, the grace and certainty of the many swift runs that form the arabesques with which the Larghetto is ornamented, the delicious trills, the softly-rounded staccato were all accessory to the final end, but above all these was the music, the divine melody which sang like a human voice full of pathos and sympathy. This was what the audience heard, and while hearing forgot that there was a pianist.

It was the very spirit of music that entered into their hearts for the few moments that the "Larghetto" lasted. At its close the enthusiasm was unbounded. The Allegro Vivace M. Pachmann gave with a half humorous exuberance of manner that was inexpressibly charming. Figuratively speaking, he danced and laughed his way through the movement like a wayward child, willful, capricious as a fairy, with everchanging moods that found expression through the vivacious music. It was a complete exposition of moods upon the pianoforte that afforded the most exquisite pleasure to the hearers. It was little wonder that they recalled him five or six times at the close, and insisted upon yet another selection from his inspired fingers.

Mr. van der Stucken managed his orchestra admirably during this concerto, and he had no easy task, for Pachmann takes his own time for everything and hardly two bars are played in the same tempo. His piano solos were Schumann's "Romanza," op. 32; "Reverie du Lac," a charming little composition by Mme. de Pachmann, and "La Fileuse," by Raff, all of which he gave in the style we have become accustomed to in his recitals.

The concert closed with a "Scherzo," op. 87, for two pianos, by Saint Saens, given by Mme. and M. de Pachmann, who made the most of an exceedingly uninteresting composition that came at the end of an already too lengthy concert, and were well applauded for their efforts.

Boston Journal.

MORNING EDITION.

MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 21, 1890.

The Symphony Concert.

The feature of the Symphony concert Saturday night, the last but one in the series, was the appearance of Mme. Steinbach-Jahns, who had been sent for by Mr. Nikisch from Leipsic as a soloist in this city and to accompany the orchestra in its Western trip. The lady has an easy and commanding stage presence, and received a cordial greeting, as was due her by courtesy on her first appearance in this country in concert. She is credited with having met with large success in Germany, where Mr. Nikisch conducted before coming to this country, and had appeared in concerts there, as well as formerly in opera. She gave two selections, a very difficult aria from Mozart, and some songs with piano, to the accompaniment of Mr. Nikisch. To our mind her singing was a disappointment. Perhaps the glowing accounts we had heard of her success had led us to anticipate too much. Certainly she did not please the audience of Saturday evening far in advance of anything that has been heard on Music Hall stage. Her voice is powerful enough, but its quality is unpleasant to the ear and without any sympathetic feeling. The aria, in all but the florid passages, was the best thing, perhaps, and the songs, excepting one by Grieg, the poorest. Her method was, as was to be expected, of the German school, and we could imagine that in some of Wagner's music she might be excellent, particularly when correct intonation and a powerful delivery were requisite. But in selections like those essayed Saturday evening there was a feeling that something was needed to touch the hearts of the listeners, or claim their attention. She was presented with large floral offerings, but the applause showed that it was, in a large measure, due to courtesy.

The orchestra played with its usual care, the symphony by Brahms being delightfully rendered; a serenade by Volkmann and Goldmark's Spring Overture being the other numbers. The next Symphony Saturday evening will be the last of the season.

[117]

Gazette

SUNDAY MORNING EDITION

The Boston Symphony Concert.

Last night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened with Goldmark's "Spring" overture, a composition new to this city. It is a brilliant, genial, and charming work, full of life and freshness, with a fine and easy flow of melody, and a broad and joyous freedom of style manifested in none of the other works that we have heard by this master. The instrumentation is very beautiful. The overture which is felicitously named was splendidly played and received with gr at favor. Brahms's Symphony No, 1, ended the concert. It was read in a masterly style, notably the adagio and allegro forming the finale, and was played in the most spirited and finished manner of the orchestra, Mme. Steinbach Jahns, a soprano from Leipsic, made her first appearance in concert here on this occasion. She has a fine presence and an attractive bearing. Her voice is powerful, but harsh and acid in quality, and shows signs of wear. She is manifestly an artist of experience, and sings with fire, but with no especial grace or polish. She sang the aria "Matern aller Arter," from Mozart's "Escape from the Seraglio," with great vigor, and something of dramatic fervor, but in a rough, and at times startlingly explosive style, and in the bravura passages with but little finish. Later she gave a group of songs by Liszt, Schubert and Grieg with better effect, but with the same roughness that characterized the earlier effort with an added leaning in the direction of false intonation. It was singing which, despite its dash and emphasis, was scarcely up to the standard demanded by these concerts. The artist was cordially received, and recalled after each performance, and was also presented with two enormous tributes of flowers. Mr. Hekking was also a soloist, playing Volkmann's Serenade for 'cello and string orchestra in D minor, op. 69; a delightful work, heard before in this city, but not in these concerts. It is needless to say that Mr. Hekking played the solo with the highest finish in point of technique, and with exquisite taste in point of style. He was enthusiastically applauded, and twice encored. For the next concert, which will be the last of this season's series, the programme is: Symphony No. 4, in B-flat, Beethoven; Moto Perpetuo, Paganini, to be played by thirty-two violins, and Wagner's "Die Meistersinger" Overture.

The last of this season's series of concerts by the the Kneisel Quartet was given in Union Hall, on Monday night. The Mozart Quartet in C, for strings, which opened the performances, was very beautifully played, and with just the grace, warmth and delicacy of style that was necessary to a sympathetic interpretation of the work. It was followed by a romance from a quartet by Greig, in G-minor, op. 27, a movement full of charm in the freshness of its subjects, and the skill and easy freedom with which they are treated. It was music which this quartet interprets with special felicity, and was delightfully played. The whole ended with Schubert's Quintet in A, for piano, violin, viola, cello and bass, op. 114, Miss Aus Der Ohe playing the piano part and Mr. A. Goldstein the ba s. The work was given in a masterly manner, but its effect was marred, owing to the fact that Miss Aus Der Ohe elected to play with the cover of the piano down, the result being a muffl d tone from the instrument and an indistinctness in the less forcible movements of the work, that caused the tones of the piano almost to disappear entirely. The pianist also played without notes, which, though it may be advantageous in solo work, is by no means advisable in ensemble chamber music, which is scarcely a medium for the exhibition of skill in mnemonics, a gift that, at its best, adds nothing to the merits of a performance. This series of concerts by the Kneisel Quartet has been the best yet given by this fine organization.

The Handel and Haydn Festival closed on Sunday evening last with Handel's "Israel in Egypt," the soloists being Miss Clementine de Vere, Miss Clara Poole, Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr. William Ludwig and Mr. Myron W. Whitney. The work was given in its entirety, and, on the whole, in a very creditable manner The chorus sang with great steadiness and precision as to rule, and acquitting itself well generally. Of the soloists Mr. Lloyd was easily first, and excited a furore by his glorious singing of 'The Enemy Said." In spirit, style, phrasing and technique it was as perfect a bit of vocal art as we are ever permitted to hear. The bravura passages were given out in a wonderfully clear, smooth and even way, though the artist was at some disadvantage owing to the inflexibility with which he was followed by the conductor, who, instead of follow the singer in his earnest efforts to push the time in these prolonged and breath-trying figures, held him with a grip of iron to the strict tempo. It needed all of Mr. Lloyd's art and science to prove equal to the rigid strain by which he was thus hampered; but he went through the ordeal successfully. He was rewarded with thunders of applause. Miss de Vere and Miss Poole sang the duet for soprano and alto with untunefulness and little skill in phrasing, and Miss de Vere was scarcely more praiseworthy in her one important solo, a result somewhat surprising in view of the fact that the artist is essentially a singer of coloratura music, to which class this number unquestionably pertains. Mr. Ludwig and Mr. Whitney were excellent in the bass solos, and sang the duet "The Lord is a Man of War" with stirring spirit and sturdiness of style. There was an enormous audience present The festival was a complete pecuniary success, and in many essentials its artistic achievements were both marked and admirable. The chorus has never done better work than it did at these performances as far as steadiness, tunefulness, and vigor are concerned. Its principal shortcomings were in the Bach and the Handel works, where sufficient care had not been taken to insure uniformity of phrasing among the large body of singers, and where also there did not appear to be any systematic taking of breath in the more florid choral passages. The performers evidently sang until their breath was exhausted, and then started again. As some could take a longer breath than others, the result was a confusion wholly inimical to the proper emphasis of phrasing—in fact, to phrasing at all. This could be easily remedied by causing the singers on each part to breathe in the same places. With the desired change the blurring of tone that was heard in the elaborate Bach and Handel choruses would disappear. Of the soloists who appeared in the festival, the men were far stronger than the women. The bright, particular star proved to be Mr. Lloyd, whose success was as overwhelming as it was merited. His work throughout was without a flaw, and was in the highest vein of the best vocal art. Mr. Ludwig's triumph in "Elijah" was another of the striking and worthy features of the festival for its originality, its deep, dramatic fervor, and the artistic quality of its singing. Mr. Parker's beautiful cantata was one of the gratifying successes of the week that was fairly made upon its great and indubitable merits. The society has every reason to be satisfied with the outcome of its efforts to make its seventy fifth anniversary memorable.

The Chopin Recitals of Mr. Vlademir de Pachmann in Chickering Hall last week were at once a surprise and a delight. We do not know whether he be versatile or not; whether or no he can interpret other composers as he interprets Chopin; but what he has let us know that he can do he does in an unsurpassed and unsurpassable way. He has some peculiarities of personal bearing before the public, possibly the outcome of a peculiar temperament, that we could wish absent, but these do not in anywise detract from his playing, which is as beautiful as it is extraordinary. His technique is not only perfect, but is astonishing in its easy, undemonstrative fluency even when the most exciting exactions are made upon it His touch is exquisite, and produces an amazing variety of tone qualities from the piano, while his phrasing is of the most masterly and fascinating description. The brilliant virtuo o and the keenly sympathetic artist are combined equally in him; he seems to play for the love of playing, making nothing of his great technique but a means to a worthy end. Above all he possesses a fine musical intelligence that makes itself felt at every stage of his playing. As we have said, we do not know the extent of his artistic gifts, but in the special genre of piano playing to which these three recitals were devoted, he is an artist of the rarest qualities. Now and then he falls into an excess of sentiment, as in his playing of the funeral march from the Sonata, op. 35, but these moments are not frequent; in fact, there is in his Chopin reading a prevailing virility and a freedom from sickly sentimentality that is notable for its rarity among interpreters of Chopin. It would be too tiresome a task to write in detail of the three long programmes, of the originality, beauty and fluency of the artist's interpretation of even his most noteworthy successes. We cannot, however, refrain from alluding to his marvellously clear performance of the difficult study in double notes, op. 25, No. 6, which was not only a triumph of technique, but which was also a triumph in the variety of color imparted to it. The ease and sureness with which this study was taken at a break-neck pace, and played throughout without seeming effort, made it one of the most brilliant and beautiful displays of technique artistically controlled to which we have ever listened. His reading and playing of the Ballade in A-flat, op 47, was indescribably fine. The Berceuse in D flat, op 57, the Allegro Assai in G-flat, op. 25, and the Polonaise in A-flat, op 53, were all examples of playing and interpretation in their highest and finest development. In the Polonaise the tremendously difficult octave figure in the left hand was given with an off-hand lack of exertion that was scarcely credible, and the steadily swelling crescendo that accompanied it, also produced in a like seemingly effortless way, added to the wonder of the technical achievement. We have heard Rubinstein do the same thing, but not with the almost exasperating ease that attended M. de Pachmann's performance of the same feat. It is possible that the artist's gifts are confined within narrow limitations as far as interpreting goes; but what he does is done with a skill, a taste and a perfection that cannot be overtopped. He will give another series of concerts shortly, in which, we understand, he is to be heard in a miscellaneous programme. We must not end before stating that the artist won an enthusiastic success from the most critical audiences that Boston can show.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 21, 1890.

The Symphony Concert—Mme. Steinbach-Jahns as Soloist.

After the short interregnum it was a delight to listen to the music of our orchestra again. If one is obliged occasionally to find fault with this or that interpretation on the symphonic programmes, it must be borne in mind that the standard applied is altogether a higher one than other musical occasions would bear, and at the end of all animadversion one can exclaim: "With all thy faults I love thee still"! The programme of Saturday began with a very ecstatic overture by Goldmark, entitled, "Spring." The first theme of this work was full of a robust heartiness which was well reflected by the robust playing of the orchestra. In fine contrast was the tender longing of the subsequent melody, in which ecstacy was represented a la Wagner by violin phrases in the highest position, and there were bird-pipings as realistic as in the coda of the second movement of the "Pastoral Symphony." The flute had much to do and did it well, and the responses between the woodwind and the strings in a deep pizzicato, were excellently given; altogether a work which made a most favorable impression on critics and public alike. Then came Mme. Steinbach-Jahns all the way from Leipsic to give some worthy additions to the German vocalism which has taken possession of our city for the past two weeks. She had evidently not brought her tuning fork along, and was often flat of pitch, but her pleasing personality, and the florid style of the first number, from Mozart's "Entfuehrung" won the public, and when at its conclusion, the contents of an entire hothouse were brought to the stage by two ushers, everyone added to the floral tribute the heartiest applause. In the subsequent group of lieder Mme. Jahns showed a more sympathetic style, and a real appreciation of the subtler points of the school. Liszt's "O lieb so lang du lieben kannst" was well sung, although at times there was a harsh and disagreeable timbre in the voice. Schubert's "Du bist die Ruh," although not exactly the best selection for Music Hall, was well shaded and the nuances at "Dies Augenzelt" were finely rendered, although here again there was more than a suspicion of false intonation. Grieg's "Hoffnung" brought the group to a close. It may be best to reserve full judgment on the vocalist until she has appeared again, since she comes at a rather inopportune moment, after Mme. Lehmann, and the faults recorded may be but temporary and the result of a long voyage. Even as it is, the public were delighted, and the recalls were numerous and hearty. The flexibility of so solid a voice was remarkable.

Volkmann's serenade for string orchestra in D minor showed plainly that the strings do not play with the precision they once possessed. It is a curious work which does not give separate movements in the old serenade style, but joins the different episodes together in a constant panorama of small tone pictures. In this respect it reminds of Schumann, and the resemblance is rendered yet more striking by distinct reminiscences of that master's "Carnival." Pierrot is there, represented by lumbering progressions on the contrabasses, and it is easy to identify the skips of harlequin as well. There is a cello obligato part in the work which brought Mr. Hekking to the front, and I have never heard this artist do broader work. When he becomes possessed of a Stradivarius or an Amaticello, instead of his own shallow-toned instrument, he will be at a better advantage. The beginning of the work is largely antiphonal, the orchestra responding to the weird Oriental phrases of the solo instrument for an unnecessary length of time. The chief phrase of the cello was decidedly Hebraic in character. The work was rather prolix, yet was very dramatic at times, and at its close Mr. Hekking was recalled three times, but I am convinced that part of the enthusiasm was intended for Mr. Nikisch, who gave the work an effective reading, but who modestly remained in the background.

The crowning glory of the concert was its ending. Brahms' symphony in C minor was given a reading that, in spite of the interpretations of Mr. Henschel (Brahms' personal friend) and of Mr. Gericke, who also had the advantage of hearing the master lead his own work, remains the grandest that has been given in these concerts. The first movement of this symphony is the extreme of intellectuality as represented in the sonata form, yet it was by no means wrong to give to it the dramatic force with which Mr. Nikisch invested it. The idea of struggle, of sorrow, of consolation, of triumph, was portrayed with sequential and logical power. The second movement was worked up in most passionate fashion, and it is but due to speak of the oboe work in this portion of the symphony, which was excellent. But if the first three movements were well read, the finale was a triumph for the conductor and orchestra. It is an epitome of the entire symphony, as the first part of the finale of Beethoven's ninth synopsizes that work. The furious pizzicato effects, with their caprices of tempo, were well given; the horn was finely played by Mr. Reiter, and the solemn chant of the trombones (oh that we could have had such an effect in "Don Juan" the other night!) was impressive in the highest degree. Hanslick has characterized Brahms' first three symphonies as follows: "The C minor is the 'pathetic' or the 'appassionata,' the second is the 'pastoral,' the third may be called the 'heroic,'" and certainly Mr. Nikisch brought out all the fervor of the "appassionata" in the reading of Saturday. I could almost wish that this had been the last concert of the season, for the conductor could not have made a more brilliant exit.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

DE PACHMANN RECITALS.

So many requests have been received for a further opportunity of hearing Mr. Vladimir de Pachmann that his manager has arranged for a single piano recital to be given at Chickering Hall on Monday afternoon, April 28, when there is little doubt that the gifted Russian will receive a hearty welcome. A second recital will be given at the same place on Wednesday afternoon, April 30, by Mme. Marguerite de Pachmann, who is also a pianist of great ability and who fairly divided with her husband the success of the New York concerts. Tickets for both recitals go on sale at Music Hall this morning.

Boston Daily Traveller.

MONDAY, APRIL 21, 1890.

Twenty-third Symphony Concert, Mme. Steinbach-Jahns.

The programme of the twenty-third Symphony concert, with Mme. Steinbach-Jahns soloist, was:

Goldmark.	Overture, "Spring." First time in Boston.
Mozart.	Aria, "Thou may'st learn to hate me," "Die Entfnehrung aus dem Serail."
Volkmann.	Serenade for string orchestra, in D minor, op 69. First time at these concerts. Solo Violoncello Mr. Anton Hekking.
	Songs with piano.
a) Liszt.	"O Lieb."
b) Schubert.	"Du bist die Ruh."
c) Grieg.	"Hoffnung."
Brahms.	Symphony No. 1, in C minor, op. 68.

Goldmark's new overture has not the superlative sensous flow of his "Sakuntala" and "Penthesilea," nor is the workmanship as fine, but it is interestingly scored and sounds well. The Volkmann serenade is neatly made, and the introduction of the violoncello obligato (beautifully rendered by Mr. Hekking) takes it out of the conventional; but its artistic level is not high. Though written to be played without break the piece is varied in tempo; it possesses a certain unity because of the frequent use of one very melodious subject. The serenade was admirably played. The splendid C minor symphony of Brahms we regret to say we did not hear. The new singer comes from Leipzig where formerly, until her voluntary retirement, she was an opera favorite. She sings with fervor, and shows a musical spirit. The florid Mozart piece was not the happiest selection, for notwithstanding her admirable phrasing, her coloratureur singing shows that her upper voice has lost something in freshness; we should think Elizabeth's aria, sung in the second act of "Tannhäuser," would fit her style. The voice is large and well fitted for dramatic parts. In the songs, sung to the exquisite pianoforte accompaniment of Mr. Nikisch, Mme. Steinbach-Jahns was more succesful, especially in Grieg's bright tune. After each appearance the singer was recalled. Mme. Steinbach-Jahns has a winning personality, and won her audience by her sweet ways. Two gorgeous flower pieces were presented to her. The season of symphony concerts closes next week Saturday, when this programme will be performed: Beethoven, Fourth Symphony; Paganini, Moto Perpetuo, for 32 violins; overture, "Die Meistersinger," Wagner.

Boston Evening Transcript.

MONDAY, APRIL 21, 1890.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The programme of the twenty-third symphony concert was as follows:

Goldmark: Overture, "Spring."
Mozart: Aria from "Die Entführung aus dem Serail."
Volkmann: Serenade for strings in D minor, Op. 69.
Liszt: Song, "O Lieb."
Schubert: Song, "Du bist die Ruh'."
Grieg: Song, "Hoffnung."
Brahms: Symphony No. 1, in C minor, Op. 68.

Mme. Steinbach-Jahns was the singer.

Goldmark's new overture is a brilliant piece of writing, gorgeously scored, and with more variety in coloring than one often finds in Goldmark. It has not the marked individuality of the "Sakuntala," nor did we find anything in it especially to catch the attention and hold it fast; but a second hearing might reveal more matter in it. It was splendidly played.

In Volkmann's Serenade it is difficult to see anything but an unmitigated bore; even Mr. Hekking's fine playing of the 'cello obligato does not make one listen to it with pleasure. The thing is simply intolerable.

The great Brahms symphony was played with a breadth, vigor and clearness that showed all its beauties in the finest light. Except that the pizzicato passages on the 'celli in the third movement were played so softly as to be scarcely audible, the playing was magnificent throughout. The work itself seems greater and greater, the more one hears it.

Mme. Steinbach-Jahns, the new singer, has a brilliant soprano voice of considerable flexibility, and sings with a good deal of effectiveness. Her method and production of tone leave somewhat to be desired, and her intonation is not always impeccable; but she sings with the authority that comes from experience, and makes her effects surely, often brilliantly. Her best work was in Schubert's "Du bist die Ruh'," which was also, by the way, the best thing she sang.

The next programme is: Beethoven, symphony No. 4, in B-flat; Paganni,i "Moto perpetuo;" Wagner, prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg."

THE ENQUIRER,

CINCINNATI, SUND.
APRIL 20, 1890—TV

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Events of extraordinary interest to music-lovers will be the pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given at the Odeon on the evenings of May 6 and 7. This organization, which enjoys the great advantage of a permanent membership, has gained an enviable reputation for performances of a very high standard, and its concerts in Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington have found great favor and abundant support from the public of those cities. The first appearance in this city of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, who was chosen to succeed Mr. Gericke as conductor, will be awaited with interest. Mme. Magdalene Steinbach-Jahns, a dramatic soprano of high repute from the Stadt Theater in Leipsic, who comes to America under special engagement to accompany the orchestra on its tour: Mr. Franz Kneisel, violin, and Mr. Anton Hekking, violoncello, will be the soloists.

Inquirer, Philadelphia,

Date 3/20

[118]

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra returns to this city to give the last concert of its series on Monday evening, April 28, at the Academy of Music. To the attractions of a very happily chosen programme will be added the singing of Madame Steinbach Jahns, of Leipsid, who makes her first appearance in this city at this concert. She visits this country at the solicitation of Mr. Nikisch. She was the leading artist at the opera at Leipsic, of which she was the conductor. She has since retired from the stage, but is ever in request to sing at concerts, and she occasionally honors these requests when the concerts are for charitable ends. She is credited with the possession of a fine soprano voice, a charming face and a versatility that makes her equally attractive in light or dramatic roles. She will sing 3 Mozart aria and songs with piano. The orchestral numbers will be the Fourth symphony by Beethoven, the second and third movements of the "Scandinavian" symphony by Cowen, and Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" overture. The sale of tickets will begin to-morrow morning.

Gazette

SUNDAY MORNING EDITION

The Boston Symphony Concert.

Last night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened with Goldmark's "Spring" overture, a composition new to this city. It is a brilliant, genial, and charming work, full of life and freshness, with a fine and easy flow of melody, and a broad and joyous freedom of style manifested in none of the other works that we have heard by this master. The instrumentation is very beautiful. The overture which is felicitously named was splendidly played and received with great favor. Brahms's Symphony No. 1, ended the concert. It was read in a masterly style, notably the adagio and allegro forming the finale, and was played in the most spirited and finished manner of the orchestra, Mme. Steinbach Jahns, a soprano from Leipsic, made her first appearance in concert here on this occasion. She has a fine presence and an attractive bearing. Her voice is powerful, but harsh and acid in quality, and shows signs of wear. She is manifestly an artist of experience, and sings with fire, but with no especial grace or polish. She sang the aria "Matern aller Arter," from Mozart's "Escape from the Seraglio," with great vigor, and something of dramatic fervor, but in a rough, and at times startlingly explosive style, and in the bravura passages with but little finish. Later she gave a group of songs by Liszt, Schubert and Grieg with better effect, but with the same roughness that characterized the earlier effort with an added leaning in the direction of false intonation. It was singing which, despite its dash and emphasis, was scarcely up to the standard demanded by these concerts. The artist was cordially received, and recalled after each performance, and was also presented with two enormous tributes of flowers. Mr. Hekking was also a soloist, playing Volkmann's Serenade for 'cello and string orchestra in D minor, op. 69; a delightful work, heard before in this city, but not in these concerts. It is needless to say that Mr. Hekking played the solo with the highest finish in point of technique, and with exquisite taste in point of style. He was enthusiastically applauded, and twice encored. For the next concert, which will be the last of this season's series, the propramme is: Symphony No. 4, in B-flat, Beethoven; Moto Perpetuo, Paganini, to be played by thirty-two violins, and Wagner's "Die Meistersinger" Overture.

The last of this season's series of concerts by the the Kneisel Quartet was given in Union Hall, on Monday night. The Mozart Quartet in G, for strings, which opened the performances, was very beautifully played, and with just the grace, warmth and delicacy of style that was necessary to a sympathetic interpretation of the work. It was followed by a romance from a quartet by Greig, in G-minor, op 27, a movement full of charm in the freshness of its subjects, and the skill and easy freedom with which they are treated. It was music which this quartet interprets with special felicity, and was delightfully played. The whole ended with Schubert's Quintet in A, for piano, violin, viola, cello and bass, op. 114, Miss Aus Der Ohe playing the piano part and Mr. A. Goldstein the bass. The work was given in a masterly manner, but its effect was marred, owing to the fact that Miss Aus Der Ohe elected to play with the cover of the piano down, the result being a muffled tone from the instrument and an indistinctness in the less forcible movements of the work, that caused the tones of the piano almost to disappear entirely. The pianist also played without notes, which, though it may be advantageous in solo work, is by no means advisable in ensemble chamber music, which is scarcely a medium for the exhibition of skill in mnemonics, a gift that, at its best, adds nothing to the merits of a performance. This series of concerts by the Kneisel Quartet has been the best yet given by this fine organization.

The Handel and Haydn Festival closed on Sunday evening last with Handel's "Israel in Egypt," the soloists being Miss Clementine de Vere, Miss Clara Poole, Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr. William Ludwig and Mr. Myron W. Whitney. The work was given in its entirety, and, on the whole, in a very creditable manner The chorus sang with great steadiness and precision as to rule, and acquitting itself well generally. Of the soloists Mr. Lloyd was easily first, and excited a furore by his glorious singing of 'The Enemy Said." In spirit, style, phrasing and technique it was as perfect a bit of vocal art as we are ever permitted to hear. The bravura passages were given out in a wonderfully clear, smooth and even way, though the artist was at some disadvantage owing to the inflexibility with which he was followed by the conductor, who, instead of follow the singer in his earnest efforts to push the time in these prolonged and breath-trying figures, held him with a grip of iron to the strict tempo. It needed all of Mr. Lloyd's art and science to prove equal to the rigid strain by which he was thus hampered; but he went through the ordeal successfully. He was rewarded with thunders of applause. Miss de Vere and Miss Poole sang the duet for soprano and alto with untunefulness and little skill in phrasing, and Miss de Vere was scarcely more praiseworthy in her one important solo, a result somewhat surprising in view of the fact that the artist is essentially a singer of coloratura music, to which class this number unquestionably pertains. Mr. Ludwig and Mr. Whitney were excellent in the bass solos, and sang the duet "The Lord is a Man of War" with stirring spirit and sturdiness of style. There was an enormous audience present The festival was a complete pecuniary success, and in many essentials its artistic achievements were both marked and admirable. The chorus has never done better work than it did at these performances as far as steadiness, tunefulness, and vigor are concerned. Its principal shortcomings were in the Bach and the Handel works, where sufficient care had not been taken to insure uniformity of phrasing among the large body of singers, and where also there did not appear to be any systematic taking of breath in the more florid choral passages. The performers evidently sang until their breath was exhausted, and then started again. As some could take a longer breath than others, the result was a confusion wholly inimical to the proper emphasis of phrasing—in fact, to phrasing at all. This could be easily remedied by causing the singers on each part to breathe in the same places. With the desired change the blurring of tone that was heard in the elaborate Bach and Handel choruses would disappear. Of the soloists who appeared in the festival, the men were far stronger than the women. The bright, particular star proved to be Mr. Lloyd, whose success was as overwhelming as it was merited. His work throughout was without a flaw, and was in the highest vein of the best vocal art. Mr. Ludwig's triumph in "Elijah" was another of the striking and worthy features of the festival for its originality, its deep, dramatic fervor, and the artistic quality of its singing. Mr. Parker's beautiful cantata was one of the gratifying successes of the week that was fairly made upon its great and indubitable merits. The society has every reason to be satisfied with the outcome of its efforts to make its seventy fifth anniversary memorable.

The Chopin Recitals of Mr. Vlademir de Pachmann in Chickering Hall last week were at once a surprise and a delight. We do not know whether he be versatile or not; whether or no he can interpret other composers as he interprets Chopin; but what he has let us know that he can do he does in an unsurpassed and unsurpassable way. He has some peculiarities of personal bearing before the public, possibly the outcome of a peculiar temperament, that we could wish absent, but these do not in anywise detract from his playing, which is as beautiful as it is extraordinary. His technique is not only perfect, but is astonishing in its easy, undemonstrative fluency even when the most exciting exactions are made upon it His touch is exquisite, and produces an amazing variety of tone qualities from the piano, while his phrasing is of the most masterly and fascinating description. The brilliant virtuoso and the keenly sympathetic artist are combined equally in him; he seems to play for the love of playing, making nothing of his great technique but a means to a worthy end. Above all he possesses a fine musical intelligence that makes itself felt at every stage of his playing. As we have said, we do not know the extent of his artistic gifts, but in the special genre of piano playing to which these three recitals were devoted, he is an artist of the rarest qualities. Now and then he falls into an excess of sentiment, as in his playing of the funeral march from the Sonata, op. 35, but these moments are not frequent; in fact, there is in his Chopin reading a prevailing virility and a freedom from sickly sentimentality that is notable for its rarity among interpreters of Chopin. It would be too tiresome a task to write in detail of the three long programmes, of the originality, beauty and fluency of the artist's interpretation of even his most noteworthy successes. We cannot, however, refrain from alluding to his marvellously clear performance of the difficult study in double notes, op. 25, No. 6, which was not only a triumph of technique, but which was also a triumph in the variety of color imparted to it. The ease and sureness with which this study was taken at a break-neck pace, and played throughout without seeming effort, made it one of the most brilliant and beautiful displays of technique artistically controlled to which we have ever listened His reading and playing of the Ballade in A-flat, op 47, was indescribably fine. The Berceuse in D flat, op 57, the Allegro Assai in G-flat, op. 25, and the Polonaise in A-flat, op 53, were all examples of playing and interpretation in their highest and finest development. In the Polonaise the tremendously difficult octave figure in the left hand was given with an off-hand lack of exertion that was scarcely credible, and the steadily swelling crescendo that accompanied it, also produced in a likeseemingly effortless way, added to the wonder of the technical achievement. We have heard Rubinstein do the same thing, but not with the almost exasperating ease that attended M. de Pachmann's performance of the same feat. It is possible that the artist's gifts are confined within narrow limitations as far as interpreting goes; but what he does is done with a skill, a taste and a perfection that cannot be overtopped. He will give another series of concerts shortly, in which, we understand, he is to be heard in a miscellaneous programme We must not end before stating that the artist won an enthusiastic success from the most critical audiences that Boston can show.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 21, 1890.

The Symphony Concert—Mme. Steinbach-Jahns as Soloist.

After the short interregnum it was a delight to listen to the music of our orchestra again. If one is obliged occasionally to find fault with this or that interpretation on the symphonic programmes, it must be borne in mind that the standard applied is altogether a higher one than other musical occasions would bear, and at the end of all animadversion one can exclaim: "With all thy faults I love thee still"! The programme of Saturday began with a very ecstatic overture by Goldmark, entitled, "Spring." The first theme of this work was full of a robust heartiness which was well reflected by the robust playing of the orchestra. In fine contrast was the tender longing of the subsequent melody, in which ecstacy was represented a la Wagner by violin phrases in the highest position, and there were bird-pipings as realistic as in the coda of the second movement of the "Pastoral Symphony." The flute had much to do and did it well, and the responses between the woodwind and the strings in a deep pizzicato, were excellently given; altogether a work which made a most favorable impression on critics and public alike. Then came Mme. Steinbach-Jahns all the way from Leipsic to give some worthy additions to the German vocalism which has taken possession of our city for the past two weeks. She had evidently not brought her tuning fork along, and was often flat of pitch, but her pleasing personality, and the florid style of the first number, from Mozart's "Entfuehrung" won the public, and when at its conclusion, the contents of an entire hothouse were brought to the stage by two ushers, everyone added to the floral tribute the heartiest applause. In the subsequent group of lieder Mme. Jahns showed a more sympathetic style, and a real appreciation of the subtler points of the school. Liszt's "O lieb so lang du lieben kannst" was well sung, although at times there was a harsh and disagreeable timbre in the voice. Schubert's "Du bist die Ruh," although not exactly the best selection for Music Hall, was well shaded and the nuances at "Dies Augenzeit" were finely rendered, although here again there was more than a suspicion of false intonation. Grieg's "Hoffnung" brought the group to a close. It may be best to reserve full judgment on the vocalist until she has appeared again, since she comes at a rather inopportune moment, after Mme. Lehmann, and the faults recorded may be but temporary and the result of a long voyage. Even as it is, the public were delighted, and the recalls were numerous and hearty. The flexibility of so solid a voice was remarkable.

Volkmann's serenade for string orchestra in D minor showed plainly that the strings do not play with the precision they once possessed. It is a curious work which does not give separate movements in the old serenade style, but joins the different episodes together in a constant panorama of small tone pictures. In this respect it reminds of Schumann, and the resemblance is rendered yet more striking by distinct reminiscences of that master's "Carnival." Pierrot is there, represented by lumbering progressions on the contrabasses, and it is easy to identify the skips of harlequin as well. There is a cello obligato part in the work which brought Mr. Hekking to the front, and I have never heard this artist do broader work. When he becomes possessed of a Stradivarius or an Amaticello, instead of his own shallow-toned instrument, he will be at a better advantage. The beginning of the work is largely antiphonal, the orchestra responding to the weird Oriental phrases of the solo instrument for an unnecessary length of time. The chief phrase of the cello was decidedly Hebraic in character. The work was rather prolix, yet was very dramatic at times, and at its close Mr. Hekking was recalled three times, but I am convinced that part of the enthusiasm was intended for Mr. Nikisch, who gave the work an effective reading, but who modestly remained in the background.

The crowning glory of the concert was its ending. Brahms' symphony in C minor was given a reading that, in spite of the interpretations of Mr. Henschel (Brahms' personal friend) and of Mr. Gericke, who also had the advantage of hearing the master lead his own work, remains the grandest that has been given in these concerts. The first movement of this symphony is the extreme of intellectuality as represented in the sonata form, yet it was by no means wrong to give to it the dramatic force with which Mr. Nikisch invested it. The idea of struggle, of sorrow, of consolation, of triumph, was portrayed with sequential and logical power. The second movement was worked up in most passionate fashion, and it is but due to speak of the oboe work in this portion of the symphony, which was excellent. But if the first three movements were well read, the finale was a triumph for the conductor and orchestra. It is an epitome of the entire symphony, as the first part of the finale of Beethoven's ninth synopsizes that work. The furious pizzicato effects, with their caprices of tempo, were well given; the horn was finely played by Mr. Reiter, and the solemn chant of the trombones (oh that we could have had such an effect in "Don Juan" the other night!) was impressive in the highest degree. Hanslick has characterized Brahms' first three symphonies as follows: "The C minor is the 'pathetic' or the 'appassionata,' the second is the 'pastoral,' the third may be called the 'heroic,'" and certainly Mr. Nikisch brought out all the fervor of the "appassionata" in the reading of Saturday. I could almost wish that this had been the last concert of the season, for the conductor could not have made a more brilliant exit.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

DE PACHMANN RECITALS.

So many requests have been received for a further opportunity of hearing Mr. Vladimir de Pachmann that his manager has arranged for a single piano recital to be given at Chickering Hall on Monday afternoon, April 28, when there is little doubt that the gifted Russian will receive a hearty welcome. A second recital will be given at the same place on Wednesday afternoon, April 30, by Mme. Marguerite de Pachmann, who is also a pianist of great ability and who fairly divided with her husband the success of the New York concerts. Tickets for both recitals go on sale at Music Hall this morning.

Boston Daily Traveller.

MONDAY, APRIL 21, 1890.

Twenty-third Symphony Concert, Mme. Steinbach-Jahns.

The programme of the twenty-third Symphony concert, with Mme. Steinbach-Jahns soloist, was:

Goldmark.	Overture, "Spring." First time in Boston.
Mozart.	Aria, "Thou may'st learn to hate me," "Die Entfnehrung aus dem Serail,"
Volkmann.	Serenade for string orchestra, in D minor, op 69. First time at these concerts. Solo Violoncello Mr. Anton Hekking.
	Songs with piano.
a) Liszt.	"O Lieb."
b) Schubert.	"Du bist die Ruh."
c) Grieg.	"Hoffnung."
Brahms.	Symphony No. 1, in C minor, op. 68.

Goldmark's new overture has not the superlative sensous flow of his "Sakuntala" and "Penthesilea," nor is the workmanship as fine, but it is interestingly scored and sounds well. The Volkmann serenade is neatly made, and the introduction of the violoncello obligato (beautifully rendered by Mr. Hekking) takes it out of the conventional; but its artistic level is not high. Though written to be played without break the piece is varied in tempo; it possesses a certain unity because of the frequent use of one very melodious subject. The serenade was admirably played. The splendid C minor symphony of Brahms we regret to say we did not hear. The new singer comes from Leipzig where formerly, until her voluntary retirement, she was an opera favorite. She sings with fervor, and shows a musical spirit. The florid Mozart piece was not the happiest selection, for notwithstanding her admirable phrasing, her coloratureur singing shows that her upper voice has lost something in freshness; we should think Elizabeth's aria, sung in the second act of "Tannhäuser," would fit her style. The voice is large and well fitted for dramatic parts. In the songs, sung to the exquisite pianoforte accompaniment of Mr. Nikisch, Mme. Steinbach-Jahns was more succesful, especially in Grieg's bright tune. After each appearance the singer was recalled. Mme. Steinbach-Jahns has a winning personality, and won her audience by her sweet ways. Two gorgeous flower pieces were presented to her. The season of symphony concerts closes next week Saturday, when this programme will be performed: Beethoven, Fourth Symphony; Paganini, Moto Perpetuo, for 32 violins; overture, "Die Meistersinger," Wagner.

Boston Evening Transcript.

MONDAY, APRIL 21, 1890.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The programme of the twenty-third symphony concert was as follows:

Goldmark: Overture, "Spring."
Mozart: Aria from "Die Entführung aus dem Serail."
Volkmann: Serenade for strings in D minor, Op. 69.
Liszt: Song, "O Lieb."
Schubert: Song, "Du bist die Ruh'."
Grieg: Song, "Hoffnung."
Brahms: Symphony No. 1, in C minor, Op. 68.
Mme. Steinbach-Jahns was the singer.

Goldmark's new overture is a brilliant piece of writing, gorgeously scored, and with more variety in coloring than one often finds in Goldmark. It has not the marked individuality of the "Sakuntala," nor did we find anything in it especially to catch the attention and hold it fast; but a second hearing might reveal more matter in it. It was splendidly played.

In Volkmann's Serenade it is difficult to see anything but an unmitigated bore; even Mr. Hekking's fine playing of the 'cello obligato does not make one listen to it with pleasure. The thing is simply intolerable.

The great Brahms symphony was played with a breadth, vigor and clearness that showed all its beauties in the finest light. Except that the pizzicato passages on the 'celli in the third movement were played so softly as to be scarcely audible, the playing was magnificent throughout. The work itself seems greater and greater, the more one hears it.

Mme. Steinbach-Jahns, the new singer, has a brilliant soprano voice of considerable flexibility, and sings with a good deal of effectiveness. Her method and production of tone leave somewhat to be desired, and her intonation is not always impeccable; but she sings with the authority that comes from experience, and makes her effects surely, often brilliantly. Her best work was in Schubert's "Du bist die Ruh'," which was also, by the way, the best thing she sang.

The next programme is: Beethoven, symphony No. 4, in B-flat; Paganni,i "Moto perpetuo;" Wagner, prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg."

THE ENQUIRER,

CINCINNATI, SUND.
APRIL 20, 1890—TV

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Events of extraordinary interest to music-lovers will be the pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given at the Odeon on the evenings of May 6 and 7. This organization, which enjoys the great advantage of a permanent membership, has gained an enviable reputation for performances of a very high standard, and its concerts in Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington have found great favor and abundant support from the public of those cities. The first appearance in this city of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, who was chosen to succeed Mr. Gericke as conductor, will be awaited with interest. Mme. Magdalene Steinbach-Jahns, a dramatic soprano of high repute from the Stadt Theater in Leipsic, who comes to America under special engagement to accompany the orchestra on its tour; Mr. Franz Kneisel, violin, and Mr. Anton Hekking, violoncello, will be the soloists.

Inquirer, Philadelphia,

Date 3/20

[118]

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra returns to this city to give the last concert of its series on Monday evening, April 28, at the Academy of Music. To the attractions of a very happily chosen programme will be added the singing of Madame Steinbach Jahns, of Leipsic, who makes her first appearance in this city at this concert. She visits this country at the solicitation of Mr. Nikisch. She was the leading artist at the opera at Leipsic, of which she was the conductor. She has since retired from the stage, but is ever in request to sing at concerts, and she occasionally honors these requests when the concerts are for charitable ends. She is credited with the possession of a fine soprano voice, a charming face and a versatility that makes her equally attractive in light or dramatic roles. She will sing a Mozart aria and songs with piano. The orchestral numbers will be the Fourth symphony by Beethoven, the second and third movements of the "Scandinavian" symphony by Cowen, and Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" overture. The sale of tickets will begin to-morrow morning.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

[redacted]

GRAND MUSIC HALL, - ST. LOUIS.

FRIDAY EVENING, - - - MAY 9.
SATURDAY EVENING, - - MAY 10.

FOURTH TOUR.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

TICKETS on Sale at BALMER & WEBER'S THURSDAY, MAY 1st.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

PEOPLE'S CHURCH, - ST. PAUL.

TUESDAY EVENING, MAY 13, 1890, at 8.

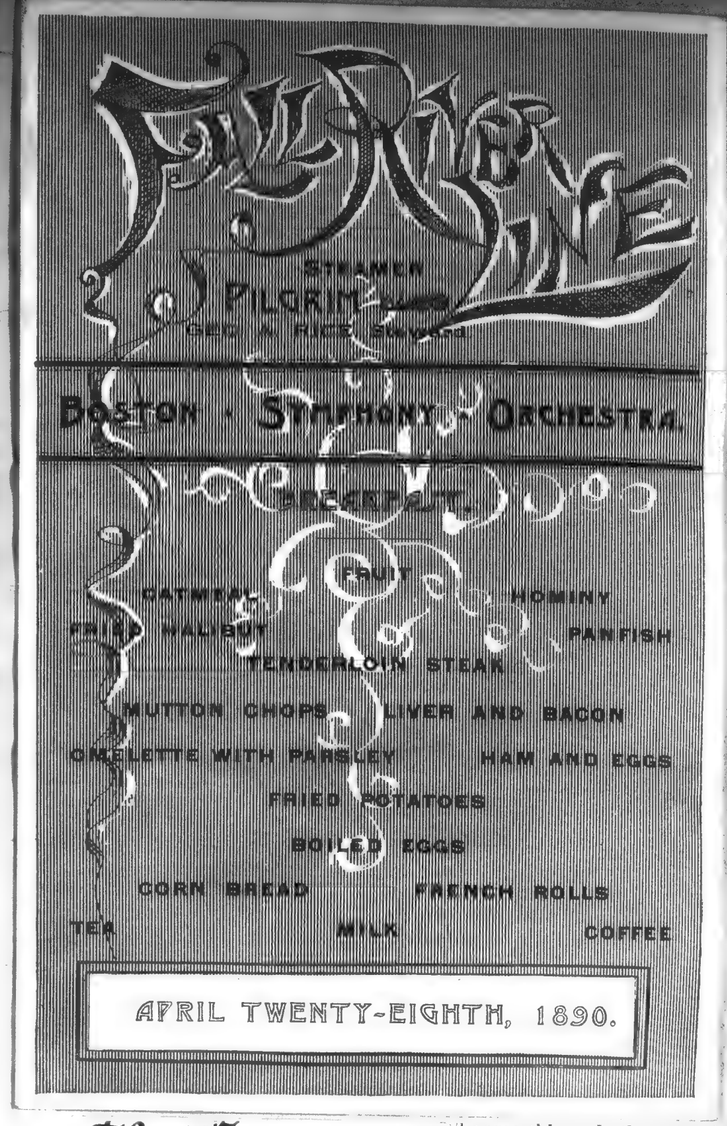
Grand Festival Concert, Supplementary to the Star Course.

E. C. MURDOCK, Manager.

FOURTH TOUR.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

FOR PARTICULARS AS TO THE SALE OF TICKETS SEE DAILY PAPERS.



[119]

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, APR. 26, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

With this evening will end the present series of Symphony concerts, the programme including Beethoven's "Leonore III." overture and fourth symphony, the prelude to the "Meistersinger," and Paganini's "Moto Perpetuo," which will be played by the thirty-two first and second violins in unison. This is a good, substantial conclusion for the season, but one which does not reflect any brilliant lustre on the enterprise or research in literature of the conductor, or bring the course of concerts up to any climax stronger than that due to vigorous and able performance. No previous season has caused so much discussion, created such hot and bitter partisanship, or left so much doubt and unsettled feeling in the public mind as this. It would be more than difficult for a stranger to Boston to form a clear and impartial judgment of Mr. Nikisch's merits and defects from any comparison of the fierce, sweeping criticisms of his censors and the equally broad and determined support of his admirers. A verdict was much more easily reached in Mr. Gericke's case; he left people unsatisfied because he failed to do enough, while Mr. Nikisch has made them dissatisfied by what he has done directly. The former was blamed for too much reserve, the latter is reproached for too little; the former was charged with chilling intellectuality, the latter with consuming passionateness; the one was said to sacrifice vitality to elegance, and the other is said to allow impetuosity to override grace and proportion; the former was too conventional, the latter is too personal; and so the comparisons have been drawn in twenty different ways, each side being espoused with scarcely less tenacity and heat than if all Wagner were under discussion. That Mr. Nikisch has caused disappointment and justified some hard criticism, cannot well be denied; and any present moderation in such disaffection and censure is due rather to his own increased control of himself and his men than to any change in the standards existing in the public mind. He is too fain to be urged on by temperament and impulse, so that his leadership is often unduly exciting rather than properly encouraging; and it is not possible to say of him, as Brutus said of Cæsar, that we "have not known when his affection swayed more than his reason." There are moments in any art when full and true effect can only be obtained through the sacrifice of delicacy to force, of grace to directness, of suggestion to imperiousness; but these moments must come from an inherent and superior necessity, not be provoked by personal fancy or nervous stimulation. When Mr. Nikisch has learned this and absorbed it, his work will be many-fold better than now, because he will then restore the fineness and softness which he has allowed to be dissipated, and will still have in reserve the fire, the dash, the sweeping enthusiasm which he now uses wastefully, roughly and too frequently. But he is a conductor of whom it seems safe to have good hopes; he is not obstinate to criticism, having shown a disposition to meet it in the right spirit; and as is he is of so impressionable a nature, it should not be hard for the better influences to prevail with him for refinement, caution and distinction. The programmes, upon which current comment has always been made here, have not answered expectation; a wider range was confidently anticipated and a closer approach to catholicity of choice. Not to enter upon a minute analysis, it may be observed in a general way that something over a hundred pieces have been presented, of which a little more than one in five was new to Boston, a very few being new to the country. In both lists German authorship is overwhelmingly in the majority; the names of other compositions stand in the general schedule about as one to five or less, while in the list of novelties they stand about as one in two. A few of the new works have been important introductions, as on the other hand some things, both new and old, have been trivial or commonplace. The want of a broad acquaintance with musical literature has been strongly felt again as in Mr. Gericke's time, and leads us to urge strenuously the appointment by Mr. Higginson of an advisory board—even a directory—to oversee the preparation of the programmes. A conductor occupying abroad such a position as these leaders used to hold, or occupying anywhere the conductorship of a musical society, would be under the direction of an intendant or a committee and think this not derogatory to his merit or his dignity. It should be so here; to direct and to keep the orchestra in perfect order and discipline to study, and to deliver, is enough for a conductor to do, without imposing upon him the responsibility of research and the adjustment of programmes. Better work could be done, better satisfaction given, knowledge increased and advantages extended. We must not fail to remark that the solo part of the concerts has been unusually even and satisfactory. The orchestra has been represented only by its strings—Kneisel, Loeffler, Adamowski and Roth, violins, Hekking and Schultz, 'cellos—although the wind might have been heard from; the pianists have all deserved well, being Baermann, Miss Aus der Ohe, Joseffy, Faelten, Mrs. Steiniger-Clark and Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler; and the singers have been Mme. Steinbach-Jahns, Miss Franklin, Miss Edmands, Mrs. Wyman, Fischer and Winch, all well-deserving and well received. Arguing from the rehearsal of yesterday this last concert will be very fine in performance, and will be directed (like early ones) without book. The Beethoven numbers had interpretations at once conservative and poetic, full of rich contrasts of color and genially dramatic. The Paganini, accompanied by Mr. Nikisch at the piano, was a splendid bit of virtuosity, the whole mass of violins moving with the neatness, celerity and exact accent of one, proving, too, that, although this department may have sometimes been harsh and rude, it has not lost its precision of phrasing nor its command of pure, keen and tenuous tone. The Wagner prelude, like all Mr. Nikisch's extracts from that master, showed out magnificently in every one of its many phases and was instinct with the right verve and character throughout. The audience was very hearty and every work and every movement of the symphony was repeatedly applauded. The first concert of the next series is appointed for October 11.

DE PACHMANN RECITALS.

On Monday afternoon Mr. De Pachmann will play once more in Chickering Hall, devoting himself as before to Chopin, the works chosen being opera 49, 29, 60, 57, 25 in part, 23, 42, 41 and 43. We have so recently spoken of this peculiar and remarkable artist's playing, and the interest of musical people has been so vitally stirred by it that we need do no more than call attention to this additional concert. But we may ask special attention to the recital which will be given on Wednesday afternoon by Mme. De Pachmann, according to a programme drawn from modern masters, such as Schubert, Mendelssohn, Liszt, Rubinstein and Saint-Saëns. Of this lady, who comes a stranger hither, Mr. Americo Gori says: Mme. de Pachmann is undoubtedly a pretty woman; her face is aristocratic in outline, extremely pleasing in expression, and is crowned with a diadem of wavy locks, gathered in a knot at the back of her head, which is poised on a slender and graceful neck; her figure is lithe and élancée, her carriage is elegant, her attitude and movements at the piano unaffectedly charming. Her playing corresponds to her personal appearance; it is grace and elegance personified; it is brilliant and dainty, without exaggerations in style or manner; it is accurate and conscientious, without being pedantic in the least. . . . She displayed an uncommonly reliable technique and a delicacy of expression which were highly artistic; her style has many qualities which betray the results of her talented husband's teachings and example, modified, of course, by her womanly temperament.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

GRAND MUSIC HALL, - ST. LOUIS.

FRIDAY EVENING, - - - MAY 9.
SATURDAY EVENING, - - MAY 10.

——FOURTH TOUR.——

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

TICKETS on Sale at BALMER & WEBER'S THURSDAY, MAY 1st.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

PEOPLE'S CHURCH, - ST. PAUL.

TUESDAY EVENING, MAY 13, 1890, at 8.

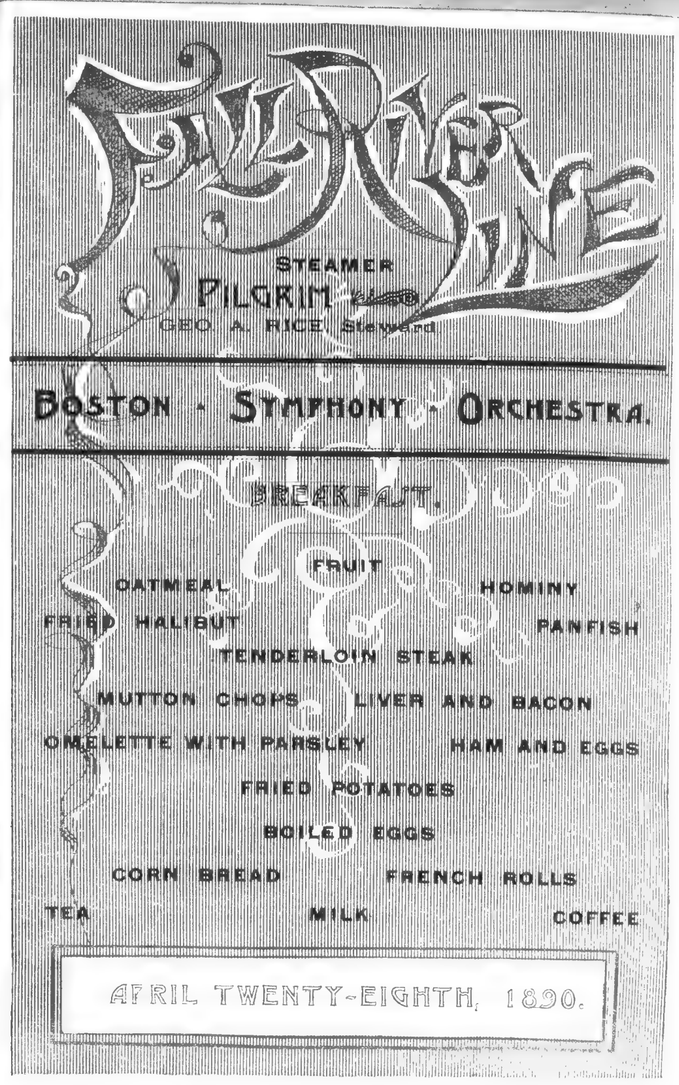
Grand Festival Concert, Supplementary to the Star Course.

E. C. MURDOCK, Manager.

——FOURTH TOUR.——

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

FOR PARTICULARS AS TO THE SALE OF TICKETS SEE DAILY PAPERS.



[119]

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, APR. 26, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

With this evening will end the present series of Symphony concerts, the programme including Beethoven's "Leonore III." overture and fourth symphony, the prelude to the "Meistersinger," and Paganini's "Moto Perpetuo," which will be played by the thirty-two first and second violins in unison. This is a good, substantial conclusion for the season, but one which does not reflect any brilliant lustre on the enterprise or research in literature of the conductor, or bring the course of concerts up to any climax stronger than that due to vigorous and able performance. No previous season has caused so much discussion, created such hot and bitter partisanship, or left so much doubt and unsettled feeling in the public mind as this. It would be more than difficult for a stranger to Boston to form a clear and impartial judgment of Mr. Nikisch's merits and defects from any comparison of the fierce, sweeping criticisms of his censors and the equally broad and determined support of his admirers. A verdict was much more easily reached in Mr. Gericke's case; he left people unsatisfied because he failed to do enough, while Mr. Nikisch has made them dissatisfied by what he has done directly. The former was blamed for too much reserve, the latter is reproached for too little; the former was charged with chilling intellectuality, the latter with consuming passionateness; the one was said to sacrifice vitality to elegance, and the other is said to allow impetuosity to override grace and proportion; the former was too conventional, the latter is too personal; and so the comparisons have been drawn in twenty different ways, each side being espoused with scarcely less tenacity and heat than if all Wagner were under discussion. That Mr. Nikisch has caused disappointment and justified some hard criticism, cannot well be denied; and any present moderation in such disaffection and censure is due rather to his own increased control of himself and his men than to any change in the standards existing in the public mind. He is too fain to be urged on by temperament and impulse, so that his leadership is often unduly exciting rather than properly encouraging; and it is not possible to say of him, as Brutus said of Cæsar, that we "have not known when his affection swayed more than his reason." There are moments in any art when full and true effect can only be obtained through the sacrifice of delicacy to force, of grace to directness, of suggestion to imperiousness; but these moments must come from an inherent and superior necessity, not be provoked by personal fancy or nervous stimulation. When Mr. Nikisch has learned this and absorbed it, his work will be many-fold better than now, because he will then restore the fineness and softness which he has allowed to be dissipated, and will still have in reserve the fire, the dash, the sweeping enthusiasm which he now uses wastefully, roughly and too frequently. But he is a conductor of whom it seems safe to have good hopes; he is not obstinate to criticism, having shown a disposition to meet it in the right spirit; and as is he is of so impressionable a nature, it should not be hard for the better influences to prevail with him for refinement, caution and distinction. The programmes, upon which current comment has always been made here, have not answered expectation; a wider range was confidently anticipated and a closer approach to catholicity of choice. Not to enter upon a minute analysis, it may be observed in a general way that something over a hundred pieces have been presented, of which a little more than one in five was new to Boston, a very few being new to the country. In both lists German authorship is overwhelmingly in the majority; the names of other compositions stand in the general schedule about as one to five or less, while in the list of novelties they stand about as one in two. A few of the new works have been important introductions, as on the other hand some things, both new and old, have been trivial or commonplace. The want of a broad acquaintance with musical literature has been strongly felt again as in Mr. Gericke's time, and leads us to urge strenuously the appointment by Mr. Higginson of an advisory board—even a directory—to oversee the preparation of the programmes. A conductor occupying abroad such a position as these leaders used to hold, or occupying anywhere the conductorship of a musical society, would be under the direction of an intendant or a committee and think this not derogatory to his merit or his dignity. It should be so here; to direct and to keep the orchestra in perfect order and discipline to study, and to deliver, is enough for a conductor to do, without imposing upon him the responsibility of research and the adjustment of programmes. Better work could be done, better satisfaction given, knowledge increased and advantages extended. We must not fail to remark that the solo part of the concerts has been unusually even and satisfactory. The orchestra has been represented only by its strings—Kneisel, Loeffler, Adamowski and Roth, violins, Hekking and Schultz, 'cellos—although the wind might have been heard from; the pianists have all deserved well, being Baermann, Miss Aus der Ohe, Joseffy, Faelten, Mrs. Steiniger-Clark and Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler; and the singers have been Mme. Steinbach-Jahns, Miss Franklin, Miss Edmands, Mrs. Wyman, Fischer and Winch, all well-deserving and well received. Arguing from the rehearsal of yesterday this last concert will be very fine in performance, and will be directed (like early ones) without book. The Beethoven numbers had interpretations at once conservative and poetic, full of rich contrasts of color and genially dramatic. The Paganini, accompanied by Mr. Nikisch at the piano, was a splendid bit of virtuosity, the whole mass of violins moving with the neatness, celerity and exact accent of one, proving, too, that, although this department may have sometimes been harsh and rude, it has not lost its precision of phrasing nor its command of pure, keen and tenuous tone. The Wagner prelude, like all Mr. Nikisch's extracts from that master, showed out magnificently in every one of its many phases and was instinct with the right verve and character throughout. The audience was very hearty and every work and every movement of the symphony was repeatedly applauded. The first concert of the next series is appointed for October 11.

DE PACHMANN RECITALS.

On Monday afternoon Mr. De Pachmann will play once more in Chickering Hall, devoting himself as before to Chopin, the works chosen being opera 49, 29, 60, 57, 25 in part, 23, 42, 41 and 43. We have so recently spoken of this peculiar and remarkable artist's playing, and the interest of musical people has been so vitally stirred by it that we need do no more than call attention to this additional concert. But we may ask special attention to the recital which will be given on Wednesday afternoon by Mme. De Pachmann, according to a programme drawn from modern masters, such as Schubert, Mendelssohn, Liszt, Rubinstein and Saint-Saëns. Of this lady, who comes a stranger hither, Mr. Americo Gori says: Mme. de Pachmann is undoubtedly a pretty woman; her face is aristocratic in outline, extremely pleasing in expression, and is crowned with a diadem of wavy locks, gathered in a knot at the back of her head, which is poised on a slender and graceful neck; her figure is lithe and élancée, her carriage is elegant, her attitude and movements at the piano unaffectedly charming. Her playing corresponds to her personal appearance; it is grace and elegance personified; it is brilliant and dainty, without exaggerations in style or manner; it is accurate and conscientious, without being pedantic in the least. . . . She displayed an uncommonly reliable technique and a delicacy of expression which were highly artistic; her style has many qualities which betray the results of her talented husband's teachings and example, modified, of course, by her womanly temperament.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

AMPHITHEATRE AUDITORIUM, LOUISVILLE, KY.

THURSDAY EVENING, - MAY 8; 1890.

FOURTH TOUR.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

FOR PARTICULARS AS TO THE SALE OF TICKETS SEE DAILY PAPERS.

HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, APRIL 26, 1890

THE TWENTY-THIRD SYMPHONY CONCERT.—

Goldmark .....Overture, "Spring"
(First time in Boston.)
Mozart .....Aria, "Thou may'st learn to hate me," from "Die Entfuehrung aus dem Serail."
Volkmann.....Serenade for String Orchestra, in D minor, op. 69.
(First time in these Concerts.)
Solo Violoncello, Mr. Anton Hekking.
Songs with Piano.
(a) Liszt ......"O Lieb"
(b) Schubert ...."Du bist die Ruh"
(c) Grieg ....."Hoffnung"
Brahms .....Symphony No. 2, in C minor, op. 68

Mrs. Magdalene Steinback-Jahns, formerly an opera singer in certain German towns, has been engaged by Mr. Nikisch to accompany the orchestra upon the tour of Southern and Western cities. At last week's Rehearsal and Concert she made her first appearances in America upon the concert stage. However excellent an actress or dramatic-singer Mrs. Steinbach-Jahns may have been in the past, she gave no signs last week of present capacity or future hope. Her voice is metallic and worn; her intonation was uncertain. These drawbacks were not offset by vocal skill or a display of uncommon musical intelligence. It is true that the singer may not have fully recovered from the voyage, and that her false intonation may have been due to temporary indisposition. This would not excuse, however, her spasmodic declamation or the exaggerations which disfigured the singing of the three songs. In the Mozart aria she showed a certain facility; it was not unlike the facility of some pianists who with foot upon the "loud" pedal run hastily through a piece, producing ragged and uneven sounds, though to a thoughtless hearer, the performance appears to be a triumph of dexterity.

Fortunately the orchestra played upon the whole exceedingly well, though in the Goldmark Overture which was given in Boston for the first time there was occasionally a feeling of insecurity. The Overture itself is a pleasing work, melodious, with passages ingeniously fashioned. It is fresh, it is spontaneous, though the music does not pierce the skin. There is an absence of that oriental, sultry sensuousness which so characterizes Goldmark's "Sakuntala" and permeates "The Queen of Sheba."

The Volkman Serenade, a monotonous if not dreary work, gave Mr. Hekking an opportunity which he was not slow to make use of, and he was enthusiastically and deservedly applauded. A Mr. Brockhoven regards this serenade as a striking example of the influence of Schumann's humor upon Volkmann. Surely this discovery is original with Mr. Brockhoven, who would seem to be eminently fitted by nature for a professorship at the grand academy of Lagado; unless it turns out that he is a humorist of subtle parts.

The blindest worshipper of Brahms could find no fault with the performance of the Symphony in C minor. In detail and as a whole it reflected great credit upon Mr. Nickish and the orchestra. As for the symphony itself what will be the verdict of the future? Is it, as some would have it, the greatest orchestral work since Beethoven's Ninth? There is by the way much of Beethoven in this very symphony, and at times suggestions of the Ninth in themes, treatment of themes, and in coloring. No one will deny the breadth of the adagio, the gracefulness of the allegretto or certain overwhelming portions of the finale. The first and last movements however are crowded with material which seems superfluous and confusing; they share the reproach of Joncières in regard to the Second of Brahms when it was played in Paris in 1880: "it abounds in brushwood." And it must be admitted that owing to the length of the symphony and the lack of contrast between the movements it fatigues, particularly when placed at the end of a program.

CAUSERIE.—The appearance of Mrs. Steinback-Jahns in Music Hall last week provokes serious reflection. For the first time this season there was an element of Barnumism in the treatment of the soloist. In the program, contrary to custom, appeared a laudatory advance notice of the singer which unfortunately was not supported by the singer's work. The matter of "floral tributes" had been most carefully attended to, and these "welcomes to America" were ostentatiously displayed. The whole thing was overdone.

* * * * *

The lady in question is an excellent example of a school of German singers. Possibly nature gives them a good, strong voice; they go upon the stage before they have acquired the art of correctly producing a tone; they are unable to sustain, swell or diminish a tone; they struggle with coloratura; they subordinate singing to action; in order to make a strong impression they force the voice, they shout, so that they soon lose all sense of pitch. After they have thus wantonly devastated the works of the living and the dead, their vocal organs are necessarily impaired by the strain; and finding that in their own cities they are in danger of being driven from the stage by younger and stronger lungs, they then look toward America.

* * * * *

Now the engagement and deliberate "booming" of a singer of inferior rank is a matter which concerns the public in more ways than one. The very fact that a singer is brought here from Leipzig, no doubt with the consent at least of Mr. Nikisch, implies that she is worthy of the position and at once prejudices a public in her favor. That she was heartily applauded Saturday evening does not prove that she is an admirable singer, nor does it show that she really pleased the musical public. For this applause may have been induced by feelings of sympathy or won by her personal appearance; it may have been instigated by a claque desirous of "germanizing" the Boston public. Whether a woman sing well or badly is not however a question of taste or sympathy; it is a question of fact, and the facts in the case of Mrs. Steinbach-Jahns are these; that without the qualifications hitherto deemed necessary, she has been imported from Germany; that she, as a soloist, is to accompany the orchestra upon its tour of Southern and Western cities.

* * * * *

What incentive has a woman born in America to work and sing when she is thus rudely told that Germany and Germans must and will rule in musical America? What incentive has a woman, whatever be her nationality, to patiently submit to the drudgery of vocal study when she sees managers and public put a premium upon mediocrity? When she sees false intonation preferred to purity of tone and careful ear? When she sees the details of an art contemptuously rejected? When she sees that which is false called good and acclaimed?

* * * * *

Repeated hearings of German operatic and concert singers with their ululations and false intonation lead one to seriously question whether Nature ever intended that the Germans should sing. For years the Italians ruled Dresden, Berlin, Munich and Vienna. In the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries and in the first half of the nineteenth century they were supreme in song. This they owed not only to the natural beauty of their voices, for voices of southern races are commonly richer in color and of fuller quality and greater flexibility than the voices of the north, but also to the wise principles of song in which they were trained from their youth up, and which were carefully handed down from father to son. "Studies regularly conducted," says Lavoix, "rules framed by skilful singers who were at the same time well-grounded musicians, exercises proportioned to the capabilities and nature of each voice, and these patiently studied,—this was the whole secret of the famous Italian school."

* * * * *

How curiously some of the sayings of the old writers apply to the singing of Germans who are so applauded by many of our opera-goers. They complained long ago of singers who, not knowing how to manage their voices, gave vent to cries which resembled the howling of wolves, and who forgot that an artist should sing rather with his voice than with his mouth. The singer, said Zarlino, should not let out his voice with the rush and fury of a wild beast, but should control it, accommodating himself to the other singers so as not to cover them and not be covered by them. Excitement should not lead him to sing with his head and arms and neck and feet so that he might be taken for a dancer (as in the case of poor Kalisch). These writers dwell upon the importance of clear enunciation, for as Tosi quaintly puts it, it is only by the words that singers raise themselves above instrumental performers, provided they be of equal intelligence.

* * * * *

Has not the diet, the cooking of the Germans, much to do with the peculiarities of their composers and singers? The question, How music is influenced by diet, is certainly worthy of consideration if not a monograph. Hoffmann, musician, critic and rhapsodist, gravely speculated as to the effect of different wines upon the composer who meditates an immortal work, and recommended Rhine wines to him who would write a mass; Burgundy to the composer of a grand opera; champagne to the writer of a comic opera; some fiery Italian wine to the author of passionate canzonets, and arrack punch to the creator of a second Don Giovanni. Fuseli ate raw pork that he might dream frightful dreams which, awake, he could put upon the canvas. Hear Bayes in "The Rehearsal": "When I write familiar things, as sonnets to Armida, and the like, I make use of stew'd prunes only; but when I have a grand design in hand, I ever take physic, and let blood; for when you would have pure swiftness of thought, and fiery flights of fancy, you must have a care of the pensive part: in fine, you must purge the stomach." And the curious can find in Burton's Anatomy specific diets advised for the encouragement or repression of certain emotions and passions.

* * * * *

Now the German composer and the German singer subsist mainly upon pork, veal, cabbage and beer. Occasionally some bold musician makes experiments, as did Anton Filz, a celebrated violinist at the court of Mannheim, who died, as Pohl tells us in his Life of Haydn, from immoderate indulgence in raw spiders which he imagined tasted remarkably like fresh strawberries. Wagner, it is true, preached vegetarianism to his disciples,—but he condemned the eating of flesh only in theory, for he heartily enjoyed roast meat. The diet of your average German is indigestible; it puffs out logy men. Could a sparkling operetta in the French style be written after a year's stay at a German boarding-house? Do soups, macaroni, cheese of Parma, salads, the native oils and wines, go for nought in the formation or inheritance of a glorious Italian voice? When another Buckle arises and writes the history of music from a philosophic standpoint, undoubtedly will the influence of climate and diet upon the music of a nation be carefully considered and treated at length.

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Sunday Globe.

TWENTY-FOUR PAGES.

SUNDAY, APRIL 27, 1890.

[120]

The Symphony Series Ends Very Brilliantly.

With unusual demonstrations of regard from the public, Mr. Nikisch's first season as director of the Boston symphony orchestra was brought, yesterday evening, to a close. It has been a year of honors for the orchestra and its leader. Conventionalism has found no place in the work of the season. Mr. Nikisch has given the public his own interpretation of the great masters—his own interpretation, for the orchestra has caught his spirit perfectly, and nobly carried out his thought and purpose. Differences of opinion regarding the correctness of Mr. Nikisch's readings have prevailed, for people do not agree in music any better than in other branches of art. But what was expected of Mr. Nikisch was that he should give his best to Boston, and this he has assuredly done.

Forty-nine composers have found representation upon the programmes of the 24 concerts of the ninth season of the Boston symphony orchestra. Twenty-eight of these, including such masters as Beethoven, Schumann, Bach, Brahms and Wagner, are Germans; no undue preponderance, assuredly, when the acknowledged eminence of Teutonic musicians in orchestral work is accorded proper consideration. American composers have by no means been neglected, witness the names of Arthur Bird, Arthur Foote, Otto Floersheim, Arthur Weld and Louis Maas. As a programme maker Mr. Nikisch certainly compares favorably with his predecessor. He takes a broader view of his art, and if less painstaking as a drill-master, is much more poetic in temperament and spirit.

The farewell concert began with Beethoven's greatest "Leonora" overture, performed with the utmost delicacy of expression and gaining a general effect altogether charming. Beethoven's "Fourth Symphony," too, found a most appreciative reading. A marvel of skill was the perfor ance by 32 violins (Mr. Nikisch giving the pianoforte accompaniment) of the exacting "Moto Perpetuo" of Paganini. The audience fairly insisted upon a repetition. A beautiful interpretation of the prelude to "The Mastersingers" ended the offering.

MUSICIANS "WESTWARD HO."

The Four Weeks' Tour of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

At 7 o'clock this evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra, 70 performers, Arthur Nikisch, conductor, accompanied by Mme. Steinsbach-Jahns, dramatic soprano from the Leipzig Opera House, will start via the Fall River line on their fourth annual Western tour. As in former trips, the orchestra will go in charge of Assistant Manager Fred R. Comee. Manager C. A. Ellis is now in the West completing unfinished arrangements, and will join the orchestra at Cincinnati.

Tomorrow evening the final concert in the series of five given at the Academy of Music, Philadelphia, will be the initial concert of the trip. The following night a similar series in Baltimore will be closed.

Then come two concerts in Washington—the first by the orchestra alone, closing a series of five, the second with the Washington Choral Society, when Dudley Buck's "Light of Asia" will be given.

On Friday and Saturday, May 2 and 3, the orchestra will make its first appearance in Richmond, Va., under the auspices of the Mozart Association. Then comes a long jump to Columbus, O., where the orchestra gives a single performance on Monday evening, May 5, under the auspices of the Orpheus Club, the leading vocal organization of the city.

From Columbus the orchestra goes to Cinnati, giving two concerts on Tuesday and Wednesday.

A single concert in Louisville, on Thursday, May 8, will be followed by two concerts in the Grand Music Hall, St. Louis, on Friday and Saturday, May 9 and 10.

Directly after the concert on Saturday, a special train of three sleeping cars will convey the orchestra to Minneapolis for one concert, on Monday evening, May 12, in the University Coliseum, under the management of Louis Miller, to whom is due the credit of introducing this famous organization to Minneapolis. On Tuesday, May 13, the orchestra makes its debut at St. Paul, under the direction of E. C. Murdock, manager of the Star course.

A special train will take the orchestra from St. Paul to Chicago, where but a single concert will be given in Central Music Hall, on Wednesday evening, May 14. From Chicago, the organization goes to Milwaukee for a concert under the auspices of the Arion Club, with which society the orchestra appeared last season.

The next objective point is Ann Arbor, Mich., where the University Musical Society undertakes the concert on Friday, May 16, as a grand finale to a series of four entertainments under the personal direction of Prof. A. A. Stanley.

On Saturday evening, May 17, a single concert will be given in Detroit; and directly after the concert the orchestra goes by steamer across Lake Erie to Cleveland, then on to Pittsburg for two concerts in connection with the Mozart Club, Monday and Tuesday, May 19 and 20, presenting on the second night Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise." From Pittsburg back to Cleveland for one concert on Wednesday evening, May 21, under the management of N. Coe Stewart, director of music in the public schools. Buffalo has a concert on Thursday, the 22d, and Albany on Friday, the 23d. In the entire four weeks sleeping cars are used.

Closing Recitals by De Pachmann in Chickering Hall.

So great a sensation was made by De Pachmann here that the Russian artist's farewell Chopin recital tomorrow afternoon, will attract a notable audience to Chickering Hall. The programme includes a fantaisie, impromptu, barcarolle, berceuse, three etudes, ballade, valse, mazourka and tarantelle. Mme. Marguerite de Pachmann, whose playing made a great success in New York, is to make her debut at the same hall on Wednesday. Schubert's fantaisie sonata, with selections from Mendelssohn, Rubinstein, Henselt, Liszt, Chopin and Saint Saens are to be performed, with a reverie of the artiste's own composing.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

AMPHITHEATRE AUDITORIUM, LOUISVILLE, KY.

THURSDAY EVENING, - MAY 8, 1890.

FOURTH TOUR.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

FOR PARTICULARS AS TO THE SALE OF TICKETS SEE DAILY PAPERS.

HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, APRIL 26, 1890

THE TWENTY-THIRD SYMPHONY CONCERT.—

Goldmark .....Overture, "Spring"
(First time in Boston.)
Mozart .....Aria, "Thou may'st learn to hate me," from "Die Entfuehrung aus dem Serail."
Volkmann.....Serenade for String Orchestra, in D minor, op. 69.
(First time in these Concerts.)
Solo Violoncello, Mr. Anton Hekking.
Songs with Piano.
(a) Liszt ......"O Lieb"
(b) Schubert ...."Du bist die Ruh"
(c) Grieg .....Hoffnung"
Brahms .....Symphony No. 2, in C minor, op. 68

Mrs. Magdalene Steinback-Jahns, formerly an opera singer in certain German towns, has been engaged by Mr. Nikisch to accompany the orchestra upon the tour of Southern and Western cities. At last week's Rehearsal and Concert she made her first appearances in America upon the concert stage. However excellent an actress or dramatic-singer Mrs. Steinbaca-Jahns may have been in the past, she gave no signs last week of present capacity or future hope. Her voice is metallic and worn; her intonation was uncertain. These drawbacks were not offset by vocal skill or a display of uncommon musical intelligence. It is true that the singer may not have fully recovered from the voyage, and that her false intonation may have been due to temporary indisposition. This would not excuse, however, her spasmodic declamation or the exaggerations which disfigured the singing of the three songs. In the Mozart aria she showed a certain facility; it was not unlike the facility of some pianists who with foot upon the "loud" pedal run hastily through a piece, producing ragged and uneven sounds, though to a thoughtless hearer, the performance appears to be a triumph of dexterity.

Fortunately the orchestra played upon the whole exceedingly well, though in the Goldmark Overture which was given in Boston for the first time there was occasionally a feeling of insecurity. The Overture itself is a pleasing work, melodious, with passages ingeniously fashioned. It is fresh, it is spontaneous, though the music does not pierce the skin. There is an absence of that oriental, sultry sensuousness which so characterizes Goldmark's "Sakuntala" and permeates "The Queen of Sheba."

The Volkman Serenade, a monotonous if not dreary work, gave Mr. Hekking an opportunity which he was not slow to make use of, and he was enthusiastically and deservedly applauded. A Mr. Brockhoven regards this serenade as a striking example of the influence of Schumann's humor upon Volkmann. Surely this discovery is original with Mr. Brockhoven, who would seem to be eminently fitted by nature for a professorship at the grand academy of Lagado; unless it turns out that he is a humorist of subtle parts.

The blindest worshipper of Brahms could find no fault with the performance of the Symphony in C minor. In detail and as a whole it reflected great credit upon Mr. Nickish and the orchestra. As for the symphony itself what will be the verdict of the future? Is it, as some would have it, the greatest orchestral work since Beethoven's Ninth? There is by the way much of Beethoven in this very symphony, and at times suggestions of the Ninth in themes, treatment of themes, and in coloring. No one will deny the breadth of the adagio, the gracefulness of the allegretto or certain overwhelming portions of the finale. The first and last movements however are crowded with material which seems superfluous and confusing; they share the reproach of Joncières in regard to the Second of Brahms when it was played in Paris in 1880: "it abounds in brushwood." And it must be admitted that owing to the length of the symphony and the lack of contrast between the movements it fatigues, particularly when placed at the end of a program.

CAUSERIE.—The appearance of Mrs. Steinback-Jahns in Music Hall last week provokes serious reflection. For the first time this season there was an element of Barnumism in the treatment of the soloist. In the program, contrary to custom, appeared a laudatory advance notice of the singer which unfortunately was not supported by the singer's work. The matter of "floral tributes" had been most carefully attended to, and these "welcomes to America" were ostentatiously displayed. The whole thing was overdone.

* * * * *

The lady in question is an excellent example of a school of German singers. Possibly nature gives them a good, strong voice; they go upon the stage before they have acquired the art of correctly producing a tone; they are unable to sustain, swell or diminish a tone; they struggle with coloratura; they subordinate singing to action; in order to make a strong impression they force the voice, they shout, so that they soon lose all sense of pitch. After they have thus wantonly devastated the works of the living and the dead, their vocal organs are necessarily impaired by the strain; and finding that in their own cities they are in danger of being driven from the stage by younger and stronger lungs, they then look toward America.

* * * * *

Now the engagement and deliberate "booming" of a singer of inferior rank is a matter which concerns the public in more ways than one. The very fact that a singer is brought here from Leipzig, no doubt with the consent at least of Mr. Nikisch, implies that she is worthy of the position and at once prejudices a public in her favor. That she was heartily applauded Saturday evening does not prove that she is an admirable singer, nor does it show that she really pleased the musical public. For this applause may have been induced by feelings of sympathy or won by her personal appearance; it may have been instigated by a claque desirous of "germanizing" the Boston public. Whether a woman sing well or badly is not however a question of taste or sympathy; it is a question of fact, and the facts in the case of Mrs. Steinbach-Jahns are these; that without the qualifications hitherto deemed necessary, she has been imported from Germany; that she, as a soloist, is to accompany the orchestra upon its tour of Southern and Western cities.

* * * * *

What incentive has a woman born in America to work and sing when she is thus rudely told that Germany and Germans must and will rule in musical America? What incentive has a woman, whatever be her nationality, to patiently submit to the drudgery of vocal study when she sees managers and public put a premium upon mediocrity? When she sees false intonation preferred to purity of tone and careful ear? When she sees the details of an art contemptuously rejected? When she sees that which is false called good and acclaimed?

* * * * *

Repeated hearings of German operatic and concert singers with their ululations and false intonation lead one to seriously question whether Nature ever intended that the Germans should sing. For years the Italians ruled Dresden, Berlin, Munich and Vienna. In the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries and in the first half of the nineteenth century they were supreme in song. This they owed not only to the natural beauty of their voices, for voices of southern races are commonly richer in color and of fuller quality and greater flexibility than the voices of the north, but also to the wise principles of song in which they were trained from their youth up, and which were carefully handed down from father to son. "Studies regularly conducted," says Lavoix, "rules framed by skilful singers who were at the same time well-grounded musicians, exercises proportioned to the capabilities and nature of each voice, and these patiently studied,—this was the whole secret of the famous Italian school."

* * * * *

How curiously some of the sayings of the old writers apply to the singing of Germans who are so applauded by many of our opera-goers. They complained long ago of singers who, not knowing how to manage their voices, gave vent to cries which resembled the howling of wolves, and who forgot that an artist should sing rather with his voice than with his mouth. The singer, said Zarlino, should not let out his voice with the rush and fury of a wild beast, but should control it, accommodating himself to the other singers so as not to cover them and not be covered by them. Excitement should not lead him to sing with his head and arms and neck and feet so that he might be taken for a dancer (as in the case of poor Kalisch). These writers dwell upon the importance of clear enunciation, for as Tosi quaintly puts it, it is only by the words that singers raise themselves above instrumental performers, provided they be of equal intelligence.

* * * * *

Has not the diet, the cooking of the Germans, much to do with the peculiarities of their composers and singers? The question, How music is influenced by diet, is certainly worthy of consideration if not a monograph. Hoffmann, musician, critic and rhapsodist, gravely speculated as to the effect of different wines upon the composer who meditates an immortal work, and recommended Rhine wines to him who would write a mass; Burgundy to the composer of a grand opera; champagne to the writer of a comic opera; some fiery Italian wine to the author of passionate canzonets, and arrack punch to the creator of a second Don Giovanni. Fuseli ate raw pork that he might dream frightful dreams which, awake, he could put upon the canvas. Hear Bayes in "The Rehearsal": "When I write familiar things, as sonnets to Armida, and the like, I make use of stew'd prunes only; but when I have a grand design in hand, I ever take physic, and let blood; for when you would have pure swiftness of thought, and fiery flights of fancy, you must have a care of the pensive part; in fine, you must purge the stomach." And the curious can find in Burton's Anatomy specific diets advised for the encouragement or repression of certain emotions and passions.

* * * * *

Now the German composer and the German singer subsist mainly upon pork, veal, cabbage and beer. Occasionally some bold musician makes experiments, as did Anton Filz, a celebrated violinist at the court of Mannheim, who died, as Pohl tells us in his Life of Haydn, from immoderate indulgence in raw spiders which he imagined tasted remarkably like fresh strawberries. Wagner, it is true, preached vegetarianism to his disciples,—but he condemned the eating of flesh only in theory, for he heartily enjoyed roast meat. The diet of your average German is indigestible; it puffs out logy men. Could a sparkling operetta in the French style be written after a year's stay at a German boarding-house? Do soups, macaroni, cheese of Parma, salads, the native oils and wines, go for nought in the formation or inheritance of a glorious Italian voice? When another Buckle arises and writes the history of music from a philosophic standpoint, undoubtedly will the influence of climate and diet upon the music of a nation be carefully considered and treated at length.

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Sunday Globe.

TWENTY-FOUR PAGES.

SUNDAY, APRIL 27, 1890.

[120]

The Symphony Series Ends Very Brilliantly.

With unusual demonstrations of regard from the public, Mr. Nikisch's first season as director of the Boston symphony orchestra was brought, yesterday evening, to a close. It has been a year of honors for the orchestra and its leader. Conventionalism has found no place in the work of the season. Mr. Nikisch has given the public his own interpretation of the great masters—his own interpretation, for the orchestra has caught his spirit perfectly, and nobly carried out his thought and purpose. Differences of opinion regarding the correctness of Mr. Nikisch's readings have prevailed, for people do not agree in music any better than in other branches of art. But what was expected of Mr. Nikisch was that he should give his best to Boston, and this he has assuredly done.

Forty-nine composers have found representation upon the programmes of the 24 concerts of the ninth season of the Boston symphony orchestra. Twenty-eight of these, including such masters as Beethoven, Schumann, Bach, Brahms and Wagner, are Germans; no undue preponderance, assuredly, when the acknowledged eminence of Teutonic musicians in orchestral work is accorded proper consideration. American composers have by no means been neglected, witness the names of Arthur Bird, Arthur Foote, Otto Floersheim, Arthur Weld and Louis Maas. As a programme maker Mr. Nikisch certainly compares favorably with his predecessor. He takes a broader view of his art, and if less painstaking as a drill-master, is much more poetic in temperament and spirit.

The farewell concert began with Beethoven's greatest "Leonora" overture, performed with the utmost delicacy of expression and gaining a general effect altogether charming. Beethoven's "Fourth Symphony," too, found a most appreciative reading. A marvel of skill was the performance by 32 violins (Mr. Nikisch giving the pianoforte accompaniment) of the exacting "Moto Perpetuo" of Paganini. The audience fairly insisted upon a repetition. A beautiful interpretation of the prelude to "The Mastersingers" ended the offering.

MUSICIANS "WESTWARD HO."

The Four Weeks' Tour of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

At 7 o'clock this evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra, 70 performers, Arthur Nikisch, conductor, accompanied by Mme. Steinsbach-Jahns, dramatic soprano from the Leipzig Opera House, will start via the Fall River line on their fourth annual Western tour. As in former trips, the orchestra will go in charge of Assistant Manager Fred R. Comee. Manager C. A. Ellis is now in the West completing unfinished arrangements, and will join the orchestra at Cincinnati.

Tomorrow evening the final concert in the series of five given at the Academy of Music, Philadelphia, will be the initial concert of the trip. The following night a similar series in Baltimore will be closed.

Then come two concerts in Washington—the first by the orchestra alone, closing a series of five, the second with the Washington Choral Society, when Dudley Buck's "Light of Asia" will be given.

On Friday and Saturday, May 2 and 3, the orchestra will make its first appearance in Richmond, Va., under the auspices of the Mozart Association. Then comes a long jump to Columbus, O., where the orchestra gives a single performance on Monday evening, May 5, under the auspices of the Orpheus Club, the leading vocal organization of the city.

From Columbus the orchestra goes to Cinnati, giving two concerts on Tuesday and Wednesday.

A single concert in Louisville, on Thursday, May 8, will be followed by two concerts in the Grand Music Hall, St. Louis, on Friday and Saturday, May 9 and 10.

Directly after the concert on Saturday, a special train of three sleeping cars will convey the orchestra to Minneapolis for one concert, on Monday evening, May 12, in the University Coliseum, under the management of Louis Miller, to whom is due the credit of introducing this famous organization to Minneapolis. On Tuesday, May 13, the orchestra makes its debut at St. Paul, under the direction of E. C. Murdock, manager of the Star course.

A special train will take the orchestra from St. Paul to Chicago, where but a single concert will be given in Central Music Hall, on Wednesday evening, May 14. From Chicago, the organization goes to Milwaukee for a concert under the auspices of the Arion Club, with which society the orchestra appeared last season.

The next objective point is Ann Arbor, Mich., where the University Musical Society undertakes the concert on Friday, May 16, as a grand finale to a series of four entertainments under the personal direction of Prof. A. A. Stanley.

On Saturday evening, May 17, a single concert will be given in Detroit; and directly after the concert the orchestra goes by steamer across Lake Erie to Cleveland, then on to Pittsburg for two concerts in connection with the Mozart Club, Monday and Tuesday, May 19 and 20, presenting on the second night Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise." From Pittsburg back to Cleveland for one concert on Wednesday evening, May 21, under the management of N. Coe Stewart, director of music in the public schools. Buffalo has a concert on Thursday, the 22d, and Albany on Friday, the 23d. In the entire four weeks sleeping cars are used

Closing Recitals by De Pachmann in Chickering Hall.

So great a sensation was made by De Pachmann here that the Russian artist's farewell Chopin recital tomorrow afternoon, will attract a notable audience to Chickering Hall. The programme includes a fantaisie, impromptu, barcarolle, berceuse, three etudes, ballade, valse, mazourka and tarantelle. Mme. Marguerite de Pachmann, whose playing made a great success in New York, is to make her debut at the same hall on Wednesday. Schubert's fantaisie sonata, with selections from Mendelssohn, Rubinstein, Henselt, Liszt, Chopin and Saint Saens are to be performed, with a reverie of the artiste's own composing.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

FOURTH ANNUAL TRIP, 1890.

ITINERARY.

Leave Boston Sunday, April 27, at 7 P.M., via Fall River Line, Old Colony Depot. Breakfast on boat.

Leave New York Monday, April 28, at 9.30 A.M., Central Railroad of New Jersey, Jersey City. Arrive at Philadelphia at 12 M., 9th and Greene Sts. Continental Hotel. Concert at Academy of Music, 8.00 P.M.

Leave Philadelphia Tuesday, April 29, at 11.10 A.M. Depot, 24th and Chestnut Sts. Arrive Baltimore 1.45 P.M. Carrolton Hotel. Concert at Lyceum Theatre, 8.00 P.M.

Leave Baltimore (Camden Station B. & O. R.R.) Wednesday, April 30, at 9.15 A.M. Arrive Washington 10.20 A.M. Willard's Hotel. Concert at Lincoln Hall, 8.00 P.M. Rehearsal, Thursday, May 1, at 10.00 A.M., at Lincoln Hall. Concert at Lincoln Hall, at 8.00 P.M.

Leave Washington Friday, May 2, at 10.57 A.M., Baltimore & Potomac Depot, corner 6th and B Sts. Arrive Richmond 2.38 P.M. Ford's Hotel. Concert at Academy of Music, 8.30 P.M. Rehearsal Saturday, May 3, at 4.00 P.M. Concert at 8.30 P.M.

Leave Richmond Sunday, May 4, at 7.32 A.M., Richmond, Fredericksburg & Potomac Depot. Arrive Washington 11.24 A.M. Leave Washington at 2.00 P.M., B. & O. Depot, corner New Jersey Ave. and C St. Supper at Cumberland, Md., about 6.45 P.M. Arrive Columbus Monday, May 5, at 7.00 A.M. Neil House. Concert at Metropolitan Opera House, 8.00 P.M.

Leave Columbus Tuesday, May 6, at 8.45 A.M., Columbus & Cincinnati Midland Depot. Arrive Cincinnati 12.45 P.M. Grand Hotel. Concert at Odeon, 8.00 P.M. Concert at Odeon, Wednesday, May 7, at 8.00 P.M.

Leave Cincinnati Thursday, May 8, at 8.00 A.M., Grand Central Depot. Arrive Louisville 12.00 M. Galt House. Concert at Amphitheatre Auditorium, corner Fourth and Hill Sts., at 8.00 P.M.

Leave Louisville directly after the concert, from O. & M. Depot. Arrive St. Louis Friday, May 9, at 9.00 A.M. Lindell House. Concert at Grand Music Hall, at 8.00 P.M. Concert at Grand Music Hall, Saturday, May 10, at 8 00 P.M.

Leave St. Louis directly after the concert, Union Depot. Breakfast, Sunday, 6.45 A.M., at Galesburg. Dinner at Cassville, 12.45 P.M. Arrive Minneapolis Sunday, May 11, at 7.00 P.M. Hotel West. Concert at University Coliseum, Monday, May 12, at 8.00 P.M.

Leave Minneapolis Tuesday, May 13, at 9.00 A.M., C., B. & N. Depot. Arrive St. Paul 10.00 A.M. Hotel Ryan. Concert at the People's Church, at 8.00 P.M.

Leave St. Paul directly after the concert. Breakfast at Cassville, Wednesday, 6.30 A.M. Arrive Chicago Wednesday, May 14, at 1.00 P.M. Tremont House. Concert at Central Music Hall, at 8 P.M.

Leave Chicago Thursday, May 15, Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Depot. Arrive Milwaukee 11.25 A.M. Plankinton House. Rehearsal at Academy of Music, at 12 M. Concert at 8.00 P.M.

Leave Milwaukee directly after concert. Arrive Ann Arbor Friday, May 16, at 8.00 A.M. Cook House. Concert at University Hall, at 8.00 P.M.

Leave Ann Arbor directly after concert. Arrive Detroit at midnight. Russell House. Concert Saturday evening, May 17, at 8.00 P.M., at Miner's Grand Theatre.

Leave Detroit directly after the concert, by Detroit & Cleveland Steamship Line, Wharf at foot of Wayne St.

Leave Cleveland Sunday, May 18, at 8.10 A.M., New York, Pennsylvania & Ohio Depot. Arrive Pittsburgh 12.30 P.M. Seventh Avenue Hotel. Rehearsal Monday, May 19, at 9.00 A.M., at Old City Hall. Concert at 8.00 P.M. Concert Tuesday, May 20, at 8.00 P.M.

Leave Pittsburgh Wednesday, May 21, at 8.00 A.M., Pittsburgh & Lake Erie Depot. Arrive Cleveland at 12.45 P.M. Weddell House. Concert at Music Hall, at 8.00 P.M.

Leave Cleveland Thursday, May 22, at 9.00 A.M., "Nickel Plate" Depot. Arrive Buffalo at 3.30 P.M. Genesee House. Concert at Music Hall, at 8.00 P.M.

Leave Buffalo directly after concert, West Shore Depot. Arrive Albany 8.00 A.M., Friday, May 23. Delavan House. Concert at Bleecker Hall, at 8.00 P.M.

Leave Albany directly after the concert. Arrive Boston 9.35 A.M., Saturday, May 24, Boston & Albany Depot.

Instruments and personal baggage must be ready at Music Hall at three o'clock on Sunday afternoon, April 27.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

HOTEL LIST.

FOURTH ANNUAL TOUR.

1889–90.

A. Nikisch.	Swornsbourne. Schuchmann.	Hoyer. Post.
Mr. Steinbach-Jahns. Mme. Steinbach-Jahns.	Stewart. Marble.	Mahn. ✓ Krafft. ✓
Miss Steinbach.	Goldschmidt. Schultz.	H: Heindl. Rietzel.
F. R. Comee. C. M. Loeffler.	Zach. Schuecker.	E. M. Heindl. J. E. Eichler.
F. Kneisel.	Campanari. Fiumara.	Schormann. Schumann.
T. Adamowski. J. Adamowski.	Simpson. Greene.	Bareither. Jennewein.
Hekking.	Lafricain. Moore.	Gerhardt. ✓ Patz.
Mole.	Fiedler. Moldauer.	Demuth. F. Muller. ✓
Sautet.	Nichols.	Fox. Dietsch.
P. Muller.	Knecht. Goldie.	Hanneman. Delisle.
J. Akeroyd.	A. Goldstein. S. Goldstein. ✓	J. Kneisel. Sauerquell.
Roth. Behr.	Kolster. Kuehn.	Tischer-Zeitz. Schneider.
Svecenski. Grunberg.	Metzger.	Evans. Patterson. ✓
Kuntz. Gantzberg.	Mingels. E. Loeffler.

Boston Journal.

MORNING EDITION.

MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 28, 1890.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL.

The Symphony Concert.

Last Saturday night occurred the closing concert of this season's series of Symphony Concerts in Music Hall under the direction of Mr. Nikisch. Floral offerings covered the condactor's platform, and during the evening a wreath was handed up to him. Mr. Nikisch discarded the music rack which, during the latter half of the season, he has used considerably, and returned to the method with which he opened his season here, conducting entirely from memory and with neither book nor stand before him. The programme was a choice one, opening with Beethoven's "Leonore" Overture No. 3 and closing with the prelude to "Die Meistersinger." The "Leonore" overture fitly introduced Beethoven's Symphony No. 4, and both were magnificently played. The orchestra seemed fully imbued with the spirit of the occasion, and entirely in sympathy with the conductor and the music. All the beautiful passages—the eagerly watched-for bits of melody which are familiar to musical people in these numbers—were expressively and delightfully interpreted, and the audience was unusually enthusiastic.

The Meistersinger Vorspiel was given a rendition such as is seldom heard, and the familiarity of the audience with its beauties, intensified, no doubt, by its frequent hearing of late, only strengthened the judgment in commendation of the work of the orchestra. A tumultuous applause greeted the closing notes; the audience rose to its feet and recalled Mr. Nikisch again and again. Such a demonstration must have been exceedingly welcome to the conductor at the close of his first season, for it is but an earnest of the kind reception in store for him at the beginning of another year. There was also given a concert number by Paganini, the eccentric and wonderful violinist, rendered by 32 violins, the members of the orchestra composing the ensemble standing around the piano, which was played by Mr. Nikisch, and led by Mr. Kneisel. The piece was a difficult thing to perform, and a queer interpolation. But it was finely done, and the audience was wild. Had not the hisses of the strictly musical part of the audience been exceedingly prominent, it is probable that there would have been no escape from a repetition.

It is impossible this morning to review at any length the work accomplished by Mr. Nikisch. He has had many obstacles and prejudices to overcome, and much of the criticism which was earlier directed toward him was not warranted by the circumstances. He closes the season with a practical unanimity of feeling of hearty approbation of his work and methods. The orchestra left Boston last evening for New York, reaching Philadelphia in season to give the final concert in the series there, thence to Baltimore, Washington and the West. Mme. Steinbach-Jachns accompanies the orchestra, which will be managed during the trip by Fred R. Comer, Mr. Ellis's genial assistant.

Gazette

SUNDAY MORNING EDITION

The Boston Symphony Concert.

The last of this season's concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given in Music Hall last night. The hall was crowded with as enthusiastic an audience as has attended any in the long series of performances. When Mr. Nikisch appeared he was welcomed with a storm of applause which was as furious as it was prolonged. In fact, through the whole concert he was almost overwhelmed by plaudits at every stopping place in the music, the most energetic exhibition of the kindly feeling of the symphony audience toward him being made at the close of the performances, when he was recalled again and again amid cheers and bravos. The programme was a curious one in its combination of Beethoven, Paganini and Wagner, but it was played in a manner that calls for nothing but praise of the heartiest and most sincere nature. The "Leonore" No. 3 overture obtained as noble a reading and as perfect a performance as it has ever had in Music Hall. The interpretation of the fourth Symphony, in B flat, was Mr. Nikisch's most brilliant and masterly Beethoven effort of the season. From beginning to end there was not a flaw in either the reading or the playing. There was no attempt to make new points, nor was there a trace of affected sentimentality, or of striving to impress an unaccustomed interpretation upon any part of the familiar work. It was given with virility, frank sincerity and loyalty to the composer, and the applause that greeted the performance at the close of each movement was equally spontaneous and appreciative. The Paganini "Perpetual Motion" played by thirty-two violins in unison was executed with a precision, a crispness, a unity and a facility of technique that testified convincingly to the skill of the principal strings of the orchestra. The artists played as one man, and with an intonation that never varied from the true pitch. It was a remarkable and interesting feat of virtuosity accomplished in a perfectly irreproachable manner; showing of what admirable material this element in the orchestra is composed, and proving that it has lost none of its earlier delicacy and efficiency under the new influences to which it has been subjected this season. It was applauded with a persistency that at one moment seemed like a demand for an encore, but the only result were frequent acknowledgements by the players. The whole ended with a magnificent rendering of the "Meistersinger" overture, which was given with that clearness in detail, splendor of tone color and masterly beauty of phrasing that are so pre-eminently characteristic of Mr. Nikisch's Wagner interpretations. It brought the season to a close in a brilliant manner. In our next we shall give a summary of this series of concerts and of the results of Mr. Nikisch's first season here.

[121]

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

FOURTH ANNUAL TRIP, 1890.

ITINERARY.

Leave Boston Sunday, April 27, at 7 P.M., via Fall River Line, Old Colony Depot. Breakfast on boat.

Leave New York Monday, April 28, at 9.30 A.M., Central Railroad of New Jersey, Jersey City. Arrive at Philadelphia at 12 M., 9th and Greene Sts. Continental Hotel. Concert at Academy of Music, 8.00 P.M.

Leave Philadelphia Tuesday, April 29, at 11.10 A.M. Depot, 24th and Chestnut Sts. Arrive Baltimore 1.45 P.M. Carrolton Hotel. Concert at Lyceum Theatre, 8.00 P.M.

Leave Baltimore (Camden Station B. & O. R.R.) Wednesday, April 30, at 9.15 A.M. Arrive Washington 10.20 A.M. Willard's Hotel. Concert at Lincoln Hall, 8.00 P.M. Rehearsal, Thursday, May 1, at 10.00 A.M., at Lincoln Hall. Concert at Lincoln Hall, at 8.00 P.M.

Leave Washington Friday, May 2, at 10.57 A.M., Baltimore & Potomac Depot, corner 6th and B Sts. Arrive Richmond 2.38 P.M. Ford's Hotel. Concert at Academy of Music, 8.30 P.M. Rehearsal Saturday, May 3, at 4.00 P.M. Concert at 8.30 P.M.

Leave Richmond Sunday, May 4, at 7.32 A.M., Richmond, Fredericksburg & Potomac Depot. Arrive Washington 11.24 A.M. Leave Washington at 2.00 P.M., B. & O. Depot, corner New Jersey Ave. and C St. Supper at Cumberland, Md., about 6.45 P.M. Arrive Columbus Monday, May 5, at 7.00 A.M. Neil House. Concert at Metropolitan Opera House, 8.00 P.M.

Leave Columbus Tuesday, May 6, at 8.45 A.M., Columbus & Cincinnati Midland Depot. Arrive Cincinnati 12.45 P.M. Grand Hotel. Concert at Odeon, 8.00 P.M. Concert at Odeon, Wednesday, May 7, at 8.00 P.M.

Leave Cincinnati Thursday, May 8, at 8.00 A.M., Grand Central Depot. Arrive Louisville 12.00 M. Galt House. Concert at Amphitheatre Auditorium, corner Fourth and Hill Sts., at 8.00 P.M.

Leave Louisville directly after the concert, from O. & M. Depot. Arrive St. Louis Friday, May 9, at 9.00 A.M. Lindell House. Concert at Grand Music Hall, at 8.00 P.M. Concert at Grand Music Hall, Saturday, May 10, at 8 00 P.M.

Leave St. Louis directly after the concert, Union Depot. Breakfast, Sunday, 6.45 A.M., at Galesburg. Dinner at Cassville, 12.45 P.M. Arrive Minneapolis Sunday, May 11, at 7.00 P.M. Hotel West. Concert at University Coliseum, Monday, May 12, at 8.00 P.M.

Leave Minneapolis Tuesday, May 13, at 9.00 A.M., C., B. & N. Depot. Arrive St. Paul 10.00 A.M. Hotel Ryan. Concert at the People's Church, at 8.00 P.M.

Leave St. Paul directly after the concert. Breakfast at Cassville, Wednesday, 6.30 A.M. Arrive Chicago Wednesday, May 14, at 1.00 P.M. Tremont House. Concert at Central Music Hall, at 8 P.M.

Leave Chicago Thursday, May 15, Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Depot. Arrive Milwaukee 11.25 A.M. Plankinton House. Rehearsal at Academy of Music, at 12 M. Concert at 8.00 P.M.

Leave Milwaukee directly after concert. Arrive Ann Arbor Friday, May 16, at 8.00 A.M. Cook House. Concert at University Hall, at 8.00 P.M.

Leave Ann Arbor directly after concert. Arrive Detroit at midnight. Russell House. Concert Saturday evening, May 17, at 8.00 P.M., at Miner's Grand Theatre.

Leave Detroit directly after the concert, by Detroit & Cleveland Steamship Line, Wharf at foot of Wayne St.

Leave Cleveland Sunday, May 18, at 8.10 A.M., New York, Pennsylvania & Ohio Depot. Arrive Pittsburgh 12.30 P.M. Seventh Avenue Hotel. Rehearsal Monday, May 19, at 9.00 A.M., at Old City Hall. Concert at 8.00 P.M. Concert Tuesday, May 20, at 8.00 P.M.

Leave Pittsburgh Wednesday, May 21, at 8.00 A.M., Pittsburgh & Lake Erie Depot. Arrive Cleveland at 12.45 P.M. Weddell House. Concert at Music Hall, at 8.00 P.M.

Leave Cleveland Thursday, May 22, at 9.00 A.M., "Nickel Plate" Depot. Arrive Buffalo at 3.30 P.M. Genesee House. Concert at Music Hall, at 8.00 P.M.

Leave Buffalo directly after concert, West Shore Depot. Arrive Albany 8.00 A.M., Friday, May 23. Delavan House. Concert at Bleecker Hall, at 8.00 P.M.

Leave Albany directly after the concert. Arrive Boston 9.35 A.M., Saturday, May 24, Boston & Albany Depot.

Instruments and personal baggage must be ready at Music Hall at three o'clock on Sunday afternoon, April 27.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

HOTEL LIST.

FOURTH ANNUAL TOUR.

1889–90.

A. Nikisch.	Swornsbourne. Schuchmann.	Hoyer. Post.
Mr. Steinbach-Jahns. Mme. Steinbach-Jahns.	Stewart. Marble.	Mahn. Krafft.
Miss Steinbach.	Goldschmidt. Schultz.	H. Heindl. Rietzel.
F. R. Comee. C. M. Loeffler.	Zach. Schuecker.	E. M. Heindl. J. E. Eichler.
F. Kneisel.	Campanari. Fiumara.	Schormann. Schumann.
T. Adamowski. J. Adamowski.	Simpson. Greene.	Bareither. Jennewein.
Hekking.	Lafricain. Moore.	Gerhardt. Patz.
Mole.	Fiedler. Moldauer.	Demuth. F. Muller.
Sautet.	Nichols.	Fox. Dietsch.
P. Muller.	Knecht. Goldie.	Hanneman. Delisle.
J. Akeroyd.	A. Goldstein. S. Goldstein.	J. Kneisel. Sauerquell.
Roth. Behr.	Kolster. Kuehn.	Tischer-Zeitz. Schneider.
Svecenski. Grunberg.	Metzger.	Evans. Patterson.
Kuntz. Gantzberg.	Mingels. E. Loeffler.

Boston Journal.

MORNING EDITION.

MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 28, 1890.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL.

The Symphony Concert.

Last Saturday night occurred the closing concert of this season's series of Symphony Concerts in Music Hall under the direction of Mr. Nikisch. Floral offerings covered the conductor's platform, and during the evening a wreath was handed up to him. Mr. Nikisch discarded the music rack which, during the latter half of the season, he has used considerably, and returned to the method with which he opened his season here, conducting entirely from memory and with neither book nor stand before him. The programme was a choice one, opening with Beethoven's "Leonore" Overture No. 3 and closing with the prelude to "Die Meistersinger." The "Leonore" overture fitly introduced Beethoven's Symphony No. 4, and both were magnificently played. The orchestra seemed fully imbued with the spirit of the occasion, and entirely in sympathy with the conductor and the music. All the beautiful passages—the eagerly watched-for bits of melody which are familiar to musical people in these numbers—were expressively and delightfully interpreted, and the audience was unusually enthusiastic.

The Meistersinger Vorspiel was given a rendition such as is seldom heard, and the familiarity of the audience with its beauties, intensified, no doubt, by its frequent hearing of late, only strengthened the judgment in commendation of the work of the orchestra. A tumultuous applause greeted the closing notes; the audience rose to its feet and recalled Mr. Nikisch again and again. Such a demonstration must have been exceedingly welcome to the conductor at the close of his first season, for it is but an earnest of the kind reception in store for him at the beginning of another year. There was also given a concert number by Paganini, the eccentric and wonderful violinist, rendered by 32 violins, the members of the orchestra composing the ensemble standing around the piano, which was played by Mr. Nikisch, and led by Mr. Kneisel. The piece was a difficult thing to perform, and a queer interpolation. But it was finely done, and the audience was wild. Had not the hisses of the strictly musical part of the audience been exceedingly prominent, it is probable that there would have been no escape from a repetition.

It is impossible this morning to review at any length the work accomplished by Mr. Nikisch. He has had many obstacles and prejudices to overcome, and much of the criticism which was earlier directed toward him was not warranted by the circumstances. He closes the season with a practical unanimity of feeling of hearty approbation of his work and methods. The orchestra left Boston last evening for New York, reaching Philadelphia in season to give the final concert in the series there, thence to Baltimore, Washington and the West. Mme. Steinbach-Jachns accompanies the orchestra, which will be managed during the trip by Fred R. Comer, Mr. Ellis's genial assistant.

Gazette

SUNDAY MORNING EDITION

The Boston Symphony Concert.

The last of this season's concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given in Music Hall last night. The hall was crowded with as enthusiastic an audience as has attended any in the long series of performances. When Mr. Nikisch appeared he was welcomed with a storm of applause which was as furious as it was prolonged. In fact, through the whole concert he was almost overwhelmed by plaudits at every stopping place in the music, the most energetic exhibition of the kindly feeling of the symphony audience toward him being made at the close of the performances, when he was recalled again and again amid cheers and bravos. The programme was a curious one in its combination of Beethoven, Paganini and Wagner, but it was played in a manner that calls for nothing but praise of the heartiest and most sincere nature. The "Leonore" No. 3 overture obtained as noble a reading and as perfect a performance as it has ever had in Music Hall. The interpretation of the fourth Symphony, in B flat, was Mr. Nikisch's most brilliant and masterly Beethoven effort of the season. From beginning to end there was not a flaw in either the reading or the playing. There was no attempt to make new points, nor was there a trace of affected sentimentality, or of striving to impress an unaccustomed interpretation upon any part of the familiar work. It was given with virility, frank sincerity and loyalty to the composer, and the applause that greeted the performance at the close of each movement was equally spontaneous and appreciative. The Paganini "Perpetual Motion" played by thirty-two violins in unison was executed with a precision, a crispness, a unity and a facility of technique that testified convincingly to the skill of the principal strings of the orchestra. The artists played as one man, and with an intonation that never varied from the true pitch. It was a remarkable and interesting feat of virtuosity accomplished in a perfectly irreproachable manner; showing of what admirable material this element in the orchestra is composed, and proving that it has lost none of its earlier delicacy and efficiency under the new influences to which it has been subjected this season. It was applauded with a persistency that at one moment seemed like a demand for an encore, but the only result were frequent acknowledgements by the players. The whole ended with a magnificent rendering of the "Meistersinger" overture, which was given with that clearness in detail, splendor of tone color and masterly beauty of phrasing that are so pre-eminently characteristic of Mr. Nikisch's Wagner interpretations. It brought the season to a close in a brilliant manner. In our next we shall give a summary of this series of concerts and of the results of Mr. Nikisch's first season here.

[121]

MONDAY MORNING

THE LAST SYMPHONY CONCERT.

An enormous crowd assembled in Music Hall on Saturday evening to congratulate Mr. Nikisch on his first year's success in Boston, to applaud his fine closing concert and to bid him a hearty "godspeed" until next autumn. The hall was full to its extreme capacity, and even long before the beginning of the concert hundreds of disappointed enthusiasts were turned away, for there was not even an inch of standing room. When Mr. Nikisch appeared and advanced to his flower-wreathed platform, he was greeted with prolonged and hearty applause, which enthusiasm was repeated after each number of the programme, and especially at the close of the concert. Our new conductor has most certainly won the sympathy and friendship of his audience beyond the least question, and he may go away for the summer feeling that his position with the public is wholly assured. The programme was as follows:

Overture—"Leonore," No. 3.....Beethoven
Symphony No. 4, in B flat.....Beethoven
Adagio. Allegro vivace. Adagio. Minuet. Allegro ma non troppo.
Moto Perpetuo—Allegro de Concert..Paganini
For thirty-two violins.
Vorspiel—"Die Meistersinger".....Wagner

The Beethoven overture was played and read in a most masterly manner, and the genial artistic interpretation of this wonderful work must have acted as a propitiation with the muses for the sorry performance of this overture so recently heard in the Boston Theatre. The strings, particularly in the celebrated crescendo passage, acquitted themselves of their task with the greatest ease and brilliancy. The Beethoven symphony was also superbly given, and especial praise is due to the manner in which Mr. Nikisch and his men prevented the slow movement which, in spite of its apparent simplicity, is always a difficult task for both orchestra and conductor.

The performance of the Paganini tour de force for thirty-two violins (played by twenty-eight violinists and four selected viola players) with piano accompaniment is on the whole to be regretted. The string players of our orchestra have so often in a more legitimate way proved themselves capable of surmounting all obstacles and overcoming all difficulties, that it was rather unnecessary to give an extra proof of their ability in this manner, especially as the composition itself is so entirely out of place upon a symphony programme. It was, however, most marvellously played and was loudly applauded. The noble prelude to the "Meistersinger" was also given a most impressive performance, and the concert closed amidst storms of applause.

* * * * *

It is a distinct pleasure to review and sum up the season just closed—the ninth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. And it may be said at once that it has been in every way, artistically and financially, in and out of Boston, by far the most successful season of this splendid organization thus far. Naturally the first question to be asked is, "Has Mr. Nikisch proved himself a proper successor of Mr. Gericke?" and there can be no doubt but what the whole public will gladly answer, "Indeed he has." This is also the most fitting opportunity to examine carefully and in some detail some of the accusations which have been brought against Mr. Nikisch by some of his embittered opponents. For instance, we have been told that his programmes have been bad; that he has favored almost exclusively German composers, and that he has not lived up to his promises with regard to giving novelties and assisting American writers, and in all these details it has been asserted that he had not kept up Mr. Gericke's standard. Now all this is simply wholly untrue. We find by studying the list of works given during the season just closed that in twenty-four concerts Mr. Nikisch has played 106 works by forty-eight composers. These forty-eight composers consisted of twenty-three Germans, eight Frenchmen, four Russians, three Englishmen, two Italians, three Scandinavians and five Americans, this division being made according to the schools to which the men are habitually considered to belong; Meyerbeer, for example, being ranked as a Frenchman, etc. There were sixteen novelties, including six works by five Americans. Now let us compare this with the season of '88-89 under Mr. Gericke. He gave in twenty-four concerts ninety-six works by forty-five composers, made up as follows: Thirty Germans, six Frenchmen, two Russians, one Englishman, two Scandinavians, four Americans and no Italian. There were seventeen novelties, including two American works. We find, then, from these figures that in spite of the persistency with which this attack has been made upon Mr. Nikisch there is not only no word of truth in it, but the very contrary is true.

It has also been stated that the orchestra has lost much of its wonderful precision during the last year: this statement was wholly disproved in last night's concert alone. The human ear could not require nor detect a more absolute precision than that of the strings in the playing of the difficult and fatiguing Paganini number, while the accuracy and exactness with which the wood rendered the many difficult contrapuntal passages in the "Meistersinger" prelude was almost incredible. After all, how petty is such comment in view of the fact of success. Mr. Arthur Nikisch is a great conductor, and he has caused the orchestra to be more successful in and out of Boston than it has ever been before, and no amount of discussion can alter that, for it is the simple fact. Every true lover of music in Boston will always remember Mr. Wilhelm Gericke with pleasure and with gratitude, and this remembrance he most richly deserves, but now that the changing circumstances of this life have taken him into other artistic circles this admiration should not be allowed to express itself in the form of detraction of his successor, especially when the premises of the argument are wholly untrue, as we have seen above.

Mr. Nikisch was hampered in many ways. He had a new orchestra, a new public and wholly new surroundings, and yet how successful he has been. In view of these facts, now that he has become accustomed to the artistic life and customs of the New World, we may justly expect that, with his well-known ambition and never-failing interest in his work, each year of his work will be an attempt to raise the standard of music all over the country to the honor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It would be unjust to close without recalling with pleasure the appearances throughout the season of sundry members of the orchestra as soloists. The violins were represented by Messrs. Kneisel, Loeffler, Adamowski and Roth, all of whom showed great advance over last year. Mr. Anton Hekking, who replaced Mr. Giese as first 'cellist, also played with great success, as well as Mr. Schulz, a newcomer among the 'cellists of the orchestra. The Young People's Popular concerts, three of which were given on were very well chosen. The tour through the Atlantic Coast have been a succession of triumphs, and the Western trip which begins today promises to be equally successful. We should be indeed proud that here in Boston we have an institution which sets the musical standard for the whole country, and we ought never to forget that it is owing to the extraordinary generosity and determination of one of our private citizens that it has been possible for Boston and all the other cities to hear first-class music given in an unvaryingly first-class manner.

ARTHUR WELD.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, APRIL 27, 1890.

THE SYMPHONIES.

TWENTY-FOURTH CONCERT.

The Boston Symphony concerts for the present season ended last evening with the twenty-fourth concert in Music hall. The programme was:

Beethoven.....Overture, "Leonore," No. 3
Beethoven.....Symphony, No. 4, in B-flat
Paganini...Moto Perpetuo, Allegro de Concert (For 32 violins.)
Wagner.....Vorspiel, "Die Meistersinger"

The above was surely not a very brilliant programme to terminate the series, and the Paganini "Moto perpetuo" for 32 violins seemed wholly out of place, although it was most skilfully and charmingly played. It is none the less an unimportant, not to say trivial composition and the raison d'être of its appearance in such a concert as that of last evening was by no means apparent. Mr. Nikisch interpreted the "Leonore" overture as artistically as could have been wished; the symphony, too, was superbly given and the concert ended with a masterly performance of the "Meistersinger" overture.

THE DE PACHMANN RECITALS.

Those who have already enjoyed Vladimir de Pachmann's delightful interpretations of Chopin will be glad to know that he will appear once more—at Chickering hall tomorrow afternoon, at 2.30 o'clock, rendering a programme comprising a Chopin fantasie, impromptu, barcarole, berceuse, three etudes, a ballade, valse, mazourka and tarantelle.

Wednesday afternoon, at 2.30, will be given the first and only miscellaneous recital by Mme. Marguerite de Pachmann, comprising compositions of Schubert, Mendelssohn, Rubinstein, Henselt, Chopin, Marguerite de Pachmann, Liszt and Saint-Säens.

Boston Evening Transcript.

MONDAY, APRIL 28, 1890.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The programme of the twenty-fourth, and last, symphony concert was as follows:

Beethoven: Overture to "Leonore," No. 3.
Beethoven: Symphony No. 4, in B flat.
Paganini: Moto perpetuo.
Wagner: Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg."

The "Leonore" overture was grandly played. Saving that the holding back the tempo at the second theme stultified itself by producing no effect, the performance was well nigh ideal.

The ever-beautiful B-flat symphony, too, went to a charm; nowhere has Mr. Nikisch done finer work. The clearness, life and vigor with which every one of the four movements was played were simply admirable.

Having Paganini's "Moto perpetuo" played by thirty-two violins in unison, to a pianoforte accompaniment, was an idea which one would not have supposed would occur to Mr. Nikisch. That sort of thing does not belong to a symphony concert. We, for one, found it deadly dull; partly, perhaps, because that same sort of rapid fiddling had just been done to far better purpose in the last movement of the symphony.

The "Meistersinger" overture was played exactly as it was at the first concert of the season, last October; but somehow it did not seem to us to make quite so brilliant an effect as then. Was it because the element of surprise was wanting? It is hard to tell, but the rendering seemed over-elaborate, and the strong effects too premeditated. One could find much to praise, but it did not carry one away.

Mr. Nikisch had the warmest of warm receptions as he appeared on the platform, and the applause at the close of the concert was a long and hearty "auf Wiedersehn."

BOSTON, APRIL 27, 1890.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concerts---Facts and Figures.

The ninth season of the Boston Symphony orchestra's home concerts was ended with that given at Music Hall last evening, on which occasion Mr. Arthur Nikisch concluded his first Boston season as the director of the organization. The programme chosen for this final appearance of the organization for the season was calculated to display the abilities of the orchestra with marked prominence, and the band met the tests of the several numbers in a most satisfying fashion. The familiar "Leonore" overture No. 3 was the introductory number, leading to the fourth of the Beethoven symphonies, and to both these compositions Mr. Nikisch gave a thoroughly conservative and refined reading, the overture being interpreted with especially pleasing results. The novelty of the evening consisted of a performance of Paganini's "Moto Perpetuo, Allegro de Concert," which was played by all the violins, the men standing at their desks grouped about the piano, at which Mr. Nikisch sat and played the accompaniment arranged by Ferdinand David. No more severe test of the virtuosity of the string players of the band has been given during the season than that afforded by this composition; and the rare purity of tone, perfection of execution and precision shown in the playing of the number fully illustrated the high standard of ability which has been regained during the season by this department of the orchestra. The Vorspiel, "Die Meistersinger," made the somewhat singularly chosen final selection for the season's programmes, and gave Mr. Nikisch an excellent opportunity to leave a fine impression of his thorough command of the orchestra in the Wagner school of compositions. It was a masterly performance of this characteristic selection, and at its conclusion the enthusiasm of the audience found expression in a somewhat extravagant fashion, the long continued applause showing a very kindly feeling toward the conductor at the end of his season's labors, as well as a keen appreciation of the final number of the evening. The season thus ended has been, in many ways, the most notable in the history of this home organization, and the results attending its ending have been far different from what its beginning promised. Coming to America with the limited knowledge of the local situation in regard to musical affairs which all foreigners appear to suffer from, it was not surprising that Mr. Nikisch at first called out some pretty severe criticisms upon his action as the director of the Boston orchestra. The autocratic position which he was placed in by Mr. Higginson, in common with his predecessors, made it a difficult matter to bring him to a full realization of the character and musical standing of the Symphony concert patrons without plain language, and, no doubt, some injustice was done Mr. Nikisch during the heated discussions following his first appearances at the head of the orchestra. It is simple justice to Mr. Nikisch, however, to say that no man, native or foreign born, could have met the situation in which he found himself with greater courtesy, tact or diplomacy. He has, since the first few weeks of his control of the Boston orchestra, shown a disposition to meet the desires of his public in all reasonable ways, and has made a steady and patient effort to fill his difficult position in a way to meet the approval of all fair minded people. The very large measure of success that has attended this effort is full of promise for his work in future seasons, and he has certainly gained the good will of the Boston public by the course he has pursued in the control of the great organization he directs.

The Season's Figures.

The very general misunderstanding existing as to the financial side of the symphony concert scheme seems to warrant the presentation of soom figures taken from official sources concerning the attendance upon the rehearsals and concerts by the class for which they were primarily designed by the founder and patron of this orchestra. While it is true that those who from season to season desire to secure choice seats, and are willing to enter into a financial contest for their posession, have paid prices which have at last put these concerts upon a self-supporting basis, it is also shown by the following figures that an immense number of people have had a hearing of the great orchestra at merely nominal prices. The figures given apply to the admission tickets and those sold at the box office without premium to both the public rehearsals and concerts, as well as to the total attendance during the season.

The number who have attended the rehearsals on admission tickets, at an expense of 25 cents, is	20,985
Five hundred and eight season tickets for rehearsals were sold at $7.50, making the number who attended at an expense of 31¼ cents	12,192
Nine hundred and seventy-four season tickets for the evening concerts were sold at $7.50, making attendance at 31¼ cents	23,376
The number who have attended the evening concerts on admission tickets at 50 cents	3,697
Total number who have heard the orchestra at an expense of 50 cents or less	60,250
Add to this the number who bought the higher priced tickets at auction—1423 season tickets for each series—(1423x43)	68,304
Admission and cheap season	60,250
Total attendance regular performances	128,554
Add again the number who attended the three young people's matinees (6900), and the total number who have heard the orchestra in Boston is, by a close estimate	135,454

It is entirely safe to say that no concert enterprise known in this country's musical history has ever equalled in all ways that of the ninth season of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Fourth Annual Tour.

The orchestra leaves Boston this evening for its fourth annual southern and western tour, during which Mr. Nikisch will make his first appearance as its conductor in many of the largest cities of the country. Mme. Steinbach Jahns, soprano, accompanies the orchestra as soloist of the tour. Monday

Washington Choral Society, when Dudley Buck's "Light of Asia" will be given. On Friday and Saturday, May 2 and 3, the orchestra will make its first appearance in Richmond, Va., under the auspices of the Mozart Association. At Columbus, O., the orchestra gives a single performance on Monday evening, May 5, under the auspices of the Orpheus Club. At Cincinnati two concerts will be given on Tuesday and Wednesday and a single concert in Louisville, Ky., on Thursday, May 8, follows. Two concerts will be given in the Grand Music Hall, St. Louis, on Friday and Saturday, May 9 and 10, and one at Minneapolis on Monday evening, May 12, in the University Coliseum. On Tuesday, May 13, the orchestra makes its debut in St. Paul, and then at Chicago, a single concert will be given in Central Music Hall, on Wednesday evening, May 14. From Chicago the organization goes to Milwaukee for a concert under the auspices of the Arion Club. The next concert is at Ann Arbor, Mich., where the University Musical Society undertakes the concert on Friday, May 16. On Saturday evening, May 17, a single concert will be given in Detroit; and directly after the concert the orchestra goes by steamer across Lake Erie to Cleveland, then on to Pittsburg for two concerts in connection with the Mozart Club, Monday and Tuesday, May 19 and 20, presenting on the second night Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise." From Pittsburg back to Cleveland for one concert on Wednesday evening, May 21. Buffalo has a concert on Thursday, the 22d, and Albany on Friday, the 23d, the orchestra reaching Boston again on Saturday, May 24.

DE PACHMANN RECITALS.

Vladimir de Pachmann, the Russian pianist, makes his last appearance in this city at Chickering Hall tomorrow afternoon, when, by especial request, he will give another of his famous Chopin recitals, including in his programme for the day the following compositions: Fantaisie, op. 49; impromptu, op. 29; barcarolle, op. 60; berceuse, op. 57; "Three Etudes," op. 25; ballade, op. 23; valse, op. 42; mazourka, op. 41; tarantelle, op. 43. On Wednesday afternoon, in the same hall, Mme. Marguerite de Pachmann, also a pianist of excellent standing, is to make her first and only appearance here. She will play a miscellaneous programme of piano music, including compositions by Schubert, Mendelssohn, Rubinstein, Henselt, Chopin, Marguerite de Pachmann, Liszt and Saint-Saens.

AMERICAN ART JOURNAL

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, APRIL 26, 1890.

Vladimir de Pachmann in Boston.

THIS gentleman has given three Chopin recitals in Chickering Hall, Boston, issuing therefor unique programs, enriched with a few bars from several of the pieces to be played, a fac-simile of a bit of the E-minor Prelude, and a picture of Chopin.

In flowing softness Mr. Pachmann's playing is a revelation. During some of his selections I fell a 'thinking, Whom have we among us who could or would play those selections in that fashion? Of course he flies in the face of many assured convictions; but as one noted pianist said: "I come to enjoy, not to criticize!"

Mr. Pachmann is himself part of the enjoyment. "How these French actors talk to the audience: was the remark once made to me by our great comedian, Warren, as we were listening to the Judic troupe. How Pachmann plays to his audience, ever and anon looking at us sidewise, as much as to say: "There, how's that?" or "You don't do it that way, do you?" or "What do you think of that, my cat?" to quote Tom Hood. He likes to have all quiet when he touches the keys, whether in public or private. He flies out about the tuning of a piano, and then plays the unchanged instrument like one of Elizabeth Phelps's angels from Gates Ajar. You know she prophesies pianos in heaven! He scolds the audience in a loud hush, and also in good set terms, when they interrupt. "Nobody can play with such a noise!" he exclaims; and you agree with his opinion, though you may think his manner impolitic. He throws in a remark explanatory now and then,—to say, for instance, that he has it from Liszt himself, that such or such a passage should be played, not dramatically (query, tragically?), but poetically. Then he goes at it again, to illustrate his point. Such marvellous endings as he makes, like the soft fall of a dying woodland note.

Hurriedly he vanishes through the stage door, for a brief intermission; and up from the audience comes such a chatter! like that of the birds in our old Chapel Cemetery, or of the delegates at a political convention.

Pachmann is an artist to be seen as well as heard. All our players can learn something from him, and most of them much. The gallop in the A-flat Polonaise is something to remember. Others do it more brilliantly; but no other pianist gives it such a smooth, turfy sound—if one may use such an epithet.

Nor is it among the least of the Pachmann delights, that he throws in selections here and there, not "nominated in the bond," out of pure musical exuberance; and that when all is over, he is as likely as not to go into the wareroom parlors below and play an hour or two longer, at his own sweet will. Rara avis.

[122]

Boston Post

MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 28, 1890

THE LAST SYMPHONY CONCERT.

An enormous crowd assembled in Music Hall on Saturday evening to congratulate Mr. Nikisch on his first year's success in Boston, to applaud his fine closing concert and to bid him a hearty "godspeed" until next autumn. The hall was full to its extreme capacity, and even long before the beginning of the concert hundreds of disappointed enthusiasts were turned away, for there was not even an inch of standing room. When Mr. Nikisch appeared and advanced to his flower-wreathed platform, he was greeted with prolonged and hearty applause, which enthusiasm was repeated after each number of the programme, and especially at the close of the concert. Our new conductor has most certainly won the sympathy and friendship of his audience beyond the least question, and he may go away for the summer feeling that his position with the public is wholly assured. The programme was as follows:

Overture—"Leonore," No. 3.....Beethoven
Symphony No. 4, in B flat.....Beethoven
Adagio. Allegro vivace. Adagio. Minuet. Allegro ma non troppo.
Moto Perpetuo—Allegro de Concert..Paganini
For thirty-two violins.
Vorspiel—"Die Meistersinger".....Wagner

The Beethoven overture was played and read in a most masterly manner, and the genial artistic interpretation of this wonderful work must have acted as a propitiation with the muses for the sorry performance of this overture so recently heard in the Boston Theatre. The strings, particularly in the celebrated crescendo passage, acquitted themselves of their task with the greatest ease and brilliancy. The Beethoven symphony was also superbly given, and especial praise is due to the manner in which Mr. Nikisch and his men prevented the slow movement which, in spite of its apparent simplicity, is always a difficult task for both orchestra and conductor.

The performance of the Paganini tour de force for thirty-two violins (played by twenty-eight violinists and four selected viola players) with piano accompaniment is on the whole to be regretted. The string players of our orchestra have so often in a more legitimate way proved themselves capable of surmounting all obstacles and overcoming all difficulties, that it was rather unnecessary to give an extra proof of their ability in this manner, especially as the composition itself is so entirely out of place upon a symphony programme. It was, however, most marvellously played and was loudly applauded. The noble prelude to the "Meistersinger" was also given a most impressive performance, and the concert closed amidst storms of applause.

. . . .

It is a distinct pleasure to review and sum up the season just closed—the ninth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. And it may be said at once that it has been in every way, artistically and financially, in and out of Boston, by far the most successful season of this splendid organization thus far. Naturally the first question to be asked is, "Has Mr. Nikisch proved himself a proper successor of Mr. Gericke?" and there can be no doubt but what the whole public will gladly answer, "Indeed he has." This is also the most fitting opportunity to examine carefully and in some detail some of the accusations which have been brought against Mr. Nikisch by some of his embittered opponents. For instance, we have been told that his programmes have been bad; that he has favored almost exclusively German composers, and that he has not lived up to his promises with regard to giving novelties and assisting American writers, and in all these details it has been asserted that he had not kept up Mr. Gericke's standard. Now all this is simply wholly untrue. We find by studying the list of works given during the season just closed that in twenty-four concerts Mr. Nikisch has played 106 works by forty-eight composers. These forty-eight composers consisted of twenty-three Germans, eight Frenchmen, four Russians, three Englishmen, two Italians, three Scandinavians and five Americans, this division being made according to the schools to which the men are habitually considered to belong, Meyerbeer, for example, being ranked as a Frenchman, etc. There were sixteen novelties, including six works by five Americans. Now let us compare this with the season of '88-89 under Mr. Gericke. He gave in twenty-four concerts ninety-six works by forty-five composers, made up as follows: Thirty Germans, six Frenchmen, two Russians, one Englishman, two Scandinavians, four Americans and no Italian. There were seventeen novelties, including two American works. We find, then, from these figures that in spite of the persistency with which this attack has been made upon Mr. Nikisch there is not only no word of truth in it, but the very contrary is true.

It has also been stated that the orchestra has lost much of its wonderful precision during the last year; this statement was wholly disproved in last night's concert alone. The human ear could not require nor detect a more absolute precision than that of the strings in the playing of the difficult and fatiguing Paganini number, while the accuracy and exactness with which the wood rendered the many difficult contrapuntal passages in the "Meistersinger" prelude was almost incredible. After all, how petty is such comment in view of the fact of success. Mr. Arthur Nikisch is a great conductor, and he has caused the orchestra to be more successful in and out of Boston than it has ever been before, and no amount of discussion can alter that, for it is the simple fact. Every true lover of music in Boston will always remember Mr. Wilhelm Gericke with pleasure and with gratitude, and this remembrance he most richly deserves, but now that the changing circumstances of this life have taken him into other artistic circles this admiration should not be allowed to express itself in the form of detraction of his successor, especially when the premises of the argument are wholly untrue, as we have seen above.

Mr. Nikisch was hampered in many ways. He had a new orchestra, a new public and wholly new surroundings, and yet how successful he has been. In view of these facts, now that he has become accustomed to the artistic life and customs of the New World, we may justly expect that, with his well-known ambition and never-failing interest in his work, each year of his work will be an attempt to raise the standard of music all over the country to the honor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It would be unjust to close without recalling with pleasure the appearances throughout the season of sundry members of the orchestra as soloists. The violins were represented by Messrs. Kneisel, Loeffler, Adamowski and Roth, all of whom showed great advance over last year. Mr. Anton Hekking, who replaced Mr. Giese as first 'cellist, also played with great success, as well as Mr. Schulz, a newcomer among the 'cellists of the orchestra. The Young People's Popular concerts, three of which were given on Wednesday afternoons, were similarly more successful than last year, and the programmes for these rather lighter concerts were very well chosen. The four trips down the Atlantic Coast have been a succession of triumphs, and the Western trip which begins today promises to be equally successful. We should be indeed proud that here in Boston we have an institution which sets the musical standard for the whole country, and we ought never to forget that it is owing to the extraordinary generosity and determination of one of our private citizens that it has been possible for Boston and all the other cities to hear first-class music given in an unvaryingly first-class manner.

ARTHUR WELD.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, APRIL 27, 1890.

THE SYMPHONIES.

TWENTY-FOURTH CONCERT.

The Boston Symphony concerts for the present season ended last evening with the twenty-fourth concert in Music hall. The programme was:

Beethoven.....Overture, "Leonore," No. 3
Beethoven.....Symphony, No. 4, in B-flat
Paganini....Moto Perpetuo, Allegro de Concert (For 32 violins.)
Wagner.....Vorspiel, "Die Meistersinger"

The above was surely not a very brilliant programme to terminate the series, and the Paganini "Moto perpetuo" for 32 violins seemed wholly out of place, although it was most skilfully and charmingly played. It is none the less an unimportant, not to say trivial composition and the raison d'être of its appearance in such a concert as that of last evening was by no means apparent. Mr. Nikisch interpreted the "Leonore" overture as artistically as could have been wished; the symphony, too, was superbly given and the concert ended with a masterly performance of the "Meistersinger" overture.

THE DE PACHMANN RECITALS.

Those who have already enjoyed Vladimir de Pachmann's delightful interpretations of Chopin will be glad to know that he will appear once more—at Chickering hall tomorrow afternoon, at 2.30 o'clock, rendering a programme comprising a Chopin fantasie, impromptu, barcarole, berceuse, three etudes, a ballade, valse, mazourka and tarantelle.

Wednesday afternoon, at 2.30, will be given the first and only miscellaneous recital by Mme. Marguerite de Pachmann, comprising compositions of Schubert, Mendelssohn, Rubinstein, Henselt, Chopin, Marguerite de Pachmann, Liszt and Saint-Säens.

Boston Evening Transcript.

MONDAY, APRIL 28, 1890.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The programme of the twenty-fourth, and last, symphony concert was as follows:

Beethoven: Overture to "Leonore." No. 3.
Beethoven: Symphony No. 4, in B flat.
Paganini: Moto perpetuo.
Wagner: Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg."

The "Leonore" overture was grandly played. Saving that the holding back the tempo at the second theme stultified itself by producing no effect, the performance was well nigh ideal.

The ever-beautiful B-flat symphony, too, went to a charm; nowhere has Mr. Nikisch done finer work. The clearness, life and vigor with which every one of the four movements was played were simply admirable.

Having Paganini's "Moto perpetuo" played by thirty-two violins in unison, to a pianoforte accompaniment, was an idea which one would not have supposed would occur to Mr. Nikisch. That sort of thing does not belong to a symphony concert. We, for one, found it deadly dull; partly, perhaps, because that same sort of rapid fiddling had just been done to far better purpose in the last movement of the symphony.

The "Meistersinger" overture was played exactly as it was at the first concert of the season, last October; but somehow it did not seem to us to make quite so brilliant an effect as then. Was it because the element of surprise was wanting? It is hard to tell, but the rendering seemed over-elaborate, and the strong effects too premeditated. One could find much to praise, but it did not carry one away.

Mr. Nikisch had the warmest of warm receptions as he appeared on the platform, and the applause at the close of the concert was a long and hearty "auf Wiedersehn."

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, APRIL 27, 1890.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concerts—Facts and Figures.

The ninth season of the Boston Symphony orchestra's home concerts was ended with that given at Music Hall last evening, on which occasion Mr. Arthur Nikisch concluded his first Boston season as the director of the organization. The programme chosen for this final appearance of the organization for the season was calculated to display the abilities of the orchestra with marked prominence, and the band met the tests of the several numbers in a most satisfying fashion. The familiar "Leonore" overture No. 3 was the introductory number, leading to the fourth of the Beethoven symphonies, and to both these compositions Mr. Nikisch gave a thoroughly conservative and refined reading, the overture being interpreted with especially pleasing results. The novelty of the evening consisted of a performance of Paganini's "Moto Perpetuo, Allegro de Concert," which was played by all the violins, the men standing at their desks grouped about the piano, at which Mr. Nikisch sat and played the accompaniment arranged by Ferdinand David. No more severe test of the virtuosity of the string players of the band has been given during the season than that afforded by this composition; and the rare purity of tone, perfection of execution and precision shown in the playing of the number fully illustrated the high standard of ability which has been regained during the season by this department of the orchestra. The Vorspiel, "Die Meistersinger," made the somewhat singularly chosen final selection for the season's programmes, and gave Mr. Nikisch an excellent opportunity to leave a fine impression of his thorough command of the orchestra in the Wagner school of compositions. It was a masterly performance of this characteristic selection, and at its conclusion the enthusiasm of the audience found expression in a somewhat extravagant fashion, the long continued applause showing a very kindly feeling toward the conductor at the end of his season's labors, as well as a keen appreciation of the final number of the evening. The season thus ended has been, in many ways, the most notable in the history of this home organization, and the results attending its ending have been far different from what its beginning promised. Coming to America with the limited knowledge of the local situation in regard to musical affairs which all foreigners appear to suffer from, it was not surprising that Mr. Nikisch at first called out some pretty severe criticisms upon his action as the director of the Boston orchestra. The autocratic position which he was placed in by Mr. Higginson, in common with his predecessors, made it a difficult matter to bring him to a full realization of the character and musical standing of the Symphony concert patrons without plain language, and, no doubt, some injustice was done Mr. Nikisch during the heated discussions following his first appearances at the head of the orchestra. It is simple justice to Mr. Nikisch, however, to say that no man, native or foreign born, could have met the situation in which he found himself with greater courtesy, tact or diplomacy. He has, since the first few weeks of his control of the Boston orchestra, shown a disposition to meet the desires of his public in all reasonable ways, and has made a steady and patient effort to fill his difficult position in a way to meet the approval of all fair minded people. The very large measure of success that has attended this effort is full of promise for his work in future seasons, and he has certainly gained the good will of the Boston public by the course he has pursued in the control of the great organization he directs.

The Season's Figures.

The very general misunderstanding existing as to the financial side of the symphony concert scheme seems to warrant the presentation of soom figures taken from official sources concerning the attendance upon the rehearsals and concerts by the class for which they were primarily designed by the founder and patron of this orchestra. While it is true that those who from season to season desire to secure choice seats, and are willing to enter into a financial contest for their posession, have paid prices which have at last put these concerts upon a self-supporting basis, it is also shown by the following figures that an immense number of people have had a hearing of the great orchestra at merely nominal prices. The figures given apply to the admission tickets and those sold at the box office without premium to both the public rehearsals and concerts, as well as to the total attendance during the season.

The number who have attended the rehearsals on admission tickets, at an expense of 25 cents, is	20,985
Five hundred and eight season tickets for rehearsals were sold at $7.50, making the number who attended at an expense of 31¼ cents	12,192
Nine hundred and seventy-four season tickets for the evening concerts were sold at $7.50, making attendance at 31¼ cents	23,376
The number who have attended the evening concerts on admission tickets at 50 cents	3,697
Total number who have heard the orchestra at an expense of 50 cents or less	60,250
Add to this the number who bought the higher priced tickets at auction—1423 season tickets for each series—(1423x48)	68,304
Admission and cheap season	60,250
Total attendance regular performances	128,554
Add again the number who attended the three young people's matinees (6900), and the total number who have heard the orchestra in Boston is, by a close estimate	135,454

It is entirely safe to say that no concert enterprise known in this country's musical history has ever equalled in all ways that of the ninth season of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Fourth Annual Tour.

The orchestra leaves Boston this evening for its fourth annual southern and western tour, during which Mr. Nikisch will make his first appearance as its conductor in many of the largest cities of the country. Mme. Steinbach Jahns, soprano, accompanies the orchestra as soloist of the tour. Monday evening, April 28, a final concert in the series of five given at the Academy of Music, Philadelphia, will be the initial concert of the trip. The following night, a similar series in Baltimore will be closed. Two concerts in Washington follow, the first by the orchestra alone, closing a series of five, the second with the Washington Choral Society, when Dudley Buck's "Light of Asia" will be given. On Friday and Saturday, May 2 and 3, the orchestra will make its first appearance in Richmond, Va., under the auspices of the Mozart Association. At Columbus, O., the orchestra gives a single performance on Monday evening, May 5, under the auspices of the Orpheus Club. At Cincinnati two concerts will be given on Tuesday and Wednesday and a single concert in Louisville, Ky., on Thursday, May 8, follows. Two concerts will be given in the Grand Music Hall, St. Louis, on Friday and Saturday, May 9 and 10, and one at Minneapolis on Monday evening, May 12, in the University Coliseum. On Tuesday, May 13, the orchestra makes its debut in St. Paul, and then at Chicago, a single concert will be given in Central Music Hall, on Wednesday evening, May 14. From Chicago the organization goes to Milwaukee for a concert under the auspices of the Arion Club. The next concert is at Ann Arbor, Mich., where the University Musical Society undertakes the concert on Friday, May 16. On Saturday evening, May 17, a single concert will be given in Detroit; and directly after the concert the orchestra goes by steamer across Lake Erie to Cleveland, then on to Pittsburg for two concerts in connection with the Mozart Club, Monday and Tuesday, May 19 and 20, presenting on the second night Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise." From Pittsburg back to Cleveland for one concert on Wednesday evening, May 21. Buffalo has a concert on Thursday, the 22d, and Albany on Friday, the 23d, the orchestra reaching Boston again on Saturday, May 24.

DE PACHMANN RECITALS.

Vladimir de Pachmann, the Russian pianist, makes his last appearance in this city at Chickering Hall tomorrow afternoon, when, by especial request, he will give another of his famous Chopin recitals, including in his programme for the day the following compositions: Fantaisie, op. 49; impromptu, op. 29; barcarolle, op. 60; berceuse, op. 57; "Three Etudes," op. 25; ballade, op. 23; valse, op. 42; mazourka, op. 41; tarantelle, op. 43. On Wednesday afternoon, in the same hall, Mme. Marguerite de Pachmann, also a pianist of excellent standing, is to make her first and only appearance here. She will play a miscellaneous programme of piano music, including compositions by Schubert, Mendelssohn, Rubinstein, Henselt, Chopin, Marguerite de Pachmann, Liszt and Saint-Saens.

AMERICAN ART JOURNAL

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, APRIL 26, 1890.

Vladimir de Pachmann in Boston.

THIS gentleman has given three Chopin recitals in Chickering Hall, Boston, issuing therefor unique programs, enriched with a few bars from several of the pieces to be played, a fac-simile of a bit of the E-minor Prelude, and a picture of Chopin.

In flowing softness Mr. Pachmann's playing is a revelation. During some of his selections I fell a 'thinking, Whom have we among us who could or would play those selections in that fashion? Of course he flies in the face of many assured convictions; but as one noted pianist said: "I come to enjoy, not to criticize!"

Mr. Pachmann is himself part of the enjoyment. "How these French actors talk to the audience: was the remark once made to me by our great comedian, Warren, as we were listening to the Judic troupe. How Pachmann plays to his audience, ever and anon looking at us sidewise, as much as to say: "There, how's that?" or "You don't do it that way, do you?" or "What do you think of that, my cat?" to quote Tom Hood. He likes to have all quiet when he touches the keys, whether in public or private. He flies out about the tuning of a piano, and then plays the unchanged instrument like one of Elizabeth Phelps's angels from Gates Ajar. You know she prophesies pianos in heaven! He scolds the audience in a loud hush, and also in good set terms, when they interrupt. "Nobody can play with such a noise!" he exclaims; and you agree with his opinion, though you may think his manner impolitic. He throws in a remark explanatory now and then,—to say, for instance, that he has it from Liszt himself, that such or such a passage should be played, not dramatically (query, tragically?), but poetically. Then he goes at it again, to illustrate his point. Such marvellous endings as he makes, like the soft fall of a dying woodland note.

Hurriedly he vanishes through the stage door, for a brief intermission; and up from the audience comes such a chatter! like that of the birds in our old Chapel Cemetery, or of the delegates at a political convention.

Pachmann is an artist to be seen as well as heard. All our players can learn something from him, and most of them much. The gallop in the A-flat Polonaise is something to remember. Others do it more brilliantly; but no other pianist gives it such a smooth, turfy sound—if one may use such an epithet.

Nor is it among the least of the Pachmann delights, that he throws in selections here and there, not "nominated in the bond," out of pure musical exuberance; and that when all is over, he is as likely as not to go into the wareroom parlors below and play an hour or two longer, at his own sweet will. Rara avis.

[122]

Boston Courier.

DAY MORNING, APRIL 27, 1890.

THE LAST SYMPHONY.

CLOSING OF THE FIRST SERIES UNDER MR. NIKISCH'S DIRECTORSHIP.

With the twenty-fourth and last concert which took place last evening, the ninth season, and the first under Mr. Nikisch, came to an end. And it may justly be said that it ended, figuratively speaking, in a "blaze of glory;" for the concerts at which the orchestra has played with such uniform fire and finish and at which the interpretations of the various numbers of the programme have given so much satisfaction, have been few in number. It began with an overture and closed with another, both of which have been called, with a strong show of truth, the two greatest overtures that have ever been given to the world. The first was Beethoven's overture to "Leonore" in C, number three. It was grandly performed. The pathetic phrases of the first measures of the introduction were most expressively played, the fortissimo climax was finely worked up and its closing measures were blended with the pianissimo entrance of the allegro in a manner as skillful as it was artistic. The trumpet call from without also was effectively rendered, and the short passage which precedes its repetition was far more smoothly and less abruptly given than it usually is. In fact, although Mr. Nikisch conducted from memory, the dynamic effects throughout the entire overture were remarkably accurate and well managed. An equally fine performance of Beethoven's fourth symphony followed. All the joyousness, the serene melancholy, the jollity of the work were given full expression, while the renderings of those particular passages that are always eagerly anticipated—the entrance of the second theme of the first movement, the passage for the clarinet in the adagio, the beautiful trio of the minuet, and the exquisitely delightful second theme of the closing allegro—were as felicitous as possible. But as the influence of many good lives is almost entirely lost through the perpetration of a single misdeed, so was the effect of this programme, which would have been wholly magnificent, nearly ruined by the interpolation at this point of Paganini's "Moto Perpetuo," which was played in unison by the thirty-two violin players of the orchestra, to the pianoforte accompaniment of Mr. Nikisch. "What a fall was there," what a blot on what might easily have been one of the few great evenings of the season! Of course, it was well played, and, of course, it was re-demanded; but fortunately good taste prevailed, and the clamor for its repitition was hissed into silence. 'Tis true, and pity 'tis, that the believers in the total depravity of mankind can find ample proof of the truth of their belief in every corner of the world's stage, even at the pet concerts of aesthetic Boston. The concert closed with the overture that came first on the opening programme of the season, the introduction to "Die Meistersinger." Without doubt it was rendered with much greater breadth, and freedom of tempo, than it was in the first instance; for, although the first performance was fine, the angularity of Mr. Nikisch's lead, at that time, caused apparently by nervousness, imbued it with a certain rigidity which was nowhere visible last evening. It was a great performance. Mr. Nikisch was received with prolonged applause at the beginning of the concert, and at close of the first overture, was presented with a large laurel wreath. At the end of the concert the audience, one of the largest of the season, evinced so much enthusiasm that he was compelled to bow his acknowledgments over and over. There can be no doubt left in his mind as to the kind of reception he will meet with next October. Before closing this report a word should be said regarding the programme book, which has become more and more valuable to the Symphony audiences during the past few years. The indefatigably energy displayed by Mr. George H. Wilson in compiling the great amount of information they have contained, and the ability with which he has met many emergencies that can hardly be realized by the public, deserve the warmest praise. The book is now a feature of the concerts that could not well be dispensed with.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

A few facts concerning this now famous organization so soon to visit this city may prove of interest. Founded in 1881 by the open-handed liberality of Mr. Henry L. Higginson, a Boston banker, and a genuine admirer of good music, this orchestra has increased in reputation until to-day it is acknowledged the finest orchestra in this country and the equal of any even in Europe, save possibly the famous Vienna Opera House orchestra, conducted by Hans Richter. The season in Boston opens usually about October 15, and closes late in April. Twenty-four Friday afternoon public rehearsals and twenty-four Saturday evening concerts, each a distinct series, by itself, are given in the famous Music Hall, which seats 2,400. Season tickets at a face value of $12 and $7.50 are sold for each series; but so great is the demand for these tickets that for the past six years the $12 seats have been sold at auction, leaving the $7.50 seats to be sold at their face value. For the past two seasons, every reserved seat in the house was sold for the season for each series of 24 concerts at the annual sale in September, a month before the first concert. The highest price paid at the auction last season for a $12 seat was $96 apiece for two seats; and this season $107 each was paid for a pair of seats, the average price being about $20 a ticket. Last September, the sale of the $7.50 seats at their face value was advertised for Tuesday, September 17; and on the Thursday previous, September 12, at ten o'clock in the morning, a party of four started a line in the entrance to the Music Hall box-office. By noon, this line had grown to fifty, by six o clock that evening to over a hundred; and, with constant addition, this party waited in line five days and five nights, sleeping in their places and having their meals brought to them. The leading dailies of Boston printed pictures of this party, and crowds of interested spectators came to look on the novel sight. When the box-office was opened at eight o'clock on Tuesday morning, nearly 500 people were waiting in line. The limit was four tickets to each buyer; and in just one hour and a quarter every $7.50 seat in the house was sold, and at least 200 people were turned away, unable to secure tickets. All this was for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals. Then a second line was at once formed for the $7.50 tickets to the Saturday evening concerts, held on the following Friday. A second wait of three days and three nights followed; and in another hour and a half every seat was sold, and the season opened with actually not a seat of any description to sell, only admission tickets. No such sale was ever known, as it must be borne in mind that this was not a sale of tickets covering two or three weeks, but six months, with two concerts in each week. On Friday afternoons, in deference to students and others who had neither the inclination nor the means to attend the entire series, the second balcony, containing 466 seats, is thrown open to holders of what are called "rush" tickets,—first come, first served. 1,000 of these tickets are sold at 25 cents each; and as there are only seats for about one-half this number, the rest being obliged to either sit on the steps alongside the stage or stand up, the holders of these tickets begin to gather an hour before the doors open. Then at sharp half-past one, with six or seven hundred impatient music-lovers crowding each entrance to the hall, the doors are opened. The scene that follows almost beggars description. Old ladies, young girls, college students, Conservatory pupils, strangers unable to secure reserved seats, push, scramble, tug, and squeeze, all good-naturedly, in the mad race for the coveted seats in the second balcony, and in five minutes' time every seat is taken, and they sit quietly during the hour that intervenes before the concert begins, reading their analytical programmes or looking down on the more fortunate reserved seat-holders as they go to their places. This scene is repeated every Friday afternoon; and, when Conductor Nikisch lifts his bâton to commence the concert, the immense auditorium is filled in every nook and corner with over 3,000 expectant listeners. For the Saturday evening concerts, the entire house is reserved, admission selling at 50 cents; and another audience of 3,000 assembles to testify to the power of good music. The programme is so arranged as to last almost exactly an hour and a half, and usually comprises an overture, followed by a selection by the soloist, then an orchestral selection of a light order, another number by the soloist, and as a closing selection some standard symphony. In the months of December, January, February, and March, a week is devoted to a trip to New Haven, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Washington, the Boston concerts being omitted. This season these trips have been literally a series of triumphs, notably in New York, Philadelphia, and Washington. In Philadelphia, the concerts are given in the Academy of Music, seating 3,000; and every seat in the house has been sold before the doors were opened. At the last concert in Washington, in March, the new Lincoln Hall, seating 1,600, was packed to the doors, the sale of tickets having been stopped at half-past seven, the capacity of the hall being sold. One feature of these performances that accounts in a great measure for the marked success of the orchestra away from home is the fact that the same high standard of artistic excellence is maintained everywhere, Conductor Nikisch always exacting from his men their very best efforts. Another strong point is the arranging of programmes to suit the tastes of the audience, an item of no slight interest to the patrons of the concerts on the coming Western tour.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 28, 1890.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Last Symphony Concert of the Season Saturday.

It was a strangely selected programme, that which ended the symphonic series on Saturday, yet the excellent execution of the different numbers atoned for the oddity of their sequence. The first number was the overture known as "Leonora No. 3," and this was read and performed in a most commendable manner. It is probably the very best example of the dramatic school of overture, and its contrasted emotions form a most exciting tone-picture. It was not exaggerated in any degree, and the tendency which some conductors have to turn the finale into a wild scramble was resisted. Equally successful was the fourth Beethoven symphony which followed. The interpretation was remarkable for its conservative style, and no attempt was made to individualize any of its effects. Even the kettledrums, which have often been over-prominent, and which in this work have a most important part to play, were not allowed to dominate the strings in the great crescendo which ushers in the recapitulation of the themes. The symphony is one of the most radical of the nine, for although the sonata shape is faithfully followed, it is full of the boldest progressions and the most abrupt contrasts. It was but natural that Weber should have attacked its iconoclasm root and branch. The treatment of some of the instruments, too, was something entirely new at the time the work was composed (1806) and must have shocked many. Beethoven revelled in elevating the humbler instruments of the orchestra into positions of unexpected prominence. Take the kettledrums as an example; already in his first symphony he brings forward this instrument, which his predecessors had only used to strengthen the rhythm, and in this work they become an important factor in the proceedings. It is singular however that the trumpet was not raised into prominence also, but one may look through all the scores of the master and not find one difficult or unconventional trumpet passage. The contrabasses, however, were very often brought in the foreground, and not even the trio of the scherzo in the fifth symphony presents more difficulties for these, than the coda of the finale of this fourth symphony, and it is pleasant to note that they were played with absolute clearness, even in such trying passages as occur in this movement. It was altogether a performance which deserves cordial praise, a true Beethoven interpretation, in which the tempi and the thousand and one markings which the composer has so carefully placed in the work, were all respected.

And then the effect of such a masterpiece was destroyed by a piece of virtuosity below the dignity of these concerts and especially out of place after a great symphony. It seemed almost as a guantlet thrown down to those who have questioned the ensemble of the strings, and if it was intended in this sense, it was certainly successful, for the ensemble was perfect, every detail of shading being executed as if by one man. Yet David's arrangement of Paganini's "Moto Perpetuo" put one out of humor for the "Meistersinger" prelude which followed it, and destroyed the loftiness of the Beethoven symphony which preceded it. It had a Gilmorean flavor which was new to the programmes. It may be urged that Handel's Largo has been given in a similar manner at these concerts, but that work, although also an arrangement and designed to display the strings, was of intrinsically different content from this bit of musical fireworks. That the work was heartily applauded is undoubtedly true, but it is a question whether 32 banjos playing in unison would not have won as decisive a tribute from the unthinking. It was not unanimously applauded either, and for the first time signs of dissent quenched the enthusiasm of the majority.

The symphonic season of 1889-90 was in rondo form, and the theme of the beginning came back at the close, for as Mr. Nikisch began with the "Meistersinger" prelude, so also he ended with it. At the end of its performance the conductor was heartily applauded, the audience evidently desiring to speak their thanks in this manner, and in summing up the season's work it is impossible to withhold the tribute of hearty thanks to all concerned. There have been faults to find, and faultfinding is not a pleasant employment, but there has also been a manifest advance made in the most recent concerts. There has been more life and dash in the performances than ever before, and if this has been counterbalanced by occasional roughness of execution even this fault shows signs of amelioration. The programmes have not been as consistently educational as heretofore, but this is a failing that leans to virtue's side. The orchestra is still the best in the country, and with such artists in its ranks it would be difficult to deteriorate it from its present foremost position. LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Post

THURSDAY MORNING, MAY 1, 1890.

MME. MARGUERITE DE PACHMANN'S RECITAL.

